

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

EX LIBRIS

Joseph A. De Chantigny

with contributions by: Alice
Yeats, Charlotte, A.D.

EVERYMAN

OCTOBER 18—APRIL 11

1912-13

EVERYMAN

HIS LIFE, WORK, & BOOKS

VOLUME ONE

LONDON : PUBLISHED BY
J. M. DENT & SONS, LIMITED

MCMXIII

HAZELL, WATSON & VINEY, LD.,
PRINTERS,
4-8, KIRBY STREET, HATTON GARDEN,
LONDON, E.C.

LIST OF CONTENTS

INDEX OF SUBJECTS

	PAGE		PAGE
A Hundred Years Ago. (Entrance into Moscow.) By Count de Ségur	47	Correspondence (continued)—
Alsace, The Problem of. By Henri Lichtenberger	265	Historical Novels	183
American Election, The Lesson of the. By Hector Macpherson	134	Holland, Reading in	665
Angell, Norman, Biographical Sketch of	140	Ibsen and Democracy	700
" " The Omissions of. By Cecil Chesterton	115	Income Tax, A Progressive	410
" " On the Balkan Crisis. By H. H. O'Farrell, F.R.G.S.	371	Industrial Unrest	271
Anglo-German Relations, How to Improve. By Prof. Rudolf Eucken	551	Irish History, The Facts of	768
Apollonius of Tyana. By J. C. Squire	703	Joan of Arc, The Trial of	636
Arbitration as a Substitute for War	358	King's Mirror, The	536
Austen, Jane. By Augustus Ralli	218	Lamb and Burns	536, 604
Awakening in New England, An. By Vida D. Scudder	742	Land Reform	410, 469, 503
Balfour, Mr. A. J., as a Philosopher and Thinker	80	Largely Emotional	182
Balkan Crisis, Mr. Norman Angell on the. By H. H. O'Farrell	371	Literature, The Practical Teaching of	602
Balzac, The Best of	212	Macpherson, Mr., on G. B. S.	796
" Selections from	339	Masefield, J., The Poetry of	208, 246
Balzac and Scott. By George Saintsbury	22	Mill Girl, The	766
Bastille, Life in a London. Part I. By Thomas Holmes	682	Miners and Education	598
" " " Part II. " "	714	Moth and Rust	210
" " " Part III. " "	743	Napoleon as a Socialist	439
" " " Part IV. " "	781	Newman, The Real	95
Bennett, Arnold, Literary Confessions of	28	Nietzsche, Shaw, and Oscar Wilde	533
Benson, Monsignor. By E. Hermann	110	Novel, The Tyranny of, and Bible Reading	412, 537
Benson, Robert Hugh, as I Know Him. By Raymond Blathwayt	364	Paganism and Christianity	798, 832
Bergson, the French Philosopher. By Henri Mazel	652	Patriotism, The Ethical Foundations of	341, 410
Björnson in English. "A Gauntlet." By Norman W. Duthie	784	Peace and War	162
Books, The Burden of, and How to Bear it. By F. T. Dalton	459	Peasant Proprietorship and the Testamentary Law	380, 410
Books, The Gold in. By Dr. William Barry	58	Peasant, The Chance of the	62
Boy and his Mother, The. By Gilbert Thomas	495	Persia, The Strangling of	438
Brain Degenerating? Is the Human. By Hubert Bland	807	Pius X., Pope	156
Browne, Sir Thomas. By E. Hermann	684	Pleasure, The Cult of	567, 634
Burns, Was, a Modern Dante?	460	Poland, The Partition of	573
Cadis of London, The. By M. Hamilton	403	Poverty, War Against	271
Campbell, R. J. By E. Hermann	180	Progress and Christianity	668, 734
Canada and the Empire. By John A. Cooper	678	Protestant Protest, A	181
Carlyle, Jupiter. By Norman Maclean	336, 366	Protestantism, Scotland's Debt to	272, 342
Chalmers, Dr., as Social Reformer. By Hector Macpherson	811	Redmond, John	702
Charles II., The Truth About. By Cecil Chesterton	77	Refugees, The	128
Chesterton, G. K.: An Appreciation	172	Roman Catholic Protest, A	181
"G. K. C." as a Heretic. By Charles Sarolea	560	Ruskin on War	438
Child, The Problem of the. By Hector Macpherson	550	Ruskin, Prof. Saintsbury on	636, 662
Church and Social Problems, The. By Hector Macpherson	614	Schoolmaster, The Sad Lot of	571, 599, 633
Churches, The Future of the. By Rev. R. J. Campbell	9	Servile State, The	310, 343
Churches, What's Wrong with the? By W. Forbes Gray, 214,	242	Shaw, Bernard, and Religious Reforms	664
Citizen, The Call of the. By Lady Frances Balfour	719	" " G. K. Chesterton and	380
Civil Servants as Slaves of the State. By P. C. Moore	232	Shop Girl, The	668
Commons in Duress, The	203	Single Tax, The, v. Shaw, Belloc, and G. K. Chesterton	377
Conrad, Joseph, The Art of. By Richard Curle	176	" " and Land Nationalisation	408, 409
Constantinople for Christendom. By Rev. Percy Dearmer	199	Social Conditions? Is Religion responsible for	410
Cooking Threatened, French Supremacy in	46	Socialism, The Collapse of	271
Copyright Bill, An Open Letter on the New. By Charles Sarolea	521	" The Life and Death of	248, 341
Correspondence—		" The Student Teachers, A Chance for	378
Angell, Mr. Norman, The Omissions of	181, 208	Superman, The	273
Anglo-German Relations	630, 728, 764, 792, 829	Swiss, The Moral Progress of	828
Army, The, and Unemployment	732	Teachers, Should, Become Civil Servants?	535, 602, 666
Bar, The Girl Behind the	698	Turk, A Hungarian Plea for the	501, 636
Bennett, Arnold, A Protest by	92	Unemployment and Over Population	160
" Reply to	93	Wells, H. G.	764
Bible, The Value of	474, 508, 536, 573, 668, 734	Wells, Mr., and the Labour Revolt	377
Calvinist, The Modern, and Progress	665	Wesley's Journal	603, 668
Carlyle's "Gospel of Work"	378	Westward Ho!	160
Chesterton, G. K., and Bernard Shaw	380	Wilde, Oscar	156, 181, 210, 270, 272
G. K. C. as a Heretic	665	Women's Movement, An Appeal to	157
Children and Music Halls	631	Woman Suffrage, The Government and	273
Churches, The Future of the	62, 94, 127, 157	Work, Out of	635
Church, The, and Social Problems	735	World Ugly, The	701
Citizen, The Call of the	794		800
Classics, How to Save the	128	Countries of the World: An Attempt in Human Geography.
Constantinople and Christendom	272, 309, 341	By Charles Sarolea.
Cross, The, and the Crescent	474	I.—Russia	360
Daughter, The, at Home	537	II.—Belgium	394
Defence, The World's	210	III.—Germany	424
Divorce, The Problem of	248	IV.—Switzerland	456
Dowry Question, The, and French Marriages, 504, 538, 572,	600, 631	V.—The Kingdom of Poland	489
Education, An Eton	470, 536	VI.—The Argentine Republic	554
" A Roman Catholic	560, 574	VII.—Holland	584
" In Defence of the Board of	604	VIII.—China	618
" Miners and	599	IX.—Spain	630
" National	732, 792	X.—Roumania	686
Educational Reform	730, 765, 830	Countries of the World. By Constance de la Cour.	776
Edwin-Drood Controversy, The	251, 310	XI.—Denmark	391
England and Germany	158	Cross and the Crescent, The. By Dr. Percy Dearmer	391
Enterprise in Business	830	Decay of Our Nation, and Imperialist Policy, The. By H. Mayers Hyndman	427
Esperanto	797, 826	Deck, Men of the Lower. By A Naval Officer	117
Eugenist, The Case for the	308	Democracy and Diplomacy. By Hector Macpherson	70
EVERYMAN, Message of	160	Demos, The Drunken Giant. By Dr. William Barry	83
" On	210, 250	Disraeli, The Paradox of	234
Feminism in Literature	210, 246	Divorce, The Problem of. By Hector Macpherson	166
German, The Neglect of	63, 94, 128, 148, 158	Dome, Under the Great	240
Germany and Religion	535	Dostoevsky, Feodor. By J. A. T. Lloyd	401
Government Schools, Why, are Unpopular	602	" and the Religion of Human Suffering	588
Half-Timerdom, The Glorious Freedom of	796	Doyle's, Sir A. C., "Refugees"	54
		Drama, Sex and the. By Arthur Owen Orrett	815
		Early English History, New Light on	626
		East, A New Power Arising in the	120

	PAGE		PAGE
Ecclesiastic, A Great, and a Great Preacher. By Norman Maclean	597	London, The Bishop of. By E. Hermann	76
Educational Reform. By Prof. John Adams	625	London, The Night Side of	498
By Prof. J. J. Findlay	745	Maeterlinck, Maurice	42
Educational Symposium:—		Main Currents of Modern Thought. By Rudolf Eucken	596
Introduction. By the Editor	40	Masefield's Portrait, Mr. By Ernest Rhys	300
I. By A. C. Benson	40	The Poetry of. By Gilbert Thomas	188
II. By W. H. D. Rouse	41	Masque of Learning, The	657
III. By Oscar Browning	112	Masterpiece for the Week—
Education, The Nationalisation of	530	I.—Balzac's "Old Goriot." By J. Middleton Murry	431
"Edwin Drood" Controversy, The. By Liddell Goddie	190	H.—Rousseau's "Emile." By Charles Sarolea	466
Empire, A Motto of. By Sir Sidney Lee	697	III.—Balzac's "Cousin Pons." By Henri Mazel	500
Enterprise in Business, An Omission in the Socialist Argument	744	IV.—Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic"	527
Esperanto, A Plea for	750	V.—Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird." By Florence G. Fidler	559
Eton, Education, An. By Mgr. R. H. Benson	328	VI.—Ruskin's "The Crown of Wild Olive." By Prof. G. Saintsbury	591
" " " " " " " "	374	VII.—Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." Part I. By Ernest Rhys	623
" " " " " " " " A Reply to Mgr. Benson, By an Eton Master	406	VIII.—Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." Part II. By Ernest Rhys	656
Eucken, Rudolf. By E. Hermann	556	IX.—Mrs. Gaskell's " Sylvia's Lovers." By John K. Prothero	694
Eugenist, The Case Against the. By Hector Macpherson	198	X.—Thomas Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus." By Hector Macpherson	721
EVERYMAN, The Message of	3	XI.—Huxley's "Lay Sermons"	758
The New Year Message of. By the Editor	359	XII.—William Law's "Serious Call." By Hugh Sinclair	785
Fabre, Henri, The Insects' Homer. By Prof. J. Arthur Thomson	213	XIII.—Thackeray's "Vanity Fair." By John K. Prothero	820
Fawcett, Mrs. Henry, An Appreciation of. By Mrs. H. M. Swanwick	524	Meredith and Carlyle. By W. R. Thomson	238
FitzGerald, Edward, and his Times. By Augustus Ralli	299	Meredith, George, in his Letters. By Darrel Figgis	26
Ford House. By Dorothy Eyre	689	Merrick, Leonard. By M. Hamilton	335
France, Anatole, A Visit to. By Mrs. John Lane	428	Molière and Mr. Shaw. By Ernest Rhys	88
French Novel, A Notable. By Sir George Douglas	78	Montaigne, Our Portrait of	396
French President, The New, Monsieur Raymond Poincaré. By "C. S."	455	Montaigne and Nietzsche. By Charles Sarolea	814
French Renaissance, The. By Charles Sarolea	207	Montenegro and its Ruler	20
Galsworthy, John, Character Sketch of. By E. Hermann	780	Montessori Method, The	369
Gaskell, Mrs., The Women of. By Margaret Hamilton	174	More, Sir Thomas, The Picture of. By E. R.	236
German Emperor, The. By Charles Sarolea	56	Moscow—
German, The Neglect of	11	Entrance into Moscow. By Count de Ségur	47
Germany and England. By Prof. Hans Delbruck	45	The Burning of Moscow. " "	85
" England, and. By Sir John Brunner	108	The Retreat from Moscow. " "	177
A Reply to Sir John Brunner by G. F. Foulston	168	Moth and Rust. By Dora Owen	113
Germany, Our Relations with	252	A Reply to. By Willfred A. Nathan	170
Gibbon's Autobiography	399	Mother, My. By Peter Altenberg	52
Goltz, von der, A Question put to Field-Marshal	138	Napoleon as a Socialist. By Charles Sarolea	264, 258
Gooseberry-Fool, The. By "W. R. T."	433	Newman, Cardinal, A Defence of. By W. S. Lilly	658
Gore, Bishop. By E. Hermann	716	Newman, The Real. By A. Houtin	53
Girondists, The Trial of. By Henri Mazel	788	Nietzsche, The Confessions of. By Henri Lichtenberger	139
"Great Adventure, The." at the Kingsway Theatre	751	Montaigne and. By Charles Sarolea	814
Greek Drama, The. By Prof. J. S. Phillimore:—		Zarathustra, on Reading and Writing	85
I.—Æschylus	718	Notes, of the Week, 1, 37, 69, 101, 133, 165, 197, 229, 261, 293, 325, 357, 389, 421, 453, 485, 517, 549, 581, 613, 645, 677, 709, 741, 774,	806
II.—Sophocles	753	Novel, The Tyranny of the. By Canon Barry	337
III.—Euripides	783	Now, The Eternal. By Edmund G. Gardner	458
Hakluyt's Voyages. By A. G. Peskett	184	Octopus, The London	197
Happiness, The Philosophy of. By Mrs. Havelock Ellis	790	Out of Work. By Dr. Percy Dearmer	615
Hobby Horse, The Master of—Laurence Sterne. By W. R. T.	201	Pagan and Christian Ideals. By Hector Macpherson	688
Hugo, Victor. By E. Hermann	748	Parkman, Francis, as the National Historian of Canada	154
Hyde Park—The People's Forum	310	Patriotism, The Ethical Foundations of. By Charles Sarolea	244
Hyndman, Henry Mayers. By "C. C."	333	Peace, Why I Believe in. By Norman Angell	13, 39
Ibsen, Henrik	520	Peace with America, The Centenary of. By Hector Macpherson	326
Imprisonment, A Few Facts Concerning. By Thomas Holmes	528, 552	Peasant, The Chance of the. By G. K. Chesterton	4
Imprisonment, Facts and Suggestions Concerning. By Thomas Holmes	647	A Rejoinder	116
Industrial Unrest. By Emilo Vandervelde	169	Pepys, Samuel, The Dream of	81, 111
" " By Hector Macpherson	390	Pepys's, Mr., Portrait of. By Ernest Rhys	106
Insects' Homer, The—Henri Fabre. By Prof. J. Arthur Thomson	213	Pius X. By Abbé Houtin	79
Irish Character, The Making of	467	Pleasure, The Cult of. By Hector Macpherson	436
Irish Mystic, An: "Æ" and Agricultural Co-operation	487	Poetry—
Islam, The Influence of, upon Christendom. By Dr. Percy Dearmer	423	Appeal, An. By Annie Matheson	338
James, Henry, Wit and Wisdom of	46	Arcady, In. By Eric Lyall	592
Jona of Arc, The Trial of. By Henri Mazel	532	Bernondsey, From. By Thomas Burke	720
"John Bull's Other Island," at the Kingsway Theatre. By E. Hermann	654	Christmas, 1912. By Riccardo Stephens	363
King Edward in his True Colours. By Sydney Whitman	381	Craftsman, The. By E. R.	118
Knights Templars, The Trial of. By Henri Mazel	302	Day and Night in London. By William A. Page	552
Knox's, John, Influence on Scottish Education. By Lord Guthrie	156	Eve, By "Syned."	725
Kropotkin's "Fields, Factories and Workshops." By Hector Macpherson	38	Fair Assurance, The. By Max Plowman	817
Labour Revolt, The. By H. G. Wells	519	Fantasy. (Translation from Gerard de Nerval.)	626
Land Monopoly	137	Flowers of the Earth. By Darrel Figgis	33
Land Reform, EVERYMAN'S Referendum on	362	Hat, Her. (From Jules Lemaitre.)	528
Lang, Andrea, The Trustworthiness of. By A. Blyth Webster	121	Hospital Nurse, The	583
"Largely Emotional." By Dr. William Barry	114	Invasion, The. By Ella E. Walters	654
Letters to Living Authors. I.—To Anthony Hope, Esq. By Lewis Melville	468	Kinship. By Thomas Moulton	242
Life at High Pressure	297	Masefield, John, Two Poems by: The Harp, and Dead Calm	146
Life, The Origin of. By Alfred Russel Wallace, O.M.	5	Memoriam, In. By Lewis Wharton	187
Literary Competition, Our	33, 303	Meredith, To George. By H. B. Binns	10
Literary Notes. By "X. Y. Z." 267, 305, 334, 367, 400, 432, 465, 494, 526, 558, 590, 622, 655, 690, 715, 752, 782,	822	Moments. By George S. Astins	269
Literature, The Practical Teaching of. By "Sigma."	529	Night. By Josef Eichendorff, Freiherr von	148
Living Wage, The	488	Owls, The. (From Baudelaire.)	459
London Bastille, Life in a. By Thomas Holmes, 682, 714, 743,	781	Pagan's Testament, A. By Thomas Moulton	108
London's Saturday Night	627	Passers-By. By Eric Lyall	502
		Peace. By Herbert Baxter	696
		Poetry, The Tribunal of. By J. S. Phillimore	183
		Prison. By Lady Margaret Sackville	682
		Progress. By E. G. Buckenridge	297
		Sea, The. By Isidore G. Ascher	200
		Sea Spray. By A. E. Stirling	392
		Strophe (with Translation). By Graf Adolf Friedrich von Schaek	206
		Suffragist, The Answer of Lady Margaret Sackville	78
		Sultana's Head, The. François Coppée. Translated by R. B. Townshend	960

Poetry (continued)—

Through Gates of Sleep. By Winifred Holmden	784
To Some Birds Singing on a Mild Morning in Midwinter. By Gilbert Thomas	566
Two Dawns, The. By Carlton Howell	789
Winter Thoughts—Dartmoor Gaol	462
Wood, The. By Reginald Peirson	351
World's Defence, The. A Reply to Lady Margaret Sackville. By "C. W."	144

Poincaré, Raymond, Monsieur, The New French President. By C. S.

Poincaré, Monsieur, as a Man of Letters. By Charles Sarolea	455
Polar Exploration, The Present Position of. By Sir Ernest Shackleton, C.V.O.	492

Portraits and Character Sketches. Portraits by W. H. Caffyn—

1. Angell, Norman, Biographical Sketch of ... 140
Portrait of ... 141
2. Benson, Robert Hugh, As I Know Him. By Raymond Blathwayt ... 364
Benson, Mons., Robert Hugh, Portrait of ... 365
3. Bergson, The French Philosopher. By Henri Mazel ... 652
Henri, Portrait of ... 653
4. Browne, Sir Thomas ... 684
Portrait of ... 685
5. Burns, Was, a Modern Dante? ... 460
Robert, Portrait of ... 461
6. Chesterton, G. K., An Appreciation ... 172
Portrait of ... 173
7. Dostoevski and the Religion of Human Suffering ... 588
Feodor ... 589
8. Eucken, Rudolph. By E. Hermann ... 556
Portrait of ... 557
9. Fawcett, Mrs. Henry, An Appreciation of. By Mrs. H. M. Swanwick ... 524
Fawcett, Mrs. Henry, LL.D., Portrait of ... 525
10. France, Anatole, A Visit to. By Mrs. John Lane ... 428
Portrait of ... 429
11. Galsworthy, John. By E. Hermann ... 780
Portrait of ... 773
12. Gore, Bishop. By E. Hermann ... 716
Portrait of ... 717
13. Hugo, Victor. By E. Hermann ... 748
Portrait of ... 749
14. Ibsen, Henrik ... 620
Portrait of ... 621
15. MacCarthy, Miss Lillah, as Viola in "Twelfth Night" ... 205
16. Maeterlinck, Maurice. Portrait by Will Rothenstein ... 43
Character Sketch ... 42
17. Masefield's, Mr., Portrait. By Ernest Rhys ... 300
Masefield, John, Portrait of ... 301
18. Montaigne, Our Portrait of ... 396
Portrait of ... 397
19. More, Sir Thomas. By E. R. ... 236
Portrait of ... 237
20. Pepys's, Mr., Portrait. By Ernest Rhys ... 106
Pepys, Mr., Portrait of ... 107
21. Poincaré, Mons., as a Man of Letters. By Charles Sarolea ... 492
Poincaré, Mons., Raymond, Portrait of ... 493
22. Rodin, Auguste, Character Sketch of. By Henri Mazel ... 74
Portrait of. By Will Rothenstein ... 75
23. Rousseau, Jean Jacques. By E. Hermann ... 818
Portrait of ... 805
24. Swedenborg, The Savant and the Seer. By J. Howard Spalding ... 330
Swedenborg, Emanuel ... 331
25. Wallace, Alfred Russel. Portrait by Will Rothenstein ... 7
A Note on ... 8

Poor, The Housing of the. By Hector Maepherison ... 422

Poverty, War Against. By Mrs. Sydney Webb, D.Litt. ... 109, 136
A Rejoinder. By Mrs. Sydney Webb, D.Litt. ... 329

Preachers of To-day, Great. By E. Hermann—

- I.—The Bishop of London ... 76
- II.—Monsignor Benson ... 110
- III.—Bishop Gore ... 149
- IV.—Rev. R. J. Campbell ... 181

"Pretenders," The (of Henrik Ibsen), at the Haymarket Theatre. By C. B. Purdom ... 624

Protestantism, Scotland's Debt to. By Hector Maepherison ... 220

Putumayo Atrocities, The ... 563

Railways, The Nationalisation of. By Hector Maepherison ... 230

Redmond, Mr. John.—A Misunderstanding. By Prof. T. M. Kettle ... 533

Reviews—

Angell, Norman. "Peace Theories and the Balkan War" ... 371

Audoux, Marguerite. "Valserine," and Other Stories ... 344

Armstrong, Robert Cornell. "Just Before the Dawn" ... 509

Balfour, Lady Frances. "Life of Dr. MacGregor" ... 597

Barker, J. Ellis. "Modern Germany" ... 254

Barrett, Prof. Sir W. F. "Swedenborg, The Savant and the Seer" ... 316

Belloc, Hilaire. "The Servile State" ... 88

Benson, A. C. "The Beauty of Life" (a Day Book) ... 595
"Along the Road" ... 672

Berger, Francesco. "Reminiscences and Impressions and Anecdotes" ... 640

Books of the Week, 222, 256, 318, 352, 384, 416, 446, 480, 512, 544, 577, 604, 642, 673, 704, 736, 770, 800, ... 832

Christmas Books for the Bairns ... 280
Gift Books ... 274

Conrad, Joseph. "Twixt Land and Sea" ... 338

Courlander, A. "Mightier than the Sword" ... 60

Reviews (continued)—

Crockett, S. R. "Sweethearts at Home"	348
E. R. "The Moss Troopers"	402
Davidson, A. G. "Victor Hugo, his Life and Work"	347
Davis, F. Hadlund. "Myths and Legends of Japan"	350
"Day that Changed the World, The"	177
Doyle, A. Conan. "The Lost World"	155
Falls, J. C. Ewald. "Three Years in the Libyan Desert."	724
Translated by Elizabeth Lee	497
Figgis, Darrell. Essays	314
France, Anatole. "Bee, The Princess of the Dwarfs"	670
Gardner, Edmund G. "Dante and the Mystics"	320
Gift Books	192
Gordon, Rev. and Hon. Arthur. "Life of Professor Charteris"	597
Gretton, R. H. "A Modern History of the English People" Vol. I.	542
Harden, Maximilian. "Word Portraits" and "Monarch and Men"	252
Hardenburg, W. G. "The Putumayo: The Devil's Paradise"	563
Harrison, E. J. "The Fighting Spirit of Japan"	479
Hawkesworth, C. E. M. "The Last Century in Europe"	659
Hill, C. Chatterton. "The Philosophy of Nietzsche"	413
Horton, Robert F., D.D. "Great Issues"	479
Hudson, W. H. "The Story of the Renaissance"	542
Hunt, B. "Folk-Tales of Brefny"	144
Innes, A. D. "A History of the British Nation"	318
"Iona Books, The"	312
Joudwine, J. W. "The First Twelve Centuries of British Story"	626
Kerr, Caroline V. "The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner"	755
Kettle, Prof. "The Day's Burden"	604
Kirtlin, Ernest J. B. "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight"	314
Kitchin, George. "Sir Roger L'Estrange"	638
Lang, Andrew. "Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown"	312
Lang, Mrs. Andrea. "Men, Women and Mixes"	541
Legge, E. "King Edward in His True Colours." Review by Sidney Whitman	381
Leighton, Gerald. "The Greatest Life"	510
Littlewood, S. R. "The Story of Santa Claus"	186
Lloyd, J. A. T. "A Great Russian Realist—Feodor Dostoevsky"	90
Macaulay, Rose. "The Lee Shore"	126
Magazines of the Month	575
Mansfield, Katherine. "In a German Pension."	192
Mason, A. E. W. "The Turnstile"	118
"Mightier than the Sword." By Alphonse Courlander	60
Miles, Clement A. "Christmas in Ritual and Tradition"	315
Milne, James. "John Jonathan and Company"	179
O'Brien, Mrs. Wm. "Unseen Friends"	592
Paget, Bishop. Biography	414
Paterson, Rev. W. P., D.D. "The Rule of Faith—A Scottish Theologian"	747
Petre, Maud. "The Life of George Tyrell"	122
Perris, Herbert. "Germany and the German Emperor"	252
Phillimore, J. S. (translator). "Apollonius of Tyana"	703
"Q." "Hocken and Huneken"	316
Reynolds, Stephen. "Men of the Lower Deck"	116
"Rifeman, A." "The Struggle for Bread"	511
Rolland, Romain. "Life of Michaelangelo"	90
Rose, J. H. "The Personality of Napoleon"	255
Shaw, Charlotte. "Selected Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw"	256
Shuster, W. Morgan. "The Strangling of Persia"	314
Sneath, E., Hershey, Ph.D. "Wordsworth, Poet of Nature and Poet of Man"	478
Snowden, Philip, M.P. "The Living Wage"	188
Strindberg, August. "The Inferno"	351
Stubbs, C. W. "Cambridge and its Story"	382
Sudermann, Herman. "Plays"	344
Szász, Elsa de. "The Temple on the Hill"	444
Thomas, Edward. "George Borrow: The Man and His Books"	316
Toynbee, Mrs. Paget. "Lettres de Mme. du Deffand à Horace Walpole"	90
Trèves, Sir Frederick. "The Land that is Desolate"	383
Wace, Henry, D.D. "Some Questions of the Day"	437
Wallace, Sir D. Mackenzie. "Russia"	373
Wangh, Rosa. "Life of Benjamin Waugh"	347
Way, Herbert W. L. "Round the World for Gold"	476
Webb, Sydney and Beatrice. "The Story of the King's Highway"	638
Wells, G. H. "Marriage"	124
Whitman, Sidney. "German Memories"	254
Whyte, Alexander, D.D. "Jacob Behmen"	402
"Santa Teresa"	414
Wilson, Philip. "The Beginning of Modern Ireland"	467
Worsley, F. W., M.A., B.D. "The Theology of the Church of England"	670
Wyndham, Hon. Mrs. Hugh. "The Correspondence of Sarah Spencer, Lady Lyttelton"	540
Zwemer, Samuel M., D.D. "The Moslem Christ"	509
Rodin, Auguste. By Henri Mazel	74
Russian Church, The Future of. By Dr. Percy Dearmer	499
Russian's View of Russia. A	520
Rutherford, Mark. By Hugh Sinclair	762
Scott, Captain Robert Falcon, A British Hero	550
Scott and Balzac. By George Saintsbury	22
Sex and the Drama. By Arthur Owen Orrett	815
Shaw, George Bernard, as the Champion of Capitalism. An Open Letter on the New Copyright Bill. By Charles Sarolea	521
Shaw, G. B. "Wit and Wisdom" of	231, 263

Short Stories—

	PAGE
The Victim. By Perceval Gibbon	18
Father Gaucher's Elixir. By Alphonse Daudet	49
Tramping Afloat. By Stephen Reynolds	147
A Russian Cabman. By A. Chekov	178
The Stars. By Alphonse Daudet	211
Hard and Sharp. A Somerset Sketch. By H. Hay Wilson	241
Mons. Seguin's Goat. By Alphonse Daudet	268
Nostalgia. By Peter Altenberg	307
The Goldfinches of Galilee. By René Bazin	339
Chrissy at the Lodge. By Jane Barlow	372
The Carpenter. By William Howard	402
Our Lady's Juggler. By Anatole France	436
The Peaches. By André Theuriot	463
The Spirits' Mass. By Anatole France	496
A Crust of Bread. By Henri Lavedan	565
The House Invisible. By Allan Sullivan	593
Queen Hortense. By Guy de Maupassant	628
The Sultan's Head. By François Coppée	660
La Bretagne. By André Theuriot	692
The Old Bell-Ringer. By W. Korolenko	724
Boy's Love. By Beatrice Marshall	756
The Dog that Lost His Character. A Cautionary Tale. By "H. H. W."	824
Should Lloyd George Imitate Napoleon? By Emile Vandervelde	586
Should Lloyd George Imitate Napoleon? A Reply. By Hilaire Belloc	710
Slms, The Problem of the. By Hector Macpherson	518
South Pole, The Conquest of the. By W. Forbes Gray	327
Silhouettes 245, 299, 332, 363, 430, 491, 531, 562, 587, 693, 761	761
Socialism, The Alleged Collapse of. By Bernard Shaw	231, 263
Socialism, The Collapse of. By G. K. Chesterton	167
Socialist, A Salute to the Last. By G. K. Chesterton	296
Spiritual Interpretation of Nature. The. By Hector Macpherson	368
State, The Servile. By Hilaire Belloc	202
Sterne, Laurence, The Master of the Hobby Horse. By W. R. T.	201
Stevenson, R. L., The Beloved Vagabond. By W. R. T.	144
Street that Never Sleeps, The. By Margaret Hamilton	306
Strikers and the Public. The. By Rowland Kenney	295
Strindberg, Three Volumes by. By Richard Curle	364
Student Teachers, A Chance for the	171
Swendenborg: The Savant and the Seer. By J. Howard Spalding	330, 370
Syndicalism	102
Synge, J. M. By G. M. Brophy	8
Taxation and Social Reform. By Hector Macpherson	454
Theologian, A Scottish. By W. R. Thomson	747
Tolstoy's "War and Peace." By Charles Sorela	16
"Twelfth Night" at the Savoy Theatre. By C. B. Purdom	204

Twentieth Century, Epistle to the. By Prof. Saintsbury	233
Twentieth Century, The. A Reply. By A. S. Neill	332
Ugly, The World. By Dr. Percy Dearmer	679
Unity, A High Churchman's Project of. By Prof. W. P. Paterson, D.D.	561
Unseen Literary Friends	592
Vagabond, The Beloved (R. L. Stevenson). By W. R. T.	144
Waiting. By Peter Altenberg	82
War, The Futility of. By Norman Angell	142
War, Who is Responsible for the?	2
Waterloo, The Battle of. Part I. By Hilaire Belloc	809
Week, Echoes of the	434
Wells, H. G. By Richard Curle	304
Welsh Clouds. By Dorothy Eyre	747
Wesley, John, Journal of. By Principal Whyte	84, 105
West, Mrs. George Cornwallis. "The Bill"	821
West or East? By Austin Harrison	646
"Westward Ho!" and "Refugees" Controversy, The. By George Saintsbury	308
"Westward Ho!" By Monsignor R. H. Benson	103
"Westward Ho!" A Reply to Monsignor Benson. By Robert Candlish	175
"Westward Ho!" Again. A Rejoinder. By Monsignor Benson	200
Why is Living Cheaper in France than in England?	392
Why the Turk Must Go. By a Member of the Diplomatic Service	426
Wilde, Oscar, Recollections of. By Henri Mazel	14
Wilson, President Woodrow. By A. F. Whyte, M.P.	135
Women at Work—
I.—The Shop Girl	582
II.—The Girl Behind the Bar	616
III.—The Chorus Girl	648
IV.—The Mill Girl	680
V.—The Nurse	712
VI.—The Typist	778
VII.—The Journalist	812
Women's Movement, An Appeal to the. By Dr. Wm. Barry	145
Women's Page—
1. Concerning the Human Child. By Evelyn Burke	683
2. The Conference Habit. By Evelyn Burke	726
3. The Labour Member's Wife. By Edith J. Macrosty	786
Women's Suffrage, The Present Position of. By Mrs. Henry Fawcett, LL.D.	523
Working Classes, The Abolition of—
Part I.—The Work that Must be Done. By L. G. Chiozza Money	775
Part II.—The Path to Freedom. By L. G. Chiozza Money	810

INDEX OF AUTHORS

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
ADAMS, Professor John	825	FOUSTON, G. F.	168	O'FARRELL, H. H.	871
ALTENBERG, Peter	52, 82, 307	FRANCK, Anatole	436, 496	ORRETT, Arthur Owen	816
ANGELL, Norman	13, 39, 142			OWEN, Dora	113
ASCHER, Isidore G. (poem)	20	GARDNER, Edmund G.	458	PAGE, Wm. A. (poem)	552
ASTINS, George S. (poem)	269	GEDDIE, Liddell	190	PATERSON, Prof. W. P., D.D.	561
BALFOUR, Lady Frances	719	GIBBON, Perceval	18	PERSON, Reginald (poem)	361
BARLOW, Jane	372	GRAY, W. Forbes	214, 242, 327	PESKETT, A. G.	184
BARRY, Dr. William	58, 83, 114, 145, 373	GUTHRIE, Lord	156	PHILLIMORE, Prof. J. S.	183 (poem), 718, 753, 783
BAXTER, Herbert (poem)	696	HAMILTON, Margaret	174, 308, 335, 403, 582, 616, 648, 680, 712, 778, 812	PILOWMAN, Max (poem)	817
BAZIN, René	339	HARRISON, Austin	646	PROTHERO, John K.	694, 820
BELLOC, Hilaire	202, 710, 809	HERMANN, E.	78, 110, 149, 180, 556, 654, 684, 716, 748, 780, 818	PURDOM, C. B.	204, 624
BENSON, A. C.	40	H. H. W.	824	RALLI, Augustus	218, 289
" Mgr. R. H.	103, 200, 328, 374, 404	HOLMDEN, Winifred (poem)	784	REYNOLDS, Stephen	147
BINNS, H. B. (poem)	10	HOLMES, Thomas	528, 552, 647, 682, 714, 743, 781, 79	RHYS, Ernest	83, 106, 300, 623, 656
BLAND, Hubert	807	HOUTIN, Abbé	53, 79	ROUSE, W. H. D.	41
BLATHWAYT Raymond	364	HOWARD, William	402	SACKVILLE, Lady Margaret (poems)	78, 682
BROPHY, G. M.	8	HOWELL, Carlton (poem)	789	SAINTEBURY, Professor George	23, 253, 302, 591
BROWNING, Oscar	112	HYNDMAN, H. Mayers	427	SAROLEA, Dr. Charles—	16, 56, 72, 207, 244, 264, 298, 360, 394, 424, 456, 486, 489, 492, 521, 554, 560, 584, 618, 650, 686, 814
BRUNNER, Sir John	108	KENNEY, Rowland	295	SCHACK, Graf Adolf Friedrich von (poem)	206
BUCKENIDGE, E. G. (poem)	297	KETTLE, Professor T. M.	533	SCUDDER, Vids D.	742
BURKE, Evelyn	683, 726	KOROLEVSK, W.	724	SÉOUR, Count de	47, 85, 177
" Thomas (poem)	720	LANE, Mrs. John	428	SHACKLETON, Sir Ernest, C.V.O.	71
CAMPELL, Rev. R. J.	9	LAVEDAN, Henri	565	SHAW, Bernard	281, 288
CANDLISH, Robert	175	LEE, Sir Sidney	697	" SIGMA "	529
C. C.	333	LEMAITRE, Jules (poem)	628	SINCLAIR, Hugh	763, 785
CHEGRO, A.	178	LICHTENBERGER, Professor Henri	193, 295	SPALDING, J. Howard	880
CHESTERION, Cecil	77, 115	LILLY, W. S.	658	SQUIRE, J. C.	708
" G. K.	4, 298	LLOYD, J. A. T.	401	STEPHENS, Riccardo (poem)	363
COOPER, John A.	678	LYALL, Eric (poems)	502, 592	STIRLING, A. E.	392
COFFÉE, François	660	MACLEAN, NORMAN	336, 366, 597	SULLIVAN, Allan	598
C. S.	28, 45	MACPHERSON, Hector—	88, 70, 134, 166, 198, 220, 280, 326, 368, 390, 429, 454, 485, 518, 550, 614, 688, 721, 811	SWANWICK, Mrs. H. M.	624
CURLE, Richard	176, 304, 364	MACROSTY, Edith J.	786	" SYNED " (poem)	725
C. W.	144	MARSHALL, Beatrice	756	THEURIOT, André	463, 692
DALLON, F. T.	459	MASEFIELD, John (poems)	146	THOMAS, Gilbert	566 (poem), 496
DAUDET, Alphonse	211, 268	MASTER, An Eton	406	THOMSON, Professor J. Arthur	213
DEARMER, Dr. Percy	199, 391, 423, 499, 615, 679	MATHERON, Annie (poem)	888	" W. R.	232, 747
DE LA COOR, Constance	776	MAUPASSANT, Guy de	628	VANDERVELDE, Emile	169, 586
DELBOROUGH, Professor Hans	45	MAZEL, Henri	14, 74, 202, 500, 532, 658, 788	WALLACE, Alfred Russel, O.M.	6
DIPLOMATIC SERVICE, A Member of the	426	MELVILLE, Lewis	468	WALTERS, Ella E. (poem)	64
DOUGLAS, Sir George	78	MONEY, Chiozza, L. G.	776, 810	WEBB, Mrs. Sydney, D.Litt.	100, 186
DUTHIE, Norman W.	784, 821	MOORE, R. C.	282	WEBSTER, A. Blyth	121
EDITOR, The	40, 359	MUCLT, Thomas (poems)	108, 242	WELLS, H. G.	519
EICHENDORFF, Joseph, Freiherr von	148	MURRY, J. Middleton	431	WHARTON, Lewis (poem)	187
E. K.	113 (poem), 296	NATHAN, Wilfred A.	170	WHITMAN, Sydney	881
ECKEN, Professor Rudolf	689, 747	NEILL, A. E.	832	WHYTE, Principal A.	84, 105
EYRE, Dorothy	745	NIETZSCHE	85	" A. F., M.P.	185
FAWCETT, Mrs. Henry, LL.D.	523			WILSON, H. Hay	241
FIEDLER, Florence G.	28			W. R. T.	201, 488
FLOOD, Darrell	33 (poem), 28
FINDLAY, Professor J. J.	745

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 1. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1912.

One Penny.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	1
WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR?	2
THE MESSAGE OF "EVERYMAN"	3
THE CHANCE OF THE PEASANT—
By G. K. Chesterton	4
THE ORIGIN OF LIFE—
By Alfred Russel Wallace, O.M.	5
PORTRAIT OF ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S. By Will Rothenstein	7
A NOTE ON ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE	8
J. M. SYNGE. By G. M. Brophy	8
THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES—
By the Rev. R. J. Campbell	9
TO GEORGE MEREDITH. A Sonnet—
By H. B. Binns	10
THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN	11

CONTENTS

ON THE
ORIGIN OF LIFE

DR. ALFRED
RUSSEL WALLACE
O.M.

WHY I BELIEVE IN PLACE—	PAGE
By Norman Angell	13
RECOLLECTIONS OF OSCAR WILDE—
By Henri Mazel	14
TOLSTOV'S "WAR AND PEACE"—
By Charles Sarolea	16
THE VICTIM. A Short Story
By Perceval Gibbon	18
SCOTT AND BALZAC
By George Saintsbury	22
GEORGE MEREDITH IN HIS LETTERS—
By Darrel Figgis	26
LITERARY CONFESSIONS OF ARNOLD BENNETT	28
A POEM BY DARREL FIGGIS	33
LITERARY COMPETITION	33
ANNOUNCEMENTS	34

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK

UP to the time of going to press there has been no actual declaration of war against Turkey by the Balkan Confederacy, but there seems no possibility of hope that it can be long delayed. It is understood that the allied Balkan States will present a simultaneous ultimatum immediately, and this can only mean a declaration of war by the allied peoples. Meanwhile, the Montenegrin armies are so far completely victorious, and are marching on Scutari, which will soon be invested on all sides. Now that war has come at last, it takes some effort of imagination to grasp the grim reality that confronts us. It is not like the war against Italy, a war undertaken for the annexation of a sandy waste on African shores. This is a National war, a Holy war, a war of Liberation; it is a war of Passion, of Revenge, in which Bulgaria, Montenegro, Servia and Greece are paying off the score of centuries of oppression.

One question forces itself upon us: Will it be possible to circumscribe the area of hostilities? Considering that Austria has solemnly declared that she has "vital interests" in the Balkans, and that in the semi-official journal Rossiya, of St. Petersburg, is published an article in which it is declared that "Russia's sympathies and pity are with the Balkan States"; and remembering that all the other great Powers have also, to say the least, very important interests to defend, and remembering that all those interests are conflicting, it is difficult to see how they can remain detached observers.

One little gleam of hope, however, comes from Vienna, for it is stated that Austro-Hungary will not take any active part, even though the Allies should interfere with the Sanjak of Novibazar.

It is true that a Viennese paper tells us that the Monarchy will have to see that at the end of the war its way to the South is not interfered with. This seems to point to the fact that the concert of Europe is yet in existence; but whether this is for the good of the small States who are thus fighting for their freedom is very difficult to decide.

One thing is certain, namely, that the status quo will never be restored; whether Turkey is beaten or victorious, whether Europe interferes or not, there will be an end to the direct rule of Turkey, in South-Eastern Europe especially. We shall hear no more of Macedonian atrocities. One tangible and enormous result will be achieved, the emancipation of the Macedonian people, the complete autonomy of that sorely tried nationality.

The Peace Treaty between Turkey and Italy was signed at Ouchy on Tuesday, thus bringing to an end a dreary war, which was nothing but an unprovoked aggression on the part of Italy, and which, we hope, may remain unique in modern history. This fact will, of course, leave Turkey's hands free to deal with her four small but gallant foes. At the same time it makes the task of the great Powers extremely difficult, and brings the danger of a European conflagration nearer. The concert is already feeling the consequences of its somewhat shamefaced connivance in Italy's aggression.

The Government have carried their closure resolutions with substantial majorities, and against Mr. Sandy's amendment to limit the legislative power of the Irish Parliament to a certain number of subjects, such as education, agriculture, maintenance of hospitals and charitable institutions, municipal institutions, etc., they had the large majority of 104.

Those who look for statesmanship in relation to Irish Home Rule will find it more often outside than inside the House of Commons, with its overheated atmosphere of party interest; and thus, while the faction fight proceeds at Westminster, sagacious counsels are finding good advocates in Lord Dunraven and Lord Macdonnell, who plead for a truce to party warfare in order that the Irish question may be reviewed and solved in coolness and reason.

Does the plea come too late? We hope and believe that it is not too late. Are the obstacles insurmountable? In appearance they may be; but obstacles as great were surmounted by that same group of loyal and patriotic Irishmen when they summoned the Land Conference ten years ago, and laid the foundation of the great Land Purchase Act of 1903. Everyone remembers how coldly the idea of that Conference was at first received; how its promoters were dismissed as adventurers and told to read Irish history if they wished to know why their Conference must fail. In the face of all, they persevered and carried the problem of Irish land to a lasting solution. Such a Conference conducted by just such men is the need of to-day, for the Irish question has ripened rapidly in the new and more temperate climate of opinion which now surrounds it.

An incident in the House of Commons on Tuesday night revealed in a flash the burning question of our time. After a day spent in sedate discussion of Clause 2 of the Home Rule Bill, a legal member rose on the motion for adjournment to cross-examine Mr. Lloyd George on the operations of his Land Inquiry Committee. In an instant the House was ablaze with the fiery passions that raged round the famous Budget of 1909. Wild words sped from side to side; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to reply, the uproar reached its height. With the merits of the particular point in dispute we are not concerned, but we point to the incident as a shadow of coming events.

We welcome the announcement that the agreement between the Post Office and the Marconi Company respecting the chain of British Wireless Telegraph Stations round the world is to be investigated by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, for only by this means can the ugly rumours of corruption be brought to light and killed.

The attempt on Mr. Roosevelt's life by a fanatic (or lunatic?) has caused great anxiety throughout America, and no less, we are quite sure, in England; for however we may disagree with the policy for which he stands, we cannot but admire the immense pluck and personality of the man. He has brought fresh life into American politics, which they sadly needed, and we are glad that so far there is no fear of danger to his life. Mr. Roosevelt's strenuous determination to go on with the programme of the evening, and to make a speech of an hour's length, no doubt has somewhat complicated the work of the surgeons, who at present do not intend to probe for the bullet; still there seems to be no fear but that he will make a complete recovery. President Taft's message is indeed significant. He says:—

"This assault, following on the shooting at Mayor Gaynor, two years ago, and the assassination of three out of the last nine Presidents elected by our people, is an event which must cause solemn reflecting by all Americans upon the conditions which make it possible that such dastardly deeds may occur in a country affording to its citizens such complete advantages of civil liberty."

What has happened in the Balkans has made a good deal of financial history, and at one moment it threatened to make a great deal more history, for the financial fabric was dangerously near a crisis of the first magnitude. Capital, as we all know, is highly sensitive; the faintest rumbling in the political atmosphere makes it shiver. Now the fact is, that within the past month or two there has been a gambling mania on the Continental Bourses, and stocks and shares, as is usual in such circumstances, were lifted up to an exceptionally high price, regardless of merit. It seemed like an inverted pyramid; a huge superstructure of speculation raised on a flimsy foundation. What was the result? Sanity momentarily returned, and in sheer desperation speculators jettisoned stocks, regardless of consequences. Had not influential bodies, the Paris Bourse, the Berlin Bourse, and many big bankers, adopted strenuous measures to allay the panic, it is certain that there would have been a crisis. Let us suppose that there had not been abnormal speculation—then the financial fabric would have shivered less alarmingly, because of the chance of all Europe being involved in a war. But with a war involving the whole of Europe the financial fabric will almost certainly crumble to pieces, because of the interdependence of finance.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR?

It would be amusing, if the subject were not so tragic, to read the commentary of British journalists on the recent events in the Balkans. With a touching unanimity they express their amazement at the failure of European diplomacy. They do not seem to realise that European diplomacy has never seriously meant to succeed, and has been nothing but a cloak to hide the selfish and unscrupulous designs of the diplomats themselves. Or the journalists express their indignation against the rash and unwarranted aggression of the Balkan nations. They seem entirely to forget that those nations have been for generations the all too patient victims of oppression.

A journalist must be either naively ignorant or shamelessly impudent thus to lay the responsibility of the war on the shoulders of the people of the Balkans. For that war is the inevitable outcome of the cynical and mischievous policy pursued for thirty years by the so-called "Concert of Europe." The Great Powers of Europe have handed over the Christian nations to the tender mercies of the Turk. They have refused to insist on the most elementary reforms; although by the Treaty of Berlin of 1878 they had solemnly pledged themselves to see a complete change in the administration carried out and to put an end for ever to Turkish misgovernment.

And not only have the Great Powers not insisted on the promised reforms being carried out, but they have themselves been the chief obstacle to the realisation of reform, and to the normal development of those beautiful and unhappy countries. Anyone who has travelled in the Balkans will be edified in a few weeks on the meaning of international political morality. When the secret history of the Balkan States comes to be written, it will reveal a lamentable record of dark conspiracy and Machiavellian intrigue.

Germany supported through thick and thin Abdul Hamid, "Abdul the damned." She lent him money to squander amongst his favourites. She reorganised his troops to crush his subjects. She propped his tottering throne. When William II. started on his pilgrimage to the Holy Land he stopped in Constantinople on his way to Jerusalem, and gave many tokens of his friendship to a tyrant whose hands were reeking with the blood of fifty thousand Armenians.

And Austria has done worse than Germany. Again and again she has stirred up the Balkan rulers against their people. She has utilised the late King Milan as a pawn in her own sordid game. The nations of the Balkans have often been blamed for their fratricidal quarrels. But we forget that it is generally Austria that has fomented those quarrels. Even as she used the vendetta of the Obrenovitch against the Karageorgevitch, thus being ultimately responsible for the ghastly butchery of Belgrade, even so has Austria played off Bulgaria against Serbia. Five years ago, whilst I was studying political conditions in the Peninsula, Serbia and Bulgaria^o had made up their minds to settle their old feuds and to conclude an alliance. But Austria opposed her veto, and declared that if such an alliance were concluded, Servian goods would not be allowed across the Danube.

One other illustration of Austrian policy may be given. It is typical of many. For years Servia has wanted to build a railway to provide a market for her agricultural produce. Austria has persistently prevented that railway being built. Until this day Servia is without an outlet on the Adriatic. She is shut in on every side, and is completely at the mercy of her mighty neighbour. As King Peter told the writer of these lines, in the course of an audience: "Nous devons passer par les fourches caudines de l'Autriche" ("We must pass under the caudine forks of Austria").

A truce, therefore, to our hypocritical lamentations! Let us not add insult to injury! Let us refrain from blaming the victims of our own greed and ambition. The score that is being settled is a very old one, and it will have to be settled once for all. Europe is reaping in blood a harvest which she has sown in iniquity. And all that Christian blood is on the head, not only of the Christian statesmen, but of the rulers of those Great Powers who have only used their strength to oppress the weak.

WHAT OF ARMENIA?

WHILE all eyes are fixed on the Balkans, it must not be forgotten that across the Hellespont there are other races who suffer under Turkish rule. From sources only too well authenticated comes the news that in Armenia murders, robbery, abduction, and forcible conversions to Islam have increased greatly, and passed the usual limit, since the new Cabinet came into power. The Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople made several protests, but no steps were taken to stop these misdeeds, and he resigned. The Armenian National Council at Constantinople also protested violently against this inhuman policy of exterminating the Christian population of Turkey. Some of the members went so far as to suggest an armed rebellion. Armenians from different parts of the world, and especially from Russia, are trying to make the respective Governments of the countries in which they live exercise their influence to put a stop to these atrocities. Even the present Foreign Minister of Turkey, who is an Armenian, resigned his post as a protest against the indifference of the Government towards the condition of Armenians, but the Cabinet has been able to win him over with promises which include the following provisions: Settlement of land disputes, organisation of local militia, equality of rights, etc. We are waiting for the result.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor cannot undertake to return manuscripts. If possible all manuscripts should be typewritten, and a stamped envelope enclosed.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar, London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d. Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post r.c. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE MESSAGE OF 'EVERYMAN'

THE object of EVERYMAN is to provide, at a price within the reach of all, a high-class literary journal, which will interpret to the people the best thought of English literature and world literature, and which will voice the ideals and aspirations of progressive democracy.

One of the most hopeful signs of the times is the extraordinary success of such popular collections as "Everyman's Library," which have revealed the vast and magnificent possibilities of what we may call the "democratisation" of literature. They have proved that the best policy for the publisher as for the statesman is to trust in the people. They have proved that there exists amongst the rising generation a keen, unsatisfied hunger for the purest and most substantial literary nourishment, and that the more the people have been debarred from their natural opportunities of culture at school, the more keenly anxious are they to obtain their intellectual and spiritual culture through the ministry of books, and through direct communion with the master-minds of all ages.

But it is not enough to place the treasures of literature within reach of the ordinary reader. We must also devise the best means and methods to unfold the nature and contents of a book, and show him how to appraise all books at their proper value; to distinguish the true from the false and the genuine from the counterfeit. It is not enough to open vistas in every direction. We must also guide the reader and see that he shall not miss the forest for the trees, that he shall not wander away from the royal road which leads to wisdom. It is not enough to say that Shakespeare and Tolstoi, that Ruskin and Carlyle, have an illuminating message for him. He must be able to understand that message for himself, and its bearing on the problems of the day and the relation of literature to life.

To provide such assistance and guidance and interpretation is the essential purpose of EVERYMAN.

There never was a time when such guidance was more urgently needed. We are living in a wonderful age, when every landmark is being swept away, when every belief is being questioned, when every established institution is on its trial, when reform is the order of the day, when almost every writer is a "Herald of Revolt." Whether that unrest and revolt will lead to a peaceful and orderly reconstruction of human society, or whether that reconstruction shall be preceded by a revolutionary catastrophe will entirely depend on the wisdom of the people, and that wisdom will largely depend on the light and leading which they will receive; which, again, will mainly depend on the sense of responsibility of those who, by their writings, are moulding and directing public opinion.

EVERYMAN, therefore, will not look at the great political and religious struggles of the present generation with the aloofness and detachment of the academic recluse, but, whilst ministering to the needs of everyday life, whilst remaining in close touch with all the problems of the day, it will be its aim and purpose to consider life from the higher plane of the ideal, and, above all, to avoid the turbid atmosphere of political and religious partisanship. Whilst keenly interested in the burning controversies of the age, it will open its columns to the expression of every honest conviction, and will deliberately invite discussion and contradiction.

THE CHANCE OF THE PEASANT * * * BY G. K. CHESTERTON

Two very extraordinary and rather unexpected things have happened in the recent political thought of this country. I mean the simultaneous collapse of the thing that is called Individualism and also of the thing that is called Socialism—at least in England and by the English Socialists. When I was last in Paris I remember seeing an election placard, advocating the claims of a gentleman with the attractive name of Baube; in which, if I remember right, that politician described himself as "Deputé Sortant Radical Republican Socialiste Anti-Collectiviste." I have never been a Deputé (thank God), and if I had been I should doubtless have been Sortant at an early opportunity; but in all other respects I think that portentous catalogue describes my own political opinions with a precision and lucidity which I and my countrymen can seldom rival. For the sake of clearness, therefore, and the avoidance of a mere verbal wrangle, I will call the Marxian and Fabian scheme for giving up to the Government all the primary forms of property, by the special term Collectivism; while I call the old English trust in competition and individual enterprise by its old name of Individualism. It is appropriate to get the names of these two causes quite clear cut and legible. For epithets are important in epitaphs: and both these causes are dead.

An ideal, it is true, can never die; not even when all the idealists are sick of it. But these two things never were ideals. They were compromises: and nothing, not a thousand door-nails, can ever be so dead as a dead compromise. It is as dead as a joke that nobody laughed at, a compliment that did not please, or a piece of exquisite social tact that made things worse than they were. And these two compromises of Collectivism and commercial Individualism—these two compromises have proved very compromising indeed. Our fathers endured the ugliness and cruelty of competition because it would lead at last to everybody being rich. We, in our Socialist youth, endured the dreariness and insane simplification of State ownership because it would lead at last to nobody being poor. But no human being to whom the word Liberal meant anything more than the word lollipops, ever really liked the notion of sacking everybody till everybody found his economic level; or ever really liked the notion of State officials distributing gardens as postmen distribute letters; or stopping building and bargaining as policemen stop traffic in the Strand. Individualism was a second best, even for the Individualist. Collectivism was a second best, even for the Collectivist.

But it was not through any idealist quarrel with these compromises that they have become impossible. They have become impossible as skating in a mild winter or bathing in a cold spring becomes impossible. The facts of this world have worked persistently the other way. It is useless to preach a hope in the competition of capitalists; because the capitalists will not compete. At every opportunity they do not compete, but combine. The Socialists are often taunted because they disagree. But the capitalists do something much more wicked and heathen: they agree. We know what is happening on a neighbouring hill while Herod and Pilate are shaking hands. There was some sense in Individualism so long as there were individuals: so long as it was really a question whether a daring and ironical Irish upstart from Liverpool might or might not undercut the powerful optimism, the sense and the strong humour of an English upstart from Leeds. But what is the good of talking about the irony of the International Toothbrush Trust, and its struggle with the strong humour of the Amalgamated Hair Brush Company? Individuality has been destroyed by Individualists; not by Socialists.

The collapse of Collectivism has been more recent, but is even more complete. Briefly, the English populace simply will not stand the State intervening on behalf of the poor, for the quite simple and sufficient reason that the State always intervenes on behalf of the rich. It is utterly useless to talk of boards of arbitration, or commissions and committees, representing both Labour and Capital. On every committee the casting vote is given to a chairman. On every committee the chairmanship is given to a plutocrat. In most cases both chairmanship and casting vote are given to a quite incongruous and even scandalous plutocrat. Perhaps the best chairman ever chosen was chosen to investigate the Railway Strike: he was an English policeman employed to crush the Irish people. Perhaps the worst was the chairman chosen for the Coal Strike: he was an English aristocrat who had actually led the worst reactionaries and defended the worst Capitalist intrigues. For these or other reasons the insurgent workers to-day are useless for the purposes of State Socialism. They believe rather less in the State than in anything else. If they invoke the Government against their employer, they know it means invoking a man dressed like their employer, talking like their employer, talking to their employer, betraying them to their employer. For good or evil, the faith in the Government official has finally and utterly broken down. And without faith in the official there can be no Collectivism.

That is the extraordinary modern situation. The competing capitalists won't compete; and when once you really collect the poor, they won't be Collectivist. It is not fantasy, it is not idealism, it is not insanity, it is nothing half so high-minded, that is driving modern men back upon the project of Peasant Proprietorship. It is the visible destruction of everything else.

Among all those miners who asked to have higher wages, I believe that most would have preferred to have no wages. I believe that most would have preferred a piece of private capital, a garden no bigger than a carpet. Cabbages can be got out of the earth more easily than coals; and are better worth their trouble. Among all those dockers who asked for higher wages, I believe that most would have preferred to have no wages. They would rather have owned a loose boat in some little harbour or canal; and been free to load it to sinking, or to empty it for idle caprice. The miners and the dockers will not trust what is called Society; but still less will they trust what is called Socialism. They must and will retreat upon the older and more unanswerable claim; they must and will demand a distributed but quite private property. That may yet be the revival of Peasant Proprietorship, and that may yet mean that England is free.

This is the hour of the English Peasant; he would be bound to conquer if he could only exist. Kings and nobles, capitalists and empires, would flee from the Peasant—if only there were any Peasant for them to flee from. The brute logic of events has shown that being bullied by employers and being bullied by officials is, in a solid and literal sense, the same thing. The employer has a stake in the Government. The Government has a yet heavier stake in the employer. The man who works with his hands has less and less part in such stakes with every sunrise and sunset. I can think of nothing else to give him except a stake in the country.

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE

THE ORIGIN OF LIFE. A REPLY TO DR. SCHÄFER

I.

THE great body of intelligent, but non-scientific, readers has been greatly interested, and many of them even mentally distressed, at what seemed to them to be an authoritative declaration by one of the highest exponents of the science of to-day in favour of the materialistic as opposed to the spiritualistic nature of Life, including that of man with all its marvellous powers and possibilities.

The position of President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science is justly considered to be one of the highest, if not the very highest, honour that can be attained by a student of science in this country, since it is given him by a select body of his contemporaries, who by their choice declare him to be in the first rank for ability and erudition in his own department.

When, therefore, Dr. E. A. Schäfer, who has been Professor of Physiology in two of our most scientific Universities, devoted the whole of his Presidential Address to a very lengthy and elaborate discussion as to "the nature, origin, and maintenance of life," it was to be expected that the vast subject would be set before the public with a full summary of the facts, accompanied by a logical statement of the conclusions arrived at by one or other of the opposing schools of thought on this intensely interesting problem.

II.

Very early in his address Dr. Schäfer expresses his own views very clearly, but in a manner which seems to me to slur over essential points and actually to beg the whole question at issue. This he does by deliberately declaring his inability to give a definition of life, and then proceeds to the statement that "life is not identical with soul," and that whatever he says regarding "life" must not be taken to apply to the conception to which the word "soul" is attached. And that is all he gives us as to what he means by either "life" or "soul."

This omission is the more important because, as I shall presently show, it is by no means difficult to define the essential features and characteristics which distinguish all living things from inanimate forms of matter; and also because Haeckel and many other physiologists maintain that every cell has a "soul," but of the lowest possible kind; that although really unconscious, yet it experiences "likes and dislikes which determinate its motions."* But as this is totally different from the generally received meaning of "soul," which is "that part of man which feels, thinks, desires, etc." (Chambers's Dictionary), it is certainly important to know what Dr. Schäfer means by the word.

Having thus ignored the soul, as having nothing to do with life from a scientific standpoint, he goes on to state his own conclusions in the following words:—"The problems of life are essentially problems of matter; we cannot conceive of life, in the scientific sense of the word, as existing apart from matter. The phenomena of life are investigated, and can only be investigated, by the same methods as all other phenomena of matter, and the general results of such investigations tend to show that living beings are governed by laws identical with those which govern inanimate matter. The more we study the phenomena of life, the more we become convinced of the truth of this statement, and the less we are disposed to call in the aid of a special and unknown form of energy to explain those manifestations."

III.

These statements are general and somewhat vague, and must be taken in connection with others of like tendency throughout his Address. Neither here nor in his lengthy account of some of the more remarkable structures or functions of organisms does the writer anywhere point out the fundamental differences between the "matter" of plants and animals when alive and when they have ceased to live—between living, growing matter and the same matter when dead and subject to immediate decomposition.

* "Riddle of the Universe," McCabe's translation, p. 78.

He never states, he never even recognises, the essential and unique feature of living things that, from minute particles of the enormously complex substance termed protoplasm, builds up a structure which, by a wonderfully accurate balance of forces, maintains itself for indefinite periods in almost identical forms. Surely this power of waste and repair, this condition of constant internal flux, this taking in of food and converting it into blood and muscle, bone and tendon, hair and skin, together with the marvellous nervous system with its mysterious powers of sensation and motion—surely all this implies laws and forces which are not "identical with those which govern inanimate matter."

When we consider further that, by slow but incessant adaptive changes throughout the myriads of ages of geological time, this marvellous life-power has produced the infinitely diversified and glorious pageant of the vegetable and animal kingdoms, we are more than ever convinced that the laws, forces and agencies which have sufficed to produce and modify the earth itself are not those which have originated and maintained the life-world. Yet Dr. Schäfer concludes with the amazing assertion that, the more we study these works of life, the more willing we shall be to impute them all to known mechanical and physical forces, and the less need we shall find "to call in the aid of a special and unknown form of energy to explain these manifestations."

IV.

Before going further it will be well to show, by reference to the writings of some of the greatest of living physiologists, that these views are not generally accepted. Max Verworn, for instance, although opposing "vitalism" as strongly as Dr. Schäfer himself, admits that there is a great difference between the dead and the living cell, and assures us that "substances exist in living which are not to be found in dead cells." He also recognises the constant internal motions of the living cell; the incessant waste and repair of the highly complex organism for indefinite periods; its resistance during life to destructive agencies to which it succumbs the moment life ceases. These characteristics Dr. Schäfer hardly alludes to, and does not even attempt to explain as the result of chemical or mechanical forces.

Professor A. Weismann, perhaps the greatest of living biologists, describes the wonderful series of changes which occur in a cell before its division. Till quite recently the nucleus, or small spot in the centre of every living cell, was supposed to have no special structure, as nothing was visible in the very best microscopes. But it has now been found by the use of certain stains that a most remarkable series of structural changes occur within it as a preliminary to division. A complex spiral structure first appears, which breaks up into separate loops. These divide transversely and split up longitudinally, each piece being connected by delicate fibres to a knob at the top and bottom of the cell. Division by the growth of a transverse membrane then occurs, the two resulting cells being apparently identical with the parent cell and with each other. But each possesses distinct properties, since they become the starting points of different organs or structures of the body. This implies some selective and directive agency in order that the specially modified cells may be carried to the right place and at the right time.

The complex changes going on in every cell and atom of every living creature during its whole term of life is summarised in the one word "growth"; and, being so familiar, is taken to explain everything, while it really explains nothing, as many of the greatest authorities fully recognise.

Professor A. Kerner, for example, in his great work on "The Natural History of Plants," after describing the process of cell-division as being almost identical in plants and animals, thus refers to the chemical explanation upheld by the materialistic school of physiologists:—"It does not explain the purposeful sequence of different operations in the same protoplasm without any change in the external stimuli; the thorough use made of external advantages; the resistance to injurious influences; the avoidance or encompassing of insuperable obstacles; the punctuality with which all the functions are performed; the periodicity which occurs with the greatest regularity under constant conditions of environment; nor, above all, the fact that the power of discharging all the operations requisite for growth, nutrition, renovation, and multiplication is liable to be lost. We call the loss of this power the death of the protoplasm."

V.

A striking example of the "periodicity" alluded to in the above quotation is given in Professor Lloyd Morgan's fine work on Animal Life and Intelligence. It is that of the annual growth of the antlers of a deer, which he thus describes:—"If you lay your hand on the growing antler, you will feel that it is hot with the nutrient blood that is coursing beneath it. An army of tens of thousands of busy living cells is at work beneath that velvet surface building the bony antlers, preparing for the battles of the autumn. Each minute cell knows its work, and does it for the general good—so perfectly is the body knit into an organic whole. It takes up from the nutrient blood the special materials it requires; out of them it elaborates the crude bone-stuff, at first soft as wax, but ere long to become as hard as stone, and then, having done its work, having added its special morsel to the fabric of the antler, it remains imbedded and immured, buried beneath the bone-products of its successors or descendants. No hive of bees is busier or more replete with active life than the antler of a stag as it grows beneath the warm, soft velvet."

VI.

But such a growth as this, wonderful and beautiful as it is, and absolutely inexplicable as the result of chemical or mechanical forces acting upon protoplasm, is as nothing in comparison with other processes and products of life. The most remarkable of these are the plumage of birds and the metamorphosis of the higher insects.

If a bird's quill is examined, and the beautifully elastic web carefully separated so as to show the structure of the barbs and barbules of which it is composed, we find it to be the most wonderful piece of mechanism in the world, and one which is wholly beyond the powers of our most ingenious mechanics to reproduce or imitate. The extreme lightness, elasticity, and strength of the horny material of the feather is due to the formation of the thin plates of which it is constructed being split up into hundreds of thousands of parts, connected together by rows of minute elastic hooks, so delicately formed that after being separated the mere pressure of the air locks them together again as firmly as before.

When we consider the myriads of cells of which each feather consists, each of which must have a special form to fill its place in the structure, and that every feather on a bird's body has a special shape and texture, and often a peculiar colour, so exactly adapted to that of adjacent feathers as to form a special pattern on the outer surface of the bird, and that the whole of this miracle of adaptive structure is reproduced afresh each year with amazing rapidity, how grotesquely inadequate is the statement that all this is produced by chemical and mechanical laws, and that it is quite unnecessary and unscientific to suppose that any special "vital" forces are required to account for them.

VII.

But in all these cases, and in the whole process of growth and assimilation, from the strange vital phenomena occurring in every cell to its final destination as part of the finished structure of the living organism, a never-ceasing, guiding agency is needed, or disorganisation and death inevitably ensues. It was the absolute necessity for some such power or guiding agency that compelled the arch-agnostic Haeckel himself to postulate a soul in every cell, but, as he frequently declares, a quite rudimentary soul, inasmuch as it is unconscious!

VIII.

Limitation of space forbids me from giving any details of the second of the marvels of organisation already referred to—that of the metamorphosis of the higher insects, such as the moths and butterflies; the bare facts must suffice. These are, that the worm-like larvæ pass their lives from the egg to the full-grown caterpillar as mere feeding machines. They then become dormant in the pupa-state, when the whole of the internal organs decompose into a pulpy mass, and then, instead of dying, which is the usual result of decomposition, a new and totally distinct winged insect is built up by directive vital forces, a true metamorphosis, and one of the most antecedently improbable and apparently miraculous in the whole series of life-phenomena.

IX.

We see then that in the whole vast world of life, in all its myriad forms, whether we examine the lowest types possessed of the simplest characteristics of life, or whether in the higher forms, we follow the process of growth from a single cell up to the completed organism—even to that of a living, moving, feeling, thinking, reasoning being such as man himself—we find everywhere a stupendous, unceasing series of continuous motions of the gases, fluids and solids of which the body consists. These motions are strictly co-ordinated, and, taken together with the requisite directing and organising forces, imply the presence of some active mind-power.

Hence the conclusion of John Hunter, accepted as indisputable by Huxley, that "life is the cause, not the consequence, of organisation." Hence also the "cell-soul" of Haeckel, though minimised to complete ineffectiveness by being unconscious.

In view of all these marvellous phenomena, how totally inadequate are references to "growing crystals," and repeated assertions that we shall some day produce the living matter of the nucleus by a chemical process; that "the nucleus" is in fact "the directing agent" in all the changes which take place within the living cell, and that "without doubt this substance (when produced chemically) will be found to exhibit the phenomena which we are in the habit of associating with the term life."

Finally, Dr. Schäfer assures us that, as supernatural intervention is unscientific, "we are compelled to believe that living matter must have owed its origin to causes similar in character to those which have been instrumental in producing all other forms of matter in the universe; in other words, to a process of gradual evolution."

I submit that, in view of the actual facts of growth and organisation as here briefly outlined, and that living protoplasm has never been chemically produced, the assertion that life is due to chemical and mechanical processes alone is quite unjustified. NEITHER THE PROBABILITY OF SUCH AN ORIGIN, NOR EVEN ITS POSSIBILITY, HAS BEEN SUPPORTED BY ANYTHING WHICH CAN BE TERMED SCIENTIFIC FACTS OR LOGICAL REASONING.

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE OM., LL.D. DCL. FRS.,
NATUS 1823.

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S.

THE Grand Old Man of British Science was born ninety years ago in Monmouthshire of Scottish ancestry. Pre-eminently a self-made man and a supremely original mind. One of the many scientists who have come to science direct from practical life, and whose independence has not been endangered by the reactionary influence of a University training. Began his career as a surveyor and architect. Left business to travel and explore the outlying regions of the globe—the Amazon and the Malay Archipelago. Conceived and constructed the theory of Evolution sixty years ago, contemporaneously with, but independently of, Darwin, whose life-long friend he was. Although having achieved fame primarily as a naturalist, he has investigated many other fields of human knowledge. Has pursued such widely divergent studies as Spiritualism and Land Reform. Is a follower of Henry George and a president of the Land Nationalisation Society. Essentially an idealist, he has risen above the mechanical doctrines in favour with modern physicists. His whole life and work has been a protest against the materialism of the age.

However great as an explorer of nature, he is even greater as a personal force. Is of the breed of giants. The most perfect living exemplar of the scientific thinker who devotes his life to the disinterested pursuit of truth and for the good of humanity.

J. M. SYNGE AND THE REVIVAL OF THE IRISH DRAMA

IN these days books are given the scraps and leavings of our time; and we read them over meals and in the train. We have forgotten that literature is not artistic writing, but written art; we pay heed as to conversation or debate, but have not ears to hear authentic utterances. Ours, perhaps, is an age of running, and of literature it is never true that he who runs may read.

Synge's work was literature. We cannot, therefore, judge it as a passer-by a placard, on its patent merits. The praise of such easy familiarity and the blame are equally idle; if the Dublin patriots were wrong to think the "Play-boy" a libel on their country, those critics were as wrong who praised it as a study of Irish life. It was not Synge's purpose to describe; his peasants are not an illustration of the "Western World," but an illustration of his dramatic concepts. Likeness to material reality is not an aim of artistic expression; it is a method. It would be as well to judge a Turner as if it were a coloured photograph as to seek in realism the standard of Synge's vision.

But if Synge was a better artist than to study realism, he did not, therefore, cut himself adrift from ordinary experience. It was in its common exhibitions that he sought the truth of life, for he was not of those who think to see reality brighter in the mirror of legend. No mystic, filled with the desire of an unearthly loveliness, was the poet who sang:

"Adieu, sweet Angus, Mæve, and Fand . . .
We'll stretch in Red Dan Sully's ditch,
And drink in Tubber fair." . . .

There was little savour for him in the exaltation of detachment; his fancy had "strong roots in the clay and worms of actual life." The fierce spirit that found starvation in Paris a good riddance of caste respectability could not find satisfaction in a suave literary convention. The delicate weavers of verse like smoke-wreaths hanging in still air might "learn their ecstasy" of the "plumed yet skinny Shee." Synge was not beholden for his art to the postured elegance of a school, nor for his inspiration to dreams.

"All art is a collaboration." To the peasants and the vagabonds of the "Western World" Synge owed the debt that Yeats owed to the storehouse of tradition. In their talk he had the living substitute for the frozen-meat of poetic diction; the ore of his humour and image was their wild fancy; their twists of phrase and song-like intonation are heard perfected in his rhythmic speech.

Nor was lyric inspiration all. Of four plays he derived the emotional atmosphere from a vision of the thought and feeling of the Irish peasants; for each their romantic quality of mind afforded the dramatic concept relating in harmonic unity diverse character and scene. Drunken Mary's sense of joy dominates the comic villainies of the "Tinker's Wedding." The yearning of Norah's heart in its vacancy, its flooding with a vision of the open road; are the drama, the question and the answer, of "The Shadow of the Glen." Like a camera obscura, the dark fancies of the blind beggars in "The Well of the Saints" sets in contrast the threadbare drab of the common lot and the rich texture of imaginative delight. Of "The Playboy of the Western World," the background suggested in tones of humorous fantasy is the peasant's hunger for sensation. Against it, in a glow of lyric passion, stands the poet, Christy Mahon—shy poacher, imaginary parricide, hero, lover, master—in whom is revealed the triumph of imagination over disillusionment, and even over love.

The four plays are variations on a single theme—their romantic genius. Variations in mood, though not in utterance. For if beside his poetry is laughter, there is never censure in his humour, never satire in his fantasy. Synge did not draw the peasant lost to a sense of law and order to add complacency to the citizen lost to a knowledge of his heart. That hectic yearning for romance, which saw happiness in vagrancy, heroism in villainy, was but to Synge the pattern of a general need—the need in life of a real existence beyond the eternal circle of toil, sleep, and toil! He had no scorn for the disreputable and wild; he did not hold it up to judgment, but in the language of its emotion he spoke his own strong passion for ardent life.

That passion was the inspiration of all his art. Not only of Aran Islands, nor alone even of death, did he express the tragedy in "The Riders to the Sea"; the desolation of the mother mourning her six sons is the "keen" of all things strong that pass away; when the cup is turned mouth downwards—in the end of her grief—"we must be satisfied" tells the death of earthly hope and care, the ultimate surrender of the heart to fate. "The Riders to the Sea" is the tragedy of life stricken and decayed.

It is the utterance of his passion in despair. "Deirdre of the Sorrows" is its utterance in exaltation. "It was sorrows were foretold, but great joys were my share always." In that triumph of Deirdre's love over her destiny was imaged the triumph of his own fierce joy over disillusionment and the sadness of death. "I have put away sorrow like a shoe that is worn out and muddy." In its last expression, Synge's love of ardent life sounded in rejoicing and defiance; like Deirdre, he had known a life that was the "choice of lives," like her he passed gladly in that knowledge to the safety of the grave.

Most of our intellectual drama has no emotional appeal, because it is a criticism of manners only, not an expression of a sense of life. Perhaps that, more than its seriousness, is the reason why many people find in it less satisfaction even than in the false joy and sentiment of musical comedy. Certainly it is a reason why Synge's utterance, of which the burden was a passion for ardent life, has a special worth in a day of wealth-convention and economic morality.

G. M. BROPHY.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES * * BY THE REV. R. J. CAMPBELL

I.

It is freely stated on every hand at the present time that all is not well with organised religion as represented by the Christian churches. It is no longer the dominating force in civilisation that it once was. One by one functions that it formerly exercised have been filched away from it. The control of education has passed out of its hands, except in a comparatively limited degree, which is gradually lessening; it has no monopoly of the arts any more; statesmanship does not depend upon it, and does not look to the clergy for trained administrators; science has not only shaken itself free of ecclesiastical tutelage, but in certain respects has become a bugbear to it, and is invading fields formerly considered immune from such interference—in fact, is fast undermining ancient beliefs, and doing so with an authority which can command much of the respect once accorded to the decrees of Councils and Popes; theology is no longer the main human interest, and with its decay a new era may be said to have begun in which the study of the historical development of religious ideas is being substituted for zeal in the elaboration of doctrine. Attendance at public worship is decreasing. Men of intellect, especially on the Continent, are almost ashamed to be known as associating themselves with the practice of religion. The most portentous movement of our time, that towards the emancipation of the toiler from unremunerative drudgery and the reconstitution of society on a juster basis, is practically independent of religion, and to a not inconsiderable extent has developed in antagonism to it. To be sure, it is receiving a great deal of religious support, but such support is only incidental to its activity, and is not its directing cause. Taken on the whole, it would be true to say that the churches are to-day on the defensive, struggling to keep themselves alive, fighting desperately against forces which are threatening to submerge them. The present is not a time in which Christianity is heroically aggressive, registering great triumphs, and carrying all before it in a rush of great enthusiasm as in days of long ago. A note of misgiving is being widely sounded with reference to its future by those who still believe it to be the bearer of a nobler message for human welfare than any of the newer movements and interests which seem to be displacing it.

II.

Perhaps the situation is not quite what it appears to be. The prospects of religion have been far darker before within the borders of Christendom, and been falsified by the event. History shows that the Church of Christ has had a marvellous way of righting herself at intervals after she has temporarily lost hold upon the reverent allegiance of mankind, and no doubt she will do so again. Nor, despite all the criticism to which she is subjected, is it entirely her fault that things are what they are just now. Men are not turning away from her chiefly because they are impatient of dogma, too intelligent to swallow what satisfied their forefathers, or indignant because she has not given them a proper lead in solving the enormous social problems of the hour. There may be something in the accusation that she has been found wanting in these ways. Ecclesiasticism is proverbially conservative, and none too friendly to the freedom of inquiry, without which the finest achievements of the human spirit would have been impossible. It does seem somewhat absurd to find it clinging to forms in which religious experience expressed itself in an age when man's thought about the visible universe was geocentric, and when he regarded it as being specially created for himself, and all other living creatures in it as existing only to minister to his need. Science has shifted the perspective considerably, and given us a humbler conceit of ourselves. But there is something to be said for this conservatism too; it arises out of unwillingness to lose a precious spiritual experience, the mistake being to imagine that this experience could ever be fettered to any merely intellectual statement of belief. As for the contention that it is the church's duty to proclaim a new social order, and to work as an organisation on the side of labour as opposed to capitalism, or on that of collectivism as opposed to individualism, it is easy to exaggerate. The church's first duty is that of witnessing for the eternal in the midst of the things of time, and it is only as a consequence of this that she is called upon to work for the abolition of all cruelty and injustice, and the bringing in of the Kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven. It may be that she has been remiss here, and that there is justification for the taunt that she is too frequently found, tacitly if not overtly, on the side of privilege, and turns a deaf ear to the righteous demands of the toiler and the destitute. It is long

"Since the priesthood, like a tower,
Stood between the poor and power;
And the wronged and trodden down
Blessed the abbot's shaven crown.

Gone, thank God, their wizard spell,
Lost, their keys of heaven and hell;
Yet I sigh for men as bold
As those bearded priests of old.

Now, too oft the priesthood wait
At the threshold of the state, —
Waiting for the beck and nod
Of its power as law and God.

Fraud exults, while solemn words
Sanctify his stolen hoards;
Slavery laughs, while ghostly lips
Bless his manacles and whips.

Not on them the poor rely,
Not to them looks liberty,
Who with fawning falsehood cower,
To the wrong, when clothed with power."

III.

In so far as this is true, the time has come for a readjustment of the church's energies, and this is rapidly going on. No fair observer of the facts could say other than that sympathy with the social movement is both deep and growing in every church, and no class in the community is more alive to it than the clergy. It may be questioned, indeed, whether we do not need to be reminded once more that our Master's kingdom is not of this world, that man cannot live on bread alone, that the spiritual must come first or the social gospel will be no gospel at all. We are not too much but too little other-worldly now. The mystic note is that which the present generation most needs to hear, but it can only be uttered by spiritually-minded men.

For, after all, it is not the church but the spirit of the age that is most responsible for the changed attitude towards religion. We live in a time when, as Eucken says, men are absorbed in the pursuit of external good to the neglect of everything else. Materialism as a philosophy is discounted; it is no longer the arrogant assailant of faith that it was in the mid-Victorian period; but materialism as a practical gospel of well-being was never so insistent or so powerful. We have grown a new type of man, a man whose nature is moulded by the ceaseless pressure of material interests to such a degree that he can hardly think or feel in terms of anything else. This is the main reason why religion is for the moment crowded into the background. The average human-being can only give close attention to one thing at a time, and the whole trend of our pursuits to-day is utilitarian. It had to be so, there was no help for it.

IV.

As Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace has pointed out in his book, "The Wonderful Century," the latter half of the nineteenth century witnessed a greater increase in the assertion of man's power over nature than the two thousand years preceding. It was a sudden and explosive uprising of faculty which found vent in the desire to subdue and exploit the resources of the material world for human benefit, and there is as yet no observable check in this direction. Civilisation is moving for the most part on the plane of the phenomenal and measures what is called progress by the number and greatness of its material triumphs. The effect of this on human nature has been inevitable. The typical man of to-day is so taken up with considerations arising immediately out of his connection with what is of the earth earthy that he is not so susceptible as he once was to the appeal of the purely spiritual. He may be quite a good fellow, kind, upright, and public spirited, but he is not by temperament religious; he cannot be; his occupations have shaped him otherwise. He would be almost surprised at the suggestion that there was any other kind of good than what could be bought with money, or obtainable in the sheer delight of adding to the world's output of material wealth in one or other of the many ways now open to ambitious youth. He is not opposed to religion, but it is none of his concern; all the force of his being falls into other channels. One does not need to be rich in order to share in this general outlook and attitude to life; it is just as characteristic of the poor, and for the same reasons. We are moving at a greatly accelerated pace; we all have to work hard, and the drones are soon squeezed out. Industrialism has no mercy on the inefficient; the old relation between master and man is gone along with the leisureliness characteristic of the simpler order which preceded the rise of the factory system. Competition is fiercer than it used to be, and in some respects more sordid; hence the worker is swept into the same maelstrom as his employer. He sees the practical advantages of the possession of material good, takes for granted like his betters that there is no other kind of good worth troubling about, and acts accordingly. He is as completely possessed by the hope of adding to his enjoyment of life by material means as the most luxurious of his richer contemporaries, and just as little disposed to listen to the claims of the super-sensuous. He is not hostile to the church, except in so far as he blames it for getting in his way, and helping to keep him out of his earthly inheritance by cajoling him with the promise of a heavenly; he is simply indifferent to what it is talking about.

V.

That there will be a strong reaction from this state of things by-and-by is certain. As it is only the result of over-emphasis on what pertains to the outer man, the spiritual can be trusted to reassert itself in the long run. Probably it is a necessary phase through which the race has to pass, and will emerge all the stronger for it; and spiritually the gainer. But in the meantime what ought the churches to be doing in reference to the situation, and in preparing for the resurgence of spiritual life and power which will come upon us soon or late? The first and most urgent thing is the necessity for closing the ranks, concentrating our forces, getting rid of our lamentable divisions. No single cause of the comparative weakness of Christianity to-day in face of a new world with its new syntheses and new problems is more potent than the scandal of its schisms, sectarian antagonisms; jealousies, and uncharitableness. The hope of a corporate reunion of the Christian churches throughout the world is no doubt very remote, and perhaps will never be realised on the lines of any single existing organisation. Nevertheless, the prevailing tendencies in the religious life of our own country are in the direction of unity; old prejudices are disappearing; misunderstandings are being smoothed away; and an all-round desire for closer co-operation amongst the various historic religious bodies is becoming more and more manifest. Several of the Methodist denominations, for instance, have managed to combine, and before long they probably all will, as they have already done in other parts of the English-speaking world. In Scotland, the two great non-established Presbyterian churches have joined hands, and there is a project on foot for amalgamating them both with the parent church. How this can succeed until disestablishment comes it is difficult to see, but it will succeed in the end. It is a good number of years too since the evangelical Nonconformist churches of England and Wales decided to federate for purposes of common action without sinking their denominational differences, and the benefits of this move are now plain to the most prejudiced critic.

VI.

As the secretary of the Baptist Union said on a recent occasion, we now practically have in England two great churches—the Church of England as by law established, and the Evangelical Free Church, which includes Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists of all sorts, and the Society of Friends. Why should not this rapprochement be carried further? Is it not possible that the Established Church and Nonconformists, without yielding any principle on either side, could come together openly and collectively on the basis of their common Christianity? There is one simple and easy way of doing this which would serve at least for a beginning. Once a year a great gathering of churchmen is held, called the Church Congress, and another called the Free Church Congress; is there any insuperable obstacle in the way of arranging a third consisting of a union of the two with a common programme? Nothing but prejudice. Even as it is, leaving out controversial subjects such as national education, the official programmes of the two assemblies are very similar. Let them be combined on some specific occasion, and it is safe to say that the good results would be great and lasting—the indirect effects might be of more value than the direct. To meet together, pray together, listen to one another's great preachers and teachers, discuss the same themes, and mingle in social intercourse, would do far more to promote mutual good feeling and respect than anything that has ever been attempted in the direction of corporate reunion, and one cannot imagine anything better calculated to impress the national consciousness as a whole. It is worth trying; what person of commanding influence and authority will take the lead?

TO GEORGE MEREDITH

EARTH lover, underfoot you went secure,
Your faith enwrought with no vanishing myth,
But with the purpose that builds up the pith—
Of spiritual forms made to endure;
Amid whatever fire, being of the pure
Asbestos that rejoices in the breath
Of passion, whom the wizard hand of death
Shall gather and their beauty, not obscure,
For this is Freedom—this is Earth a-flower,
Yea-saying to the spirit that is Man!
O you, who striving, stretched thought that it might
Be not untrue to the soul's infinite,
Urge still the strife until our thinking can Embrace the joy-emancipating power!

H. B. BINNS.

THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN

THERE are many urgent reforms needed in our national education; those who are best qualified to speak could make many a startling revelation if they only dared to speak out. And there is ample evidence that almost every part of our educational machinery requires the most thorough overhauling. In the words of Bacon, "Instauratio facienda ab iniis fundamentis." But I doubt whether there does exist any more glaring proof of the present inefficiency of our Secondary Schools and Universities than their scandalous attitude towards the study of the German language and literature.

The plain and unvarnished truth is that at the beginning of this, the twentieth century, when Germany is the supreme political and commercial Power on the Continent of Europe, the study of German is steadily going back in the United Kingdom. In some parts it is actually dying out. In many important Secondary Schools it is being discontinued. Even in the Scottish Universities, which pride themselves on being more modern and more progressive than the English Universities, there does not exist one single Chair of German. In Oxford a Chair of German was only established through the munificence of a patriotic German merchant.

And even when there are teachers there are very few students. In one of the greatest British Universities, with a constituency of 3,500 students, there has been, for the last ten years, an average of five to six men students. And the reluctance of young men to study German is perfectly intelligible. The study of German does not pay. It brings neither material rewards nor official recognition. All the prizes, all the scholarships and fellowships, go to other subjects, and mainly to the classics. Let any reader of EVERYMAN stand up and say that I am exaggerating, I would only be too delighted to discover that I am wrong.

Such being the attitude of those who are primarily responsible for our national education, can we wonder at the attitude of the general public? Can we expect it to take any more interest in German culture than the educational authorities? Let those who have any doubt or illusion on the subject make inquiries at booksellers', at circulating libraries and public libraries, at London clubs. I have tried to make such an investigation, and all those institutions have the same sorry tale to tell. It is impossible to get an outstanding book which appears in Germany, for it does not pay the publisher to stock such a book. At Mudie's, for every hundred French books there may be two German books. At the Royal Societies' Club, with a membership of several thousands, every one of whom belongs to some learned society, you may get the Revue de Deux Mondes, or the Temps, or the Figaro, but you cannot get a German paper. For the last twenty years I have not once seen a copy of the Zukunft, or the Frankfurter Zeitung, or the Kölnische Zeitung at an English private house, at an English club, at an English bookseller's, at an English library.

A few months ago the most popular and most enterprising daily paper of the kingdom published some articles on the German elections, which were justly rousing a great deal of attention in this country. I was very much impressed by the cleverness of those articles, but my admiration knew no bounds when the author confessed that he was writing without knowing a word of German, and that when attending political meetings he had to make out the meaning of the language by the gestures and facial expression of the orators. Have we not here, my classical friends, an exhilarating instance of the results of your monopoly? "Ab uno disce omnes."

We are constantly being told that "knowledge is power," and that the knowledge of a foreign language means not only intellectual power, but commercial and political power. Yet those in authority do not budge an inch to get possession of such power. We are constantly warned by political pessimists that Germany is making gigantic strides and that we ought to keep a vigilant outlook. Yet we do nothing to obtain first-hand information of the resources of a nation of sixty-five millions, who is certainly a formidable commercial rival, and who to-morrow may meet us in deadly encounter. On the other hand, we are told with equal persistence by political optimists that we ought to be on the most friendly terms with a great kindred people from whom nothing separates us except regrettable ignorance and superficial misunderstandings. Yet, in order to dispel that ignorance and to remove these misunderstandings, we do not make the first necessary step, namely, to learn the language of the people whom we are said to misunderstand.

It is true that members of Parliament and journalists are ready enough to proceed to Germany on a mission of goodwill, and to be entertained at banquets and international festivities. But how futile must be those friendly demonstrations when we consider that the enormous majority of those Parliamentarians and journalists are unable to read a German newspaper! And how must it strike a citizen of Hamburg or Frankfurt when their English guests have to reply in English to the toasts of their German hosts! And how must a patriotic German feel when he discovers that not five out of a hundred have taken the trouble to master the noble language of the country whose friendship they are seeking!

A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of attending, at the house of a prominent political leader, a representative gathering of politicians, diplomats, and journalists, who were met to consider the best means of promoting Anglo-German friendship. In answer to a little speech of mine, an eminent German publicist and editor of an influential monthly review delivered an eloquent address in broken French. To hear a German address in French an audience of Germanophile Englishmen was certainly a ludicrous situation! But the speaker realised that it would be hopeless to use the German language, even to an assembly specially interested in supporting Anglo-German friendship.

How long, my classical friends, are we going to submit to these disastrous results of your monopoly? Quousque tandem! How long are we going to stand this scandal of international illiteracy and ignorance, fraught with such ominous peril for the future? How long is this nation going to be hoodwinked by an infinitesimal minority of reactionary dons and obscurantist parsons, determined to force a smattering of Greek down the throats of a reluctant youth? How long is modern culture going to be kept back under the vain pretence of maintaining the culture of antiquity, but in reality in response to an ignoble dread of enlightenment and progress, and in order to protect vested interests and to maintain political, intellectual, and religious reaction?

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—A contributor to whom the foregoing paper on "The Neglect of German" was submitted protests against the assertion that the neglect of German is the greatest scandal of the present secondary education. The Editor fully agrees with that contributor. Scandalous as is the neglect of German, there is another and a more disastrous result of the monopoly of classics, and that is the neglect of English. In a subsequent number of EVERYMAN we intend to show extensively how the present educational policy is affecting the study and deteriorating the standard of our mother tongue.]

HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE.

EDITORS: Prof. Gilbert Murray, D.Litt., LL.D., F.B.A. Herbert Fisher, M.A., F.B.A., Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, M.A., Prof. William T. Brewster.

THE SIXTY BEST BOOKS.

Among cheap original works, "THE HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE" maintains its pre-eminence as easily as does "Everyman" in famous reprints. It is not so much the price (1/- net in cloth, 2/6 in handsome leather gilt) that distinguishes the sixty volumes now issued, but the quality. The Library gives the best, and only the best; hence its great success. Never, in any country, at any time, or at any price, has a more commanding array of scholarly talent been organised. We owe this result, as well as the unity of design and the vivid presentation of the subjects, largely to the efforts of the Editors. The aim which has alone sustained the Editors, the Authors, and the Publishers alike is to bring into every home in the English-speaking world, not a series of odd essays of average excellence, but a bookshelf of the essentials of the best modern scholarship, research and reflection. The sixth ten volumes just issued are:—"Warfare in Britain," with plans, by Hilaire Belloc; "Great Writers of America," by Professors W. P. Trent and J. Erskine; "The Making of the Earth," fully illustrated, by Professor J. W. Gregory, F.R.S.; "Ethics," by G. E. Moore, M.A.; "Master Mariners," by J. R. Spears; "Making of the New Testament," by Professor B. W. Bacon, D.D.; "The Human Body," illustrated, by Professor Arthur Keith, M.D.; "Electricity," illustrated, by Professor Gisbert Kapp; "Political Economy," by Professor S. J. Chapman; and "Missions: their Rise and Development," by Mrs. Creighton.

1/- NET
256
PAGES.
CLOTH.

LEATHER.
2/6 net
256 PAGES.

SEND FOR LIST OF VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED AND DETAILS OF A LARGE NUMBER IN ACTIVE PREPARATION.

OTHER IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Latter Day Saints:

A Study of the Mormons in the Light of Economic Conditions.

By RUTH KAUFFMAN and REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN.

Medium 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Within:

Thoughts during Convalescence.

By Sir FRANCIS E. YOUNGHUSBAND.

Square crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

Initiation into Philosophy

By EMILE FAGUET.

Translated by Sir HONG GORDON, Bart.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Bible Reading in the Early Church

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin.

Translated by Rev. J. R. WILKINSON, M.A. Forming Vol. V. of "Harnack's New Testament Studies," and Vol. XXXVI. of "Crown Theological Library."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

[Ready shortly.]

Character and Life

A Symposium.

Arranged and edited by PERCY L. PARKER, Editor of "Public Opinion"; by Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace; by John A. Hobson; by Harold Begbie; by Walter Crane; by Emil Reich.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

The House of Commons from Within

By the Rt. Hon. ROBERT FARQUHARSON, P.C., M.D., LL.D.

Author of "In and Out of Parliament."

Medium 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Mineral Kingdom

By Dr. REINHARD BRAUNS, Professor of Mineralogy in the University of Bonn. Translated by L. I. SPENCER, M.A., F.G.S. Demy 4to. With 275 figures in the text, and 91 full-page plates, of which 73 are chromolithographs, and 18 from half-tone blocks. Beautifully bound in half morocco,

£2 16s. net.

Protestantism and Progress

By ERNST TROELTSCH, D.Th., D.Phil. (Jena).

Translated by W. MONTGOMERY, B.D.

Forming Vol. XXXVII. of "Crown Theological Library."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

[Ready shortly.]

Nervation of Plants

By FRANCIS G. HEATH.

Author of "Our Woodland Trees," "The Fern World," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

The Lost Language of Symbolism.

An Enquiry into the Origin of certain Letters, Words, Myths, Fairy Tales and Theologies.

By HAROLD BAYLEY.

Author of "A New Light on the Renaissance." In 2 vols. Medium 8vo. With upwards of 1,500 symbols. 25s. net.

Religious Liberty.

By FRANCESCO RUFFINI, Rector of the University of Turin.

With a Special Supplementary Chapter for the English Edition, and an introduction to the English Reader, by the Rev. J. B. BURY, of Cambridge. Forming Vol. XXXII. of the Theological Translation Library.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

An Interpretation of Professor Eucken's Philosophy

By Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.

Translator of Professor Eucken's greatest work, "The Truth of Religion," and for many years a student under Professor Eucken.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Prehistoric Times

As illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages.

By LORD AVEBURY, D.C.L., F.R.S.

Cheap popular Edition, 7s. 6d. net.

SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST OF AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

WHY I BELIEVE IN PEACE * * * * BY NORMAN ANGELL

I.

THE efforts to organise the Community of Nations, to arrive at that capacity for common action which in the case of persons distinguishes the civilised from the uncivilised group, have their final justification, not in the fact that the alternative state of anarchy, which in its active form we call war, is brutal and full of suffering (man's struggle in peace is often brutal, and the fight with Nature full of suffering); nor in fact that war does not "pay" in a money-lending sense; nor that war contravenes the injunction to love one another (we contravene that in peace; and it is a psychological impossibility to have any definite affection, for instance, for sixty-five millions of people whom we have never seen and never shall see). It is not for any of these reasons that International Order is preferable to International Anarchy, but because, peopled as the world now is—a very populous and a very small place—we can best, indeed we can only achieve, those objects which make life fuller and more valuable for the great mass of us by co-operation, which implies a condition of order.

II.

Nor merely is co-operation and order necessary for that subjugation of material nature by which alone these millions—so infinitely more than ever before in the written history of the Western world—can be properly clothed and fed, and housed and warmed, and cared for in sickness and old age, but because it is also necessary for the development of the ideas, the understanding and realisation of which determine not merely the form of organised society, but the whole character of human relationship, its moral and spiritual texture. War can only be justified on the assumption that nations are rival entities, with conflicting interests; that man's struggle for life is not with Nature, but with his fellows (for if the interests of nations are common, their conflict is due merely to misunderstanding, in Mr. Bonar Law's phrase, "the failure of human wisdom," and our evident task is to enlarge that wisdom). I have attempted to show that that conception of nations as rival entities is not merely a false generalisation, overlooking subordinate details, but is an idea false at its very base. States are not entities in their moral, economic, social, or spiritual activities, nor are they rivals. They are interdependent, not as an abstract theory, but as a positive and concrete fact, and I have attempted at some length to indicate the process of this growing interdependence.

III.

The primary operative factor is the division of labour which the improvement of communication has set up. It makes of one area or of one group a producer of cotton, another of coal, or another of wheat, so that Lancashire is dependent not only upon Louisiana, representing its raw material, but upon India or South America, representing its market, which market is in its turn dependent upon the producer of coal or iron, who buys the South American product; the coal or iron producer in its turn dependent upon some other group, performing its due function in the sub-division of labour, so that neither can benefit by the destruction or damage of the other.

IV.

So little, for instance, could the English people profit by the destruction of their "enemies" that if by some magic they could accomplish it completely, something like a third of the population of these islands would starve to death. Bismarckian statesmanship was founded, as we know, upon the old conceptions; and as little were they based on actual fact, that if the objects they embodied could have been completely achieved, and France, as a political, moral and economic factor, have been blotted from the map, much of modern Germany would have been impossible: the trade by which so many millions of Germans are actually fed and clothed, the trade, that is, of countries like South America and Russia, is the direct outcome of development wrought by money furnished by French thrift and French prosperity. And French statesmanship has shown an equal blindness to this necessary interdependence of the modern world: the French efforts to aid, among other means by generous loans, the social and industrial development of Russia, in order to offset in Europe the influence of Germany, has resulted in furnishing Germany with one of its most valuable markets.

V.

We have here but a hint of the process by which the daily activities of men cut athwart, and must cut athwart, the political frontiers, and have woven the modern world into one social and industrial organism—an organism, like any other living organism, suffering as a whole by any damage to a part, feeling the damage, of course, through its nerves. Those nerves are furnished in the modern industrial organism by the device of credit. The fact that financial misbehaviour in New York, or a crash in Berlin, sends the English Bank Rate up to 6, 7 or 8 per cent., and fines every English industry, is not a sly device of Jewish money-lenders; it is simply the expression of that interdependence which the money-lenders could neither have created nor prevented, but which is the outcome of a thousand factors, moral, religious, economic, the origins of which are rooted in every one of the needs, appetites and emotions of mankind.

VI.

For the economic division of labour and the economic interdependence has its counterpart in the moral and intellectual sphere. For one nation to destroy or conquer another would be to cut vital arteries of its own moral and intellectual life, just as, if we could imagine England "destroying" the United States, she would by that blow destroy the livelihood of Lancashire. To the English mind the preservation of certain freedoms embodied in our law and government, the survival in the world of certain sanctities connected, say, with family life, are more important than the sort of food that we shall eat or the sort of clothes we shall wear. But those freedoms and sanctities would be threatened more by the destruction of certain "rival" States than by the contradiction of the political domination of our own. We could, for instance, afford to lose India than to see America dominated by, for instance, Spanish-American ideas. That America should, in those ideas which determine the character of human intercourse, drift from what we regard as the essentials, would be a greater loss to our moral and spiritual security than the mere transfer of the administration of an Asiatic province to other hands.

(This article will be continued in next week's issue.)

MY RECOLLECTIONS OF OSCAR WILDE

By HENRI MAZEL
Of the "Mercure de France"

I.

THE first time that I saw Oscar Wilde was in Paris, in 1892, at the house of Stuart Merrill—the French poet of American extraction. It is now twenty years ago, but I can recall him clearly—tall and heavy, fair and freshly coloured, with a monocle in his eye and a hot-house flower in his buttonhole, dressed in clothes of an irreproachable cut, and speaking in a slow, quiet manner—slightly affected perhaps, but altogether pleasing—his English accent adding a further charm.

There were present, besides Stuart Merrill, several of our friends from among the circle of symbolical poets—then in the first flush of achievement.

We were all greatly interested in the uncommon personality of this writer, whose reputation was then so great in London literary circles, and I spent the whole evening listening to him, as he was talking with his spicy wit and his good-tempered charm.

Oscar Wilde loved talking before a picked audience, and yet he wanted it to be a fairly large one, for as it seemed to me it pleased and flattered him when those people who were talking amongst themselves in the recess of the window would stop their own conversations and join the circle which had gathered round him.

II.

Oscar Wilde spoke French very well, and when he did stop for a word it was not like a foreigner unfamiliar with the vocabulary, but as a stylist who brings to conversation the same desire for picturesque and imaginative expression which he shows when writing at his desk. Many among us, the poet Laurent Tailhade, for instance, had this same slightly slow method of expression, which added to the value and relish of the right word when it was found. Although he was very familiar with our language, and capable of appreciating its most subtle shades of meaning, Oscar Wilde could not write French with the perfect style of a Beckford or a Hamilton. The first draft of "Salomé," according to what I was told, was full of colour, but from the point of view of grammatical correctness needed a good deal of revision. Those amongst us who corrected it limited themselves entirely to this grammatical correction; they modified nothing, and "Salomé" is truly the work of the English poet, and not, as some evil tongues have said, that of his French friends.

He did not gesticulate much—at least that evening he was restrained in his movements. Fat and heavy as he was, he sat at ease in the arm-chair, which he entirely filled. The thing I remember as most characteristic of him was his happy, friendly laugh, which made us like him immediately, for his attitude, a trifle too languid, and his somewhat affected carriage did not seem to suit the manly breadth of shoulder of this giant of the north.

III.

I saw him again in 1901, but without having an opportunity of speaking to him. He was seated on the terrace of the Café de la Paix, on the Boulevard, with someone I did not know, and I did not go up to him, as I should have done if he had been alone. Although I had not then read his admirable "De Profundis," I was sure that Oscar Wilde, in spite of his inexcusable moral faults, was better than his reputation, and it was a profound satisfaction to me when I read that book and the "Ballad of Reading Gaol" to find that the soul of Wilde had indeed benefited, like that of Paule Verlaine, from the severe but well-merited experience which they were both condemned to undergo.

This last time that I saw Oscar Wilde he was but a shadow of his former self. I recognised him. One could hardly fail to recognise him—he was so tall and broadly built—but what a change from the radiant lover of beauty that I had known. What a change in his appearance, his manner, and even in his clothes.

IV.

There had already grown up a kind of Oscar Wilde legend, which people will always hesitate to repeat, simply because it is a legend, and because many of its features were invented afterwards, but he himself was indulgent towards this kind of literary embellishment. "Legends are often more true than reality," he used to say. But I shall only recall those anecdotes characteristic of him which have been told me as authentic by his friends in Paris, and chiefly by Stuart Merrill, who knew him so intimately.

One day some visitors calling on Oscar Wilde found him gazing ecstatically at some rare Chinese porcelain. They spoke to him—he gave no answer—they shook him, saying "Have you gone mad?" He answered gravely, "I am trying to live up to my china."

Another time he seemed suffering from great depression. "What is wrong?" "It is sad," he said; "one half of the world does not believe in God, and the other half does not believe in me."

During his tour in America, the inhabitants of Griggsville, in Kansas, sent him a telegram asking him to come and give them a lecture on æsthetics. Oscar Wilde telegraphed back, "Begin by changing the name of your town."

It was probably at the Theatre du Moulin Rouge that he conceived the idea of putting on the stage the drama of Salomé, who obtained the head of St. John the Baptist from Herod the Tetrarch. On the stage a Roumanian acrobat was dancing on her hands. Oscar Wilde, who up to that moment had been paying little attention to what was going on, sat up. "I must see that woman," he said to Stuart Merrill, who was with him. "She must play the part of Salomé in a play which I shall write for her. I want her to dance on her hands, as in the tale of Flaubert."

V.

The greater number of his Parisian friends remained loyal to him. I remember the incredulity with which they heard the first rumours tending to prove the truth of the accusation which the Marquis of Queensberry had brought against him. Nothing in the talk of Oscar Wilde had ever supported these accusations. He never used expressions that were too free, and he blamed his friends from the Quartier Latin for their taste for a Rabelaisian fashion of speech.

Among those whom I have already named, Andre Gide, Henry Davray, Edouard Julia, and many others did not desert him in his troubles; thanks to them, Oscar Wilde still enjoyed some happy days in Paris, especially during the Exhibition of 1900. But it was no longer the triumphant Oscar Wilde of former days. He thus describes the change. "My life," said he, "is like a work of art. An artist never repeats himself. My life before going to prison had achieved harmonious success; now it is a thing of the dead past."

Perhaps one day I shall write some recollections of "Oscar Wilde after his prison days," from the memories of those who remained faithful to him. Just now I only wish to recall the hero of fashion, the arbiter elegantiarum, the successor at one and the same time of Brummel and Ruskin, he whom his friends delighted to compare to a grand priest of the Moon Goddess in the days of Heliogabalus.

PICTURES FOR EVERYMAN

What "Everyman's Library" is to the lover of literature, so are the "Medici Prints" to the lover of great pictures

¶ Does this statement need further support? If so, that may be adduced from many quarters. Take first the testimony which may be termed quantitative.

¶ The Medici Prints already offer a choice of OVER 150 OF THE WORLD'S FINEST PICTURES as adornment for the walls of Everyman. Here is the product of six years of The Medici Society's activity: at the present rate of output—which only adequate public support can guarantee—the number will be doubled in a like period. And it is the policy of The Medici Society to bring its Prints within the reach of Everyman's purse.

¶ This is not to say that a MEDICI PRINT may be had in exchange for the ever-ready shilling. A moment's reflection will show such a requirement to be unreasonable. Where the furnishing of Everyman's home demands five hundred books, it does not demand five hundred pictures. A fiftieth part of that number would turn the average house into a picture gallery. ¶ On the other hand, it may be claimed that, if a shilling edition of a standard work is cheap in relation to a scarce first edition of the same book, vastly more is the price of a MEDICI PRINT moderate compared with the market value of an original Old Master. The Medici Society is content to offer its Prints at prices commensurate with the cost of using for its reproductions THE FINEST AVAILABLE PROCESS—that of the expensive and difficult "colour collotype." In relation to the outlay involved in the production of a Print—to say nothing of the expert care demanded by the process—the prices of MEDICI PRINTS, from 6s. to 40s., will be generally conceded moderate.

¶ Now turn to the testimony which may be termed qualitative. Take, for instance, the highest artistic authority in Europe, the "Burlington Magazine," whose judgment from the outset has been that "nothing of the kind so good and so cheap has ever been issued before." That opinion it has quite recently confirmed in the statement that the Prints "maintain their previous high level of excellence, and, in deed, sometimes surpass it." ¶ "The Times" has said that "in hundreds of homes they are taking the place of original pictures"—quite accidental confirmation of which statement may be found in a letter printed in the "Westminster Gazette" so lately as October 5th last, from a correspondent entirely unknown to The Society:—

"It is not safe for anyone untrained in artistic matters to sink any large sum of money in any original work of art. . . . The safest plan is to buy Medici Prints and furnish up to them. You pay for cultivated taste in the choice of the picture. . . ."

¶ These last words strike the key-note of The Society's usefulness. The claim made in them may be tested by Everyman: if he will investigate for himself the evidence provided by The Society's Prospectus and Catalogue, which will be sent by post on receipt of 6d. stamps. And at the same time he will therein learn how, by becoming a Subscriber or Associate of The Society, he may, besides securing for himself preferential terms in all his purchases from The Society, ensure that its full programme may be maintained. A mere application by postcard will bring condensed particulars of all published Prints. ¶ For those who are interested to hear of other sides of The Society's activity, the following printed particulars are available:—

A Catalogue, fully illustrated, of the "O.M.C." series of miniature Old Masters in Colour, at ONE SHILLING each. This is an attempt to make accessible a comprehensive series of small colour prints in a form really useful to students and lovers of Art. The Catalogue will be sent for 2d. post free, or with specimen Plate, 7d. post free. Similar in aim is the collection of 7,500 Carboprints and Carbon Photographs at ONE SHILLING each, of which the illustrated Catalogue costs 2s., including Supplement of National Gallery subjects, which may also be had separately for 3d. post free. An illustrated Catalogue of 350 Drawings by the Old Masters, reproduced in facsimile, may be had for 6d. post free. Summary lists, with one or more illustrations, may also be had post free, on request, of The Popular Medici Prints (price 6s. each), The National Portrait Series, and Pictures from the Tennant Collection.

Another side of The Medici Society's enterprise is in the domain of literature, where the same high standard of production as marks the Medici Prints is scrupulously maintained. An illustrated list of new and recent Books so published by Mr. Lee Warner for The Medici Society, including the Riccardi Press Books, may be had free on request.

¶ All applications should be addressed to: Dept. E.M., The Medici Society, Ltd., 7, Grafton Street, Bond Street, W. At The Society's Galleries (address as above) their publications may be freely inspected.

•N.B. An Exhibition of Medici Prints is at present open at The Institute, Hampstead Garden Suburb.

TOLSTOY'S "WAR AND PEACE" * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

It is now exactly a hundred years since Napoleon crossed the Niemen and declared war to his former friend and ally, Alexander I. Like the passing of the Rubicon by Cæsar, the crossing of the Niemen marks a turning-point in human history. Everything in the Russian campaign is stupendous, and staggers our imagination. The numbers engaged are on a scale hitherto unexampled in military annals. The most moderate computation exceeds half a million. Nor is the composition of the "Grand Army" less extraordinary than its numbers. It is too often forgotten that in the Russian campaign the French were in a minority. Half the nations of the Continent had sent their contingents to the Lord of the World. Danes, Spaniards, Austrians, Poles, had all been coaxed or driven into the service of the Corsican, and were to adorn the supreme triumph of Napoleon's career.

And from beginning to end the Russian Campaign is a succession of dramatic contrasts and of tragic incidents. The conflict between the civilised Frenchman and the semi-barbarous Muscovite, the novel theatre of the war, the vast Russian plain alluring and devouring the invader, the guerilla tactics of the Cossacks, the ghastly shambles of Borodino, followed by the victorious entry into Moscow, the burning of the capital in the very hour of victory, the gradual approach of the Arctic winter, the hurried retreat, the infinite expanse covered with snow as with a winding sheet, the heroism of Murat and Ney, recalling the Homeric age, the disaster of the Berezina, the secret flight of Napoleon in the dead of night, and, as the last phase, a few straggling and famished hordes returning to the Polish frontier, a remnant of what had been, six months before, a formidable host—all those scenes and incidents are written in indelible characters in the annals of human folly and human suffering, and make the Campaign of Russia one of the most impressive catastrophes of all times.

II.

It is this catastrophe which is the subject of Tolstoy's novel. Only a literary giant like Tolstoy could have done justice to so gigantic a theme, and it is through this unique combination of a wonderful subject with a wonderful genius that "War and Peace" takes rank as one of the supreme masterpieces of world literature.

"War and Peace" is one of the miracles of literary art, and, like every miracle, it necessarily evades us. We cannot explain how the miracle came into being. We can only contemplate the achievement. We can only admire and inadequately analyse the magic powers displayed: the creative imagination which breathes life into every scene and every character, and which, indeed, makes the fictitious characters stand out more vividly than the historical, the infallible observation and sense of reality which seizes on the most minute details, and which selects with infallible tact the most characteristic touches; the universal outlook which embraces every aspect and every class of society, which introduces us to the drawing-room of the society woman, to the closet of the statesman, and to the hut of the peasant; and, above all, the divine gift of sympathy, which can feel with every suffering, which can read into every heart, into the soul of sinner and saint, of young and old, of the worldling and of the common people.

And as we can only inadequately analyse the powers displayed, so we can only dimly guess the methods employed. One of Tolstoy's favourite methods is the method of contrast, and that method is illustrated in the very title of the book. For we may observe that the title is not "The Great War." The title is "War and Peace." The author gives us the action and reaction of the one on the other. He does not give the military events separately. He gives us the battle scenes on the background of the domestic drama. He makes the pomp and circumstance of war alternate with the peaceful pursuits of everyday life. He shows us events not merely from the vantage-ground of the battlefield, but from the more important point of view of those who are left at home. He tells us of the war as it affects the old prince on his remote estate, or as it impresses the wives and mothers whose dear ones are taken away from them. Whilst in one scene the hero is dying in the stillness of the starry night, in the next scene the heroine is making love, and the little ironies and comedies of ordinary life only heighten the effect of the tragedy.

III.

But "War and Peace" is not only an inspiring epic, the Iliad of the Russian people. It also contains an ethical message of weighty import. From his protracted absorption in his great theme, Tolstoy has emerged with a new conception of war and a new conception of life. Describing the military incidents of the campaign, he has come to close quarters with the horrors of modern warfare, with the wholesale and treacherous butchery of gun and grape-shot, which makes no difference between coward and hero. The once dashing young officer of the Crimea is transformed into an ardent anti-militarist. And thus the record of a great patriotic war indirectly becomes a plea in favour of peace. Or, again, studying the high life of Petersburg and Moscow, Tolstoy cannot help contrasting the selfishness and frivolity of the upper classes with the quiet heroism and the resignation of the illiterate peasant. And thus, what appears at first sight as a description of Russian society life, becomes indirectly the glorification of democracy. Or again, tracing the action between cause and effect, Tolstoy has observed how at every stage the individual will is overruled by a Higher Will; how in the battlefield the leader does not lead, but follows; how victory and defeat are equally at the mercy of forces beyond human control. And thus we see the gambler and Bohemian of earlier years transformed into a Russian Puritan and a Christian Nihilist.

But although the burning problems of modern life are presented to us in all their aspects, Tolstoy is too much of an artist to obtrude his own theories upon his audience. He lets life teach its own lessons, and he lets the reader draw his own moral. From the first page to the last he remains the objective creator; standing, as it were, outside and above his own creation, he retains his impartiality and his serenity. No doubt, he writes with a purpose, but the purpose is hidden from us. The time will soon come in the life of Tolstoy when the story will be overweighted with the message, and when the story teller will recede in the background and surrender to the leader and preacher. But the "final conversion" has not come yet. In "War and Peace," Tolstoy still maintains that perfect equilibrium which is so rarely met with in literature, that harmony between the creative artist and the thinker where neither encroaches on the province of the other, and where each remain supreme in his own sphere.

Cambridge University Press

SELECTED LIST

ENGLISH LITERATURE

- The Cambridge History of English Literature. Vols. I. to VIII. now ready. Prices on application.
- Beaumont and Fletcher: Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by ARNOLD GLOVER and A. R. WALLER. In 10 volumes. 4s. 6d. net each, or £2 net the set.
- Sir Philip Sidney: Complete Works. Edited by ALBERT FEUILLERAT. Vol. I. now ready. 4s. 6d. net.
- An Anthology of the Poetry of the Age of Shakespeare. By W. T. YOUNG. 2s. 6d. net.
- Life in Shakespeare's England. A Book of Elizabethan Prose compiled by J. DOVER WILSON. 3s. 6d. net.
- Milton: The Poetical Works. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT. Cloth, 5s. net; lambskin, 7s. 6d. net.
- The Literature of the Victorian Era. By HUGH WALKER. 10s. net.
- Lyrical Forms in English. Edited, with introduction and notes, by NORMAN HEPPLE. 3s. net.
- Principles of Biography. By SIR SIDNEY LEE. 1s. 6d. net.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY

- The Gospels as Historical Documents. By V. H. STANTON. To be completed in 4 parts. Parts I. and II. now ready. 17s. 6d. net.
- The Apostles' Creed: Its Relation to Primitive Christianity. By H. B. SWETE. 3rd edition. 3s.
- The Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin. By F. R. TENNANT. 9s. net.
- Twelve Cambridge Sermons. By JOHN E. B. MAYOR. Edited, with Memoir, by H. F. STEWART. 5s. net.
- Ecclesiasticus. New Volume in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges. 6s. net.
- The Realm of Ends, or Pluralism and Theism. By JAMES WARD. 12s. 6d. net.
- The Pursuit of Reason. By CHARLES F. KEARY. 9s. net.
- The Philosophical Works of Descartes. Rendered into English by ELIZABETH S. HALDANE and G. R. T. ROSS. 2 vols. 21s. net.

EDUCATION

- The Principles of Intellectual Education. By F. H. MATTHEWS. 2s. 6d. net.
- The Making of Character. Some Educational Aspects of Ethics. By JOHN MACCUNN. 2s. 6d.
- Roman Education. By A. S. WILKINS. 2s. net.
- Greek Education: Its Practice and Principles. By JAMES DREVER. 2s. net.
- The English Grammar Schools to 1660. Their Curriculum and Practice. By FOSTER WATSON. 6s. net.
- Scottish Education, School and University. From Early Times to 1908. By JOHN KERR. 6s. net.
- Studies in Education During the Age of the Renaissance, 1400-1600. By W. H. WOODWARD. 4s. 6d. net.
- Pioneers of Modern Education in the Seventeenth Century. By J. W. ADAMSON. 4s. 6d. net.

HISTORY

- The Cambridge Modern History. Complete in fourteen volumes. Prices and particulars on application.
- The Cambridge Medieval History. To be completed in eight volumes. Full particulars on application. Vol. I. now ready.
- History of Scotland. By P. HUMF BROWN. 3 vols. Cloth, 13s. 6d. net; half-mor., 21s. net. Illustrated library edition, 30s. net and 50s. net.
- The Growth of British Policy. By Sir J. R. SEELEY. 2nd edition. 2 vols. 12s.
- Outlines of English Industrial History. By W. CUNNINGHAM and ELLEN A. McARTHUR. 3s. net.
- Canada Under British Rule, 1760-1905. By Sir JOHN G. BOURINOT. 8 maps. 4s. 6d. net.
- A History of the Australasian Colonies to 1911. By ED. JENKS. 3rd edn. 2 maps. 4s. 6d. net.
- The Revolutionary and Napoleonic Era, 1789-1815. By J. HOLLAND ROSE. 6th edition, revised. 6 maps and plans. 3s. 6d. net.

GREEK AND LATIN

- Plato. The Republic. The text with critical notes. Edited by J. ADAM. 4s. 6d.
- Sophocles. The Seven Plays with notes, commentary, and translation, by Sir R. C. JEBB. 12s. 6d. each.
- Sophocles. The Text of the Seven Plays. Edited, with introduction, by Sir R. C. JEBB. 5s.
- Sophocles. The Tragedies. Translated into English Prose by Sir R. C. JEBB. 5s. net.
- Horace. Odes and Epodes. Edited, with introduction and notes, by J. GOW. 5s.
- Juvenal. Satires. Edited, with introduction and notes, by J. D. DUFF. 5s.
- A Companion to Greek Studies. Edited by L. WHIBLEY. 2nd edition. 18s. net.
- A Companion to Latin Studies Edited by Sir J. E. SANDYS. 18s. net.

MATHEMATICS, ETC.

- Principia Mathematica. By A. N. WHITEHEAD and BERTRAND RUSSELL. Vol. I., 25s. net. Vol. II., 30s. net.
- A Course of Pure Mathematics. By G. H. HARDY. 12s. net.
- An Elementary Course of Infinitesimal Calculus. By HORACE LAMB. 2nd edition. 12s.
- Elements of Natural Philosophy. By LORD KELVIN and P. G. TAIT. 2nd edition. 9s.
- The Thirteen Books of Euclid's Elements. Translated and edited by Sir THOMAS L. HEATH. 3 vols. 42s. net.
- A Treatise on Plane Trigonometry. By E. W. HOBSON. 3rd edition. 12s.
- Statics: Including Hydrostatics and the elements of the theory of elasticity. By HORACE LAMB. 10s. 6d. net.
- The Mathematical Theory of Electricity and Magnetism. By J. H. JEANS. 2nd edition. 15s. net.

A complete catalogue of the publications of the Cambridge University Press will be sent post free on application

London

Cambridge University Press

Fetter Lane

THE VICTIM*

By PERCEVAL GIBBON

COBB was crossing the boulevard, and was actually evading a taxi-cab at the moment when he sighted the little comedy which he made haste to interrupt. Upon the further pavement, Savinien, whom we once believed in as a poet, had stopped in the shelter of a shop-door, an unlighted cigarette between his lips, and was prospecting his vast person with gentle little slaps for a match. The current of the pavement rippled by him; the great expanse of his back was half turned to it, so that he and his search were in a kind of privacy, and the situation was favourable to the two inconspicuous men who approached him from either side. The one, with an air of hurry, ran against him at the instant when he was exploring his upper waistcoat pocket, staggered and caught at him with mumbled apologies; the other, with the sure and suave movement of an expert, slid an arm between the two bodies, withdrew it, and was making off.

"Hi!" shouted Cobb, as the taxi shaved past him, and came across with a rush. People stopped to see what he was shouting at, and a group of them, momentarily blocking the pavement, made it easy for the lanky Cobb to bowl the fleeing pickpocket against the wall and lay secure hands on him.

"You come along with me," said Cobb, who always forgot his French when he was excited.

The thief, helpless under the grip on the nape of his neck, whined and stammered. He was a rat of a man, white-faced, pale-eyed, with a sagging uncertain mouth.

"M'sieur!" he whimpered. "But I have got nothing! It is a mistake. The other man——"

Cobb thrust him at the end of a long arm to where Savinien stood, the cigarette still unlighted. The other man, of course, was gone.

"Hullo, Savinien," said Cobb. "You know you've been robbed, don't you? I just caught this fellow as he was bolting. See what you've lost, won't you?"

"Lost!" Savinien stared, a little stupidly, Cobb thought, and suddenly smiled. He was bulky to the point of grotesqueness, with a huge white torpid face and a hypochondriac stoop of the shoulders, and the hand that travelled over his waistcoat, from pocket to pocket, looked as if it had been shaped out of dough.

"Well?" said Cobb impatiently, stilling the thief's whimpering protests with a quick grip of the hand that held him.

"My watch," murmured Savinien, still smiling as though he were pleased and relieved to be the victim of a theft. "But let him go."

"Let him go! Oh, no," said Cobb. "I'll hand him over to the police and we'll get the watch out of him."

"The watch is nothing," said Savinien. "Let him go before there arrives an agent, or it will be too late."

He came a pace nearer as he spoke, and nodded at Cobb confidentially, as though there were reasons for his request which he could not explain before the onlookers.

"But——" began Cobb.

"Let him go," urged Savinien. "It is necessary. Afterwards, I will explain to you." He put his shapeless soft hand on Cobb's arm which held the thief. "Let him go."

"You are serious?" demanded Cobb. "He's to go, is he? With your watch? All right!"

He let go the scraggy neck which he held in the fork of his hand. They were, by this time, ringed about by spectators, but the thief was not less expert with crowds than with pockets. He was no sooner loose than he seemed to merge into the folk about, to pass through and beyond them like a vapour. Heads turned, feet shuffled. Savinien came about ponderously like a battleship in narrow waters, but the thief was gone.

* Copyright in the U.S.A. by Perceval Gibbon.

"Tiens!" ejaculated someone, and there was laughter.

Savinien's arm insinuated itself through Cobb's elbow.

"Let us go where we can sit down," said the poet. "You are puzzled—not? But I will explain you all that."

"It wasn't a bet, was it?" asked Cobb.

The poet laughed gently. "That possibility alarms you?" he suggested. "But it was not a bet; it is more vital than that. I will tell you when we sit down."

At Savinien's slow pace they came at last to small marble-topped tables under a striped awning. Savinien, with loud gasps, let himself down upon an exiguous chair, rested both fat hands upon the head of his stick, and smiled ruefully across the table at Cobb. A tinge of blue had come out around his lips.

"Even to walk," he gasped, "that discomposes me. As you see. It is terrible."

"Take it easy," counselled Cobb.

An aproned waiter served them, Cobb with beer, Savinien with a treacly liqueur in a glass the size of a thimble. When he was a little restored from his exertions, he laid his arm on the table, with the little glass held between his thumb and forefinger, and remained in this attitude.

"Go ahead," said Cobb. "Tell me why you are distributing watches to the deserving poor in this manner."

"It is not benevolence," replied Savinien. "It is simply that I have a need of some misfortune to balance things."

There was a muffled quality in his voice, as though it were subdued by the bulk from which it had to emerge; but his enunciation was as clean and dexterous as in the days when he had made a vogue for his poems by reading them aloud. It was the voice of a poet issuing from the mouth of a glutton.

"To balance things," he repeated. "Fortune, my dear Cobb, is a pendulum; the higher it rises on the side of happiness, the further it returns on the side of disaster. And with me, who cannot take your arm for a promenade along the pavement without a tightness in the neck and a flutter of my heart, who may not go upstairs quicker than a step a minute, disaster has only one shape. It arrives and I am extinguished! It is for that reason that I fear a persistence of good luck. Of late, the luck that dogs me, has been incredible.

"Listen, now, to this! Three days ago, being in a difficulty, I go in search of Rigobert. You know Rigobert, perhaps?"

"No," said Cobb. "But you have lent him money?"

"Precisely," agreed Savinien. "The sum which he owed me was no more than two hundred and fifty francs, but I had not much hope of him. I went leisurely upon the way towards his studio, and at the corner by the Madeleine I entered the post office to obtain a stamp for a letter I had to send. The first thing which I perceived as I opened the door was the back of Rigobert, as he sprawled against the counter, signing his name upon a form while the clerk counted out money to him. Hundred franc notes, my friend—noble new notes, ten in number, a thousand francs in all, which Rigobert received for his untidy autograph upon a blue paper. As for me, I planted myself there at his back in an attitude of expectancy and determination to await his leisure. He was cramming the money into his trousers pocket as he turned round and beheld me. He was embarrassed. He, the universal debtor, the bottomless pit of loans and obligations, to be discovered thus.

"You!" he exclaimed.

"I!" I replied, and took him very firmly by the arm, and mentioned my little affair to him. He was not pleased, Rigobert, but for the moment he was empty of excuses. When he suggested that we should go to a café, to change one of the notes, that he might pay me my two hundred and fifty, I agreed, for I had him by the arm, but I could see that he was gathering his faculties, and I was wary. A bon rat bon chat!

"I waited till his note was changed. 'Now, my friend,' I said. 'The hour is come.'

"He looked at me attentively; he is very naïve, in reality. Then, very slowly, he put one hand in his pocket and drew out the whole bundle of money. It looked opulent, it looked fulsome.

"Savinien,' he said. 'I will do even more than you asked. Two-fifty, is it not? See, now, here is five hundred, and I will toss you whether I pay you five hundred or nothing.'

"He balanced a coin on his thumb-nail, and smiled at me sidelong. I drew myself up with dignity to repudiate his proposal, but at that instant there came to me—who can say what it was?—a whim, a nudge from the thumb of Providence, a momentary lunacy? I relaxed my attitude.

"Very well,' I replied. 'But first permit me to examine the coin?'

"With Rigobert, that is not an insult. He handed me the coin without a word—an honest cart-wheel, a five-franc piece.

"Toss, then,' I said, returning it to him. 'Face!' I called, as he spun it up. It twinkled in the air like a humming-bird, a score of francs to each flick of its wings, and his palm intercepted it as it fell. I leaned across to see; behind Rigobert's shoulder the waiter leaned likewise. The poor fellow had really no chance to practise those little tricks in which he is eminent. I had won. I drew the money across to me.

"Peste!' remarked Rigobert, in a tone of dejection, and looked with an appearance of horror at what remained to him of his thousand francs. The waiter beamed at me and rubbed his hands. I ordered him in a strong voice to bring two more consommations.

"Look here,' said Rigobert. 'Lend me that five hundred, will you? Or, at any rate—'

"He paused, and his eye lit again with hope.

"Tell you what,' he said. 'I'll toss you once more—five hundred against five hundred. This—he laid his hand on his remaining money—is no use to me. I simply can't do with less than a thousand. Is it agreed?'

"I desired to refuse; I am not a gambler; I come of prudent people. But again it came, that inspired impulse, that courageous folly.

"It is agreed,' I replied.

"He meant to win, that time. He sat back to it, he concentrated himself. He cast a look at me, the glance of a brigand. I was imperturbable. Again the waiter hurried to see the venture. Rigobert frowned.

"You call "face," eh?' he asked, balancing the coin.

"I call when the coin is in the air,' I replied.

"He grunted, and spun it up. 'Pile!' I called this time. Down it came to his hand. Once more the eyes of the waiter and myself rushed to it; the result was capable of no adjustment. I felt my heart bump painfully. The broad coin lay on his hand, 'pile' uppermost. I drew the rest of the money to me.

"A thousand thanks,' I croaked from a throat constricted with surprise. Rigobert swore."

Cobb laughed. "Is that all that is troubling you?" he asked.

"All!" Savinien shrugged his immense shoulders desolately. "All! That was merely the commencement," he said. "And even that did not finish there."

"I hope Rigobert didn't get any of it back," said Cobb.

"He did his best," replied Savinien. "In a minute or two he collected his wits and addressed himself to the situation. It was worth seeing. He shook his depression from him like a dog shaking water from its coat, and sat up. Enterprise, determination, ruthlessness, were eloquent in his countenance; I felt like a child before such a combination of qualities. Then he began to talk. He has an air, that brigand; he can cock his head so as to deceive a bailiff; he can wear a certain nobility of countenance; and with it all he can importune like a beggar. He has a horrid and plausible fluency; he is deaf to denials; he drugs you with words and robs you before you recover consciousness. He had got the length of quoting my own verses to me, and I felt myself going, when deliverance arrived. A stout man paused on the pavement, surveying us both, then came towards us.

"Monsieur Rigobert,' he said, with that fashion of politeness which one dreads, 'I am on my way to your address.'

"Do not let me detain you,' replied Rigobert, unpleasantly.

"But,' said the other, 'this was the day you appointed, M'sieur. You said, "Bring your bill to me on the 13th, and I will pay it." Here is the bill.'

"He plunged his hand into his breast pocket and fumbled with papers. Rigobert examined me rapidly. But the spell was broken, and I was myself again, master of my emotions and of the thousand francs. He saw that it was hopeless—and rose.

"Monsieur,' he said to the tradesman, 'this is not a time to talk to me of business. I have just suffered a painful bereavement.'

"He made a gesture with his hand, mournful and resigned, and walked away, while the tradesman gazed after him. And there was I—rich and safe! I felt a warmth that pervaded me. I settled my hat on my head and reached for my cane. It was then that the truly significant thing occurred—the clue, as it were. My hand, as I took my cane, brushed against my liqueur glass upon the table; it fell, rolled to the edge, and disappeared. The waiter dived for it, while I waited to pay for the breakage. His foolish German face came up over the edge of the table, crumpled in a smile.

"It is all right,' he said. 'The glass is not broken.'

"It was then, my friend, that I began to perceive how things were with me. Dimly at first, but, as the day proceeded, with growing clearness. I became aware that I stood in the shadow of some strange fate. Small ills, chances of trifling misfortune, stood aloof, and let me pass unharmed; I was destined to be the prey of a mightier evil. When I light my cigarette, do my matches blow out in the wind? No; they burn with the constancy of an altar candle. If I leave my gloves in a cab, as happened yesterday, do I lose them? No, the cabman comes roaring down the street at my back to catch me and restore them. A thousand such providences make up my day. This morning, just before I encountered you, the chief and most signal of them all occurred."

"Go on," said Cobb.

"It was, in fact, impressive," said Savinien. "There is, not far from here, a shop where I am accustomed to buy my cigarettes. A small place, you know, a hole in the wall, with a young ugly woman behind the counter. One enters, one murmurs 'Maryland,' one receives one's yellow packet, one pays, one salutes, one departs. There is nothing in the place to invite one to linger; never in my life have I said more than those two words—'Maryland' on entering and 'Madame' on leaving—to the good creature of the shop. I do not know her name, nor she mine. Ordinarily she is reading when I enter; she puts down her book to serve me as one might put down a knife and fork; it must often happen that she interrupts herself in the middle of a word. She gets as far as: 'Jean ki—' then I enter. 'Maryland,' I murmur, receive my packet, and pay. 'Madame!' I raise my hat and depart. Not till then does she know the continuation:—'ssed Marie,' or 'cked the Vicomte,' whichever it may be. Not a luxurious reader, that one, you see.

"Well, this morning I enter as usual. There she sits, book in hand. 'Maryland,' I murmur. For the first time in my experience of her she does not at once lay the book, face downwards, on the counter, and turn to the shelf behind her to reach me my cigarettes. No, the good creature is absorbed. 'Pardon,' I say, rather louder. She looks up, and it is clear she is impatient at being disturbed. 'Maryland,' I request. She puts down the book and fumbles for a packet. But I am curious to know what book it is that holds her so strongly, what genius of a romancer has aimed so surely at her intelligence. I turn the book round with a finger. The shop, the shelves, the horse's face of Madame, the proprietress, swim before me. I could dance; I could weep; I could embrace the lady in the pure joy of an artist appreciated and requited. For of all the books ever printed upon paper, that book is mine. My verses! My songs of little lives, they grasp at her and will not let go, like importunate children; she is not easily nor willingly free of them when affairs claim her. Nunc dimittis!"

"What did you do?" enquired Cobb. "Give her a watch, or what?"

"My friend," said Savinien; "I was careful. To do a foolish or a graceless thing would have been to dethrone for her a poet. There was need of a spacious and becoming gesture. I opened her book at the fly-leaf, and reached across to the comptoir for a pen. She turned at that and stared, possibly fearful, poor creature, that it was the till that attracted me. I took the pen and splashed down on the fly-leaf of the book my name in full—a striking signature! Then without a further word that might make an anti-climax, I took my cigarettes and departed. I was so thrilled, so exalted, that it was five minutes before I remembered to be afraid."

"For my fortune was becoming bizarre, you know. It was making me ridiculous even to myself. I have told you but the salient incidents of it; I do not desire to weary you with the facts of the broken braces, the spurious two-franc piece, or the lost door-key. But it is becoming sinister; it needed a counterpoise before it became so pronounced that nothing but sudden death would suffice. The thief steals my watch and I am relieved; he is departing with my best wishes for his success; all promises well, till you arrive at the charge, with your comb erect, and seize him. It is all of a piece. Yes, I know it is funny, but it alarms me. I offer it, therefore, my watch—a sacrifice. Perhaps it likes watches. If so, I have got off cheaply, for, to tell the truth, it was not much of a watch."

He raised the minute glass and drank, setting it down again with a flourish.

"And now I must be going," he said. "It is a strange story—not? But I don't like it; I don't like it at all."

"Adieu," said Cobb, rising also. "I don't think I'd worry if I were you. And I won't interfere again."

"On no account," said Savinien, seriously.

Cobb watched him move away, plodding along the pavement heavily, huge and portentous. The back of his head bulged above the collar, with no show of neck between. He was comical and pathetic; he seemed too vast in mere flesh to be the sport of a thing so freakish as luck. To think that such a bulk had a weak heart in it—and that deeper still in its recesses there moved and suffered the soul of a poet.

"Queer yarn," mused Cobb.

It was on the following morning, while Cobb was dressing, that the messenger arrived—a little man in black, with a foot-rule sticking out of his coat-pocket. He looked like an elderly manservant who has descended to trade. He had a letter for Cobb, addressed in Savinien's pyrotechnic hand, and handed it to him without speaking.

"My dear friend," it said, "I fear the worst. On my return to my rooms here, the first thing I saw was my watch, reposing on my bedside table. It appears that when I made my toilet in the morning I forgot to put it in my pocket. The thief, after all, got nothing. I am lost. In despair,—Your César Savinien."

"Yes?" said Cobb. "You want an answer?" For the little artisan in black was waiting.

"An answer!" The other stared. "But—Then monsieur does not know?"

"What?"

"He must have been going down to post that note when he had written it," said the little man. "We found it in his hand."

"Eh?" Cobb almost recoiled in the shock of his surprise and horror. "D'you mean to tell me that, after all, he—he is——"

The little man in black uttered a professional sigh. "The concierge found him in the morning," he replied. "It is said that he suffered from his heart, that poor Monsieur."

"Oh, these Frenchmen!" cried Cobb. "To think that the fellow actually meant all he said yesterday!"

MONTENEGRO AND ITS RULER

I.

It has been left to the diminutive principality of Montenegro to assume the formidable responsibility of declaring war on Turkey. In the present juncture it may be interesting to recall the remarks which appeared in the Contemporary Review on the proclamation of the new kingdom, under the signature of Dr. Dillon, probably the greatest living authority on Eastern Policy.

"The venerable Prince of Montenegro—the Black Mountain—has been promoted to the rank of king, if not by the grace of God, then by the courtesy of European monarchs. It is amusing to reflect that about the time when Kaiser Wilhelm was magniloquently holding forth on the divine right of kings, this Homeric figure of South-eastern Europe was climbing into a royal throne and acquiring those same divine rights, although his predecessor and uncle, Danilo, was but a clergyman, while the prince's mother carried wood to Cattaro for sale. Thus, since the 28th August, 1910, Europe has had a new kingdom, while the republic of letters has a crowned poet and journalist. Montenegro is by far the tiniest of the kingdoms—although by no means the most insignificant. King Nicholas rules over a population equal to that of some London parish, about 300,000 men, women, and children all told, most of whom have a very hard struggle for existence. For, with the exception of a very few districts, like the Moratsha-Plain and the Zeta Valley, Montenegro is a realm of hard stone.

II.

"When God set about creating the world, says the legend current among these mountaineers, He made rivers, fields and meadows, and forests. But looking down on the totality of things from His celestial throne, He found the result monotonous. Nature needed a touch of rugged wildness by way of variety, so He resolved to pile hills upon hills and see how they would look. For this purpose He gathered stones from all parts of the universe, and packed them in two mighty sacks, which He threw over His shoulders. But as He strode over the globe the sacks burst, just as He chanced to be where Montenegro now stands, and all the stones fell to the ground. That is how the arid, stony mountain first came into existence. Even now, thirty years after the annexation of fertile stretches of land that belonged to Turkey, there are families living in places two and a half hours' distant from the nearest source of water! And it is characteristic of their love of their old homes that most of the people refused to accept the offer made them to go and live in the new fertile districts.

(Continued on page 22.)

From
HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S
NEW LIST.

RUDYARD
KIPLING

Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling

£5 5s. net Edition, limited to
100 copies. ALL SOLD.

£2 2s. net Edition, limited to
500 copies. ALL SOLD:

20s. net Edition. First large printing order all sold. Second edition already heavily subscribed.

Sir Arthur
Conan Doyle's
New Novel

The LOST WORLD

By Sir ARTHUR CONAN
DOYLE. Illustrated. 6/-

*Presentation Edition, with Special Illustrations,
10/6 net.*

THE LADY MARRIED

By the Author of
THE LADY OF THE DECORATION.

The great sequel to that world-famous book "The Lady of the Decoration," now in its 28th Edition.

6/-

THE LEE SHORE.

By ROSE MACAULAY.

The novel that won the
First Prize in Hodder &
Stoughton's Prize Novel
Competition, of £1,000

6/-

Complete List post free on application
HODDER & STOUGHTON, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

With a Portrait in Photogravure of H.M. King Louis Philippe. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

ENGLAND AND THE ORLEANS MONARCHY.

By Major JOHN HALL, Author of "The Bourbon Restoration."

4th and Greatly Enlarged Edition. Small Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MODERN GERMANY:

Her Political and Economic Problems, her Policy, her Ambitions, and the Causes of her Success.

By J. ELLIS BARKER.

Large Post 8vo, 6s. net.

THY ROD AND THY STAFF.

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON, Author of "From a College Window," "The Silent Isle," etc.

With 15 Illustrations. Small Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

ARABIC-SPAIN: Sidelights on Her History and Art.

By BERNHARD and ELLEN M. WHISHAW.

With 31 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

THE CHURCH IN MADRAS. Vol. II.

By the Rev. FRANK PENNY, LL.M., late Chaplain in H.M. Indian Service (Madras Establishment).

Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

WHAT THE JUDGE SAW:

Being 25 years in Manchester by One who has done it.

By His Honour Judge EDWARD ABBOTT PARRY, Author of "Judgments in Vacation," etc.

Large Post 8vo, 6s. net.

ALLEGORIES OF THE LAND.

By Major GAMBIER-PARRY, Author of "Murphy: A Message to Dog Lovers," etc.

On Oct. 23rd. With 8 Illustrations. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ETON IN THE SEVENTIES.

By the Honourable GILBERT COLERIDGE, Author of "An Instinctive Criminal," etc.

Ready Oct. 23rd. With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 6s. net.

A HOME HELP IN CANADA.

By ELLA C. SYKES, Author of "Through Persia on a Side Saddle," "Persia and its People."

On Oct. 23rd. With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

BOSWELL, THE BIOGRAPHER.

By GEORGE MALLORY.

Ready Oct. 31st. With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SCENES AND MEMORIES.

By WALBURGA, LADY PAGET.

NEW 6s. FICTION.

HONEY, MY HONEY.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

THE GRIP OF LIFE.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

ERICA.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE (Lady Clifford). ON OCTOBER 23RD.

PROMISE OF ARDEN.

By ERIC PARKER. ON OCTOBER 31ST.

SEVEN SCOTS STORIES.

By JANE FINDLATER. With 5 Illustrations in Colour by HENRY W. KERR, R.S.A., R.S.M. ON OCTOBER 31ST.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

III.

"King Nicholas was still, when I last saw him about four years ago, a majestic, imposing figure. Fifty years ago he married the prettiest girl in the principality, Milena Vukolich, when he was about nineteen and she just thirteen and six months old. This marriage is said to have been as happy as it was fruitful, and the exemplary couple were blessed with three sons and seven dutiful daughters, who have never lost an opportunity of testifying in deeds their sense of gratitude to their parents. In his youth he won golden opinions abroad—Louis Napoleon's friendship in Paris was one manifestation of them—and the nimbus of a hero at home. His people—the elite of the Servian race—looked upon him as a sort of Messiah, who was destined not only to free them from the Turkish yoke, but to unite them with the other fragments of the race in a great Servian Tsardom. And he certainly had some of the qualities and rendered some of the services of a national Messiah. He was comely, martial, intrepid, and chivalrous. His knowledge of men was subtle, and his way of dealing with them efficacious. He spoke the languages of all those with whom his rôle in life was likely to bring him into contact: Servian, Turkish, Italian and French. He made serious personal sacrifices for the good of the race, and he did not make them in vain."

SCOTT AND BALZAC

BY GEORGE SAINTSBURY

It would not be a quite unpardonable thing if a person, not wholly ignorant of either of the two great novelists whose names stand above, but not very thoroughly acquainted with either, and not given to critical consideration, were to think and speak of them as not merely different but opposed to each other in every possible way. He might even (if he knew a little more, but not enough) point to the contempt with which both English and French admirers of Balzac have often spoken of Scott; and to the scanty relish, if not the positive disapproval, which not a few English admirers of Scott have shown towards Balzac. Yet Balzac himself, though some of his critics and biographers have ignored or obscured the fact, was a fervent and a life-long admirer of Sir Walter.

The cant of the present day, both in France and England, about Scott is that he was a writer without art, who was constantly under the yoke of a pruderie bête, who composed stories possibly capable of amusing savages or our grandfathers, but incapable of satisfying a modern child; sometimes tedious, sometimes extravagant, badly written, characterless, permeated by a detestable affection for royalism, mediocrism, romanticism, and other "isms" equally bad, possessing neither heroes nor heroines, inaccurate in historical detail—and so on, and so on.

The cant (not quite so much of the present day, but still not quite recanted) about Balzac in England is that he has a predilection for the portrayal of vice; that if he is not such an "aristocrat" as Scott politically, he has a snobbish devotion to wealth and, at any rate, a rather suspicious fondness for depicting "high life"; that, as the moral atmosphere of his books is rarely quite pure, so the temperamental atmosphere is seldom cheerful and inspiring; that his minuteness, both in external detail and internal analysis of character, is oppressive, and other things of the same kind. To which it may be added that, in France itself, there have not been wanting people who said that Balzac also "could not write," and that, despite the immense and enduring critical attention bestowed on him there, it is by no means very easy to trace much direct following of his style in the enormous volume of fiction produced since his death. •Let us dismiss all this,

(Continued on page 24.)

Macmillan & Co.'s List.

NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

Folk-Tales of Bengal.

By the Rev. LAL BEHARI DAY. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to. 15s. net. Also Edition de Luxe, limited to 150 copies, printed on hand-made paper and bound in vellum. Demy 4to. 42s. net.

White-Ear and Peter: the Story of a Fox and a Fox-Terrier.

By NEILS HEIBERG. With 16 Coloured Plates by Cecil Aldin. Pott 4to. 6s. net.

THE MODERN READER'S CHAUCER.

The Complete Poetical Works of Geoffrey Chaucer.

Now first put into modern English Prose by JOHN S. P. TATLOCK and PERCY MACKAYE. With 32 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to. Decorated cloth. 15s. net.

NEW NOVELS.

Marriage.

By H. G. WELLS. 6s.

Mrs. Lancelot.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. 6s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CHARWOMAN'S DAUGHTER."

The Crock of Gold.

By JAMES STEPHENS. 5s. net.

The Standard.—"There is not another book like this 'Crock of Gold' in English literature. There are many books like pieces of it, but the humour and the style, these things are Mr. Stephens's own peculiar gift."

Folk-Tales of Breffny.

By Miss B. HUNT. [Shortly.]

A Regular Madam.

By ALICE WILSON FOX. Author of "Hearts and Coronets," etc. 6s. [Shortly.]

The Reef.

By EDITH WHARTON, Author of "The House of Mirth," etc. 6s. [Shortly.]

The subject of Mrs. Wharton's new novel is a sentimental drama between four Americans living in France.

WORKS BY STEPHEN REYNOLDS.

How 'Twas: Short Stories and Small Travels.

Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily Mail.—"Mr. Reynolds is slowly coming into his own as a writer with literary gifts of a high order. . . 'How 'Twas' is a collection of stories and sketches which make fascinating reading."

A Poor Man's House.

Crown 8vo. 6s. Popular Edition. Globe 8vo. 1s. net.

Mr. JOHN ECHAN in the Westminster Gazette.—"Mr. Reynolds has a remarkable literary gift, but none of the false impressionism which too often accompanies it. He does not go out to seek impressions; they come gladly to seek him. Above all, he has a sympathy which is a kind of genius. . . . Apart from its high literary value, it is full of a most manly and profound philosophy."

Seems So! A Working-Class View of Politics.

By STEPHEN REYNOLDS and BOB and TOM WOOLLEY. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily News.—"The value of this book—and it is of immense value—is that it puts before us a fisherman's point of view, and also the point of view from the lower deck in the Navy. Mr. Reynolds has probed deep. He has made his collaborators articulate. He does not merely generalise. He shows us vividly through conversations and pictures of life what the habits of working people are. He clears the ground of nonsense and cant. The prejudices are those of people living instinctively, from day to day in touch with the very hardest brute facts of life. It is an exhilarating book."

Alongshore: Where Man and the Sea Face One Another.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Daily Express.—"To all who love the sea and fishermen and dark nights and spacious cityless life, very heartily do we recommend Mr. Stephen Reynolds's splendidly vigorous 'Alongshore.' . . . A fine thing finely achieved."

Narrative of the Visit to India of Their Majesties King George V. and Queen Mary, and of the Coronation Durbar held at Delhi, 12th December, 1911.

By the Hon. JOHN FORTESCUE. With 32 Illustrations. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

This work continues the official record of the Visit and Durbar.

The Worker.—"Mr. John Fortescue has produced a book worthy of his theme. It tells his story from start to finish of the tour in a direct, explicit, direct manner; marshals his facts with consummate skill, and contrives, without waste of words, to be intensely interesting."

A Tramp's Sketches.

By STEPHEN GRAHAM, Author of "Undi covered Russia." With Frontispiece. Extra Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily News.—"Mr. Graham walked, mainly at random, from the Caucasus to Jerusalem; and he has given us in this robust book a classic of educated yet wild vagabondage."

The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter.

By JAMES SUTHERLAND. Illustrated. 8vo.

7s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

FREDERIC HARRISON'S NEW WORK.

Among My Books; Centenaries, Reviews, Memoirs.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

A companion volume to "Choice of Books."

Further Reminiscences of H. M. Hyndman.

8vo. [Immediately.]

Marie Antoinette: Her Early Youth: 1770-1774.

By LADY YOUNGHUSBAND. Illustrated. 8vo. 15s. net. [Tuesday.]

Second and Revised Edition.

Life of William Earl of Shelburne, afterwards First Marquess of Lansdowne, with Extracts from his Papers and Correspondence.

By LORD FITZMAURICE. With Portraits, Caricatures, and Maps. Second and Revised Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 24s. net.

Interpretation in Song.

By HARRY PLUNKET GREENE. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

This Work forms Vol. V. of "The Musician's Library." A new series issued in conjunction with Messrs. Stainer and Bell, Ltd.

The Thought in Music. An Enquiry into the Principles of Musical Rhythm, Phrasing and Expression.

By JOHN B. McEWEN, M.A., Fellow and Professor of Musical Composition in the Royal Academy of Music, London. Extra Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S NEW SHILLING LIBRARY.

Globe 8vo. 1s. net per Volume.

Six Lectures on the Inns of Court and of Chancery.

Delivered in the Middle Temple Hall during Easter and Trinity Terms, 1912. With Map.

A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

and see what, in contrast-parallel as above, the two men were and what they did.

One point of a strictly historical character gives a solid start. In both cases and in both countries—though Balzac had in Scott an advantage which Scott had in nobody—they began novel-writing after a long period of extremely voluminous but very undistinguished practice in it by their predecessors. Although France had got a little the start of us with the novel proper in the later seventeenth and early eighteenth century, she had no such group of novelists as that which illustrated our mid-eighteenth. For nearly fifty years before Waverley, and for quite fifty before "Les Chouans" (Balzac's earlier books are not quite negligible, but may be neglected here), the novel in both countries had been represented by floods of rubbish, with a few better and generally nondescript things—windfalls from Beckford and Godwin and Miss Edgeworth, from Saint-Pierre and Chateaubriand and Constant. But in this muddle, two kinds had been striving to get themselves born—the historical novel, especially in England, and the novel of analysis of character, assisted by description of scene and circumstance, especially in France. Scott almost at once, but, of course, helped by his years of practice in the verse-romance, struck into the line which the Lees, and the Porters, and the Godwins, and, to some extent, the Radcliffes, had been vainly groping for; Balzac, after less agreeable and much less successful preliminaries of search in the actual province of prose fiction, achieved, not exactly in "Les Chouans," but after it, the transformation of the novel of "sensibility" into the acts and scenes of the "Comédie Humaine."

What is most remarkable in Scott, and what distinguishes him most from his predecessors, is that quality of life which is diffused over and throughout his stories. It is quite arguable that, in the twelfth century, Gurth and Wamba would not have talked as they talk in his pages; but it is quite certain that they are, and talk like possible human beings. Then, too, there is the utilisation of all the accessories and et ceteras, the want of which, or the improbability of which, is so obvious and so objectionable in most earlier work. The scenes are agreeably painted and "set"; the dialogue, if open to criticism on strictly pedantic lines, completely escapes from that provoking inverisimilitude of conventional lingo which had beset plays and novels so long. The things and the persons are not shadows; they are not types; they are not tracings off a pattern. There is no (or very little) ostensible attempt at elaborate analysis of character and motive; yet an acute French judge, a contemporary of Balzac's and a friend of Browning's, detected, and rightly detected, fugitive touches of general observation of life which, as he said, you might read no small number of so-called philosophical novels without finding.

Now turn to Balzac. He tried the romance of incident and history, and discovered that, except perhaps on a small scale, it was not for him, and so he turned to the enormous network-study of contemporary French life, of which he succeeded in constructing so large a part, but which no one could have finished—which, in the nature of things, was interminable. He attended more to construction than Scott did; though, in his constant habit of reworking, he as often obscured as cleared up his first drafts. He, not having poetry to serve as an outlet for his more imaginative creation, suffused the whole of his work with a grandiosity which his extreme precision of detail prevents from being exactly vague, but which has been not improperly called "vignetted"—shading itself off into vastness and infinity instead of remaining clearly and positively outlined like Scott's. But the actual life, the actual utilisation of scene and surrounding; the personality, a little more typical (as being French) than the English writer's, but equally vivid; the absence of suggestion of mere bookishness—in all these things he resembles the great predecessor, whose best work was closed just when his accomplished performance was beginning. He applied, of course, what may be less well called the "method" than the "mode" of Scott to character-presentation, and to a presentation much more elaborate, much more what is called in French fouillé, than Scott's. And although he himself was much annoyed at being charged with preferring vicious people (and even most characteristically endeavoured to draw up lists rebutting the charge), it cannot, of course, be denied that his presentation of life is "grimier" than Scott's. It is so, not because it is necessarily truer; but simply because the springs of vicious or faulty conduct are less simple than those of virtuous, and so give the student of character more chance.

But these generalities should, small as is the space for it, be completed by some approximations in detail. Anybody who would like a pleasant and profitable critical exercise may find it in reading not merely "Les Chouans," which is Balzac's closest approach to Scott, but "St. Ronan's Well," which is Scott's closest approach to Balzac, and would, if Sir Walter had not allowed himself to be over-persuaded by Ballantyne, have been closer still. That, in the first case, there is deliberate following, and in the second entire precursorship, only makes the comparison the more interesting. In "Les Chouans" the whole general scheme is "after" Scott: and perhaps the undue slowness of movement which characterises the greater part of the book is an unlucky attempt to imitate that tour de force by which Sir Walter manages to confine nearly half of one of his best and busiest novels, "Rob Roy," to the events of scarcely forty-eight hours. On the other hand, the admirable close—the Jour sans Lendemain—treats its main motive in the style which Scott deliberately refused. Yet even here the "mode," as it has been called, is more that of Scott than of any earlier novelist—the constant projection of picturesque detail, the vivid succession of striking incident, to give background to the character.

Turn to the other. The plot of "St. Ronan's Well"—as it ought to be, and as it originally was, involving the actual and irreparable wrong to Clara—is quite Balzacian; and the society of the Wells and the village, though he could not have managed its more humorous figures, can be thought out in Balzac's form without any difficulty by anyone who knows the work from the "Chat-qui-Pelote" and "Père Goriot" to the unfinished "Député d'Arcis" and "Petits Bourgeois."

But, it may be said again, "Is not this mere paradox? Does not the fact still stare us in the face that there are no two novelists more different than Balzac and Scott?" Well! that depends on what is meant by difference. The broken ends of a tally, if you hold them up side by side, are very strikingly different; when you put them together you discover that they are parts of the same whole, and that the very action, the very process, which has made the one has made the other. That action, that process, in the case of our two great novelists is partly negative, partly positive—the absolute forsaking of previous convention, and the deliberate adoption of human life, actual or possible, contemporary or antiquated, as the standard, the model, the goal. The way of the one is conditioned by English, of the other by French influence and circumstance. One bases himself mainly on incident and romance; the other mainly on character-analysis and the more strictly defined novel. You can trace differences between them endlessly, and with almost a futile facility. The likeness may be harder to find at first, but it is there; and it is an illustration of the old proverb on which Montaigne wrote his first and not his worst essay, "Par divers moyens l'on arrive à pareille fin." The end of the novel is the presentation of life: and the more abundantly the better.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

Mr. Sandow on "The Wonderful Mechanics of Digestion."

A Remarkable Contribution to the Literature of Health. by the Great Physical Culturist.

Machinery in order implies three things :

1. Power to drive it;
2. Lubrication to ensure efficiency;
3. Skilled attendance to keep it in order.

When a machine breaks down, gets out of order, or is hindered by obstructions, lubrication is useless.

It must first be cleaned and repaired.

When, however, Power is insufficient or cut off or diverted, the best oil and the most skilful mechanic are helpless to keep it working at full pressure until Power is restored.

The body is the most wonderful machine of all.

In this marvellous machine, Indigestion invariably implies loss of Power, but Power must be restored or recruited to set the machinery of digestion vigorously at work once more.

A Commonsense Method.

All human Power comes from muscle, and muscle development is Power development.

The first step, therefore, in the treatment of indigestion is the scientific development of the muscular power of all the organs associated with digestion.

I want every reader of EVERYMAN to understand me clearly when I write here as a strong advocate of internal muscular development for the cure of indigestion.

The Unseen Muscles of the Body.

Muscle is the whole support of your body. Your body is full of muscles, little and big, flat and round. You cannot raise your little finger, you cannot even chew your food, much less digest it, without muscle.

The most important are the great unseen muscles lying in the region of the various organs of life, supporting them and reinforcing them by their hidden power.

These are the muscles that the Sandow Treatment restores to condition. Your arms and legs need not be masses of muscle unless you desire, but your involuntary and invisible muscles must be fully developed if you are to possess perfect health.

Now, you cannot develop this organic muscular strength by lifting huge weights or doing heavy, fatiguing, physical exercises. But you can develop organic power in almost any organ by the light scientific movements that I will prescribe.

Take, for example, the organs of digestion.

The walls of the stomach and of the intestines are muscular walls, and their strength means digestive strength. The "churning" action of the food in the stomach by which the food is ground so finely as to be easily assimilated is a muscular movement, called peristalsis, and the peristaltic action of the stomach is greatly strengthened by the Sandow Treatment, through specific movements which are carried out.

A Daily Dietetic Aid.

An important matter to dyspeptics is, of course, the regulation of the dietary, but this, after all, is or ought to be only a matter of secondary importance, as no system of dietetics can ever prove an absolute cure for dyspepsia. Still, in many cases that have come under my notice I have found it necessary to add certain dietetic advice to individual patients, as, at the outset especially, I found errors of diet a serious bar to the generally beneficent operations of my Treatment.

Since youth I have been a strong and ardent believer in the superior merits of cocoa, for its wonderfully sustaining and strengthening qualities. I frequently advised patients to substitute this beverage for tea or coffee, only to find that in the case of most dyspeptics the ordinary cocoa was too "fatty" and "gritty" to be digestible by them. It was the continual recurrence of such experiences that led me to investigate the subject more fully, and which finally led to my adoption of new and improved methods of cocoa production.

Dyspeptics found my new cocoa to be palatable, digestible, and full of nourishment, as it contained no husk or shell, no adulterated or flavouring matter, while the oily and fatty ingredients of the cocoa bean had been reduced to a minimum. I would recommend all those who suffer from digestive, liver, or nervous troubles (as well, of course, those who are hale and well) to try my new Health and Strength Cocoa for themselves.

It would be wrong for me, however, to delude the dyspeptic with the false idea that my cocoa will cure chronic indigestion, for nothing can do that except internal muscular development. My cocoa, however (which, by the way, is obtainable everywhere at no higher price than ordinary cocoa), will be found an invaluable auxiliary, and will impose less digestive tax while also supplying a greater margin of food-power.

If the reader would like to have my advice upon his or her case, and cares to write to me, I shall be pleased (without fee or obligation) to answer the letter and to send some personally helpful literature dealing with the subject of Indigestion and its natural method of cure.

Rebuilding the Body.

In my Curative Treatment for Indigestion the whole health of a patient is steadily built up step by step. There is no mere attempt to allay what are but the symptoms of disease, but a radical elimination from the system of the causes of the trouble.

In the case of the dyspeptic, the organs of digestion are quickly strengthened and the work of assimilating nourishment made easier because of this access of strength, not by simply lightening the task. So as digestion improves the appetite for more food also increases, and thus the general health is recruited as it should be, direct from food that is transformed into rich blood, firm flesh and muscles, and strong nerves.

Free Book and Advice.

I shall gladly forward to anyone interested, a gratis copy of my book dealing with indigestion, which it will well repay every dyspeptic to peruse carefully from beginning to end. The reader is placed in possession of plain facts in plain language, and fully explanatory of the various physiological processes of digestion. The book also describes the natural method of cure by the inexpensive Sandow Treatment.

The book and Mr. Sandow's advice are quite free. You may write or call as you please. You can carry on the Treatment at the Institute or in your own home under postal direction. It takes but a few minutes daily, and in no way interferes with the usual routine.

Mr. Sandow attends personally at his Institute daily, and a preliminary consultation is free of fee or obligation. Address Eugen Sandow, The Sandow Curative Institute, 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W.

POST THIS FORM for MR. SANDOW'S BOOK

To Mr. EUGEN SANDOW,
The Sandow Curative Institute, 32, St. James' Street, London, S.W.
Please forward me (free and post free) your book on the cure of Indigestion without drugs.

NAME
State whether Mr., Mrs., Miss, or title.

ADDRESS

Occupation..... Age.....

This form is inserted to enable readers to secure Mr. Sandow's book conveniently and quickly. A letter giving fuller information should be attached if desired. Everyman, Oct. 18, 1912.

GEORGE MEREDITH IN HIS LETTERS. BY DARREL FIGGIS

ONE of the difficulties in what is called a co-ordinated philosophy of life is that the very process of co-ordination implies an elimination. It is very seldom that men are content to trust their instincts of worth, however seemingly contrarious, and to have faith in a larger co-ordination in the heavens that shall round up the contradictory parts into their proper beauty. All in a haste they begin to work with rod, level, and trowel to chip away what is not necessary for the co-ordination they wish; and so they come often to deny some of their own instincts for a beauty that is not comprised by their philosophy.

It is a fatal itch from which the very sanest are not immune. Few thinkers have been so sane, in both the larger and smaller meanings of the word, than George Meredith, and he was, moreover, a thinker who was for ever disciplining his thoughts into the orderly shape of a philosophy. Lovers of his books, and readers of his letters just edited and published by his son, Mr. William Meredith, will scarcely need to be told of his perpetual insistence on its need. To Captain Maxse (who is, of course, Nevil Beauchamp, of "Beauchamp's Career") he declares with regard to Victor Hugo, in one of the incidental criticisms of his contemporaries in these Letters: "He is the largest son of his mother earth in this time present. Magnificent in conception, unsurpassed—leagues beyond us all—in execution. Not (nur Schade!) a philosopher. There's the pity. With a philosophic brain, as well as his marvellous poetic energy, he would stand in the front rank of glorious men forever." In another letter, when Captain Maxse (like his other self in fiction, Nevil Beauchamp) would raise hot battle for the oppressed, he says: "You appear to me to want to raise up an extreme party that shall rouse the other party to extremes, and so do battle-fight for a shade; gain what Time would have given you without waste of blood, temper, and divine meditation. Between you Philosophy would have no home on our planet." It threads through most of his poems, and in it he was rather as Descartes and Spencer would have understood the word than as Plato and Bergson have conceived it. He was more than suspicious of the instincts, the intimations of Beauty, that haunt and afflict man always. It is his desire that "the mind in expansion"

"should prompt us to Change, as to promise of sun, Till brain-rule splendidly towers."

So he cries in "The Empty Purse." "I'm more an antique Roman than a Dane," he might almost say with Horatio; to which Hamlet, wilder of blood, would respond:—

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

In the novels, and especially in the poems, his effort to display, even often to define, this philosophy of his, is apparent; and since one wonders how far its limitations reflect the man himself, one turns to his letters to see his mind more intimately at work. And then one comes across this wonderful letter to John Morley:—

"I tossed off a letter to St. B. to end the year '77. I greet you in the first hour of the New One, after a look at the stars from my chalet door, and listening to the bells. We have just marked one of our full stops, at which Time, turning back as he goes, looks with his old-gentleman smile. To come from a gaze at the stars—Orion and shaking Sirius below him—is to catch a glance at the inscrutable face of him that hurries us on, as on a wheel, from dust to dust. I thought of you and how it might be with you this year: hoped for good: saw beyond good and evil to great stillness, another form of moving for you and me. It seems to me that Spirit is,—how, where, and by what means involving us, none can say. But in this life there is no life save in spirit. The rest of life, and we may know it in love,—is an aching and a rotting."

Possibly it was this very moment, as it was some such moment, that he celebrated in his poem, "Meditation under Stars," where, night having passed, he comes to Earth with his mind full of the hints of eternal majesty the stars give, and

"Then at new flood of customary morn,
Look at her thro' her showers,
Her mists, her streaming gold,
A wonder edges the familiar face:
She wears no more that robe of printed hours;
Half strange seems Earth, and sweeter than her flowers."

"Sweeter than her flowers"! Yet this was he who once sang:—

"Into the breast that gives the rose Shall I with shuddering fall?"

It was so, too, in that great hour of trial when he knew that his richly happy second marriage was to know the term sternly set by Death. When the blow fell on him he found his solace in his philosophy, and raised that stately, though chastening, temple of stoic comfort, "A Faith on Trial." Here he turns to his Earth for comfort, and learns that

"Harsh Wisdom gives Earth, no more;
In one the spur and the curb:
An answer to thoughts and deeds;
To the Legends an alien look;
To the Questions a figure of clay."

"Smite, Sacred Reality!" he says in the same poem, and will have no comfort from hopes for, and instincts of, a richer being beyond the clay. Indeed, he declares roundly in a letter to Mr. Herbert Trench that "the good ship Immortality methinks has served her turn." Nevertheless, the strong heart and desire of the man break through the somewhat severe code of his philosophy into his letters. On the death of his wife he writes to John Morley (in one of the rich series of letters to Lord Morley):—

"Death is death, as you say, but I get to her by consulting her thoughts and wishes—and so she lives in me. This, if one has the strength of soul, brings a spirit to us."

Which is the application to himself of the counsel he gives to his son, the compiler of these letters:—

"I do not doubt that you think of your dear mother. Think of her as alive in the spirit. She is with you in your noblest thoughts—and the nobler they are the more you may be sure of that."

So rich are these letters that it would be possible to take many lines of progress through them. He seldom deliberately speaks about his contemporaries. It is the exception rather than the rule to find him doing so. Yet, one way or another, such men as Carlyle, Ruskin, Dickens, Tennyson, and Mill are touched upon with an incisive pen. And in his attitude to each he naturally defines his own position. There are several letters, moreover, chiefly to Lady Ulrica Duncombe, in which he speaks in some detail of his own work. But in the letters to Captain Maxse and to John Morley he writes out some of the deeper things in him, that shine with a faint mystical beauty scarcely to be found in the delimitations set by his more ordered philosophy. By their aid our ears may be attuned to the discovery of a chord that shall be heard sounding with sudden spiritual meaning in a music that seems too often to be prohibitive of the larger spiritual application. Then becomes "The Great Unseen nowise the Dark Unknown." For though in the severer co-ordination of his philosophy the larger and fairer aspects of his mystical desire are too much apt to be eliminated, yet these letters come to show that it meant far more to him than his work would seem to hint; and so both the novels and the poetry (though especially the later poetry) have a richer significance thrown on them.

MR. ANDREW MELROSE'S NEW BOOKS.

GERMANY AND THE GERMAN EMPEROR.

By G. H. FERRIS.

Demy 8vo, Gilt Top. Price 12s. 6d. net.

FOLLOWING THE DRUM: Chapters in the Daily Life of a Common Soldier.

By HORACE WYNDHAM

Fully Illustrated by EDGAR LANDER. Demy 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net.

LEGENDS. Autobiographical Sketches.

By AUGUST STRINDBERG.

Translated from the Swedish by C. FIELD. Crown 8vo. Gilt top. Price 5s. net.

AN IDYLL AND OTHER POEMS.

By E. HAMILTON MOORE.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 2s. net.

BELLES LETTRES AND CLASSICS.

PLATO'S APOLOGY AND CRITO.

A New Translation by C. L. MARSON.

Printed with Parallel Greek Texts and Notes. Crown 8vo. Price 3s. 6d. net.

DISTINGUISHED NOVELS AT 6s.

THE PORT OF DREAMS.

By MIRIAM ALEXANDER.

Author of "The House of Lisronan." Price 6s.

The second story by a winner of our 250 Guinea's Prize is always eagerly looked for and Miss Alexander's extraordinary first novel makes the interest attaching to her next keener than usual. Suffice to say that "The Port of Dreams" confirms the opinion expressed by the majority of the critics that welcomed the author of "The House of Lisronan" as a notable addition to the small band of novelists from whom something really worthy may be expected.

A CRY IN THE WILDERNESS.

By MARY E. WALLER.

LOVE IN A MOTOR CAR.

By RAYMOND NEEDHAM.

Author of "A Man and a Motor," "L'Entente Cordiale (More or Less)," etc.

RUSTED HINGES.

A Novel on a New Plan.

By A. ST. CLAIR HARNETT.

ANDREW MELROSE.

LONDON.

Hitherto it has been difficult to accompany a singer by means of a Player-Piano, whatever the make. It is no longer difficult.

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

hear the words of the song opposite the accompanying chord or phrase.

In all other respects "SONGOLA" Music Rolls leave nothing to be desired. They are perfect in notation, phrasing, and tempo; climate-proof, and practically indestructible. In fact, "SONGOLA" Music Rolls are Lined Music Rolls with the words of the songs added. No greater praise can be bestowed upon them, for "Lined" Music Rolls have long been acknowledged the finest made. They also happen to be the cheapest, being sold at 9d. to 6/3 each.

SEND FOR "SONGOLA" CATALOGUES.

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., LTD.,

94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.

Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE ST., EDINBURGH.

AGENTS -

LIVERPOOL: Rushworth & Decaper, Ltd., 11-17, Islington.

CHELTEHAM: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., Promenade.

CARDIFF: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., High Street.

BRISTOL: Duck, Son & Pinner, 1, Royal Promenade, Clifton.

BATH: Duck, Son & Pinner, Pultney Bridge.

CARLISLE: C. Thorman & Son, Whitehall House.

STOCKTON-ON-TESSE: John Burdall, 52, Yarm Lane.

NOTTINGHAM: H. Turner & Co., High Street.

Don't be Content with 4%

The cost of living is rising; incomes derived from investments are, in many cases, falling. What is to be done? The prudent investor is turning his attention to "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. This Company, one of the soundest concerns in the British Empire, deals with the whole problem of Annuity Insurance on progressive and comprehensive lines. Their attractive forms of Annuities appeal to everyone who has money invested or to invest, or who can spare a small amount out of income to provide for the evening of their lives.

BUY AN ANNUITY

You can buy an Annuity out and out; or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it out of your income—so much per year until the Annuity is due. You can buy joint Annuities for yourself and your wife; you can buy educational Annuities for your children; you can buy Annuities with the return of your Capital guaranteed. And these are but a few of the various forms of annuities purchasable. Investigate! Your enquiry may mean, probably will mean, the doubling or quadrupling of your present income. You will gain in every way by taking out a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity. Your income will be fixed and regular, independent of labour troubles and international complications. It will be a larger income and more amply secured. If you happen to be in indifferent health when the arrangement is made, you will have still better terms offered you.

The Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada has assets of over £9,000,000 invested under the strict supervision of the Canadian Government. Send for full particulars to Mr. J. F. Junkin, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, 24, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, stating your age and kind of annuity required.

This shows a G.W. "Elastic" Bookcase with a Desk Unit in the centre.

Every man who regards his books as treasures should see to it that they have adequate housing. The ordinary bookshelf exposes them to dust, to the inevitable accidents of house-cleaning, to the innocent maraudings of little children, while the fixed-size bookcase soon becomes overcrowded. The Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase, being arranged on the "Unit" plan, enables every man to build his bookcase to suit his own particular requirements. He can always add more Units as he wants them, and build them up in various ways—vertically or horizontally. Each Unit is, in itself, a bookcase, being provided with its own dust-proof glass-door. The Units when built up form a complete bookcase at every stage—as handsome a piece of furniture as one could possibly desire.

Full particulars are given in Catalogue No. 72B, a copy of which will be sent to any address on application.

Packing Free—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid! to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.;

82, Victoria Street, S.W.; 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

MEMORY BUILDING

By T. SHARPER KNOWLSON

(Pelman Instructor).

Author of "The Art of Thinking," "The Education of the Will," etc.

The Pelman School has the finest group of students in the world. They come from every class of society; they stand for progress and efficiency in every trade and profession under the sun; they represent all the chief nationalities of the great continents; and last, but not least, they are hard workers. Football, tennis, cycling, bridge, whist, and what not are nowadays calling loudly to tired hands and weary brains; but the Pelman student turns a deaf ear to these calls, and begins his text-book work and the exercises involved. Quite true, I assure you. This is no desirable fancy—a thing one would like to believe as against hard facts. It is extremely real, for the thousands of Pelman pupils keep the examiners busy all day and every day.

To be candid, I am not surprised, nor are the Directors of the School, for they spent much time and money in producing a really interesting and profitable course of mind and memory training. There is nothing dry and overpoweringly technical in these lessons; we teach efficiency by means of the things that form part of a man's ordinary life—his reading, his walks abroad, his conversation, even his games at cards.

I am going to show you what a specimen day's work in the Pelman School is like—a pen-picture of some of our pupils as they appear to us from their correspondence and exam. sheets; and also how this responsible valuation of answers to questions is varied by interviews.

Before me is a pile of exam. sheets fresh from the industrious pens of many pupils.

Here on the top is one from a clerk, who entered for our course of general mental training; he wants to make the best of himself and his chances. His weak point is mind wandering. He says in a note: "I sit down to a book or to work out some figures, and almost immediately I begin to think of something else. I bring myself round again, but in a minute I am off wool-gathering. Can you help me?" We can, and we do.

The next paper is from T. Q. M.—those are not his initials, but they will suffice. He is an M.D. of a great University, and an honour's man at that. What is his trouble? No trouble at all really. As an educated man, he knows there is a best way of doing everything, and in organising a hundred and one details respecting the duties of a busy hospital life he wishes to adopt the method that is most efficient.

We are teaching him that method, and he is working out an application of it for his own benefit. In a little while he will be able to remember every detail respecting the patients who pass through his hands; all particulars of medicines and operations will file themselves away in his brain, ready for use at an instant's notice. Efficiency is important for the medical man—just as important for us.

A lady teacher comes next. She has just concluded Book 12, the last of the course. To the test questions she has returned admirable answers; and to the final question (as to definite results) she replies that one of the things she has valued most, next to Mr. Pelman's technical help, is the truth that the sense of fear is the most destructive force in the world. I am glad to notice this, because of its truth and because to realise it makes life a different thing altogether.

The day moves on. Luncheon is over—tea time comes—the pile of papers to be examined has decreased; the end, for the time being, is in sight. I have been dealing with doctors, lawyers, engineers, directors, managers, shop assistants, apprentices, miners, school teachers of both sexes, and many more. As the last paper leaves my hands, I begin to wonder why even more than the thousands who have passed, and are passing, through the school do not enrol for the Pelman Course. Is it because advantages are so numerous that they have become stale? Many pupils tell us that they wish they had had many years ago the benefits our course offers to them; they would then have had many more chances of success.

WRITE FOR FREE COPY OF THE "PELMAN MAGAZINE."

If you are unable to call, send your application by letter or post-card to-day for free copy of the "Pelman Magazine."

Address your application (a postcard will do) to the Secretary.

THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND,
52, Wenham House,
Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Branch Schools—

47, Queen Street, Melbourne; 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay;
Club Arcade, Durban.

THE LITERARY CONFESSIONS OF MR. ARNOLD BENNETT

I.

THERE have been few more interesting events in contemporary literature than the gradual emergence and the gradual rise of Mr. Arnold Bennett. Like a conquering hero, he has invaded one after another every province of English letters. And like his favourite personage in the "Card" in whom it is not difficult to recognise many of the author's own characteristics, Mr. Bennett has achieved success in whatever he has chosen to undertake. And he has achieved it with something of the dash and daring and defiance, with something of the luck and pluck of a romantic adventurer believing in his star. Whether he writes a very short narrative or a very long novel, like "Old Wives' Tales," whether he tries to emulate Mr. Bernard Shaw in the drama, or whether he tries to surpass Conan Doyle in the detective story, he pours out a continuous stream of books, invariably successful, nearly always amazingly clever, and always marked with his exuberant personality.

II.

This prodigious success of a writer who is still a comparatively young man, and who at forty-five years of age has already twenty literary campaigns behind him, has seemed to most critics a triumph of spontaneity. And the image which most people form of the author of "Clayhanger" is that of a stupendous Improvisatore of the Dumas Père type. But this judgment is entirely erroneous, and it is formulated in complete ignorance of the facts. And if in one sense it may be considered an involuntary tribute to his genius, in another sense it does Mr. Bennett a very real injustice. So far from owing his success to the gratuitous gifts of the fairies, he has earned it as the reward of many years of hard toil. Few writers have learned more systematically the technique of their trade. Few writers possess in a higher degree the conscientious scruples of the craftsman. Few writers have served a more onerous and more honourable apprenticeship.

III.

Those years of apprenticeship, those "Lehrjahre," Mr. Bennett has himself described in a volume of literary autobiography of extraordinary interest. The volume appeared under the thin disguise of anonymity, with the significant title, "The Truth about an Author." Strange to say, the book seems to have almost entirely escaped the notice both of the public and of the critics, and until this day it remains almost unknown. Yet I am much mistaken if this book will not outlast, as a human document, many of Mr. Bennett's productions, and if, of all Mr. Bennett's works, it is not the one which enables us to do honest, adequate justice to his genius, and to gain the greatest insight into his personality.

The reason why the "Truth about an Author" has thus remained unknown even to his admirers is partly because English criticism is so often so amazingly short-sighted, and partly because Mr. Bennett himself, after publishing his autobiography, has deliberately chosen to suppress it. And the reason why he has suppressed it is that the book is an absolutely unveiled, irresponsible, and not always edifying confession. It was written in a moment of impulsive sincerity. It was prompted by a mood of refreshing but cynical outspokenness. And when he wrote it, the author had not yet been compelled by an enthusiastic public to take himself as seriously as he does to-day. For since those earlier "Lehrjahre" circumstances have totally changed. The pushing young adventurer and freelance of early days has become the cynosure of two continents. The author has been raised to the pinnacle of fame. And when a man has been raised to that uncomfortable position, he that dealers are daily asked if such and such a fountain pen is as good as a "Swan"? Is it not conclusive that the "Swan" is surely the best, when it has become the standard by which others are judged—the recognised standard of excellence?

(Continued on page 30.)

IS IT NOT SIGNIFICANT

THE "SWAN"

PRICES:

Standard Pattern
from 10/6
Safety Pattern
from 12/6

SOLD BY ALL HIGH-CLASS STATIONERS & JEWELLERS.

May we send our Catalogue? Post Free.

never has had an equal, and though many thousands of "Swans" that were made over twenty years ago are in daily use to-day, we say flatly that the "Swans" we are making to-day are even better in finish, quality, and action than earlier products.

THE POLICY OF OUR HOUSE

is based on satisfaction, and we promise absolute satisfaction to every "Swan" Pen user. Anyone not satisfied has only himself to blame for not giving us the opportunity to make our promise good. See Catalogue.

At first glance, to the unpractised eye, there are many pens that look like the "Swan." The best things are always imitated, so, when buying a fountain pen, you will be well advised to see that you get the genuine "Swan" with our name and trade mark.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 79 & 80, High Holborn, London, W.C.;
38, Cheapside, E.C.; 954, Regent Street, W., London; 3, Exchange Street, Manchester; 10, Rue Neuve, Brussels; 17, Ave de l'Opera, Paris; and at New York, Chicago, Toronto, and Sydney.

ARE YOU LAME, CRIPPLED, OR UNABLE TO WALK?

If so, send for my FREE BOOK.

I am an invalid myself, quite unable to walk; but I see no reason why we invalids should not get about really independently, and I have therefore designed the "Dingwall-Witham" HAND-PROPELLED BATH-CHAIR, with TWO SPEEDS and FREE-WHEEL, a "go-anywhere" machine in which an invalid can tackle a bad bill unassisted, and which is really as good as a new pair of legs to a paralysed or crippled invalid. Many ladies, too, use our chairs and are delighted with them.

Then I supply all sorts of INDOOR self-propelling chairs—Merlins (with wooden hand-rims on the side-wheels) from £3, combined propelling and carrying chairs, adjustable Merlin chairs, couches, etc., etc.

Anyone unable to walk—or any friend of such an invalid—should write for my illustrated catalogues of Hand-tricycles, Merlins, etc. These contain the fullest information and numerous testimonials from delighted invalids all over the country. I particularly want those using other makes to enquire about my improved hand tricycle.

SEND TO-DAY for BOOKLET.

JAMES P. WITHAM, Invalid-Chair Specialist, 76, PYLE HOUSE, NEWPORT, WIGHT.

Works: London & Isle of Wight (Hand Tricycles); Bucks (Merlins, etc.)

CYCLE SADDLE IF DESIRED

A MAN IS JUDGED BY HIS BOOTS.

Footwear, without a doubt, is a most important item of dress, and upon its good or bad appearance good or bad impressions are made that have much to do with the daily success or failure of most people, whether socially or commercially.

"NUGGET" waterproofs, shines and preserves all leathers.

POLISHES

ARE YOU A TRAFFORD?

H. G. WELLS, in his new novel, "Marriage," makes his hero Trafford say:

"I want to do a new sort of work now altogether. . . . Life has swamped me once, but I don't think it will get me under again; I want to study men.

"I want to get into contact with the men who are thinking. I don't mean to meet them, necessarily, but to get into the souls of their books. Every writer who has anything to say, every artist who matters, is the stronger for every man or woman who responds to him. That's the great work—the Reality. I want to become a part of this stuttering attempt to express. I want at least to resonate, even if I do not help."

Mr. Wells does not say that Trafford became a reader of PUBLIC OPINION—but Mr. Wells is himself a reader of that journal, and all these who, like Trafford, want to study men, and to get into contact with the men who are thinking, should make a careful weekly study of PUBLIC OPINION.

For it claims to be THE BEST WEEKLY REVIEW OF WHAT MEN AND WOMEN THINK, SAY, AND DO.

PUBLIC OPINION

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER
TWO PENCE WEEKLY

People read PUBLIC OPINION to-day because it is supremely interesting. As readers are constantly saying, it is readable from beginning to end. "It keeps a tired world alert," says Mr. J. L. GARVIN, the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette."

It conveys, in the most handy form, something of life's variety, vivacity, and eternal interest. It is a weekly cinematograph of what people are Doing, Saying, and Thinking. It gives a rapid survey of the events of the week.

PUBLIC OPINION (2d.) has increased its circulation four times in the last four years. It has just begun its 52nd year, and will give 52 of the best numbers ever issued.

FOR BUSY PEOPLE THERE IS NO OTHER PAPER WHICH SO EASILY HELPS THEM TO KEEP IN TOUCH WITH

ALL THOSE THINGS WHICH INTEREST INTELLIGENT PEOPLE AS

PUBLIC OPINION

THE LAST TWO ISSUES CONTAINED ARTICLES BY

Sir H. H. JOHNSTON
A. C. BENSON
KATHARINE TYNAN

Professor EUCKEN
Professor KETTLE
EVELYN UNDERHILL

It is a unique paper, presenting the cream of all the best thought in the best Papers, Magazines and Books on All Questions of the day. It is interested in Social Problems, in Religion, in Politics, in Science, in Literature, in all Arts and Crafts.

It is a Newspaper, Koon, a weekly Library of New Books, and always a cheerful and well-informed companion. It goes all over the world, and makes an ideal present.

PUBLIC OPINION can be had at all Newsagents' and Bookstalls at 2d., or this week's special issue will be sent on receipt of 23d. It can be sent for one year in the United Kingdom for 10/6; abroad, 15/-, post free.

Address Manager,

PUBLIC OPINION,
22 & 23, Temple House, Talli. St.,
London, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION

IS

EVERYBODY'S PAPER

has a part to play, he has a dignity to sustain, and he naturally prefers to divert attention from the indiscretions of his youth. But we, in the humble position of reader and critic, may be permitted not to have the same reasons as Mr. Bennett for suppressing this illuminative piece of self-revelation. And the very motives which induced the writer to throw a veil over his beginnings must tempt us to remove it. The very indiscretions of which the author now repents are precisely what gives the book its psychological value. They will enable us to discover the characteristics of his personality, the secrets of his art, the strength and weakness of his work, and the true reasons of its success.

IV.

The first quality which strikes us in Mr. Bennett and the most obvious reason of his success is his amazing resourcefulness and cleverness. In one sense he is more American than English. He is pre-eminently what the Yankee calls a "smart" writer. In another sense he is more French than English. He possesses that invaluable gift which is so rare in England and so frequent in France—intellectual versatility and pliability. He can turn his mind to the most diverse tasks. He can rise to any emergency. He would have succeeded as a lawyer or as an engineer, if he had not preferred to be a man of letters. As a "freelance" in a provincial paper, he achieved a premature local fame, and staggers the provincial editors by the brilliancy and incisiveness of his topical paragraphs. As an apprentice in a lawyer's office he draws up his bills of costs with such skill that at once he rises to a salary of £200, where his older colleagues must be content with a salary of £80. As the editor of a woman's paper, he guesses by instinct the mysteries of the feminine taste and the vagaries of female fashion.

V.

Combined with this Gallic versatility we find an equally extraordinary practical ability. Bennett is the ideal exemplar of the new business man of letters. His watchword is "efficiency," his object tangible and material results. He is of the earth, earthy. Other contemporary writers like Mr. Wells may be equally matter of fact. Mr. Wells also keeps the practical end in view, but he has social and ethical ideals. He is a teacher and preacher, as well as a successful "business man of letters." We may object to his teaching. He may have varied in his preaching; but whether he preaches the Fabian Gospel of free meals for children or the Gospel of free love for adults, or the Gospel of Good-will, or the Gospel of the Great State, we feel there is always a moral background to his work. Mr. Bennett has no such didactic purpose. He may sometimes be concerned with the aesthetics of literature, he is never concerned with its ethics; he is always concerned with its economics. Mr. Bernard Shaw, in a recent message addressed to the German people, claims for the writer of plays that he is the latter-day prophet and apostle. Mr. Arnold Bennett would ridicule such a claim, and he repudiates it in the most candid way in "The Truth about an Author." "My aim in writing plays, whether alone or in collaboration, has always been strictly commercial. I wanted money in heaps, and I wanted advertisement for my books." (Page 178.) Let us, therefore, be under no misconception. On his own admission, the author of "Milestones" writes mainly to make money, and to win the kind of fame which is convertible into hard cash. His scale of literary values is primarily so many pounds per thousand words, and it must be confessed that he has raised his scale enormously. He started with making a guinea by a prize essay; he has finished by making ten thousand by a comedy. Mr. Bennett may congratulate himself on such commercial results, but those who, like the present writer, have the profoundest admiration for his magnifi-

(Continued on page 32.)

Waterman's IDEAL Fountain Pen

This is the Pen for every man who writes

The comfort gained by constantly using a pen attuned to your hand, a pen that never leaks, spurts, or falters, a pen that you can use at your office, in your home, or wherever you happen to be, such comfort alone is worth many, many times the price of Waterman's Ideal.

Invest in a Waterman's Ideal—the Fountain Pen which, by virtue of consistent efficiency, has firmly established its supremacy in every Country of the World.

10/6 and upwards. In Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, etc. Booklet free from L. and C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House,	Kingsway, London. (New York: 173, Broadway. Paris: 6, Rue de Hanovre. Brussels. Vienna. Milan. Dresden. Zurich. Barcelona.)
--	---

DECEIVED BY DIABOLUS!

The well known proverb should read: "God seeds the Food, but the Devil seeds the Saucepans" which boil and wash out the valuable salts, tonics, natural aperients, and life giving essences of meat and vegetables, which are designed to revitalize and re-invigorate body and brain. On account of this "washed out" method of cookery, many suffer from "Brain Fog," Dyspepsia, Insomnia, Neuralgia, and Anemia seeking relief in drugs, stimulants, narcotics, and quack nostrums, in a vain attempt to make up for that which in folly, has been thrown away. But the evil has been overcome at last by the aid of a Simple, Scientific, and Conservative Cooker, which conserves all the vital essences of Meat and Vegetables. This Cooker is called—

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

Don't Delay
but
Send To-day.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot, above 212 degrees, yet never burns the food. As it is Self-Acting, it requires no attention, and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER" (Hospital).

The Ideal Cooker for Porridge, Milk, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauce, Jam and Marmalade Making, Beef Tea, &c. A Speciality for Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT & VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

By which means all the valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and Life-Giving Properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

BEAUTIFUL BOILERETTED BEEF.

Better than Roast. The boilerette browns meat. Fat eats like marrow. Lean so tender that it can be spread like potted meat, yet so thin that it can be thinly sliced. Very delicious as a cold joint.

"THE OLD CONVERTED INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat tender and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

THE COOKER THAT LOOKS AFTER ITSELF.

You simply put a complete dinner in the Boilerette go right away and leave it to take care of itself. When you are ready to dine, it will be found beautifully cooked, ready to serve. Please Note.—These Boilerettes can be left for hours without attention.

Full Particulars, with Booklet of Remarkable Testimonials, Post Free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, BANBURY,
LONDON: 222, 7, 105, Newgate Street, F.O. Tel. 5796 City.

What Every Man should know—that ONE

"Koh-i-noor" outlasts six ordinary pencils, and does better work all the time.

The "Koh-i-noor" is universally recognised as the world's leader in pencils. No matter what your business or profession, there is a "Koh-i-noor" just right for your purpose. The "Koh-i-noor" is made in 17 different degrees and in copying. The lead is highly compressed, it contains no grit, no flaws, no soft greasy spots. It writes evenly and smoothly, retains its point longer than other pencils, does not snap in use, and has a remarkable reputation for durability

4d. each; 3s. 6d. per dozen. Of Stationers, &c. List from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London (Paris, Vienna, Milan, Zurich, Dresden, Barcelona, Brussels, New York.)

EVERYMAN'S TYPEWRITER

OLIVER

Strongest and Most Durable.

Makes the largest number of clear Carbon Copies, and writes the best Stencils for the Duplicator.

Over 400,000 in use. Ask for booklet No. A.901 describing this powerful and popular Typewriter.

OLIVER TYPEWRITER CO., LTD.,
75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

CONTRACTORS TO H.M. GOVERNMENT.

THE ROYAL ROAD TO MIND TRAINING.

THE nearest approach to a Royal Road to Mind-Training is the World-famous Course, "Scientific Concentration." It is recognised by all competent to judge as the most thorough, most practical, most scientific all-round mental training the world has ever known. Scientific Concentration teaches you to see things clearly, to have a steady purpose in life, and to go straight ahead without swerving from the path you have marked out. Scientific Concentration teaches you the Laws of Attention, Observation, Interest, Fatigue, Memory, Habit and Will-Power, and Thought-Control. With Scientific Concentration you can concentrate upon your Studies, Profession or Business with that intensity that leads steadily and surely onward to success, with a minimum of fatigue and nervous waste.

The late Mr. W. T. STEAD, shortly before going on his ill fated voyage on the Titanic, said:

"I have read with much interest and satisfaction the series of Booklets and Lessons on Concentration published by the Concentro Company, of Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne. I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, and wish it every success."

Members of All the Professions (especially the Church, Law, and Medicine), and Business Men of every degree of standing in every part of the world, are doing splendid work with the aid of Scientific Concentration. Learn what it will do for you. Send to-day for Free Booklet and the most convincing testimony you have ever read to the—

CONCENTRO CO.,

46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm

280th THOUSAND.

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS. PRICE 1/- NET.

REBECCA is by the foremost American woman of letters, Kate Douglas Wiggin.—SAN FRANCISCO POST.

REBECCA bubbles over with delicate humour and tender pathos.—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

REBECCA will be read and re-read. Tears and laughter will greet her.—GLASGOW HERALD.

REBECCA is thoroughly refreshing.—PUNCH.

REBECCA is a most interesting and lovable child. . . . Mrs. Wiggin touches heights of delicious comedy in which the pen of Mr. Barri can soar.—GLASGOW DAILY RECORD.

REBECCA is a story where insight and sympathy, the delicate touch and merry laugh, are blended with true artistry.—OUTLOOK.

REBECCA is one of the most attractive children we have ever met in a book.—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

REBECCA is, indeed, a character to be remembered. . . . From the perusal of such books the reader rises stimulated and refreshed.—LIVERPOOL COURIER.

REBECCA is full of wit and pathos. We part reluctantly with Rebecca.—METHODIST TIMES.

REBECCA is worthy of all the success it is attaining.—DAILY NEWS.

REBECCA is to be seen at the GLOBE THEATRE.

REBECCA is now in its 280th thousand, and is published at 1/- net, and also 3/-.

GAY & HANCOCK Ltd., 12 & 13, Henrietta St., Covent Garden cent gifts will be most sincere in their regret that he should have sold his birthright as a man of genius for a mess of pottage.

VI.

For to this absorption in practical aims we can trace most of the shortcomings and weaknesses of Arnold Bennett. We may go to him for intellectual stimulus; we shall not go to him for inspiration. He seldom strikes the deeper chords of human nature. He does not open wide vistas. There is little background or perspective. There is infinite wit, there is little humour. It has been said that the world is a tragedy to those who feel, and a comedy to those who think. Mr. Bennett obviously belongs to the thinking kind, and not to the feeling kind. It is the comic aspect of humanity and not the tragic, not the lacrimæ rerum, which appeals to him. There is a hardness of touch and absence of emotional vibration even in his best work.

In his autobiography there is an illuminative passage which illustrates this constitutional and temperamental dullness:—

"My venerable grandfather, who lived at the other end of the town, had been taken suddenly ill, and was dying. As his eldest grandson, my presence at the final scene was indispensable. I went, and talked in low tones with my elders. Upstairs the old man was fighting for every breath. The doctor descended at intervals and said that it was only a question of hours. I was absolutely obsessed by a delicious feeling of the tyranny of the Press. Nothing domestic could be permitted to interfere with my duty as a journalist.

"I must write those facetious comments while my grandfather is dying upstairs." This thought filled my brain. It seemed to me to be fine, splendid.—I was intensely proud of being laid under a compulsion so startlingly dramatic. Could I manufacture jokes while my grandfather expired? Certainly; I was a journalist. And never since have I been more ardently a journalist than I was that night and morning. With a strong sense of the theatrical, I wrote my notes at dawn."

VII.

But if Mr. Bennett's intense realism is a source of weakness, it is also a source of strength. He has his feet firmly planted on Mother Earth. To him the one function of literature is to interpret life as it is, and not as it ought to be; its highest achievement is to enlarge our vision of reality. Bennett believes in the "human document." From the beginning his sympathies were with the naturalist school. It is characteristic that already, as a youth of nineteen, he copies the "Assommoir," one of the most powerful and one of the most sordid of Zola's novels, and to this day his gods are Turgenev and Maupassant. And when he ventures on forbidden ground he goes further than Maupassant. On the risky subject of "La Maison Tellier," Maupassant only dares to give us a short story; Bennett has given us the longest of his novels.

We may not like "Old Wives' Tales," but in its strict adherence to reality, in its bold treatment of a delicate subject, there is not only extraordinary artistic power, there is also unmistakable moral power. And generally, although he is never conscious of a moral purpose, Bennett always reveals in a supreme degree one great moral virtue, namely, truthfulness and sincerity. He discards convention. He hates cant and sentiment. He abhors insincerity. The one duty of the writer is to be true to himself, as well as true to life.

VIII.

But it is as an artist that Mr. Bennett above all compels our admiration. He is a craftsman to his fingertips. His French discipline has stood him in good stead. He has learned from Maupassant and Turgenev the sense of form, the skill of constructing a plot, the art of telling a story. And if he has no exalted moral ideals, at least he always maintains a high artistic ideal. "In literature, but in nothing else," he tells us; "I am a propagandist." "To have a worthless book in my house (save in the way of business), to know that any friend of mine is enjoying it, actually distresses me. That book must go. The pretensions of that book have to be exposed if I am to enjoy peace of mind."

And as he has a respect for literature, so he has a reverence for the English language. Even in his most rapid improvisations he is never slovenly. He holds that every author has a professional duty to the language which he inherited from his predecessors, and which has been perfected by the labours of generations of artists. If Bennett is not a puritan in his ethics, he is a purist in his style. For his uniformly high level of style, for his rare qualities of form, for the excellence of his workmanship, for those artistic virtues alone, and for that virtuosity, if for no other, Mr. Bennett would be entitled to a first place in contemporary letters.

C. S.

FLOWERS OF THE EARTH

FLOWERS of the Earth,
Children begotten of our mother's bliss,
By whose dear mirth
Upon the airs she wafts us a pure kiss,
I would not have you die
Drooping away, and lie
With those bright cheeks kissed lately of the Sun
Soiled, dishevelled, and dun.
I would avoid that shame;
Therefore I strew you o'er the sharp and quickening flame.

With ritual grave,
With reverent gestures and a holy care,
Each beauty so brave,
Giving its loveliness to the lucid air,
I send back whence it came,
I give to sacred flame.
Back to the Beauty beauty came to show
Each spirit I bid go,
While from beyond the veil
Rich musics float my nimbler senses to assail.
DARREL FIGGIS.

OUR LITERARY COMPETITION

THREE PRIZES are offered for the best Essays on the following subjects:—

- (1) A Prize of £5 for an Essay on THE BEST METHODS OF ORGANIZING READING CIRCLES IN CONNECTION WITH "EVERYMAN" (not to exceed 2,500 words).
- (2) A Prize of £3 for the best Essay on THE ENGLISH BOOKS MOST SUITABLE FOR A SCHOOL CURRICULUM FOR BOYS AND GIRLS OF 14-18 (not to exceed 2,000 words).
- (3) A Prize of £2 for the best Essay on THE FEMALE CHARACTERS IN THE PLAYS OF G. BERNARD SHAW (not to exceed 1,300 words).

All MSS. must be enclosed in envelopes, and marked on the top left-hand corner with the word Competition 1, 2, or 3, and forwarded to the Editor, 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh, before November 15th.

Competitors must state the number of words contained in their Essay. The Editor reserves the right of printing any matter sent in for competition, whether it is awarded a prize or not. The Editor's decision is final.

NAME AND ADDRESS OF COMPETITORS MUST BE WRITTEN ON THEIR MSS.

FRANK PALMER'S

Vellum Perpetual Calendars

contain representative extracts from the works of the Authors named. Fcap. 8vo. Printed in two colours and daintily bound in Simili Vellum. 1/- net; by post, 1/1.

G.B.S. (G. Bernard Shaw). ROBERT BLATCHFORD.
OSCAR WILDE. J. M. BARRIE.
H. G. W. WILLS. HILAIRE BELLOC.
ARNOLD BENNETT. GEORGE MOORE.
NAPOLEON. NIETZSCHE.
ANATOLE FRANCE. THOREAU.
PINERO.

Also in Limp Velvet Calf, 3 6 net.

POTTED POLICIES. "What I have said I have said" Series. These books give a condensed summary of the political creeds of great Statesmen, by means of extracts from their speeches and writings. Fcap. 8vo. Picture Boards with Coloured Plates. 1/- net; by post, 1/2.
JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Ready). REDMOND (Shortly).
GLADSTONE (Shortly). ASQUITH (Shortly).
Other Titles in Preparation.

JUST PUBLISHED.

OSCAR WILDE: Art and Morality. By STUART MASON. Fcap. 8vo, 328 pp., 5/- net.

A record of the discussion which occurred on the publication of "Dorian Gray."

THE BOOK OF THE TARPON. By A. W. DIMOCK. With 93 Photographs by J. A. Dimock. Demy 8vo, 7/6 net. "The best sporting book of the year."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

The Web of the Golden Spider. By F. O. BARTLETT. A story of thrilling adventure.

The Virgin Royal. By Mrs. DONALD SHAW.

Through the Ivory Gate. By R. FARRER.

Bed of Roses (9th impression). By W. L. GEORGE.

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS, or from the Publisher,
FRANK PALMER & Co., Ltd., 49, Rupert Street, London.

THERE IS ALWAYS A NEW

MILLS & BOON NOVEL

6s. each.

THE BROWNS J. E. Euckrose
CU NEA GOLD Beatrice Grimshaw
THE FIVE OF SPADES Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny
THE WIND AMONG THE BARLEY M. P. Willcocks
STORMLIGHT Lady Troubridge
THE CONFESIONS OF ARSENE LUZIN Maurice Leblanc
A PLAIN WOMAN'S PORTRAIT Sophie Cole TALES OF THE OPEN HAZARD Halliwell Sutcliffe
THE SWIMMER Louise Gerard
THE PALACE OF LOGS Robert Barr
AT LAVENDER COTTAGE Mary L. Peard
THE ADVENTURES OF BILLIE BELSHAW Mrs. G. de Horne Vaizey

MILLS & BOON'S GENERAL LITERATURE.

MY PARISIAN YEAR. By MAUDE ANNESLEY. With 16 illustrations from photographs and one in colour. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MY SUDAN YEAR. By E. S. STEVENS, Author of "The Veil." With 40 illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MAN WHO SAVED AUSTRIA: The Life and Times of Baron Jellacic. By M. HARTLEY. With 18 illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A MYSTIC ON THE PRUSSIAN THRONE: Frederick William II. By GILBERT STANHOPE. With 12 illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A CENTURY OF GREAT ACTORS (1750-1850). By CECIL FERARD ARMSTRONG. With 16 illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF THE MEN OF DEVON. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. Author of "The Romance of the Oxford Colleges," &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 16 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FORTY YEARS OF A SPORTSMAN'S LIFE. By SIR CLAUDE DE CRESPIGNY, Bart. With 18 illustrations. Popular Edition. 6s.

MILLS & BOON, Ltd., 49 Rupert Street, London, W.

"The most remarkable Single Volume ever published."

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

Containing over

400,000 REFINED WORDS AND PHRASES.
2,700 PAGES. 6,000 ILLUSTRATIONS.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

400,000 words and phrases defined.
More than has ever appeared before between two covers.

2,700 pages, every line of which has been revised and reset (320 pages in excess of old "International," and yet the new book is practically the same size).

6,000 Illustrations, each selected for the clear explication of the term treated.

Divided page: important words above, less important below. The "New International" is the only Dictionary containing this valuable feature.

Encyclopædic Information is given upon thousands of subjects. This one volume contains the pith and essence of an authoritative library.

Literary Quotations. No Dictionary approaches "Webster" in the number and variety of its Illustrative Literary Quotations. In the "New International" these have been much increased in number.

Synonyms are more skilfully treated than in any other English work.

Gazetteer and Biographical Dictionary have been thoroughly revised and brought up to date.

Pronunciation is phonetically indicated by the "WEBSTER" SYSTEM of re-spelling. The simplest and most effective method used in any work of reference.

New Discoveries and Inventions in Medicine, Science, and Technology are fully described and illustrated.

Contains More Information of MORE interest to MORE people than any other Dictionary.

390,000 and Ten Years' Labour have been devoted to making better what was already regarded as THE BEST.

Sir SYDNEY LEE, D.Litt., says:—

"No more complete and satisfying presentation of our language in all its forms has yet, I think, been achieved in a single volume. . . . 'Webster's New International Dictionary' is indeed a library in itself, and no collection of books, whether small or large, should be, in my opinion, without a copy."

SEND A POSTCARD

mentioning "Everyman," and Messrs. BELL will forward, gratis and post free, a copy of the Illustrated Booklet, with Specimen Pages, which fully describes the "New International Dictionary."

London: C. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Dept. 4, Portugal St., W.C.

FUTURE ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE journal for this issue, owing to heavy advertising, consists of 36 pages—22 of matter and 14 of advertisements; but the normal issue will consist of 32 pages, always with 22 pages of literary matter.

In order to provide for more complete discussion of the greater questions, the Editor hopes to proceed more frequently by the method of symposium, so that great questions may be argued "pro and con" and the opinions of the leaders of thought on most questions can be more clearly expressed. We hope next week to open a symposium on Education, in which the Editor, Mr. A. C. Benson and Dr. W. H. D. Rouse will take part, until the question has been very thoroughly discussed.

The Editor has also arranged a discussion on the Labour Unrest, which will be opened, it is hoped, by Mr. H. G. Wells and replied to by Emile Vandervelde, the Belgian statesman.

The cosmopolitan character of the journal will be seen by the fact that the next number will include an admirable essay by Professor Hans Delbrück on German and English relationships.

It is hoped that the article in this number, "The Future of the Churches," by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, will be the first of a series devoted to a discussion on the Unity of the Churches.

The proprietors hope that a special feature of EVERYMAN will be Correspondence from their readers, which they very heartily and earnestly invite. It should be of some service as a ventilation of questions from many standpoints, and one of the great features of this journal will be that it will have an open platform where all questions may be discussed freely.

The Editor will endeavour to present his readers with an artistic story at very frequent intervals.

As has been announced, another feature will be the inclusion each week of a fine pen-and-ink drawing of some literary, scientific, or artistic celebrity, of either modern or past times, by Mr. Will Rothenstein or some artist of high standing, thus forming a gallery of portraits of real value, which will be an unique feature in journalism.

The following is a list of contributors already arranged for:—

ENGLISH.

NORMAN ANGELL.
HON. MAURICE BARING.
Canon WM. BARRY.
HILAIRE BELLOC.
A. C. BENSON.
Monsieur R. H. BENSON.
Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL.
G. K. CHESTERTON.
EDMUND GARDNER.
Lord GUTHRIE.
THOMAS HOLMES.
Sir EYERARD IM THURN.
Sir OLIVER LODGE.
Rev. NORMAN MACLEAN.
JOHN MASEFIELD.
Professor PHILLIMORE.
STEPHEN REYNOLDS.
ERNEST RHYS.
W. H. D. ROUSE.
Professor G. SAINTSBURY.
THOMAS SECCOMBE.
Sir ERNEST SHACKLETON.
ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M.

Mrs. SIDNEY WEBB.

H. G. WELLS.
Rev. ALEXANDER WHYTE.
PERCEVAL GIBBON.
Prof. ARTHUR THOMSON.

FOREIGN.

Viscount D'AVENEL.
HENRI BERGSON.
Professor HANS DELBRÜCK.
VICTOR GIRAUD.
Count GOBLET D'ALVIELLA.
Mme. FELIX FAURE GOYAU.
ALBERT HOUTIN.
Prince KROPOTKIN.
Professor EMILE LEGOUIS.
HENRI LICHTENBERGER.
Baron LUMBROSO.
Count LÜTZOW.
MAURICE MAETERLINCK.
ARTHUR LEVY.
HENRI MAZEL.
EMILE VANDERVELDE.

IMPORTANT BOOKS

from Messrs:
CHAPMAN & HALL'S AUTUMN LIST.

THE DIARIES OF WILLIAM CHARLES

MACREADY. Edited by WILLIAM TOYNEEE. With numerous Portraits. Two Vols. Small Royal 8vo. 32s. net.

MEMORIALS OF CANTERBURY

CATHEDRAL. By C. EVELEIGH WOODRUFF, M.A., Six Preacher of Canterbury Cathedral, etc., and WILLIAM DANKS, M.A., Canon Residentiary. With Illustrations by LOUIS WEIRTER, R.E.A. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

GEORGE BORROW, The Man and

His Books. By EDWARD THOMAS, Author of "The Life of Richard Jefferies," "The Heart of England," etc., etc. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

IN FRENCH AFRICA. Scenes and

Memories. By Miss BETHAN EDWARDS, Author of "Unfrequented France," "French Vignettes," etc. With numerous original and copyright Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

JOHN FORSTER AND HIS FRIEND-

SHIPS. By R. RENTON. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

ROMANCES OF THE FRENCH

THEATRE. By FRANCIS GRIEBLE, Author of "The Passions of the French Romantics," "Chateaubriand and his Court of Women," etc. With Six Photogravure Portraits. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

JOHN JONATHAN AND COMPANY.

By JAMES MILNE, Author of "My Summer in London," etc. With Frontispiece by CHARLES PEARS. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

LIFE IN THE INDIAN POLICE.

By C. E. GOULDSBURY, Author of "Dulall the Forest Guard." Fully Illustrated from Photographs by the Author. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL OF THE COMTE

D'ESPINCHAL. Edited by ERNEST D'HAUTERIVE. Translated by Mrs. RUDOLPH STAWELL. With numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

SUMMER DAYS IN SHAKESPEARE

LAND. By CHARLES G. HARPER, Historian of the Roads of England. With numerous drawings by the Author. Large Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

DIGRESSIONS: Being Passages from the Works of F. TEMPLE THURSTON. Edited by "BELLWATTLE." With Portrait. Foolscap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net in cloth, 5s. net in leather.

LETTERS FROM SOLITUDE: And

Other Essays. By FILSON YOUNG, Author of "Memory Harbour," etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

MAN'S PLACE IN THE UNIVERSE.

By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S., etc., Author of "The World of Life," etc. New and Cheaper Edition. Foolscap 8vo. 1s. net.

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

Extracts from the Private Diary of Her Majesty from her 13th Year (1832) till her Marriage in 1840. Edited by VISCOUNT ESHER, G.C.B. 2 Vols. With Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 36s. net. Ready end October.

CORRESPONDENCE OF SARAH, LADY

LYTTELTON, 1787-1870. Edited by her Great Granddaughter, the Hon. Mrs. HUGH WYNDHAM. With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

CORRESPONDENCE OF LORD BURG-

HERSH (Afterwards Earl of Westmorland), 1868-1840. Edited by his Grand-daughter, Miss RACHEL WEIGALL. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

THE SOUTH POLE. A full account of an Expedition to the Antarctic Regions in 1911-1912. By Captain ROALD AMUNDSEN. With an Introduction by Dr. FRITJOF NANSEN. Translated from the Norwegian by A. G. CHATER. In 2 Vols. With numerous Illustrations and Maps. Demy 8vo. 42s. net.

THE WAR DRAMA OF THE EAGLES.

The Story of Napoleon's Standards on the Battlefield from Austerlitz to Waterloo. By EDWARD FRASER, Author of "The Enemy at Trafalgar," etc. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo.

THE ARABS IN TRIPOLI. With an Account of the Desert War. By ALAN OSTLER. With Illustrations specially drawn by H. Seppings Wright. Demy 8vo.

THROUGH MESOPOTAMIA AND TUR-

KESTAN IN DISGUISE. By E. B. SOANE. With Illustrations and a Map. Large crown 8vo. 12s. net.

THE LIFE STORY OF A HARE. By J. C.

TREGARTHEN, Author of "Wild Life at the Land's End," "The Life Story of an Otter," etc. With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo.

POEMS, OLD AND NEW. By HENRY

NEWBOLT, Author of "The Island Race," "The Year of Trafalgar," etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe. 10s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE STREET OF THE FLUTE PLAYER.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

SIMON BRANDIN. By B. PAUL NEUMANN

GLAMOUR. By BOHUN LYNCH.

BUNCH GRASS. By HORACE A. VACHELL.

MUDDLING THROUGH. By LADY NAPIER OF MAGDALA.

RAYMOND LANCHESTER. By RONALD

MACDONALD.

THE CLOUDY PORCH. By K. M. EDGE

(Mrs. C. T. Caulfeild).

THE ENLIGHTENMENT OF SYLVIA. By

A. D. PICKERING.

THE WHITE KNIGHTS. By T. G. WAKE-

LING.

THE MYSTERIOUS MONSIEUR DUMONT

By FREDERICK ARTHUR.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

See That Packet!

You can keep yourself healthier and stronger, freer from indigestion, better able to sleep at nights, able to work longer and harder without getting tired, need medicines and the doctor less if you make Vi-Cocoa your daily food-beverage.

There's no question about it. For the last fifteen years thousands have proven the truth of these statements. No other food-beverage has had such unsolicited testimonials. There's no secret about it—Vi-Cocoa contains the richest and choicest cocoa—it is more delicious and more nutritious than any other cocoa made. It contains Extract of Malt, the doctor's panacea for indigestion. It contains Extract of Hops, the best known remedy for insomnia. It contains the wonderful Kola Nut, nature's greatest boon in endurance-giving power. And it's so easy to prove. A 6d. packet or a 9d. tin from your grocer's TO-DAY will give you all the evidence you require and make you a permanent friend of Vi-Cocoa.

Don't ask for COCOA—ask for VI-COCOA

469

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 2. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1912.

One Penny.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	37
KROPOTKIN'S "FIELDS, FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS"—
By Hector Macpherson	38
WHY I BELIEVE IN PEACE (Part II.)—
By Norman Angell	39
EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM—
Introduction by The Editor	40
I. A. C. Benson	40
II. W. H. D. Rouse	41
ANNOUNCEMENTS	42
MAURICE MAETERLINCK	42
PORTRAIT OF MAETERLINCK	43
ENGLAND AND GERMANY—
By Prof. Hans Delbrück	45
FRENCH SUPREMACY IN COOKING THREATENED	46

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

1. NORMAN ANGELL
2. A. C. BENSON
3. PROF. HANS
DELBRÜCK
4. A. HOUTIN
5. Dr. W. H. D. ROUSE

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO—	PAGE
By Count de Segur	47
FATHER GAUCHER'S ELIXIR—
By A. Daudet	49
MY MOTHER—
By Peter Altenberg	52
THE REAL NEWMAN—
By A. Houtin	53
TRUTH AND FICTION AND SIR A. CONAN DOYLE'S "REFUGEES"	54
THE GERMAN EMPEROR—
By Charles Sarolea	56
THE GOLD IN BOOKS—
By Dr. William Barry	58
"MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD"	60
CORRESPONDENCE	62
LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS	66

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN regard to news from the seat of war, the public would do well to exercise a judicious scepticism.

The censorship is quite draconian in its severity; only such items of intelligence are allowed to pass which satisfy the official men. For on the authority of Mr. Nevinson (war correspondent of the Daily Chronicle), there must be "no unfavourable articles written, no descriptions of defeats, no details as to losses, and no criticisms of the dispositions of the various armies." As we go to press, news comes to hand that a big battle has begun in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. The Turkish troops are said to be advancing, and the Bulgarians falling back with heavy losses, which losses are reported to be 2,000 killed and 4,000 wounded. The Sofia newspapers report, on the other hand, the capture by Bulgarians of several important positions round Adrianople. The Servian forces seem to have met with success. They have captured Prishtina and Kotchana.

The Montenegrins have followed up their earlier successes by taking the towns of Plava and Gusinje. A Turkish force of 2,000 men, mostly Albanians, has been ambushed while marching from Plava to make an attempt to recapture Berans.

The Servian army has also invaded Turkish territory, but so far the fighting has not been of a serious nature. The Greeks claim to have gained a brilliant victory in the capture of Ellassona. The Bulgarian ports of Varna and Burgas are said to be effectively blockaded by the Turks: while Greece has declared an effective blockade of that part of the Adriatic coast of Turkey lying between Preveza and the northern end of the island of Corfu.

The Turkish island of Lemnos, in the Ægean Sea, is blockaded by a Greek squadron, the Commander having refused to surrender. Greek troops have been landed on the island.

A proclamation of British neutrality has been published.

At Constantinople all does not go well. Fears are entertained of intervention by another Power—obviously Russia. In view of this, Kiamil Pasha, President of the Council, appeals to England for fair play. The appeal is no doubt dictated by the dread that Russia may take advantage of the drafting of large numbers of troops into Europe to make a move on the Asiatic provinces. Another disquieting piece of news, so far as the Young Turk is concerned, is the decision to transfer the Ex-Sultan Abdul from Salonica to Constantinople. In view of the fact that the President of the Council, Kiamil Pasha, has always been friendly to Abdul, the decision means more than appears at first sight. A serious reverse to the Turkish arms would be likely to provoke a revolution on behalf of Abdul, whose presence in Constantinople would be highly favourable to the designs of his friends.

Emperor William loses no opportunity of magnifying his office. With him the Divine Right theory is more than a theory. It is a comforting fact. Speaking at the unveiling of the Coligny Memorial at Wilhelmshaven, he dwelt upon the relation of loyalty to religion. In his opinion, loyalty to an earthly king flourished only on soil where faith in the Heavenly King held sway.

The political world is greatly excited over the Government's new land policy. The land-owning section of the Liberal party are strongly opposed to the method of enquiry which has been adopted. One member of the party, Sir Herbert Raphael, M.P., addressing a Liberal meeting this week, suggested the appointment of a Royal Commission—the enquiry which precedes legislation should not, in his opinion, be conducted by party men.

The Liberal party is seriously exercised on the question of foreign policy. The advanced guard have been dissatisfied for some time with the reticence of the Foreign Office, and have again and again expressed dissent from the policy of Sir Edward Grey. The feeling has been accentuated by the letter of Sir John Brunner, whose position as President of the National Liberal Federation naturally gives his views great weight. Sir John emphasised the necessity of coming to an understanding with Germany. Special stress is laid upon the necessity of Liberals voting for the abandonment of the right to capture peaceful merchantmen on the high seas in time of war. Resolutions on these lines are recommended to all Liberal associations throughout the country.

In Committee on the Home Rule Bill the House of Commons on Monday discussed several important points. A motion was made to exclude Trinity College, Dublin, and Queen's College, Belfast, from the jurisdiction of the Irish Parliament.

Mr. John Redmond described the suggestion as unworthy and intensely offensive. The demand Mr. Birrell characterised as unreasonable, but in order to remove apprehensions which did exist, he promised in the report stage to introduce words which would exempt Trinity College and prevent the Irish Parliament diverting the £18,000 a year now payable from Imperial funds to the Queen's College, Belfast. An equally important matter came up for discussion in a motion to reserve for the Imperial Parliament the control over "factories, workshops, and mines, or other trades or industries in the regulation of hours of employment or the rate of wages therein." This was opposed by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, the Labour Leader, on the ground that sectarian division would be greatly lessened by granting Ireland control of her social and industrial affairs. Mr. Balfour, among others, joined in the discussion. The amendment was defeated by 204 to 198 votes.

Representatives of Government departments, municipalities, education authorities, and shipping organisations were present at a national conference in London on Monday. A letter was read from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that he is at present in consultation with the Board of Trade with regard to providing additional monetary assistance "to promote this most important branch of technical instruction."

An agreement of great importance to the mining industry was adopted on Monday by the Coal Conciliation Board for the federated districts of England and North Wales, affecting 400,000 colliery workers. An increase of wages is to be given to the extent of one shilling per week, involving a total increase of £1,000,000 a year.

It is announced that out of friendship for Italy the French Government will recognise Italian sovereignty in Lybia without waiting for the regulation of various questions affecting Tunis and Tripoli. Preparations are being made for the departure of Turkish troops from Tripoli.

By an overwhelming vote the British Steel Smelters have decided against the federation of all trade unions in the iron and steel trades. Out of a membership of 48,000, about 20,000 were opposed to the scheme.

PRINCE KROPOTKIN ON "FIELDS, FACTORIES, AND WORKSHOPS"*

By HECTOR MACPHERSON

I.

FOURTEEN years ago Prince Kropotkin published his epoch-making book, "Fields, Factories, and Workshops," in which he gave expression to the view that the cause of our industrial trouble was our excessive devotion to Adam Smith's principle of division of labour. In Adam Smith's time the principle was capable of national application, and was productive of good. But with the rise of full-fledged industrialism and its embodiment in the factory system, the principle of division of labour was interpreted to mean that a nation like ours, with an aptitude for manufactures, should aim at becoming—which, as a result of the Napoleonic war, it did become—the workshop of the world. As Nature had evidently intended Great Britain to produce manufactures, so countries like Russia were meant in the scheme of things to grow corn for manufacturing countries. Each nation, in short, was to specialise in its own particular product, and on the basis of free exchange universal harmony was to result.

II.

Unfortunately, the result of excessive specialisation is that, in this country, agriculture has been neglected. Prince Kropotkin maintains that, with the application of science to agriculture, the soil of Great Britain would support all its inhabitants. Compare this with present conditions, when by wholesale emigration the rural districts are being depopulated. Moreover, excessive specialisation in industry, along with a wretched system of land tenure, is largely, if not mainly, responsible for the slums in our cities and towns, which are a frightful commentary upon our Blue Book records of expanding trade.

III.

Prince Kropotkin's idea is that the watchword of the future should be not the division, but the integration of labour. Agriculture should be made the foundation of national life, and should decide which village industries will naturally develop. In that way our manufactures, instead of being wholly dependent upon a foreign demand with its recurrent crises and panics of unemployment, would rely upon a steady domestic demand. The present writer has it on the authority of a large exporter that in every way the home trade is more profitable than the foreign trade, which has assumed its present enormous and risky proportions mainly because of the low consumptive power of the home market. Political economy, which has grown up under the manufacturing régime, has concentrated its attention almost exclusively upon the production, to the neglect of the distribution and consumption of wealth. In the hands of humanitarian thinkers, like Prince Kropotkin, economic science is giving increased attention to the human equation. Neither Free Trade nor Tariff Reform seems capable of solving the grave problem of the hour. That can only be done on the lines of a scheme like Prince Kropotkin's, which, by uniting the bitterest antagonistic factors, agriculture and manufacture, will lay the foundations of a national life which will bring within the reach of all the comforts and blessings of civilisation. Prince Kropotkin agrees with Ruskin that "there is no wealth but life," and "that country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings."

* Published in Messrs. Nelson's Shilling Library.

WHY I BELIEVE IN PEACE * * * * BY NORMAN ANGELL

PART II.

I.

WAR between States, the imposition of mere physical force by one group upon another, is as ineffective in the moral as in the economic domain; and it is marked by a like irrelevancy. Christendom is at the present time divided by certain conflicting conceptions of life and society—Socialism and Individualism, material and religious sanctions, and so on. The military conflicts of States cannot advance the understanding of these problems one iota; it can, and unhappily does, retard that understanding. Imagine England waging war in favour of Parliamentary government in Europe against Germany; we should then be compelling those in favour of Parliamentary government in Germany to fight against those ideas which we desired them to hold. The thing has, in the opinion of competent judges, actually happened in history. It is at least arguable that the Armada gave the coup de grace to Catholic domination in England, and compelled the English Catholics to take up arms in defence of a faith in which they did not believe. Whether the Admiral who led the English navy in the attack on the Catholic Armada was a Catholic or not, its possibility illustrates my point. The outcome of force is an accident.

II.

But the peace preparation for conflict operates against the improvement of ideas as much as war itself. If the conditions under which men live together are to improve, their efforts must be directed to social management. If their Socialism is not to be a form of slavery, their eugenics and the rest of it a very vile form of tyranny, then their collective effort must be given to making their Governments and their States an effective instrument for the management of the community. At present the States of Christendom are formed, not even with the idea of creating an efficient instrument of social management, but mainly with the idea of enabling them to wield physical force as against rival States. The great States of Europe are the outcome of war, not of peace; the greatest sacrifices made by the peoples of Europe are not for improvement, but for destruction; the intensest emotion is centred upon the rivalry of groups, not upon the improvement of their co-operation. Political organisation receives its stamp from the needs of war rather than from the needs of peace. And an instrument which is the outgrowth of one special condition, and which is created for one special purpose, is not likely to work efficiently in an entirely different condition, for an entirely different purpose. At the present moment, for instance, the British Empire is in the process of undergoing a certain transformation. We are taking steps to render it more centralised, more uniform, just as the old military States of the Continent are centralised, and characterised by great uniformity. These qualities may be good or bad, but my point is that the steps we are taking are not the outcome of social needs, they have not been prompted in the remotest way by any intention of better social management—they have simply been prompted by the desire to have a more efficient instrument wherewith to exercise physical force against other groups.

And that force, when exercised, whether in the material or in the moral fields, is both ineffective and irrelevant. Ineffective, futile, for the reasons which I have detailed elsewhere. If we can imagine a complete victory of England over Germany, or of Germany over England, the victor could not achieve by that victory any object which would add to the well-being of his people. Irrelevant, because the real struggle of mankind, the better understanding of the facts of the universe, which enable men to carry on together their fight with Nature, and to live together the fullest lives during that fight, is not advanced.

III.

Despite ourselves, the nations of Christendom have become dependent the one upon the other, and yet they are not a community; and they are not a community because no community can be formed where the units adhere to the use of force the one against the other. You cannot form so much as a pirate crew if the members refuse to act upon some sort of an agreement; if each is in danger of being knifed at any moment by his fellow, if they cannot depend upon abiding by some sort of an agreement concerning discipline, and the division of spoil, they cannot even carry on piracy.

IV.

The first step, therefore, towards the creation of a community is the realisation on the part of the units of the advantage of acting together, and the disadvantage of using force as between themselves. So long as each says, "I am as strong as the rest, and I will enforce my view with the knife," no civilisation will be possible: it is the creed of the Congo and of Borneo. But it is also the creed of our opponents. They say, "If you believe yourselves right, and the others wrong, fight." So says and acts the Dervish, who slits the throat of the Christian infidel. And it is the creed which makes Turkey, and Albania, and Macedonia.

V.

To this our opponents rejoin, "Should not nations, then, defend themselves if they are attacked?" Of course they should. The Christian, who does not urge the use of force, and is consequently justified in trying to prevent its use against himself, should defend himself against the Dervish, and, if need be, kill him. The plea for force in the matter of ideals really amounts to this: "Kill the man who does not live like you, destroy nationalities." For if the political creed of Christendom did not justify this, there would be no need for men to defend their spiritual possessions by force, or for the smaller peoples to fight for their nationalities.

VI.

When Europe, as the result of a better understanding, a more informed public opinion, realises that it is better not to use force in these matters, we shall have achieved an added guarantee for the survival of the highest political ideals.

Christendom has already reached that point in the matter of religious beliefs—the whole paraphernalia of force in religious matters, the inquisitions and the wars, and the rest, have been abandoned. We desire to arrive at a like step in the matter of political differences. And that not merely because the replacing of conflict by co-operation will add to the material wealth of the great mass, and so give an added chance to the widening of their lives, the bringing into them of greater variety, the possibility of leisure, education, travel, adventure; not merely because the completer conquest of nature implies the completer conquest of disease and discomfort and pain; but because it also implies the completer realisation of those essentials of human intercourse upon which depend the quality of the ultimate realities of human life.

AN EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM

INTRODUCTION BY THE EDITOR.

AMONGST the many problems which force themselves on the attention of EVERYMAN, that of Secondary Education Reform is entitled to a front place. There are few national activities in which drastic changes are more urgently needed. There are few subjects about which it is more necessary to clear up our thoughts and to speak out the truth.

And there is probably no man living better qualified than Mr. A. C. Benson to open a discussion. The eminent son of an illustrious father, who was himself a headmaster of Eton before he became Primate of England, Mr. A. C. Benson, also a former master in the same school, and at present a tutor and lecturer in Magdalen College, Cambridge, has a personal and intimate knowledge of the educational organisation. That a man who has thus inherited the public school tradition, who has been imbued from childhood with the classical spirit, and who is pre-eminently a man of balanced judgment and of Conservative instinct, should rise in rebellion against the old system, is indeed a sign of the times.

From the first line to the last, Mr. Benson's Introductory paper is a protest against the monopoly of the Classical Languages, against the system of classical compulsory feeding, which forces Greek and Latin down the throats of reluctant and refractory schoolboys. He convincingly shows how the present tyranny sacrifices the vital needs of an overwhelming majority to the literary luxuries of a few chosen prize boys. He shows how, as the ultimate result, the present conditions deaden the intellectual curiosity of the average boy, and how they inevitably transform the public school into mere athletic gymnasia and into fashionable boarding-schools.

To put an end to an effete system, Mr. Benson suggests the substitution of a civic education by the State. Most reformers will agree with him that there lies the true remedy. For what is wrong in the public schools is not only what they teach or what they fail to teach; what is wrong is the spirit and the atmosphere of the schools themselves. What is wrong is that they are not really, as they call themselves, "public" schools, but "private" schools, the schools of a caste, controlled by a "Trade Union," schools which are an appendage of the Anglican hierarchy and of the squirearchy.

There is no reason why in the schools of the future the study of the classics should be abandoned for the study of purely utilitarian subjects. Indeed, I am convinced that classical culture is the first to suffer from the classical monopoly; in the reformed education of tomorrow, the ancient humanities will be better taught than in the present-day public schools. Mr. Rouse, in the suggestive paper which follows up Mr. Benson, shows how the classics could be taught without detriment to modern subjects, and could be brought into relation to present-day life.

I.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF SECONDARY EDUCATION

By A. C. BENSON

I.

I HAVE often thought that of all the unfortunate names for harmless and necessary things the title of Secondary Education is the worst; it overwhelms the mind with a sense both of dulness and unimportance. As a matter of fact, it is not a name for a definite thing at all; it is simply a kind of et cetera, a rough designation for all education that cannot be defined as Primary.

It is this weltering mass of curricula, utilitarian aims, intellectual ideals, traditions, authorities, monopolies, that needs organising and co-ordinating. It is not an Augean stable at all, but it is a scene of misunderstanding, futile collision, dull obstruction, reactionary prejudice. It is time for the State to lay down a plan of civic education, for that is what the absurd confusion is dimly aiming at; to say what the average citizen is to be taught, and at the same time carefully to safeguard and foster special aptitudes and intellectual abilities.

II.

Now, in the present chaos, intellectual ability is very fairly provided for, and the rest of secondary education is ruthlessly sacrificed to provide for that. The victims of secondary education, the boys who come off badly, are the average boys. They, as a rule, are put to work at things only suited for boys of special ability; and the excuse that is made is that it is necessary to maintain a high ideal of intellectual culture. Secondary education is, in fact, a monopoly, and it is in the hands of what is really a Trades Union, which is none the less tyrannical in its exercise of power, because that power is not consciously applied. The teachers are drawn from the men who have been brought up under the old system, and they are naturally only capable of teaching the subjects they have learned. Thus, the system gets automatically perpetuated, because there is no organised pressure to make the teachers reform their aims and methods. This pressure can only be applied by the State, because the parents who have themselves suffered under the established system have no clear idea what they want, though they have a very clear idea that they have been inefficiently taught.

If we track the evil to its source, it is probably the older universities which are responsible for the worst of the confusion. They impose on the public schools a certain curriculum by maintaining compulsory classics; that affects the public schools, and the other schools to a great extent follow suit. A classical education is a thing for specialists. Boys of real linguistic and literary ability can be effectively trained in the classics; though even so the best classical education is a very incomplete thing, even from the classical point of view, and leaves wide tracts of literature unexplored. But for average boys, the classics, taught grammatically and on literary lines, provide a very elaborate and wasteful method of taking up the time of boys, obliterating their intellectual curiosity, and leaving them with no residue of efficiency or interest.

The ordinary man, when he comes to take his place in the ranks of wage-earners, ought to be able to write and spell his own language accurately, and to be able to express himself clearly in English; he ought to know something of our great national literature, including the Bible. He ought to be able to calculate in arithmetic rapidly and correctly; he ought, if possible, to be able to read easy French, and even to write it; he ought to know something of the world's history, and of its present conditions; to have a good knowledge of modern geography, and of popular science. He would then be a soundly educated man.

III.

How much of this is attained by secondary education? Very little, indeed, it must be confessed. It is an ample curriculum for ordinary minds, and, if at all firmly grasped, it would produce a thoroughly efficient man.

AN EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM (continued)

But the effect of the curriculum, as it is administered, is to produce a certain number of able boys, and to leave the mass both inefficient and uninterested. The real deficiency is the total lack of acquaintance with modern conditions, ideas, and problems; and if we are to hold our own in the competition of nations, if we are to retain a foremost place, we must bring up our citizens to be efficient, and to know what is going on. We cannot allow a classical ideal of culture, not understood or felt or attained by most of its victims, to thrust all these urgent and complicated questions into the background.

Of course, it is true that much depends upon the personality of teachers; a good teacher can do more with a bad curriculum, to make minds active and alert, than a bad teacher can do with the best curriculum. It is the effect of our many good teachers, trained in numerous instances on classical lines, which conceals from us how ill adapted the whole system is to educate ordinary minds. But if the universities would set the example of modernising the curriculum, giving more alternatives and higher standards, good teachers trained on modern lines would very soon be forthcoming.

IV.

Another thing which hides from us the deplorable intellectual results of the present system is the fact that the secondary schools pay very careful attention to physical well-being and sound morality. Thus, the product of the secondary schools is a well-developed, energetic, and manly type, which believes in health and strength, in honour and virtue; what it does not believe in is intellectual force. It remembers with pleasure the physical exercise and the social activity of school life; it remembers with indifference and boredom its hours of intellectual work, because the secondary teachers do not, as they do with physical exercise, recognise what the boys enjoy, and build up their training upon that; they force upon the boy subjects which he does not enjoy, and which he does not even feel to be useful. Intellectual work must be built upon use and enjoyment; but, as it is, the best result of the curriculum is that you may get boys capable of doing work conscientiously in which they are not in the faintest degree interested. Intellectual curiosity is not only not encouraged, it is faithfully and elaborately extinguished, because subjects are not sought which the boys can master and feel at home in, but subjects which are outside the range of comprehension and mastery.

V.

What then I plead for is the State settlement of a plan of civic education, based upon modern conditions and modern needs. The State has every right to insist that its citizens shall be made efficient; it is for the schoolmasters to see that intellectual interests shall not be neglected. We cannot afford to follow a laissez-faire policy any longer. Life under modern conditions is a very competitive business. We must frankly recognise that first; and next we must not continue to think so meanly of the intellectual capacities of our race. Schoolmasters are too apt to say of boys without any very marked aptitude that it does not much matter what they are taught. It does matter very much, because it is in the school days that intellectual habits are formed. If we pay so much attention to physique and character, can we be excused for neglecting the intellectual side?

The organisation is all ready to hand; the grave fault of the system is its intellectual cynicism. It seems to me that the time has come for the State to intervene, and to say peremptorily that education shall face the problems of the present, instead of dawdling among the memories of the past.

II.

HOW TO SAVE THE CLASSICS

By W. H. D. ROUSE.

I.

MR. BENSON has stated clearly some of the faults of our educational system. I call it a system, not a muddle, as it is often called, because, thanks to centralised examinations, it has become a system, very rigid and hard to change. But I am not quite so hopeful as he is that the State will be a Deus ex Machina. In some respects it is a diabolus ex machina. Thus the Act of 1902, well meant, and excellent in many respects, had a fatal flaw—in placing education under the control of the uneducated; local bodies are not only unfit to control education, but they allow political intrigue, and even personal spite, to influence them in this department, as in others of their activity. The State, again, too often means the Minister, and he is too often the puppet in the hands of men who will use our schools as a pawn in the game of politics; the most glowing instance of this are the twenty-five per cent. free places. If the State meant a competent Minister, with power to act as reason to direct, that would be another thing. The State has done a great deal of good, but it has also done much harm, and it may do more.

For one thing, it is likely that a vague cry, like Modernise the Curriculum, would be popular; and yet it might be made to cover a great deal of foolishness. These words generally mean, Cut out the Classics first—they are not modern; put in every kind of natural science—that is supposed to be modern; and let all your training be directed to earning money. Now, it is not certain that all good things are modern and all old things bad; and it is quite certain that, in so far as the learner is conscious of the motive to earn money, his education suffers. He learns an accomplishment for an ulterior end; and the means, whether it be book-keeping, or botany, or Latin verses, or football, is merely thought of in connection with the end. But education should be the cultivation of all the faculties for the pleasure of using them well. Professionalism spoils football, and it spoils everything else in the same way.

II.

My own idea of what is wanted is a scheme which shall include, as far as possible, all faculties of body and mind; the scheme as a whole, and each part of it, beginning with bodily action, and leading up to mental action, moral habits being formed at the same time by the process. I would include not only natural science, of such kinds as are suited to the young, but a large proportion of literary training, and this for two reasons: first, because this alone teaches how to express what is in oneself, and secondly, because this alone reveals to us the best thoughts of others. And I would include not only modern languages, as the gate to knowledge of our fellow-creatures and sympathy with them, but ancient languages, as the key to the past on which our present is built up.

Foreign languages, indeed, are indispensable, if we are to learn how to see what our thoughts really are; and Greek and Latin are indispensable, because modern languages are too like our own to give the searching analysis which is necessary to full knowledge. The practise of expression in Greek or Latin is indeed invaluable, because these languages are so direct and simple that we must say exactly what we think, whereas modern languages are all cumbered with verbiage and dead metaphors which obscure thought. But to attain this end, Greek and Latin must be taught naturally, both by speech and writing, so that the learner may truly express his own thoughts; and by this means he will naturally attain to an understanding of ancient literature, which contains, in compact form, stores of wisdom and close observation of human nature.

AN EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM

(continued)

III.

It is here that I venture to differ from Mr. Benson. I agree fully that the end is not attained by the common grammar and case-exercise grind; but I know that it is attained by the natural method of speech. And so taught, they are accessible not only to the clever boy, but to those of moderate ability.

Hence I plead for classical study, but I ask only for a very moderate allowance of time, which will leave enough for English, modern languages, and natural science, those modern subjects so dear to this generation. This study is, indeed, peculiarly needed now, in an age of materialism and sentiment; for they represent the ideal, and they deal with real human feeling, not with sentiment or humbug.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

The Publishers cannot help but express their gratification at the kindly reception the public have given to EVERYMAN—four editions having been called for, and the demand still unsatisfied, when they were compelled to lift it from the press. They have to offer their apologies to those who have been unable to obtain the first number, which is entirely out of print, and to say that they are making full provision to meet the increased orders, which are already in excess of those placed for Number One.

The third number of EVERYMAN will give its readers an important article on the present position of polar exploration, by Sir Ernest Shackleton. Dr. Alexander Whyte will write an appreciation of "Wesley's Journal." There will also be an historical article, with some new light on the character of the "Merrie Monarch," entitled "The Truth about Charles II.," as well as an important contribution on "Napoleon as a Socialist," pointing out how the Code Napoleon is working out on almost purely Socialistic lines in France. The Abbé Houtin will continue his article on Newman, and there will be others on "G. K. C. as a Heretic," "Lest We Forget," etc.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor cannot undertake to return manuscripts. If possible all manuscripts should be typewritten, and a stamped envelope enclosed.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d. Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

MAURICE MAETERLINCK

I.

To an outside observer the biography of Maeterlinck seems without incident and almost without events. His life flows like a tranquil river with clear and deep waters through a verdant plain. The only events of his external life, in intimate communion with Nature, are the succession of seasons, the annual migrations from town to country, from the North to the South of France. The only events of his intellectual life are the dates of publication of his works, which mark the stages of his literary career like the milestones on a triumphal road. But that even and uniform external life conceals an adventurous inner life, filled with vicissitudes, culminating in crises and sudden catastrophes, in developments and renewals, in revolutions of thought and revelations of love. What an enormous distance between the starting point and the final goal, between the spectral and terrifying world of the "Princess Maleine" to the luminous and joyous visions of "Joyzelle" and "Monna Vanna," from the "Treasure of the Humble" to the "Buried Temple"! And is it not his own personal experience which he has summed up, when he lays down this proposition, which reappears like a "leitmotiv" in the "Treasure of the Humble" and in "Wisdom and Destiny": that the only true human dramas are the dramas of the Soul, and that the least interesting, the most monotonous, the dullest lives, like that of Charlotte Brontë, are often the most intense, those which are richest in movement and passion?

II.

A Fleming like de Koster, like Rodenbach, like Verhaeren, like Van Lerberghe, like Eeckhoud, singularly enough like most Belgian writers who use French as the vehicle of their thought, born in 1862, in Ghent, the ancient and glorious and turbulent city of Van Artevelde and Charles V., Maeterlinck always remained loyal to the spirit of his native city, and his greatness, like that of the writers whom I have just mentioned, is precisely due to that loyalty which he has retained to the spirit of his country. He has not, like the Belgian writers of the Walloon provinces, allowed his personality and his originality to be submerged by French or Belgian influences. He will be in the history of French letters the representative of the Flemish people, the admirable product of the cross fertilisation of the Teutonic genius, refined in the Flemish people by centuries of culture. Descended, like Goethe, from an old family of honest burgesses, Maeterlinck owes to his descent a rich inheritance of solid qualities, of practical sense, of ponderation, and that faculty of patient and minute observation which is revealed in "The Life of the Bee": in one word, all those gifts which have, as it were, ballasted the winged imagination of the poet. And, finally, a Catholic and a pupil of the Jesuits, he owes to his religious education the pre-occupation of what is beyond ratiocination, the metaphysical need, the comprehension of the spiritual life, and of the candid faith of the simple and of the humble, and when in later life he rejected the supernatural, he retained the sense of mystery, and his soul continued to haunt the ruins of Gothic cathedrals.

III.

To indulge the wishes of his family, Maeterlinck followed the study of Law, and eventually became a member of the Ghent Bar. He is even said to have

Votre essential et absolu

MAURICE MAETERLINCK, NATUS 1862

MAURICE MAETERLINCK (continued)

pleaded in the Flemish language the cause of the widow and the orphan. But the pedantry and the formalism of the professors of Ghent University, as he has often confided to the writer of these pages, inspired in him a profound repugnance for jurisprudence, and already on the college benches Maeterlinck turned away from a legal career, with its lucrative prizes, towards the distant and uncertain future of Art and Poetry.

He started in his literary career at the critical and decisive moment when his native country was passing through a complete social and intellectual transformation. In the admirable outburst of talent, which is called "Young Belgium," the first writings of Maeterlinck compelled attention and revealed a new and mysterious force. But it is highly probable that his original and strange genius, both simple and complex, both naïve and subtle, would not have been known outside the esoteric circle of a happy few, and that it could not for a very long time have imposed itself to universal admiration, without the famous article of Octave Mirbeau, published in the Figaro in the month of August, in the year of grace 1890. This article revealed to the world that a new Shakespeare had just appeared in Belgian Gaul. Hitherto almost unknown, Maeterlinck, at twenty-eight years, owing to that paper of Mirbeau, suddenly became a star of the first magnitude: a memorable example, let it be said in passing, of the influence of literary criticism on the fate of literary masterpieces.

IV.

The clarion ring of Mirbeau is like an appeal from literary France to young Belgium. Maeterlinck answers the appeal, and accepts the invitation which is sent to him by France, ever generous and hospitable to genius. He leaves Belgium; but he leaves it not like a writer uprooted from his native soil, but like an ambassador who continues to represent and to defend abroad the dignity of the country which sends him. Henceforth Maeterlinck will be in France and in the world the plenipotentiary of Belgian letters. Moreover, although he settles in Paris, he will not lose himself, like so many other poets, in the whirl of Parisian life. He will not compromise his originality. He will not allow himself to be turned away from his path either by the flattery of literary circles or by the ridicule of the boulevards. As a dramatist, he will content himself with gathering psychological documents, and to study the infinitely diverse stage of life. As a thinker and moralist, he will be content to observe with the detachment of the contemplative mind the most prodigious human agglomeration of our planet. But the observation of the human hive turns him so little away from his habitual occupations that he continues to investigate in his Paris study, in his glass hives, the manners and habits of the City of Bees.

V.

The ten years passed in Paris are decisive for the intellectual formation of Maeterlinck, and mark the maturity of his genius. In the full consciousness and possession of his powers, in the radiation of glory which, like dawn, illumines his youth, and soon after, in the burning rays of a great love, his thought expands, his art becomes stronger and more precise, more simple and expressive, and reveals itself in works more and more exquisite, more and more harmonious in form, more and more simple and classical, the marvellous blossom of his fortieth year.

But in the very zenith of his fame, Maeterlinck deserts the capital which acclaims him. Even so the Roman general returned to his plough on the morrow of a victory. For Maeterlinck, more so even than his friend and countryman, Verhaeren, has a horror of the "ville tentaculaire"—the "tentacular" cities—and he has the yearning and the nostalgia for Nature. The artist who has written admirable pages on Silence has fled notoriety and noise with as much eagerness as Victor Hugo sought them. Henceforth Maeterlinck lives in the solitude of the country, propitious to long and deep meditation. In his biennial migrations he follows the sun in his course. At the approach of winter he migrates south with the swallows. With the return of spring he ascends again to the north.

VI.

And as if everything were to be pre-established harmony in this so-well-ordained existence, and as if to provide appropriate surroundings for his genius, Maeterlinck divides the year between the Mediæval and Gothic Abbey de Saint Wandrille and the sunny mansion of Grasse. The ruins of St. Wandrille and Grasse, the City of Flowers! Do these names not symbolise, and do not they render visible the two contradictory forms of that complex genius, both romantic and classical?—on the one hand, the feudal ruin, inhabited by ghosts and tragic memories; and, on the other hand, the perfumed hillsides of Pagan Provence.

VII.

Thus appears to us in broad outline the life of Maurice Maeterlinck, and the beauty, the simplicity, and the harmony of this life make us surmise that the man is even superior to the writer. No one who has had the privilege of meeting the author of "Wisdom and Destiny" but has been at once conquered by the charm and the moral strength which emanates from his personality, and has been fascinated by the hypnotism of his limpid and steady glance.

The superficial reader who would try to form an image of Maeterlinck from his first drama would probably represent him under the traditional figure of the romantic or decadent poet, pallid and dishevelled, Bohemian and neurotic. It is useless to say that Maeterlinck does not in the least resemble this imaginary portrait. The dramatist who has evoked so many phantoms and visions of terror has nothing about him which is either spectral or transparent, and he does not inspire any terror.

VIII.

Physically, Maeterlinck is a solid and almost stolid country gentleman, fond of outdoor sports, a fervent lover of boxing, of the motor-car, and especially of the motor-bicycle. And that idealist poet is, in real life, a man of strict order and almost a business man. To borrow an expression from Nietzsche, he comes nearer to the "Apollinian" than to the "Dionysian" type. He has more affinity with Goethe than with Baudelaire or Verlaine. Like Goethe, he has practised his theories, he has lived his philosophy. He is the wise man who knows how to vanquish and control destiny.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY * * * * BY

PROF. HANS DELBRÜCK (Professor of History in University of Berlin, Editor of "Die Preussische Jahrbücher")

THE majority of Germans believe that the strained relations with Britain are due to British jealousy of the enormous increase of German industry and German trade. This increase is, in point of fact, so considerable that in certain branches British production has already been surpassed by German. If Britain were actually planning to attack and defeat Germany on this account, with the idea of gaining for herself the present German export trade with all its advantages, then all hope of bettering the present state of affairs would be destroyed. For it is certain that the progress of German economic life will not be arrested, but that it will, on the contrary, develop more and more. Britain's jealousy would therefore have to go on increasing, until finally the catastrophe was brought about.

But the entire supposition is a false one. In Germany the circle is ever widening of those who recognise that British competitive jealousy, if it exists at all, is far outweighed by the friendship which every merchant has for his customer. Germany is one of the largest consumers of British goods, and the richer Germany grows, the better customer does she become to Britain. It is certain that a war between the two nations will never arise from purely economic reasons.

Exactly the same may be said with regard to the fear of many British people that Germany is preparing an attack on Britain, to make a great raid for the sake of plunder, to impose a huge war indemnity, or to force Britain to cede certain of her colonies. Even assuming that such a plan were in keeping with the German national character, that it were practicable, and that it were to succeed, there is nothing more certain than that Germany would have no benefit from her gains, but would have to pay dearly for them. For a victory over Britain would give Germany the supremacy in Europe. Europe, however, has never yet submitted to such supremacy, and would unite to punish and suppress Germany, just as she did with Louis XIV. and Napoleon I.

Neither Britain nor Germany intends war against the other. The real reason of the strain is that, to protect her growing trade in the first instance, and later to safeguard her interests in world-politics, Germany has built a powerful fleet, and Britain feels that this fleet is a check and a menace to her. The German fleet is not large enough to be able ever to weaken Britain's naval power, but it is large enough to cause her serious trouble if her attention were taken up with fighting in any other part of the world. I do not, indeed, wonder that the British nation should dislike this, but the British nation in its turn should understand that Germany cannot help herself. The German Empire has practically no colonies. It is true that, in spite of its sixty-five million inhabitants, it has no surplus population, scarcely any emigration (about 25,000 yearly), and, on the other hand, a very large immigration. Yet it requires colonies, because it has a very large surplus among its upper classes. The excellent educational institutions of Germany are well known: primary and secondary schools, technical colleges and universities. Thousands of foreigners—Russians, Americans, Asiatics—come to study in Germany (this year there are as many as 5,400), and the more intelligent among the lower classes of the nation are continually rising to swell the ranks of the university-educated. Almost thirty per cent. of the students of Berlin University are drawn from the lower classes. In the last three years the population of Germany has increased four per cent., while the number of students increases four per cent. every year, and it has been calculated that even at the present day Germany has already 10,000 students too many. With these splendidly trained young men Germany would be in a position to govern and to civilise many millions of people of inferior race or of less advanced civilisation, as the British are doing in India, Egypt, South Africa, and the Soudan. But ever since Germany has begun to make active efforts to obtain possessions of this kind it has been our experience that England again and again comes in our way, and is endeavouring, as far as she can, to make the whole world British. Even at this moment England would appear to be working to bring part of Persia and Tibet under her dominion, and further divisions or redistributions are always in prospect. In order that they may not fare badly on such occasions in the future, the Germans have been obliged to build their great fleet. This step cannot be retraced. The question now is, what can be done, in spite of the existence of the German fleet, to better the relations between Britain and Germany? Mr. Asquith said recently that the territory and dominion of England were sufficiently great, and she could not desire to go on increasing her responsibilities. The truth of this statement is obvious. Already 400 millions, i.e., one-quarter of the whole human race, are under British rule. But the course of events is often stronger than human wishes; and it may be that, not because she desires it, but because she cannot help herself, England will bring still further territories under the protection of her flag. But in that case she should remember that the Germans too are a great nation, who have their own claims, and are entitled to have them. The relations between the two countries would at once become less strained if we in Germany could feel assured that Britain was no longer opposing our expansion, but, on the contrary, was furthering it in a spirit of friendship, free of competitive jealousy; in other words, that in any future extension of dominion on the part of England or any other great Power, Germany should not be denied her share. As soon as the Germans see that this principle is recognised in England, the insistence of public opinion that the fleet continue to be further strengthened will relax—an insistence which has been assuming most passionate form since the interference of England in the Franco-German Morocco compromise. And when Germany begins to experience not only the glory which a large colonial empire brings with it, but also the burdens which it entails, she will of her own accord in so far set bounds to her ambition that England will have no further cause for anxiety.

FRENCH SUPREMACY IN COOKING THREATENED

AND

THE NINETEEN PRECEPTS OF THE FRENCH GOURMET

THE French nation have suddenly awakened to a great national peril. French supremacy is threatened in the most important and the most practical of all the arts: an art in which it is recognised by the universal consent of civilised humanity: the noble art of cooking. It is becoming increasingly apparent that French cooking is steadily and rapidly deteriorating. The good old traditions are giving way before new-fangled inventions. The subtle and delicate alchemy of Vatel is being replaced by poisonous chemical preparations. Whether the deterioration is due to the wholesale exodus of the great French "chefs," who are bribed in their thousands by English and American plutocrats, or whether it is due to the invasion of English tourists with barbarous palates, or whether it is due to the establishment of big cosmopolitan hotels, one fact seems certain: it is more and more difficult to get a good French dinner either in Paris or in one of the provincial centres, and the best traditions are only maintained in those little out-of-the-way inns which have not yet suffered from the alien invasion.

To meet this imminent peril a Society has been recently constituted, which may be best described as a Committee of national defence for the preservation of the culinary art. For the last few months travellers in France may have been puzzled by the appearance of motor-cars with the inscription in brass letters, "Club des Cent." This mysterious inscription is the title of the new Association. Its members combine a love for motoring with a love for good cooking, and to qualify for membership they must have covered at least forty thousand miles, and must have won an approved reputation as culinary experts! The connection between a passion for motoring and a passion for good cooking may not seem self-evident, but on closer examination it is obvious that the motorist has more frequent and more varied opportunities than any other French citizen of studying in every part of France the progress and decline of the national art. And not only has he a better chance of studying the evil, but he has also a greater power to counteract it. For motorists form a powerful freemasonry, whose support or hostility can make or unmake the fortunes of practically all the provincial hotel keepers of the French Republic.

It seemed impossible to us to let such an important international event as the formation of the Club des Cent pass without due notice, and we shall certainly have a further opportunity to return to this important topic. But for our present purpose it may be sufficient to warn our readers against two misconceptions. The Club des Cent will probably be suspected of being an exclusive and aristocratic institution. For motorists who both have covered forty thousand miles and are adepts in the culinary art are not likely to be recruited from the ranks of the democracy. Yet the new Club is entirely democratic in sympathy and tendency. For it combats the expensive hotel and patronises the cheap little inn. With equal injustice would the Club des Cent be suspected of unmitigated materialism. As a matter of fact, it is imbued with high ideals. How high those ideals are will appear from the following precepts, which it has adopted as its guiding principles. They are well worthy of the closest attention of our female readers who want to become adepts in the culinary art.

THE NINETEEN PRECEPTS OF THE FRENCH GOURMET.

1. The "Club des Cent" especially favours the good small hotels, the good little inns kept by the "patron."
2. We only recommend costly hotels on condition that their luxury is not paid at the expense of sane cooking.

We feed on beef-steaks and not on Louis XV. arm-chairs.

3. The hotel which is only clean, but where one does not eat to perfection, is nothing but a clean hole (n'est qu'une boîte propre).

4. In a good hotel the guest is personally welcomed by the "patron."

5. Le Club des Cent insists on the good old French cooking.

6. Good French cooking is always made with fresh ingredients, fresh vegetables, fresh eggs, fresh butter, fresh milk.

7. One recognises a good hotel from the quality of the coffee it supplies. No chicory! Coffee is made slowly, with boiling water. Any coffee prepared beforehand is necessarily bad coffee.

8. No hotel keeper who has not got some speciality, some receipt in which he excels, is worthy of the support of the Club des Cent.

9. The hotel keeper who does not preserve somewhere in his cellar some fine old bottles for the consumption of the connoisseur is only a vile tradesman.

10. French cooking ignores soups bought in bottles or in tins at the grocer's.

11. Down with gelatine! Down with the glue made of fish bones! Any gelatine concoction is a nest of microbes.

12. No chemical extracts!

13. No sauces fabricated in factories!

14. For the preparation of meals the "Club des Cent" does not admit of any other factory but the kitchen (n'admet pas d'autre usine que la cuisine).

15. Cooking on a large scale is generally the enemy of good cooking.

16. Down with cookery schools invented in those countries where one does not know how to eat! Cooking cannot be learned in a school. One only learns to cook by having a taste for delicate food, and by experience acquired in a good French kitchen.

17. A cook is not an artisan, but an artist. The cook who considers himself merely an artisan ought to change his trade. He is not worthy of his noble profession.

18. Choose the personnel of your kitchen in your own country. The Club des Cent refuses to patronise inn-keepers who employ people with queer accents. Let the Swiss stay in Switzerland, the Italians in Italy, and the Frenchmen in France.

WIT AND WISDOM OF HENRY JAMES

"To be young and elastic, and yet old enough and wise enough to discriminate and reflect, and to come to Italy for the first time—that's one of the greatest pleasures life has to offer us."

"She's like a revolving lighthouse: pitch darkness alternating with a dazzling brilliancy."

"The winter was not over, but the spring had begun, and the smoky London air allowed the baffled citizens, by way of a change, to see through it. The town could refresh its recollections of the sky, and the sky could ascertain the geographical position of the town. The essential dimness of the low perspectives had by no means disappeared, but it had loosened its folds; it lingered as a blur of mist, interwoven with pretty sun tints and faint transparencies. There was warmth and there was light, and a view of the shutters of shops, and the church bells were ringing."

"There are not five people in the world who really care for me." "Really care? I am afraid you look too close. And then I think five good friends is a very large number. I think myself very well off with half a one. But if you are friendless, it's probably your own fault."

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO : THE ENTRANCE INTO MOSCOW BY COUNT DE SEGUR (Aide-de-Camp to Napoleon)

I.

THAT very day (September 14th, 1812) Napoleon, being at length persuaded that Kutusoff had not thrown himself on his right flank, rejoined his advance guard. He mounted his horse a few leagues from Moscow. He marched slowly and cautiously, sending scouts before him to examine the woods and the ravines, and to ascend all the eminences to look out for the enemy's army. A battle was expected; the ground was favourable; works had been begun, but had all been abandoned, and we experienced not the slightest resistance.

At length the last eminence only remained to be passed; it is contiguous to Moscow, which it commands. It is called the Hill of Salvation, because, on its summit, the inhabitants, at sight of their holy city, cross and prostrate themselves. Our scouts had soon gained the top of the hill. It was two o'clock. The sun caused this great city to glisten with a thousand colours. Struck with astonishment at the sight, they paused, exclaiming "Moscow! Moscow!" Everyone quickened their steps; the troops hurried on in disorder; and the whole army, clapping their hands, repeated with joy, "Moscow! Moscow!" just as mariners shout "Land! land!" at the conclusion of a long and toilsome voyage.

II.

At the sight of this gilded city, of this brilliant knot uniting Asia and Europe, of this magnificent emporium of the luxury, the manners, and the arts of the two fairest divisions of the globe, we stood still in proud contemplation. What a glorious day had now arrived! It would furnish the grandest, the most brilliant recollection of our whole lives. We felt that at this moment all our actions would engage the attention of the astonished universe; and that every one of our movements, however trivial, would be recorded by history.

On this immense and imposing theatre we marched, accompanied, as it were, by the acclamations of all nations; proud of exalting our grateful age above all other ages, we already beheld it great from our greatness, and irradiated by our glory.

At our return, already ardently wished for, with what almost reverent consideration, with what enthusiasm should we be received by our wives, our countrymen, and even by our parents! We should form, during the rest of our lives, a class of beings set apart, at whom people would only look with astonishment, to whom they would only listen with mingled curiosity and admiration! Crowds would throng about us wherever we passed; they would catch up our most unmeaning words. This miraculous conquest would surround us with a halo of glory; henceforward people would fancy that they breathed about us an air of prodigy and wonder.

III.

When these proud thoughts gave place to more moderate sentiments, we said to ourselves that this was the promised goal of our labours; that, at length, we should pause, since we could no longer be surpassed by ourselves, after a noble expedition, the worthy parallel to that of Egypt, and the successful rival of all the great and glorious wars of antiquity.

At that moment, dangers, sufferings, were all forgotten. Was it possible to purchase too dearly the proud felicity of being able to say, during the remainder of life, "I was one of the army of Moscow"? Well, comrades, even now, amidst our abasement, and though it dates from that fatal city, is not this reflection of a noble exultation sufficiently powerful to console us, and to make us proudly hold up our heads, bowed down by misfortune?

IV.

Napoleon himself hastened up. He paused in transport; an exclamation of joy escaped his lips. Ever since the great battle the discontented marshals had shunned him; but, at the sight of captive Moscow, at the news of the arrival of a flag of truce, struck with so important a result and intoxicated with all the enthusiasm of glory, they forgot their grievances. They pressed around the Emperor, paying homage to his good fortune, and already tempted to attribute to his genius the little pains he had taken on the 7th to complete his victory.

But in Napoleon first emotions were of short duration. He had too much to think of to indulge his sensations for any length of time. His first exclamation was: "There at last is that famous city!" and the second, "It was high time!"

V.

His eyes, fixed on that capital, already expressed nothing but impatience; in it he beheld in imagination the whole Russian empire. Its walls enclosed all his hopes—peace, the expenses of the war, immortal glory; his eager looks, therefore, watched all its outlets. When will its gates at length open? When shall he see that deputation come forth which will place its wealth, its population, its senate, and the heads of the Russian nobility at our disposal? Henceforth that enterprise in which he had so rashly engaged, brought to a successful termination by dint of boldness, will pass for the result of a high combination; his imprudence for greatness; henceforth his victory at the Moskwa, incomplete as it was, will be deemed his greatest achievement. Thus all that might have turned to his ruin will contribute to his glory; that day would begin to decide whether he was the greatest man in the world, or the most rash; in short, whether he had raised himself an altar or dug himself a grave.

VI.

Anxiety, however, soon began to take possession of his mind. On his left and right, he already beheld Prince Eugene and Poniatowski approaching the hostile city; Murat, with his scouts, had already reached the entrance of the suburbs. And yet no deputation appeared: an officer, sent by Miloradowitch, merely came to declare that his general would set fire to the city if his rear was not allowed time to evacuate it.

Napoleon granted every demand. The first troops of the two armies were, for a short time, intermingled; Murat was recognised by the Cossacks, who, being familiar as all nomadic tribes, and as expressive as the people of the south, thronged around him: then, by their gestures and exclamations, they extolled his valour and intoxicated him with their admiration. The King took the watches of his officers and distributed them among these barbarous warriors. One of them called him his het man.

Murat was for a moment tempted to believe that in these officers he would find a new Mazeppa, or that he himself would become one: he imagined that he had gained them over. This momentary armistice, under the anxious circumstances, sustained the hopes of Napoleon, such need had he to delude himself. He was thus put off for two hours.

Meanwhile the day was declining, and Moscow continued dull, silent, and, as it were, inanimate. The anxiety of the Emperor increased; the impatience of the soldiers became more difficult to repress. Some officers ventured within the walls of the city. "Moscow is deserted!"

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO (continued)

VII.

At this intelligence, which he angrily refused to credit, Napoleon descended the Hill of Salvation, and approached the Moskwa and the Dorogomilow Gate. He paused once more, but in vain, at the entry of that barrier. Murat urged him. "Well!" replied he, "enter, then, since they wish it!" He recommended the strictest discipline; he still indulged hopes. "Perhaps these inhabitants do not even know how to surrender: for here everything is new, they to us and we to them."

Reports now began to succeed each other; they all agreed. Some Frenchmen, inhabitants of Moscow, ventured to quit the hiding-place which for some days had concealed them from the fury of the populace, and confirmed the fatal tidings. The Emperor called Daru. "Moscow deserted!" exclaimed he; "what an improbable story! We must know the truth of it. Go and bring me the boyars." He imagined that those men, stiff with pride, or paralysed with terror, were fixed motionless in their houses; and he, who had hitherto been always met by the submission of the vanquished, provoked their confidence and anticipated their prayers.

VIII.

How, indeed, was it possible for him to persuade himself that so many magnificent palaces, so many splendid establishments, were forsaken by their owners, like the paltry hamlets through which he had passed. Daru's mission, however, was fruitless. Not a Muscovite was to be seen, not the slightest noise issued from this immense and populous city; its three hundred thousand inhabitants seemed to be struck dumb and motionless by enchantment; it was the silence of the desert!

But such was the incredulity of Napoleon that he was not yet convinced, and waited for further information. At length an officer, determined to gratify him, or persuaded that whatever the Emperor willed must necessarily be accomplished, entered the city, seized five or six vagabonds, drove them before his horse to the Emperor, and imagined that he had brought him a deputation. From the first words they uttered Napoleon discovered that the persons before him were only indigent labourers.

It was not till then that he ceased to doubt the entire evacuation of Moscow, and lost all the hopes that he had built upon it. He shrugged his shoulders, and, with that contemptuous look with which he met everything that crossed his wishes, he exclaimed, "Ah! the Russians know not yet the effect which the taking of their capital will produce upon them!"

IX.

It was now an hour since Murat and the long, close column of his cavalry had entered Moscow; they penetrated into that gigantic body, as yet untouched but inanimate. Struck with profound astonishment at the sight of this complete solitude, they replied to the taciturnity of this modern Thebes by a silence equally solemn. These warriors listened, with a secret shuddering, to the steps of the horses resounding amid these deserted palaces. They were astonished to see and hear nothing but themselves amid such numerous habitations. No one thought of stopping or of plundering, either from prudence, or because great civilised nations are over-awed on finding themselves in an enemy's capital.

Meanwhile they were silently observing that mighty city, which would have been truly remarkable had they met with it in a flourishing and populous country, but which was still more astonishing in these deserts. It was like a rich and brilliant oasis. They had at first been struck by the sudden view of so many magnificent palaces; but they now perceived that they were intermingled with mean cottages, a circumstance which indicated the want of gradation between the classes and that luxury was not generated there, as in other countries, by industry, but preceded it; whereas, in the natural order, luxury follows after commerce.

X.

Here more especially prevailed inequality—that bane of human society which produces pride in some, debasement in others, corruption in all. And yet such a generous abandonment of everything demonstrated that this excessive luxury, as yet, had not rendered these nobles effeminate.

Amid these reflections, which were favoured by a slow pace, the report of firearms was all at once heard. The column halted! Its last horses still covered the fields; its centre was in one of the longest streets of the city; its head had reached the Kremlin. The gates of that citadel appeared to be closed. Feroocious cries issued from within it; men and women, of savage and disgusting aspect, appeared fully armed on its walls. In a state of inebriety, they uttered the most horrible imprecations. Murat sent them an amicable message, but to no purpose. It was found necessary to employ cannon to break open the gate.

XI.

We penetrated, partly without opposition, partly by force, among these wretches. One of them rushed close to the King, and endeavoured to kill one of his officers. It was thought sufficient to disarm him; but he again fell upon his victim, rolled him on the ground, and attempted to suffocate him; and even after his arms were seized and held, he still strove to tear him with his teeth. These were the only Muscovites who had awaited our coming, and who seemed to have been left behind as a savage and barbarous token of the national hatred.

It was easy to perceive, however, that there was no unison in this patriotic fury. Five hundred recruits, who had been forgotten in the Kremlin, beheld this scene without stirring. At the first summons they dispersed. Farther on, we overtook a convoy of provisions, the escort of which immediately threw down its arms. Several thousand stragglers and deserters from the enemy voluntarily remained in the power of our advanced guard. The latter left to the corps which followed, the task of picking them up; and these again to others, and so on: hence they remained at liberty in the midst of us, till, the conflagration and pillage of the city having reminded them of their duty, and rallied them all in one general feeling of antipathy, they went and rejoined Kutusoff.

XII.

Murat, who had been stopped but a few moments by the Kremlin, dispersed his crew, which he despised. Ardent and indefatigable as in Italy and Egypt, after a march of nine hundred leagues and sixty battles fought to reach Moscow, he traversed that proud city without deigning to halt in it, and, pursuing the Russian rear-guard, he boldly, and without hesitation, took the road for Vladimir and Asia.

Several thousand Cossacks, with four pieces of cannon, were retreating in that direction. The armistice was at an end. Murat, tired of this peace of half a day, immediately ordered it to be broken by a discharge of carbines. But our cavalry considered the war as finished; Moscow appeared to them to be its end, and the advanced posts of the two empires were unwilling to renew hostilities. A fresh order arrived, and the same hesitation prevailed. At length Murat, irritated at this disobedience, gave his orders in person; and the firing with which he seemed to threaten Asia, but which was not destined to cease till he reached the banks of the Seine, was renewed.

FATHER GAUCHER'S ELIXIR * * * * BY ALPHONSE DAUDET

[INTRODUCTORY NOTE.—It is one of the many ironies in the history of the Roman Catholic Church that for generations some of the most ascetic in the most rigorous communities, the Carthusians, and the Benedictines, and the Trappists, have tried to increase the revenue of their order by distilling strong alcoholic beverages. The Benedictine, the Trappist, and Carthusian liqueurs are known to the epicure all over the world. In a Northern Protestant and intemperate country, such a contradiction seems little short of a public scandal. In the more temperate Southern countries the monopoly of the manufacture of liqueurs does not cause offence, and only raises the nice point of casuistry. One of the great story-tellers of France has dramatised this point of casuistry in one of the most exquisite stories in world literature, a masterpiece of general humour and malicious wit.]

* * * * *

I.

"DRINK this, neighbour, and tell me what you think of it." And, drop by drop, with the scrupulous care of a lapidary counting pearls, the curé of Graveson poured out a thimbleful of a golden-green liqueur, warm, glittering, exquisite . . . like a ray of sunshine within.

"It is Father Gaucher's elixir, the joy and the health-giver of our Provence," said the good man with triumph. "It is made at the convent of the Prémontrés, two leagues from your mill. Isn't it worth all the Chartreuse in the world? If only you knew the story of that liqueur, it is amusing! . . . Listen! . . ."

Then in that tranquil presbytery dining-room, with its pretty white curtains starched like surplices, and its little pictures of the stations of the Cross, the good curé began his tale, a tale suggestive of Erasmus or d'Assoucy—innocently sceptical and irreverent.

II.

Twenty years ago the Prémontrés, or rather the White Friars, as we of Provence call them, had sunk into great poverty. You would have been shocked to see their house at that time. The great wall and the Pacôme tower were going to pieces. The pillars round the grass-grown cloister were cracking, the stone saints crumbled in their niches, there was not a window intact, not a door on its hinges. The wind from the Rhone blew through the courtyards and chapels as wildly as at Camargue, putting out the candles, breaking the leaden casements, blowing the holy water out of the vessels. But the saddest part of all was the convent belfry, as quiet as an empty dove-cot, and the poor fathers, with no money to buy a new bell, obliged to ring Matins with little almond-wood castanets.

Poor White Friars! I can see them still at the procession of the Corpus Christi, trooping sadly past in their patched hoods, pale, thin, nourished on "citres" and water-melons, and behind them the Very Rev. Abbot, hanging his head, ashamed that his tarnished crozier and his worm-eaten white woollen mitre should be seen by the light of day. The ladies of the sisterhood wept at the sight, and the burly banner-bearers tittered at the monks and whispered one to another: "Starlings go hungry when they fly in flocks!"

The fact is that the poor White Friars themselves had begun to wonder if it would not be well each man to take flight across the world and seek his own provender.

Well, one day, when this momentous question was being discussed in the chapter, it was announced that Brother Gaucher requested to be heard in the council.

III.

This Brother Gaucher, you must know, was the cowherd of the monastery; that is to say, his days were spent waddling through the cloisters from courtyard to courtyard, behind two emaciated cows which browsed on the grass that grew in the cracks of the pavement. An old witch of Baux, known as Tante Begon, had looked after him till he was twelve years old, then the monks had taken him in. The poor cowherd had never been able to learn anything except to drive his cows and to say his Paternoster, and even that he said in Provençal, for he was hard of head, and his wits were about as sharp as the edge of a leaden dagger. A fervent Christian withal, at peace in his hair-shirt, and when he scourged himself it was with a grand conviction . . . and arms!

As he entered the chapter house, bowing to the Assembly, one leg awkwardly stuck out behind, Prior, canons, treasurer, everyone began to laugh. The sight of his simple face, with its grizzled goat's-beard, was ever mirth-provoking.

IV.

"Reverend fathers," he said, guilelessly, "it is a true saying that empty tankards ring the best—by dint of burrowing in my hollow brain, I believe I have found the means to get us all out of this fix: this is how. You know Tante Begon, that good woman who looked after me when I was little . . . (God keep her soul, the old wretch; she sang uncommonly naughty songs after drink.) I must tell you then, reverend fathers, that Tante Begon in her lifetime knew the herbs of the mountain as well, if not better, than an old Corsican blackbird. Even so, towards the end of her days she had compounded an elixir by mixing five or six simples that we used to pick together on the Alpilles. That is a long time ago; still, I believe, with the help of St. Augustine and the permission of our father the Abbot, that I might be able, by much search, to find out once more the ingredients of this mysterious elixir. Then we would have but to bottle it and sell it rather dear, and little by little the community would become as rich as our brothers of La Trappe and the Grande Chartreuse."

He was not allowed to finish. The Prior had risen and flung his arms round his neck. The canons were pressing his hands. The treasurer, more moved than all the others, was respectfully kissing the frayed edge of his robe. Thereupon they all returned to their places to deliberate, and the chapter straightway decided that the cows should be put in charge of Brother Trasibule, so that Brother Gaucher might devote himself entirely to the concoction of his elixir.

V.

How the good brother managed to discover Tante Begon's recipe, by means of what efforts, what sleepless nights, history does not relate. We do know that before six months had elapsed the White Friars' elixir was already very popular. In all the neighbourhood, in all the country round Arles, not a house, not a farm, but had at the back of its storeroom, between the bottles of "vin cuit" and jars of "olives à la picholine," a little brown earthenware pot, sealed with the arms of Provence, with a monk in ecstasy, on a silver label. Thanks to the vogue of this liqueur, the house of the Prémontrés became rapidly rich, the Pacôme tower was rebuilt, the Prior had a new mitre, the church pretty stained-glass windows, and in the delicate face-work of the belfry a whole company of big and little bells started pealing and chiming in grand style one Easter morning.

FATHER GAUCHER'S ELIXIR

As to Brother Gaucher, the poor brother whose simplicity used to amuse the chapter so much, he was no more heard of in the convent. No, only the Rev. Father Gaucher was known, a man of brains and great knowledge, who took no part in the petty and numerous duties of the convent, but shut himself up all day in the distilleries, while thirty monks ranged the hillsides in search of sweet-smelling herbs. This distillery, which no one, not even the Prior, had the right to enter, was an old abandoned chapel at the far end of the canons' garden. The good fathers, in their simplicity, imagined it something great and mysterious, and if a bold and inquisitive novice, pulling himself up by the climbing plants, managed to look in at the rose-window over the door, he hurried down again pretty quick, scared at the sight of Father Gaucher, with his necromancer-like beard, bending over his furnace, measure in hand, surrounded by gigantic alembics, crystal tubes, and retorts of pink stoneware, a weird collection, gleaming as if bewitched in the red glow of the windows.

VI.

At twilight, when the last Angelus rang, the door of this place of mystery would be discreetly opened, and the reverend father betake himself to church for vespers. You should have seen his reception; when he crossed the monastery, the brothers stood back to let him pass. "Sh! he has the secret!" they would say. The treasurer would follow and talk with him, his head respectfully bent. Through this atmosphere of adulation the father would pass, mopping his brow, his wide-brimmed three-cornered hat set like a halo on the back of his head, looking round him with an air of satisfaction at the great courts planted with orange trees, at the blue roofs, on which twirled the new weather-cocks, and through the sparkling white cloisters, between the flowered colonnades, the quiet-faced brethren going past two by two in the new cassocks.

"They owe all this to me!" the father would think to himself, and swell with pride.

VII.

The poor man was well punished, as you shall see for yourself. Would you believe it! one day during vespers he arrived in an extraordinary state of agitation, red, out of breath, his hood on one side, and so upset that he wetted his sleeve right up to the elbow when taking the holy water. At first they thought his emotion was caused by his late arrival; but when he was seen to make deep genuflections to the organ and the tribunes, instead of to the high-altar, then dash across the church like a whirlwind, wander for five minutes in the choir before finding his stall, and when once seated bow left and right, with a blissful stare, a murmur ran through the church. "What is wrong with our Father Gaucher? What is wrong with Father Gaucher?" was whispered from breviary to breviary. Twice the Prior, annoyed, knocked on the flags to demand silence. At the back of the choir the psalms continued as before, but the responses were meagre.

All at once, in the very middle of the Ave Verum, our Father Gaucher leans back in his stall, and with a resounding voice intones:—

"In Paris there lives a white friar,
Patatin, patatan, tarabin, taraban."

General consternation! Everyone rose. "Remove him; he is possessed!" they cry. The canons cross themselves. My lord Abbot's crosier taps excitedly. But Brother Gaucher sees nothing, hears nothing, and it takes two lusty monks to drag him out, struggling like one demented, by the little door of the choir, still vigorously shouting his patatin and tarabin.

Next morning, at dawn, the wretched man was on his knees confessing his fault in the Prior's oratory, the tears streaming down his face. "It was the elixir, my lord Abbot, the elixir which took me by surprise," said he, striking his breast.

(continued)

VIII.

Seeing him so sorry and repentant, the good Prior was moved himself. "Come, come, Father Gaucher, calm yourself; all this will evaporate like the dew in the morning sun. . . . After all, the scandal is not as great as you imagine; the song was rather, h'm . . . rather . . . We must just hope the novices did not hear it. Now, tell me exactly how it happened; you were trying the elixir, were you not? Your hand was just a trifle heavy. . . . Yes, yes, I quite understand. . . . Like Brother Schwartz, who invented gunpowder, you have fallen a victim to your own invention. . . . But tell me, my good friend, is it quite necessary that you should try this terrible elixir on yourself?"

"Yes, unfortunately, my lord. The test-tube gives me the strength of the alcohol quite well; but for the finishing touch, for the rich mellow flavour, I can only trust my tongue."

"Ah! very good! . . . But one moment more—when you taste the elixir, thus, as a duty, do you take pleasure in it?"

"Alas! my lord, yes," replied the unfortunate father, going scarlet. "For two nights now I have thought the flavour, the aroma . . . it is the devil that is playing this wicked trick on me, that is certain. But I have quite decided, from now onwards, I shall only use the test-tube. No matter if the liqueur is not so delicate, nor so pearly limpid . . ."

"Have a care!" interrupted the Prior anxiously. "We must not run the risk of displeasing our clients. All you have to do, now that you are warned, is to be on the watch. Let me see, how much do you need to test it? Fifteen or twenty drops? Say twenty drops. The devil must be very cunning if he catches you out with twenty drops. . . . Furthermore, to prevent any possible accident, I exempt you from now onwards from attending church. You shall say vespers in the distillery. Now go in peace, my reverend brother; . . . but remember, count your drops!"

Alas! count as he would, the devil had hold of him, and would not let him go.

The distillery heard some singular services.

During the day all went well. The father was calm. He prepared his furnaces, his alembics, sorted his herbs: the herbs of Provence, delicate grey, lacelike, sun-scorched and perfumed. But in the evening, when the simples were infused and the elixir was cooling in the great copper basins, then began the martyrdom of the unhappy man. "Seventeen, eighteen, nineteen . . . twenty!"—drop by drop they would fall from his blow-pipe into the silver-gilt goblet. The poor father would toss off these twenty drops almost without pleasure. But how he longed for the twenty-first! Then, to escape from temptation, he would fling himself on his knees right at the other end of the laboratory, and bury himself in his Paternosters. But a gentle aromatic vapour would rise from the warm liquid and come wandering around him, and, willy-nilly, draw him back to his cauldrons. The liqueur was of a beautiful golden-green colour. Bending over it with his nostrils distended, the father would stir it gently with his blow-pipe, and in each sparkling bubble, floating on an emerald sea, he seemed to see Tante Begon's maliciously twinkling eyes laughing at him. "Get along, one more drop." And drop by drop the unfortunate man would fill his goblet to the brim. Then, overcome, he would sink into a large armchair, half close his eyes, and abandon himself to the delights of his crime, murmuring to himself with delicious remorse, "I am damning myself, I am damning myself." . . . The worst of it was that at the bottom

(Continued on page 52.)

"THE EVOLUTION OF 'FOURACRES.'"

A STORY of an old-world cottage in Kent; a story of its renovation in the right manner; a story of the little difficulties of two ordinary people who furnished it as a cottage home, and satisfied respectively an artist and a Philistine. This little book, entitled "The Evolution of 'Fouracres,'" is illustrated throughout with a dozen or more coloured drawings really well done. The whole book is stimulating and interesting. It will be sent free to any reader of Everyman who writes for it to

HEAL & SON TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, W.

DRYAD
CANE FURNITURE

SOUND IN CONSTRUCTION
LUXURIOUS IN COMFORT ARTISTIC IN DESIGN

QUITE DIFFERENT FROM ANY OTHER MAKE
SEE THAT THE NAME 'DRYAD' IS ON THE CHAIR.

BOOK OF DESIGNS POST FREE
X DEPT. DRYAD WORKS, LEICESTER

WARM YOUR ROOM NOT THE CHIMNEY

Everyone knows, to their cost, the tremendous amount of coal consumed by the ordinary bar grate, and how little heat is given out in proportion. The reason is that, owing to the old-fashioned construction of the bar grate, the heat is wasted in the chimney instead of warming your room. The "HUE" Fire is barless, will burn for hours without attention, and is guaranteed to give out more heat WITH ABOUT HALF THE COAL CONSUMPTION. It can be adapted to any existing stove without removing the mantelpiece, and your local Decorator can supply and fix the "HUE" Fire from 15/- upwards.

Insist upon having a "HUE."

Send a postcard to-day for our illustrated descriptive list, giving details and prices, to

YOUNG & MARTEN, Ltd.,
(Dept. E), Stratford, London, E.

FATHER GAUCHER'S ELIXIR

of this diabolical elixir he found, by some witchcraft, all Tante Begon's naughty little songs—"Three little gossips going to have a feast," or "Master Andrew's little shepherdess went off to the wood alone," and always the famous "Pères blancs, patatin, patatan!"

IX.

Imagine his feelings when, the following morning, the monks of the neighbouring cells would say, "Ho! ho! Father Gaucher, you were a trifle merry yesterday when you were going to bed!"

Then followed tears, despair, fasting, the hair-shirt, flagellations. But nothing availed against this demon of the elixir. Every evening, at the same hour, he was once more possessed.

Meanwhile, orders were pouring in on the monastery in a blessed manner. They came from Nîmes, from Aix, from Avignon, from Marseilles. Day by day the convent took on the air of a little factory. There were packer brothers, labelling brothers, others for correspondence, others again for portage. Now and then there was a little less bell-ringing in the service of God, but I can answer for it that the poor of the countryside were as well cared for.

Well, then, one fine Sunday morning, while the treasurer was reading his report of the past year, and the good canons were listening with sparkling eyes and smiling lips, here comes Father Gaucher. He dashes into the midst of the council, crying: "I have done with it: I shall make no more: give me back my cows! . . ."

"What is wrong, Father Gaucher?" asks the Prior, who had his suspicions about the matter.

"What is wrong, my lord? . . . It is that I am busy preparing for myself a fine eternity of flames and pitchforks! It is that I drink! that I drink! like an out-cast!"

"But I told you to count your drops."

"Oh, yes, that is so, count my drops; it is goblets I must count now. . . . Yes, holy fathers, that is where I have come to. Three phials every evening. . . . That sort of thing cannot last. Get who you will to make your elixir. May the fires of God burn me if I take any further part in it!"

Not a smile in the chapter now.

"But, miserable man, you will ruin us!" cried the treasurer, brandishing his huge ledger.

"Do you prefer that I should damn myself?"

At this moment the Prior rose. "Reverend fathers," said he, stretching out his fine white hand with the pastoral ring gleaming, "all this can be arranged. . . . It is in the evening, is it not, my son, that the demon tempts you?"

"Yes, my lord Prior, regularly every evening; and now, when night falls, I am, saving your presence, taken with a sweat like Capitou's donkey when he saw the pack-saddle coming."

"Well, take courage; from now onwards, every evening, during vespers, we shall recite the orison of Saint Augustine, to which plenary indulgence is attached. With that, whatever happens, you are safe; it is absolution during the sin."

"Oh! very well, then, thank you, my lord Prior." And, without question, the father returned to his alembics, as happy as a lark.

X.

So it was, from that time onward, at the end of complines every evening, the officiating priest never failed to say: "Let us pray for our poor Father Gaucher, who is sacrificing his soul in the interests of the community. . . . Oremus Domine." Then, while all the white hoods were bowed, and in the shadow of the nave the orison ran trembling across them, like a gentle breeze over snow, at the far end of the convent, behind the flaming windows of the distillery, Father Gaucher's ear-splitting song might be heard:—

(continued)

"In Paris there lives a white friar,
Patatin, patatan, tarabin, taraban.
In Paris there lives a white friar,
Who causes nuns to dance,
Trin, trin, trin, in a garden,
Who causes nuns. . . ."

* * * * *
Here the good curé stopped, horrified. . . . "Heaven help us! if my parishioners should hear me! . . ."

—Translated by A. B. Chalmers.

MY MOTHER*

MY beautiful mother is dead. Nothing is left of her. She vanished from the world long ago.

When I was a child. I shall never forget what I suffered on the nights that she went to the theatre or was having her hair dressed for a ball. I nearly died of despair. Her driving away from the house of an evening hurt me unspeakably. The Bonne used to say, "There, now; aren't you proud of your lovely mamma?" For no one understood my anguish in the least. Was it not awful that she should go off into a world that I knew nothing about, a world that was not our world, and that she should like to go, even go with joy? It made me desperately unhappy. After she was gone, the room with the wax candles, in which she had dressed, looked to me like a scene of disaster and destruction, wrought by some devastating army. There was the glass before which she had done her hair, the basin in which she had washed her soft, white hands; slippers and dressing-gown lay on the floor. Everything was in confusion, as if it didn't matter at all so long as mamma was not too late for her party. No one had time or understanding enough to concern themselves about my wretchedness; not the kind old cook, or the pretty lady's maid, or the Bonne. They sat down together and gossiped and were in more lively spirits than usual. I had lost my dearest beloved; but they had got an evening "off."

A few days ago I went and stood in front of the house in the Franzensbrücken street where I was born. I looked up at the windows of the second floor. They were dark. It was at this quiet hour that my beautiful mother had suffered behind those dark windows exquisite pain to bring me into the world. I fancied that I could hear my own first whimper, and see my mother half-dead from the exhaustion of having accomplished her supreme duty to life. Anyhow, I had arrived. The fatality of my existence could not be shunted backwards. I was doomed to blunder ahead in future by endless crooked paths. I screamed, and probably the midwife said, "Healthy lungs."

Now here I stand, looking up at those windows at exactly the same hour of the night, and I hear my mother's sighs. I am growing bald and prematurely aged at forty-eight. In spite of magnificent gifts I have done nothing. . . . My beautiful mother is dead. . . . She vanished from the world long ago. She gave me a sound body, intelligence, and, what's more, a soul. So she performed her duties of motherhood in an ideal fashion. May she rest in peace!

PETER ALTENBERG.

* The above sketch is taken from a slender volume of charming Viennese vignettes by Peter Altenberg, an author probably little known in this country, though on the Continent he has acquired fame as a master of brevity. Peter Altenberg's motto is: "Mon verre, n'est pas grand, mais je bois dans mon verre."

THE REAL NEWMAN* A FRENCH ESTIMATE

I.

IN studying the spiritual crisis which made Newman, at the age of forty-four, leave the Anglican and enter the Roman Church, one is struck by the narrowness of his outlook. For him the whole question turned on which of the two Churches was apostolic in its episcopal succession and doctrine. The previous question as to whether Jesus of Nazareth really commanded His apostles to set up an ecclesiastical organisation at all, did not trouble him. The sceptics of the eighteenth century had stated the problem. It had been studied in Germany, in daring "speculations on the Bible or on theology"—speculations which Hugh Rose, one of Newman's dearest masters, had denounced. Newman did not trouble about them. He paid no attention to these "liberal" speculations, just as at the age of thirty-one he refused to look at the French flag, just as he refused to see the city of Paris when he had to pass through it, just as he deliberately shut his eyes to the beauty of Italy. The question for him lay between a definite and logical sacerdotalism, and an atheism which was alien to his temperament. "There is no alternative between Catholicism and Infidelity to the clear thinker," he wrote to his friend Henry Wilberforce in 1849. (Ward I., p. 238.)

As an Anglican priest he was very devout, but his devotion became even greater when he entered the Roman Church. He accepted the whole Catholic mythology, even the miracle of the Santa Casa de Lorette. He was not free from formal superstition, as is shown by the special significance he attached to the number seven.

II.

"He limited his Irish Rectorship to seven years: he believed seven years to be the normal term of his intimate friendships. A letter of 1871 to his Mother Prioress of the Dominicans shows him half thinking that the mystic number enters into the computation of the elect in each generation." (Tome II., p. 343.)

The emotional side of his nature, which was apparent even in childhood, became so marked as he grew older that, in order to avoid seeming exaggeration, it seems best to quote the actual words of his biographer:

"Albany Christie walked with him from Oxford to Littlemore when the great separation of 1845 was approaching; Newman never spoke a word all the way, and Christie's hand when they arrived was wet with Newman's tears. When he made his confession in Littlemore Chapel his exhaustion was such that he could not walk without help. When he went to Rome to set right the differences with his brethren of London which tried him so deeply, he walked barefoot from the halting stage of the diligence all the way to St. Peter's Basilica. When Ambrose St. John died, Newman threw himself on the bed by the corpse and spent the night there." (Ward I., p. 21.) After learning the bad news about his journal The Rambler, in 1858, Acton wrote to one of his friends: "He was quite miserable when I told him the news, and moaned for a long time, rocking himself backwards and forwards over the fire like an old woman with a toothache." (Ward I., p. 481.)

III.

Old age did not alter this temperament. In a letter which he wrote at the age of eighty-two, Newman speaks of his "morbidly sensitive skin." (Ward II., p. 522.) "Morbid" is exactly the right word. Those who are shocked, and who would prefer a politer term, remembering that he played the violin extremely well, may call it an acute artistic sensibility.

* "Life of Cardinal Newman." By Wilfrid Ward. (2 vols.) Longmans. 36s. net.

"When Canon McNeile, the Liverpool anti-Popery speaker, challenged him to a public dispute, Newman replied that he was no public speaker, but that he was quite ready for an encounter if Mr. McNeile would open the meeting by making a speech, and he himself might respond with a tune on the violin. The public would then be able to judge which was the better man." (Ward II., p. 349.)

This answer shows the real Newman. Whether he accepts a theological challenge, or whether he expounds didactically his own ideas, he does not speak really as a thinker or a scholar, but as an artist. It is always "a tune on the violin." His inherent melancholy took pleasure in language full of sentiment and emotion. Let the reader read over again the impressive ending to his "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine."

IV.

"Such," he wrote, "were the thoughts concerning 'The Blessed Vision of Peace' of one whose long-continued petition had been that the Most Merciful would not despise the work of His own hands, nor leave him to himself; while yet his eyes were dim, and his breast laden, and he could but employ Reason in things of Faith. And, now, dear reader, time is short, eternity is long. Put not from you what you have here found; regard it not as mere matter of present controversy; set not but resolved to refute it, and looking about for the best way of doing so; seduce not yourself with the imagination that it comes of disappointment, or disgust, or restlessness, or wounded feeling, or undue sensibility, or other weakness. Wrap not yourself round in the associations of years past, nor determine that to be truth which you wish to be so, nor make an idol of cherished anticipations. Time is short, eternity is long. 'Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, secundum verbum tuum in pace, quia viderant oculi mei salutare tuum.'"

When one considers that such is the conclusion of a book which claims to be history, a book which is lamentably poor from the point of view of scholarship, can one see in it anything more than a "tune on the violin"?

V.

The Roman Church could not fail to bring this magic-worker to the fore; he was to make many converts for her. But Newman was too restless to be as successful in such a sphere of work as many of his contemporaries, such as Cardinal Wiseman, Frederick William Faber, and Edward Manning. Moreover, he did not preach well. The bishops thought that they might utilise him as Rector of a University, purporting to be Catholic, which they were going to set up in Dublin in 1891.

A Catholic University is a contradiction in terms. A scientific conception of the world, the result of a synthesis of all the sciences, and a traditional theology must necessarily conflict in such an institution till the one has overthrown the other. Then, according to the result, the institution will either be a university, Catholic only in name, or it will become a higher grade school, scientific only in name, and purely denominational. The art with which Newman played his "tunes on the violin"; could not alter the nature of things. After seven years of difficulties he sent in his resignation. Subsequently he tried, in a Catholic Review, to reconcile orthodoxy and science, the past and the future, to satisfy, at the same time progressive and Conservative Catholics. This was a still more hopeless task; and he had to give up his position as Editor.

TRUTH AND FICTION AND SIR A. CONAN DOYLE'S "REFUGEES."

It might have been better if Sir Arthur Conan Doyle had not republished a cheap edition of the "Refugees." Sir Arthur has a great reputation to lose, and the "Refugees" can add nothing to that reputation. In this historical novel on the expulsion of the Huguenots and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Sir Arthur has not shown that acute sense of reality and that careful attention to fact which have established the fame of "Sherlock Holmes." On the contrary, he has taken unpardonable liberties with history, and indulged in anachronisms which even the most unbridled licence of poetry could not justify. An English novelist writing on French history may presume a great deal on the ignorance of his readers, but treating of a period which is so near to us and so familiar, Sir Arthur has really presumed too much. I do not know of another novel where history is so grossly distorted and where chronology is so grotesquely trifled with.

In the year of grace 1685, when the events narrated in the "Refugees" unfold themselves, the Duke of Saint Simon could not have aired his views on Versailles politics, as the great Mémoire writer was only a little boy of ten. On the other hand, Corneille could not have moved in Court circles, for he had died in the previous year, a broken old man of eighty, and his last years were passed in poverty and illness and oblivion. Moreover, every French "schoolboy"—I really do mean every French schoolboy, not Macaulay's schoolboy—might have told Sir Arthur that the fatal blunder which brought down the wrath of Louis XIV. was committed, not by Corneille, but by his rival, Racine.

As Sir Arthur confuses Racine and Corneille (what would we think of an English writer who would write a novel on the age of Shakespeare and who could confuse Shakespeare and Milton?), he as hopelessly mixes up Fenelon, Bossuet, and Massillon. Courtiers could not have discussed in 1685 the comparative merits of Massillon and Bourdaloue, for Massillon was still an unknown young cleric, and his success as a Court preacher was only achieved about a quarter of a century later. Sir Arthur is guilty of the same error with regard to Fenelon. Fenelon has not yet appeared at Court. Nor is it Fenelon, but Bossuet, who had leanings to Jansenism. For the future Archbishop of Cambrai from the very beginning was a most bitter opponent of the Jansenists, and his heresy of quietism has absolutely nothing to do with the heresy of the grand Arnauld.

The character sketch which Sir Arthur gives us of Louis XIV. very much resembles a caricature. Sir Arthur has learned from the "Mémoires" of Saint Simon that Louis was very ignorant, and I dare say that the illustration he gives is not improbable. The great King is quite as likely to have confused Darius and Alexander as the novelist himself has confused Corneille and Racine, and the Sovereign was more excusable than the writer. But it is most unlikely that the "Roi-Soleil" should have condescended to a conversation with Corneille on such a slippery subject, even if Corneille had been still alive.

With regard to Mme. de Maintenon, Sir Arthur has been kept straight by the admirable Essay of Doellinger, which, fortunately for the novelist, is not quite as stiff reading as the twenty volumes of Saint Simon. But here, again, how little does the author seem to have understood his heroine, and how ludicrous and psychologically impossible is the love scene on page 88! And here, again, he might have remembered that in 1685 Louis was forty-seven, while Mme. de Maintenon was fifty. Sir Arthur makes the proud Majesty of forty-seven speak to the stately widow of fifty even as a love-sick swain of twenty might speak to a girl of eighteen.

He makes Louis ask in a sentimental outburst whether, forsooth, he, the King, was the widow's first love. Even Sir Arthur cannot fail to see that for Louis XIV. and Mme. de Maintenon the age of passion had passed, and that what drew Louis XIV. to Mme. de Maintenon, and what kept the once so fickle lover faithful for thirty years to the widow of Scarron, was not passion, but the moral influence and spiritual magnetism of one of the most extraordinary women of French history.

I am only dwelling on a few of the more glaring errors. There are hundreds of them. Sir Arthur derives most of his information from Saint Simon, but he has read the immortal memoir writer with an absent-minded eye and to very little purpose. The expulsion of Arnauld took place in 1656, thirty years before the period of the "Refugees." Neither the insolence of Pascal nor the last comedy of Molière could have been the topic of the day, for the "Provinciales" of Pascal and the last comedy of Molière appeared an entire generation before. The faithful servant Nanon was not young, but old. It was not Fagon, but Daquin, who was first physician to his Majesty. Louis XIV. rose at eight in the morning, and not at eight-thirty. Louis XIV. did not wholly depend on his valets de chambre in the ritual of dress, and he performed it himself with becoming grace and majesty, as Saint Simon is careful to add. Louis XIV. was never lax in the discharge of his religious duties, and he only once missed attending Mass, and that only in the course of a strenuous campaign. It is Louvois, and not Colbert, who created the Invalides. The famous scene of the window of Trianon occurred at a later date, and was, according to Saint Simon, the futile cause of the European War of 1688. Louis XIV. threatened Louvois with pincers, not because he had sent a letter to Lord Sunderland, but because he had ordered the archiepiscopal and electoral city of Treves to be burnt. The Marquis de Montespan only died in 1700. Bontemps could not have called Mme. de Maintenon the "new one," for she had been at Court for ten years, and a favourite for five.

The writer who perpetrates such glaring mistakes in matters of detail is not likely to be more trustworthy with regard to the main subject and purpose of his book. According to Sir Arthur, the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was the result of a fiendish plot between Bossuet, the Jesuit Confessor, and Mme. de Maintenon. Mme. de Maintenon pledged herself to use her influence over Louis XIV. in order to secure the expulsion of her former co-religionists, and the Churchmen pledged themselves to use their influence to bring about her marriage with the King. So intimate is the connection between one event and the other that in the novel the Revocation takes place two days after the marriage, whereas, in point of fact, the marriage took place in December, 1684, and the Revocation was signed in October, 1685. No doubt the combination of Love and Fanaticism is very melodramatic. Unfortunately, it is absolutely untrue to history. The expulsion of the Huguenots would have occurred without Mme. de Maintenon, and without the Jesuit Father, La Chaise. So far from encouraging the marriage with Louis XIV., Father La Chaise resolutely opposed it.

No act of Louis XIV. has been more generally approved of by his contemporaries than the Revocation. It is not only a big-hearted woman like Mme. de Maintenon, or a gentle prelate like Fenelon, who gave their assent. Even the persecuted Jansenists demanded the expulsion of the Huguenots.

The whole French nation, therefore, are responsible for the deed, and it is grossly unfair, and it is only humouring popular ignorance and popular prejudice, to single out one woman and a bishop and a Jesuit, and make them the scapegoats of a national policy. And what is even more relevant to our general criticism, it is entirely to misrepresent that great historical tragedy, to narrate which was, after all, the main purpose of the author of the "Refugees."

GREATER MENTAL EFFICIENCY

NATION'S RESPONSE TO THE KING'S CALL.

Never before in the annals of the British Empire has there been so much attention paid to mental efficiency as there is to-day.

The kingly call of His Majesty King George to "Wake up, England!" and the wonderful work of the Pelman School have instituted a mental revolution.

Men and women in every corner of the British Empire are alive to the fact that mind-training has become a necessity to those who would achieve success in the professional, business, or social world.

This truth has been pressed home by the fact that 200,000 successful men and women have received the training of the world-famous Pelman School. In fact, the Pelman Training is sine qua non to success.

THE KING'S RECOGNITION OF THE SPLENDID WORK OF THE PELMAN SCHOOL.

His Majesty the King has shown his appreciation of the Pelman Training by accepting for presentation to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales the lessons which embody the complete Course of Mind Training of the Pelman School. Many of the over 200,000 of His Majesty's subjects in all parts of the world who have taken this wonderful mind-training have rapidly progressed to higher positions than they had ever dreamt possible.

It will be interesting to quote what the Editor of the popular weekly, Public Opinion, has to say of the value of the Pelman Mind and Memory Training Course.

The Editor of "Public Opinion" says:—

"In these days of stress and competition, the mind cannot be too highly trained. The man who avails himself of the Pelman Mind and Memory Training will improve his concentration, his quickness of thought, and his visualising power."

Over 500 of the world's leading Editors all speak of the wonderful value of the Pelman System of Mind Training. For instance, that enlightened educationalist, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll (as Editor of that highly influential organ, the British Weekly), characterises the Pelman Training as:

"The Training which school education can never give."

Again, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, the brilliant journalist M.P., has the greatest faith in the Pelman School of Mind Training, for, as Editor of T.P.'s Weekly, he says:

"The Pelman System is a perfect method of training and especially adapted for business men."

MENTAL EFFICIENCY MEANS MAXIMUM EARNING POWER.

The greater a man or woman's mental efficiency, the greater his success. The battle, in all walks of life to-day, is fought with brains, and victory comes to the brain whose powers are organised for success.

The Pelman Training does more to increase a man or woman's earning power than a whole life-time of the more or less haphazard teaching of the School of Experience. The amazing results of the Pelman Training, as evidenced by the thousands of letters received by the Pelman School from successful and grateful students, are proof of this.

WHY THERE IS MONEY IN THE PELMAN TRAINING.

Why is it that the Pelman Training lifts you right out of the rut of routine and steers you straight for a highly-paid post? This is the reason. The Pelman plan is a scientifically evolved course of mental training which takes every faculty of your mind, exercises it, develops it, nourishes it, strengthens it, and makes it able to do twice the work in less than half the time.

The Pelman System creates and develops to the full, powers of the mind which are, in many, non-existent. Such wonderful money-making qualities as concentration, keen perception, initiative, ideation, logical reasoning, self-confidence, rapid decision, and action are all developed under the Pelman plan.

FACULTIES YOU WILL DEVELOP.

Just read down the nine mental powers enumerated below and think how much greater your earning power would become if you were to develop them to perfection upon the Pelman plan. Under this plan you learn how

1. To think logically.
2. To reason soundly.
3. To act with decision.
4. To rise to responsibility.
5. To control others with tact and judgment.
6. To organise and reduce order out of chaos.
7. To originate new "ideas."
8. To master the most difficult subjects.
9. To remember everything you desire (faces, facts, figures, appointments, dates, plans, references, prices, and a hundred and one other things which are now of vital necessity to every man or woman who wishes to "get on").

WHAT A SEARCH THROUGH THE PELMAN SCHOOL REGISTER WOULD SHOW YOU.

If you looked through the pages of the Pelman School Register you would be astonished. A great cosmopolitan body, nearly a quarter of a million strong, representing every occupation under the sun, have been trained for success upon the Pelman plan. Students are writing up to the Pelman School daily saying that the Pelman plan has doubled, or trebled, or even quadrupled their income. You can increase your income in just the same way by the Pelman Training.

DON'T LEAVE IT TOO LATE.

As the number of applications for enrolment for the Pelman Course of Training is sure to be large, readers are advised to make early application as the number of enrolments is limited. To every reader will be sent (1) Full particulars of the arrangements whereby readers of EVERYMAN are enabled to secure a reduction of 700 Guineas in the usual fee for the Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training, (2) Full description of the Pelman Course of 12 Correspondence Lessons which may be studied at home in your spare time—thus avoiding the time and expense involved in attending classes of oral instruction, (3) A Presentation Copy of the illustrated Pelman Magazine of the Mind—a unique publication full of fascinating reading from beginning to end.

TO-DAY IS A RED-LETTER DAY FOR YOU.

To-day is a day that will be remembered by you throughout your life if you will call or write for particulars of the Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training—the Pelman School remains open on Tuesday and Thursday evenings until 8.30 p.m. for the convenience of those who find it impossible to call at the school during the day. Action is the first stepping stone to success.

Act now. Fill up, cut out and bring (or post) the appended Request Form.

PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND, 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, LONDON, W.C.

Please send free copy of "Pelman's Magazine" and particulars of special terms to readers of EVERYMAN.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Branch Schools—47, Queen Street, Melbourne; 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay; Club Arcade, Dublin.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR

CHARLES SAROLEA

BY

I.

To write on German politics and to ignore the German Kaiser would be like playing "Hamlet" whilst leaving out the character of the Danish prince. For the Kaiser meets us at every turn. In the words of Victor Hugo, speaking of Napoleon: "Toujours lui, lui partout." It may be found on close examination that his influence on the political drama is much less decisive than appears at first sight, even as in Shakespeare's masterpiece, Hamlet has comparatively little influence on the actual development of the plot. It may be that the Kaiser's part is more spectacular than dramatic. But whether we like him, whether we believe in him, or not, we cannot avoid his august presence.

And even if his absorbing personality did not force itself upon our attention, its study would still present to us a most fascinating problem. For the Kaiser is essentially complex and perplexing, elusive and stimulating, explosive and incalculable. With him it is the unexpected that always happens. He is a bundle of contradictions. He is the war lord of Europe, and yet he has been nicknamed by the war party, "William the Peaceful." He is a German of the Germans, and yet he professes to be the friend of England. He is intensely religious, and claims to be the Anointed of the Lord. Yet in many respects he is a materialist mainly trusting in brutal force. He is picturesquely mediæval, and the Hohenzollern seems to be ever anxious to model himself on the Hohenstaufen. Yet he is pre-eminently modern. He shocks us as offensively theatrical, yet he is unmistakably sincere.

II.

Anyone who attempts to write on the German Emperor must solve those glaring contradictions. And he will only succeed in doing so if he carefully dissociates the various elements which have entered into his composition. He will only succeed if he separates what the Kaiser owes to his ancestry, and what he owes to his education; what he owes to his inmost personality, and what he owes to his immediate surroundings, and to the age he lives in. It is for want of making those necessary distinctions that so many publicists who have given us biographies and character sketches of the Kaiser have failed to reveal him to us.

And, after all, when every fact has been conscientiously sifted and analysed, even the most careful student cannot be sure of having hit the Imperial likeness. It seems as if the Kaiser each time he sits for his portrait not merely dons a different uniform, but puts on a different moral physiognomy. On three occasions I have made an attempt to draw a pen portrait of William, and each sketch was different from the other; each subsequent judgment contradicted my previous estimate. I do not, therefore, pretend in the present instance to have given a final definition of the German autocrat, for the simple reason that it is not possible to give a final definition. It must be left to the reader to exert his own judgment and to compare my estimate of Emperor William with the estimate of those who have written before me.

III.

THE HOHENZOLLERN INFLUENCE.

First in importance is the Hohenzollern influence.

Few royal families in history possess a more marked individuality. Each member of the dynasty may differ widely from his predecessor or successor. The cynical man of genius, Frederick the Great, is not like the feeble voluptuary, Frederick William the Third, who, again, is very unlike the romantic and mystical dreamer, Frederick the Fourth. And yet as rulers they all have a certain common type. They have created a definite European state, and they themselves have been moulded by that state.

Considering the enormous part they have played in history, and how closely the Hohenzollern have been identified with the fortunes of Prussia, it is natural that their first characteristic should be an overweening dynastic pride. No Bourbon or Habsburg has ever believed more firmly in his Divine Right to govern or misgovern his people. A Hohenzollern may condescend to employ men of genius to assist him in his providential task, but he will only consider those men of genius as tools to work out his own ends, and he will discard those tools whenever they have served their purpose, or whenever they have ceased to be pliable instruments.

IV.

William possesses in the highest degree the pride of his race. The exaltation of the Hohenzollern is the one leitmotiv of his speeches, and especially the exaltation of his immediate predecessors, and, above all, of William "the Great," of William "the Saint." Every schoolboy knows that William was an honest, conscientious, well-meaning ruler, and not devoid of judgment, whose great merit was to efface himself before his Chancellor, and to give way to Bismarck's policy even when he did not approve of it. Every schoolboy knows that William's relation to Bismarck was very much that of Louis the Thirteenth to Richelieu. But here again Emperor William has changed our interpretation of history. To him the real creator of the new empire is neither Bismarck nor Moltke nor Roon. William, indeed, may graciously condescend to speak of his "Paladines" as we speak of the Knights of the Table Round, or of the Twelve Peers of Charlemagne, but they are only mentioned collectively and anonymously, and it is significant that for many years the name of Bismarck has been taboo in the Kaiser's orations.

V.

Even as their dynastic pride, so is the absolutism of the Hohenzollern bred in the bone, and transmitted with the traditions of Prussian history. A Hohenzollern impatiently submits to constitutional checks. Most of the political difficulties and anomalies are due to the one cause.

Bismarck, in order to win over all the nations of the empire to Prussian hegemony, made an appeal to popular opinion, used universal suffrage as a hammer to break down dynastic and particularist opinion in the service of the absolute monarchy of the Hohenzollern. But universal suffrage, once it had served its purpose as a plebiscite, was made innocuous, and became a mockery. The absolute monarchy alone remained a reality.

William the Second possesses in its integrity the despotic temper of his ancestors. From the beginning of his reign he has shown himself impervious to criticism.

"I go my way; it is the only right one. Whoever shall prove an obstacle to the realisation of my purpose, I shall shatter—den zerschmettere ich."

(To be continued.)

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME

No form of bathing accomplishes such perfect cleanliness as the combined HOT-AIR and VAPOUR BATH. It not only cleanses the outer surface, but also opens the pores, eliminates impure matters, and stimulates a healthful flow of life's principal—the blood, clears the skin, recuperates the body, quiets the nerves, rests the tired, and creates that delightful feeling of invigorated health and strength.

PHYSICIANS AGREE THAT "FOOT'S" is THE BEST CABINET

and recommend its use for the prevention and cure of Colds, Influenza, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Troubles, Skin Diseases, &c. A FOOT'S Cabinet possesses every desirable feature of efficiency, and has several exclusive advantages, including Improved Outside Heat and Vapour Generator, Adjustable Seat, and Heat Regulator. The Bath is not fastened to the Cabinet; Exit is Easy and Immediate; No Assistant required. Can be used in any room, and folds into a small compact space.

Our "Bath Book," No. 30, contains much interesting information not generally known about Thermal Bathing, and illustrates and describes our Cabinets in various qualities. Sent Free on request.

FOOT'S

(Dept. B. 30),

171, New

Bond St., London, W.

NUGGET

The NAME

"NUGGET" stands for Quality and Perfection in Boot Polishes.

"NUGGET" gives a Rapid, Brilliant and Lasting Shine, waterproofs the leather, keeps it soft and pliable, and lengthens its life.

On the score of appearance and economy, therefore, you should insist on getting "NUGGET," and refuse all substitutes.

2/6

GET IT
USE IT
KEEP IT or EXCHANGE IT

2/6

Here is the Demonstrator. It will give you as good a shave as our regular Razor.

We Make this Remarkable Razor Offer to Back

THE DURHAM-DUPLEX IDEA

You can buy outright for 2/6 a DURHAM-DEMONSTRATOR Razor and DURHAM-DUPLEX BLADE! With it is enclosed a COUPON which enables you, if you desire, to exchange this for a complete Durham-Duplex Standard Set—2/1-, or a Durham-Derby Set—10/6, your 2/6 being credited on your new purchase.

Know What "Durham-Duplex" Shaving is

The Demonstrator is a sample of the Durham-Duplex idea. Our Razor has the hang set, and CORRECT DIAGONAL STROKE of the old-style Razor, without the dangerous naked Blade. Its superb Double-edged Hollow-ground Blades are securely Guarded and may be Stropped on any Strop.

There is no art in the use of our Razor.

You apply it FLAT to the face and glide it.

It smooths your hair off.

Your Dealer can supply you; if any difficulty write to—

THE DURHAM-DUPLEX CO., Ltd.,
5.T., YORK BUILDINGS, ADELPHI, LONDON, W.C.

THE GOLD IN BOOKS

A LAY SERMON

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY

I.

A SHARP wit has called our present time "an age of gold, but not the golden age." Millionaires abound, so monstrous in their havings that neither themselves nor those who would disendow them can quite imagine the wealth at stake. It is, however, a matter for reflection that the largest of goldmasters build libraries and set up universities with such income as it fatigues them to manipulate any more. They believe that the people ought to be civilised by reading; or that the democracy is of that opinion; or that it is advisable to seem to think so. Accordingly, the Millionaires' Library is a modern institution, not unlike the mediæval robber-baron's religious house, dedicated to the local apostle of Christianity whom his ancestor slew. In both cases we perceive an act of homage to the ideal, mingled with shrewd, though perhaps vague, hopes of profit otherwise unattainable. There is even a sense of incompleteness touching the power of money or of plunder, in this turning with deference to literature, to religion and their allied motives, as if the big purse and the strong arm could not subdue men for ever. The Money-King dreams of a bargain with poets, prophets, sibyls, philosophers, and other strange folk, who appear to own commodities not negotiable in Wall Street. He fancies that there may be gold in books.

II.

There is, of course—Fairy gold. Practical men have been apt to scorn it as current coin of the imagination, which it is, without considering how the whole world is led by fancy, fixing for all of us the standard of value. When a certain idea puts on the fit expression it works like magic, and things apparently as solid as the core of the globe melt, pass into smoke, and vanish. The money market itself is a product of thought. Adam Smith or some other absorbed student came by his meditation on exchange values to create the commercial age. Deeper thought will bring it to an end. The social order—civilisation, as we know it: a little too proudly—is nothing else than embodied beliefs about man's nature, his duties and destinies, of which the enduring forms have been set down in black and white, on paper, their vehicle and record. That which a nation persistently reads it cannot but hold to be true. Its daily literature becomes its Bible. A few long-headed men, to keep their balance of reason, make it a point to read the other side; but these are active, determined intellects. The crowd is passive. And at present democracy is the crowd. It can be made to affirm, by dint of repetition, whatever is put before it, provided you flatter its self-love. That is an old Greek story: it is the comedy of Demos openly fooled on the stage in Athens and tickled by the sight of his own imbecile attitudes, while the leather-seller and the sausage-seller contend as to which of them shall exploit him for private gain. Aristophanes had never set eyes on a multi-millionaire; but his "Knights" might still be given in New York.

III.

Out of this false democracy the way to escape must be bought with Fairy gold. We have to think true thoughts. They are waiting for us, asleep if you will, but ready to awake at a first touch of heroic adventure, in books the most beautiful, wise and sane and happy—our best inheritance. Here is the world's treasure. The nations have not been left without their Bibles. Deathless, invisible teachers speak to them yet in words of exquisite music, with all manner of enchanting figures and lively scenes and inspired sentences, beyond rivalry of to-day, coloured by association with the famous ones that knew and lived upon their charin, long ere we arrived to vex our hearts with questions clamouring for an answer.

Freedom lies in those books, light and deliverance. Our poor millionaires feel it dimly too. They have gotten so much, but all outside them; and as the late very rich, Mr. Pullman said, even a lord of capital can wear only one suit of clothes at a time and eat only three meals a day. His great fortune satisfies the sixth sense, which is vanity: it leaves hungry and starved the something else, not appetite and not vanity, dwelling far within him, the sick soul of the man. To found a library is to acknowledge his failure. Pity him. With infinite toil he has made the experiment on himself for you and me, which proves that another kind of value, different altogether from stock certificates, is indispensable to our happiness. Had we not these frightful examples in our sight, who knows but we might have been seduced into the pillories where they stand, a warning to good Christians? Humbly they call upon men of science, scholars, lovers of learning, to go and teach the rising youth a more excellent way than the art of company-promoting. And it is true that those who make money seldom understand how to make anything else. Financiers, not backed by the men of talent they buy cheap, would in no long while ruin society. Thus their universities intimate that a spiritual currency must be somehow restored to circulation if the crowd is not to invade the Stock Exchange and distribute its spoils.

IV.

That easy-going old Frenchman, Montaigne, said, "I seek in the reading of books only to please myself by an irreproachable diversion. If one book do not please me, I take another, and never meddle with any but at such times as I am weary of doing nothing." On this principle railway bookstalls have been devised; and in Germany young ladies leave the trash they have been irreproachably diverting themselves with in the rack reserved to light articles over their heads. Much may be allowed on a journey between Hamburg and Berlin to the weary traveller. But books have a more serious purpose than to kill time. When Matthew Arnold preached—and George Meredith accused him of always preaching—on culture as the cure for anarchy, we may be certain that he was eager to recommend something better than Montaigne's irreproachable diversion. To Arnold the use of books did not signify pedantic scholarship, or examinations, or worship of the past. He meant by reading acquaintance with the wisdom of Life stored up in volumes, tried and tested age after age, in form not less delightful than in their content illuminating, slight or severe, from the epic to the sonnet, from the long-drawn romance to the tale of a few pages' compass. Literature such as Arnold had in view never fails to suggest ideas of Truth, Goodness, and Beauty. These words are hardly more than signs; they need illustration; but let them serve as titles under which to sift and choose out the elements of sound judgment, never called for more vehemently than it is now, when everyone reads and only the few reflect.

V.

To apply the touchstone of an ideal life to literature is the very poor purpose of education. Why do we
(Continued on page 60.)

From CONSTABLE'S List

THE LETTERS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

Collected and Edited by his Son.

Demy 8vo, 2 Vols., 21s. net, with 4 Photographic Plates.

1st EDITION NEARLY EXHAUSTED.

NOW READY.

THE POEMS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

Complete in One Volume. Library Edition. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. Also a Pocket Edition on Oxford India paper, limp leather, 10s. 6d. net; and a large paper edition, printed on English mould-made paper, bound in buckram with label, and limited to 500 copies, 21s. net.

SELECTED PASSAGES from the Works of BERNARD SHAW.

Arranged by MRS. GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

Square Crown 8vo. With a Photogravure Frontispiece after the bust by Rodin. Cloth gilt extra, 5s. net.

The Private Papers of HENRY RYECROFT by GEORGE GISSING

New Special Edition. 6s. net.

This new and very attractively produced edition of George Gissing's most famous work, which has now finally taken place among our English classics, will be welcomed as an ideal gift book. It is printed in clear large print, and no pains have been spared to make its appearance as attractive as possible.

The Beautiful Comtesse de Castiglione, THE ROMANCE OF A FAVOURITE By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE.

Translated from French by W. M. FULLERTON. Demy 8vo. With Photogravure Plates. 10s. 6d. net.

"The picture of her sombre end is now painted in detail for the first time, and helps to explain much that was hitherto unaccountable in the real character of this mysterious figure. One word more, and that in praise of the translation by Mr. W. Morton Fullerton, who has succeeded—where so many English translators fail—in giving a faithful rendering of the French text without losing indefinable literary grace."—Mr. Frank A. Mumby in the Manchester Courier.

3rd LARGE EDITION.

THE FOURTH GENERATION BY JANET ROSS

"Read and be refreshed. And if that be not sufficient recommendation one can but pick certain plums and offer them as samples of the delightful garden's fruit. Excellent in all its parts. 'The Fourth Generation' is excellent as a whole. Coming from a quill that has been running nigh on sixty years, it has as much brightness and gaiety, vividness and vivacity as one might demand from the freeliest flowing fountain pen, fresh from the maker."—Bookman.

CONSTABLE'S FICTION.

PRISCILLA	Mrs. GEORGE WEMYSS
THE HERO OF HERAT	MAUD DIVER
A SLICE OF LIFE	ROBERT HALIFAX
THE BROAD WALK	BARONESS AMINOFF
MY LOVE AND I	A WELL-KNOWN WRITER
THE BLUE WALL	R. W. CHILD
ROSE OF THE GARDEN (2nd imp.)	KATHARINE TYNAN
EVE (3rd impression)	MAARTEN MAARTEHS

DON'T DELAY—ORDER "TO-DAY"

PERCY WHITE'S GREAT NOVEL.

CONSTABLE & CO., Ltd.

LONDON, W.C.

Four Remarkable New 6s. Books

PORTRAITS AND SKETCHES

By EDMUND GOSSE, C.B., LL.D. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THE INN OF TRANQUILLITY

By JOHN GALSWORTHY. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SALVE!

By GEORGE MOORE. (Uniform with AVE!)

Crown 8vo. 6s.

WILD LIFE & THE CAMERA

By A. RADCLIFFE DUGMORE. Crown 4to. 6s. net.

EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE ART

By E. F. FENOLLOSA.
2 vols. With 230 Plates. Crown 4to. 36s. net.

GERMAN MEMORIES.

By SIDNEY WHITMAN. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

MEMOIRS OF THE MARQUISE DE CUSTINE.

Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

THE PROMISED LAND.

By MARY ANTIN. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

REVIEWS & APPRECIATIONS OF SOME OLD ITALIAN MASTERS.

By H. COOK, M.A., F.S.A. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. net.

French Artists of Our Day. Each with 48 Plates from their works. 3s. 6d. net. The first vol. is PUVIS DE CHAVANNES, by ANDRE MICHEL.

The Great Engravers.

Edited by ARTHUR M. HIND. Each 2s. 6d. net. New Volumes.

(1) Marcantonio. (2) Holbein.

New Illustrated Books

Arthur Rackham's New Pictures.

AESOP'S FABLES. Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM. With an Introduction by G. K. Chesterton. Large crown 8vo. 6s. net. (Also an Edition de Luxe—all sold.)

ALL THE TALES FROM
SHAKESPEARE. By CHARLES and MARY LAMB and H. S. MORRIS. With 46 Colour Plates from the Great Masters, 2 vols. Large 8vo, cloth gilt. 21s. net.

THE FOUR GARDENS. Illustrated by CHARLES ROBINSON. 6s. net. A beautiful gift book.

MICHAEL ANGELO. By ROMAIN ROLLAND. With 24 Plates. 6s. net.

THE BOOK OF BEGGARS. By W. DACRES-ADAMS. Crown 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

PICTURES OF THE PANAMA
CANAL. By JOSEPH PENNELL. Crown 4to. 5s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE "MIND THE PAINT" GIRL	- - -	Louis Tracy (Adapted from Sir A. W. Pinero's Play.)
ADNAM'S ORCHARD	- - -	Sarah Grand
MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR	- - -	Duncan Schwann
LESS THAN THE DUST	- - -	Mary A. Hamilton
THE BOOK OF WONDER (Ill. by S. H. Sime)	- - -	Lord Dunsany
BETWEEN TWO THIEVES (2nd Imp.)	- - -	Richard Dehan
YONDER (2nd Imp.)	- - -	E. H. Young
THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE	- - -	C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford St., W.C.

DUCKWORTH'S NEW BOOKS

A Wiltshire Village

By ALFRED WILLIAMS

"Mr. Alfred Williams, the Wiltshire forgerman and poet, brings forward a notable plea for the life of the humble folk who till the soil, harvest the crops, and tend the cattle, free from the shackles of the town life, and the turmoil of streets and factories. Mr. Williams speaks with authority, for he has worked for years both in the old-fashioned Wiltshire village, which he describes, and in the din and high pressure of a great railway workshop. The chapters abound with racy portraits of old-fashioned characters, and with charming descriptions of field life. All is taken direct from life, and all is racy of the Wiltshire life and character."

Crown 8vo, 5s. net; postage 4d.

NOTABLE NEW NOVELS. 6s. EACH

The Mistress of Kingdoms

By BRIDGET MACLAGAN.

The Weaving of the Shuttle

By C. HOLMES CAUTLEY.

Elizabeth, Betsy and Bess

By LILY SCHOFIELD.

Wide Courses: Tales of the Sea.

By J. B. CONOLLY. Illustrated.

Halcyone. A Love Story.

By ELINOR GLYN. With a Frontispiece.

MODERN PLAYS

Curtain Raisers. Three One-Act Plays

By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. Cloth, 2s. net. Paper Covers, 1s. 6d. net.

Peter's Chance. A Play

By EDITH LYTTTELTON. Cloth, 2s. net. Paper Covers, 1s. 6d. net.

Duckworth & Co. have just published in their Modern Plays Series volumes by STRINDBERG and by SUDERMANN.

A full list of the series, which includes all the Dramatic Work of John Galsworthy, will be sent post free on request.

The Readers' Library

Copyright Works of individual merit and permanent value by authors of repute.

Library style. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net a volume.

NEW VOLUMES JUST PUBLISHED.

Men, Women & Books: Res Judicatæ

By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. Complete in one volume.

Success

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

Parallel Paths. A Study of Ethics and Art

By T. W. ROLLESTON.

The Greatest Life. An Enquiry into the Foundations of Character. By GERALD LEIGHTON.

"The Readers' Library" now comprises upwards of thirty volumes. A special list of the series will be sent on application.

PLEASE WRITE FOR LIST OF ANNOUNCEMENTS.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

read at all? For amusement? That may be well if what we read is irreproachable; too commonly it is trifling; sometimes it is deadly. But do we set no value on high thoughts, human kindness, golden deeds? We come of ancestors whose great qualities shine as much in the words they have left as in the battles they fought and won over chaos. These men made Humanity. Their spirit cries to us yet in clear, articulate tones, laying bare the heart, pleading for the morrow by the achievements of yesterday. They conquer death. The gold in their books is an elixir of life, steeped in immortality. No genuine scholar would sell his knowledge of the classics, of Latin or Greek, of any language that possesses a noble literature, for the tasteless material millions of a dealer in oil, or hogs, or cotton fibre. And the very rich man has discovered this, to him, surprising fact. It is time that our democracy laid to heart the lesson inflicted on its paymaster and lord. The Bible of humanity is the Book of Freedom. Neither Chicago nor New York can make a slave of Homer, Dante, or Milton. Culture sits in judgment on the multi-millionaire, on the freaks in which his passing wife and her friends waste the wealth stupidly piled up by him, idiotically squandered by them. Culture—that is to say, reason—thrown into its most persuasive embodiment, convincing by its mere presence, robs money of the spell it has cast on the serfs who would be masters. In a world of buying and selling it has the secret of independence. The University cannot, in the long run, be a forecourt to the Bourse. It will give young men interests of which they had not dreamed. But now books are the great university. And the best of them will outlive the commercial era.

"MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD"

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER

I.

IN the deluge of works of fiction which at this season of the year floods the editorial room, it is with inexpressible relief that we turn to those few novels which, either by virtue of the power of observation or imagination or insight into human character which they reveal, can really be called literature.

Mr. Courlander's new novel, "Mightier than the Sword," possesses that rare literary quality. It certainly deserves to be ranked as one of the half-dozen outstanding works of fiction of the autumn, along with Benson's "Mrs. Ames," Wells' "Marriage," Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's "The Lost World," or Conrad's "Twixt Land and Sea." It is an extraordinarily clever book. It is a masterly treatment of a big subject. It only just misses greatness.

II.

Unfortunately, it must be confessed that it does miss greatness, not for any want of intrinsic merit, but because Mr. Courlander has not kept the promise of his title. The title promised a novel on the newspaper, on its organisation, on the secret of its mighty influence. Instead of such a comprehensive novel on the problem of journalism, he has only given us a novel on the newspaper reporter. Now, I have every sympathy and respect for that most invaluable member of the journalistic profession, but the business of the reporter is not the whole of journalism, and certainly it is not by virtue of its reporting that a newspaper is "mightier than the sword."

After all, the formidable power wielded by the

* "Mightier than the Sword." By A. Courlander. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

"MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD"

(continued)

modern Press does not rest on the news or information which it provides, but rather on the ideas it advocates, on the public opinion which it moulds. And on this vital function of journalism, on the manufacture of opinion, on the diffusion of ideals, Mr. Courlander has very little to say. He does not reveal to us the subtle relations between journalism and finance, or between journalism and politics, or between journalism and religion.

III.

With this important reservation, and remembering that the main subject of the book is a picture of the life of the newspaper reporter, it is difficult to overrate the strength of Mr. Courlander's achievement. The one criticism I would venture is that even as a picture of the life of the reporter it is somewhat exaggerated. So far as the reporter is concerned, the paper is represented as a grinding machine, as a devouring Minotaur. Every character in the volume falls a prey to the monster. Humphrey sacrifices to his profession first his love, and then his life. Wratten dies suddenly, a victim to his duty. Another is brutally dismissed after a strenuous life of loyal service. The only reporter who is not a martyr to the profession is the amateur Kenneth Carr, and only because he has prematurely and voluntarily withdrawn from the race.

IV.

The literary qualities of the book are equal to the absorbing interest of the subject. The love story is cleverly woven into the life story of the main character. There are occasional slips in the style and doubtful metaphors ("Kenneth with beer woven into the fibre of his being"); but generally the writing is vigorous and incisive. Nothing could be better, for instance, than this satire of that mania for meetings and societies, which is one of the features of our time. I give the passage in full, because it is very characteristic of the author:—

V.

"There were societies and counter societies; there was a society for the suppression of this, and a society for the encouragement of that; there was the Society for Sunday Entertainment, and the Society for Sunday Rest; every one seemed to be pulling in opposite directions, and every one imagined that his or her views were best for the people. Humphrey found the reflection of all this in the advertisement columns of The Day, where there were advertisements of lotion that grew hair on bald heads, or ointments that took away superfluous hair; medicines that made fat people thin, or pills that made thin people fat; tonics that toned down nervous, high-strung people, and phosphates that exhilarated those who were depressed. Life was a terribly ailing thing viewed through the advertisement columns; one seemed to be living in an invalid world, suffering from lumbago and nervous debility. It was a nightmare of a world, where people were either too florid or too pale, too fat or too thin, too bald or too hairy, too tall or too short; . . . and yet the world went on unchangingly, just as it did after the meetings of all the little societies of men or women who met together to give moral medicine to the world."

Mr. Courlander (born 1881) is one of the most promising men of the new generation. Much may be expected of him. Let him follow up this first book with another, which will reveal to us the whole secret and mechanism of the modern newspaper, and I can safely prophesy that he will transform his success of to-day into the triumphant achievement of to-morrow.

A Work without which no Library is complete.

A handsomely bound, large type, Uniform Library Edition of

The Works of GEORGE MEREDITH

AT A POPULAR PRICE AND IN A FORM ENTIRELY WORTHY OF HIM.

THE SURREY EDITION IN 24 VOLS.

With Photogravure Frontispiece to each Vol.

The text embodies the author's last revisions, and three of the volumes contain his Poems. Beyond question one of the finest editions of the Works of George Meredith ever issued.

The Volumes are beautifully bound in Pale Blue Cloth, with gilt Title, artistic Medallion, and gilt top edges.

Everyone ought to possess a worthy set of his works, for Meredith is at once a classic and a source of never-ending delight. His writings have been, indeed, for many years among the most eagerly sought possessions of the more discerning.

Cash Price, £8.

Payment may be made, if desired, by convenient Monthly Instalments.

Prospectus containing full particulars, with Coloured Illustrations of Binding and Specimen Pages, Post Free on Application.

The Times Book Club

376 to 384, Oxford Street, London, W.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS

Marie Antoinette: Her Early Youth
(1770-1774). By LADY YOUNGHUSBAND.
Illustrated. 8vo. 15s. net.

The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter
By JAMES SUTHERLAND. Illustrated. 8vo.
7s. 6d. net.

NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

Folk-Tales of Bengal. By the Rev. LAL
BEHARI DAY. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to. 15s. net. Also Edition de Luxe, limited to 150 copies, printed on hand-made paper and bound in vellum. Demy 4to. 42s. net.

White-Ear and Peter: The Story of a
Fox and a Fox-Terrier. By NEILS
HEIBERG. With 16 Coloured Plates by Cecil Aldin.
Pott 4to. 6s. net.

H. G. WELLS'S NEW BOOK.

Marriage. 6s.

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW BOOK.

Mrs. Lancelot. 6s.

JAMES STEPHENS'S NEW BOOK.

The Crock of Gold. 5s. net.

FALL HALL GAZETTE: "A wise, beautiful, and humorous book. . . . If you could have given Sterne a soul and made him a poet he might have produced
'The Crock of Gold.'"

NEW BOOK FOR THE YOUNG.

The Magic World. By E. NESBIT, Author of
"The Magic City," etc. With Illustrations by H. R.
Miller and Spencer Pryse. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

SOME GOOD NOVELS.

THE STREETS OF ASCALON.

By Robert W. Chambers. 6/-

Illustrated by CHARLES DANA GIBSON.

A new full-length Society story of a woman's sacrifice for the man she loved.

THE PRICE SHE PAID.

By David Graham Phillips. 6/-

The life story of an operatic singer and the price she paid for success.

THE SINS OF THE FATHER.

By Thomas Dixon. 6/-

A romance of the South, with a sex problem of the most complicated character, treated with restraint.

THE MAKER OF OPPORTUNITIES.

By George Gibbs. 6/-

The story of a rich young man, who spends his leisure in seeking adventures.

THE DEPARTMENT STORE: A Novel of To-day.

By Margarete Bohme. 6/-

The modern department store brought into fiction. A vast, throbbing, vital drama.

THE NAMELESS THING.

By Melville Davisson Post. 6/-

A most ingenious detective story by a well-known author.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SECOND SHOT.

By Rufus Gillmore. 6/-

The efforts of two smart reporters to unravel a mystery make a detective story of unusual fascination.

D. APPLETON & CO., 25 Bedford St., London.

BOOKS.

LARGEST STOCK IN LONDON OF PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER BOOKS,

All in perfectly new condition as originally published, but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

New complete Catalogue now ready, post free.

WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London; and 14, George Street, Croydon.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

(Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

A. E. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

THE INFORMATION AND AGENCY BUREAU.—Established to procure INFORMATION on literary, social and other subjects, and to carry out EXECUTIVE AGENCY work. Researches at the British Museum, Somerset House and elsewhere. Reasonable charges. Apply for PROSPECTUS to THE SECRETARIAT, 26, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.

NOW READY.

THE BOOK OF COURAGE.

By W. J. DAWSON, D.D.

Author of "The Threshold of Manhood," "The Reproach of Christ," &c., &c.
Price 3s. 6d. net; postage 4d.

The Methodist Times says:

"The style is excellent, the illustrations most apt, whilst the twelve poems facing the chapters are in themselves both fresh and beautiful."

The Edinburgh Evening News says:

"This is a capital book, full of level-headed common sense and ripe wisdom. . . . This book is full of helpful teaching and inspiration for all who have a hard fight in the battle of life."

THE SAINTS OF FORMOSA.

Life and Worship in a Chinese Church.

By CAMPBELL N. MOODY, M.A.,

Author of "The Heathen Heart."

Price 3s. 6d. net; postage 4d.

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—

"Recent events in China having quickened interest in the work of Chinese Missions, it is probable that Mr. Moody's story of his labours in Formosa will be widely read. . . . Undoubtedly this book is well worth three and sixpence."

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER,

100, PRINCES STREET, EDINBURGH,
21, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, LONDON.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The Rev. R. J. Campbell's article on "The Future of the Churches" is a remarkable literary production. It reminds one of an essay on "The Future of Naval Power" containing no reference to the British Navy.

Mr. Campbell, in reckoning up the Churches, takes account only of the Established Church and the Dissenting bodies. Surely the Catholic Church counts for something in the world. Materially it is the greatest of existing organisations. As to its position in the British Empire, it is worth noting that of the five Premiers of the Overseas Dominions who attended the Coronation of the King, three were Catholics. In Germany, the leading power of the Continent, and in the great American Republic the Catholic Church is a force to be reckoned with, a proof that it can flourish alike under the rule of a military Empire and a democratic Republic. It is not "struggling to keep alive." It is ever widening its borders. It sees, not a decrease, but a steady increase of its church attendance. It has at its command an unceasing supply of men and women ready and eager to give their whole lives to social work. And here in England we have had proof enough that in such work Catholics—and Catholic priests and prelates—are ready to give hearty co-operation to men of other creeds. Surely in discussing the future of the Churches it is a strange mistake to leave this worldwide force out of account.—I am, sir, etc.,

A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

London, October 19th, 1912.

THE CHANCE OF THE PEASANT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your distinguished contributor, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, in his article, "The Chance of the Peasant," states that Collectivism is dead, and advances as the reason the loss of faith by Labour in the intervention of the State in disputes. But the call for State control has been persistently advocated by large bodies of workers. The railwaymen believe in the nationalisation of our railway system, the miners in the nationalisation of the mines. The workers in London are the staunchest supporters of Municipal Collectivism as expressed in the public ownership of our tramway system. It seems as though Mr. Chesterton, between his dislike of the official and the decay of Individualism, accepts for himself a compromise in the shape of Peasant Proprietorship. In the face of the private ownership of land by the few, the peasant proprietor can only come into being through the intervention of the State, and when that intervention comes a State tenancy seems a much more reasonable method of raising the peasantry of our country again than a peasant proprietorship, to which so few of the workers could ever attain.

I agree that "the competing capitalist won't compete," and it is because of this fact that when you really collect the poor they will be Collectivist.—I am, sir, etc.,

FRANCIS SKINNER.

Palmer's Green, N.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Chesterton, like most negative critics, is most convincing when he condemns the present social system. He is most unconvincing when he proposes a constructive remedy. He only vaguely suggests what might be a possible cure, and tells us that peasant proprietorship ought to be given a chance. If he really believed in the wonderful cure he suggests, it would be unpardonable, on his part, to withhold from the public a secret of such vital moment.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

Alas! peasant proprietorship has not the ghost of a chance. Peasant proprietorship cannot be extemporised at the bidding of a politician, and still less at the suggestion of an erratic man of genius like G. K. Chesterton. There exists at present in this country no class from which peasant proprietorship can be evolved. The dweller in the slums is not a potential peasant proprietor. There is not even a desire for peasant proprietorship amongst the masses. And even if the desire did exist, even if the human material were at our disposal, the peasant proprietor class cannot be developed under present conditions. Peasant proprietorship is not the beginning of social and political reform. Rather is it the ultimate conclusion. The French people have achieved peasant proprietorship, but they had to go through a great Revolution before they obtained it—I am, sir, etc.,

"A PEASANT PROPRIETOR."

Colinton, Midlothian, October 19th, 1912.

THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The writer of the article, "The Neglect of German," on p. 11 of your excellent first issue, would appear to advocate the more general acquirement of German, partly with the object, apparently, of encouraging Anglo-German friendship. He rightly draws attention to the ludicrousness of a German addressing an English audience in indifferent French. Now, while in no wise wishing to decry the study of German for all those wishing to become more intimate with the thought and sentiment of that nation, I take the opportunity of pointing out that the remedy proposed is hardly likely to be very effective generally, for the ability of making a public speech in German, it need hardly be said, entails for the majority of people two or more years' residence in Germany. There is, however, a much simpler solution of the language difficulty.

The present writer attended a Congress in Antwerp last year, at which were present, besides some three hundred Germans and six hundred English people, representatives of nearly thirty other nationalities. The Congress in question was the seventh international Esperantist Congress. On the occasion referred to, the whole of the meetings were conducted in one language only, i.e., in the international auxiliary language Esperanto. This language, besides being extremely easy of acquirement—it is possible to make a public speech after three months' devotion to its study—has the merit of being absolutely neutral alike for all nationalities. It was not necessary for the Germans present at this Congress to blush while speakers of other nationalities stammered a few words in bad German; all were on neutral language territory, and with equal ease communicated as if in their own national language, the result being that an atmosphere of perfect equality, tolerance, and friendliness existed between all present, irrespective of nationality. I submit, therefore, that all persons having at heart the promotion of Anglo-German friendship could not do better than endeavour to extend the circle of persons throughout the world, already appreciably large, by whom the auxiliary language Esperanto is used. I might perhaps mention that in Germany

THE NEW ARTIST

FOR CHILDREN AND OTHERS.

6/-
net.

GULLIVER'S VOYAGES
TO L'LLIPUT & BRODDINGNAG.

6/-
net.

With EIGHT Colour Plates and over EIGHTY Drawings in the text. (Printed in two colours throughout.)

By P. A. STAYNES.

Write for coloured prospectus, and ask your Bookseller to show you the Book.

3/6

ROUNABOUT WAYS

3/6

Verses by FRIDA WOLFE. Pictures by P. A. STAYNES.
(Authors of "The Orange Cat.")

A charming book dealing with Towns and Countries, Lakes and Rivers, Roads and Mountains, from a fanciful and witty point of view.

THE GRANDEUR THAT WAS ROME

A SURVEY OF ROMAN CIVILISATION AND CULTURE.
By J. C. STOBART, M.A.

A Companion Volume to "The Glory that was Greece," issued last year.—"A vivid picture of a wonderful civilisation," Profusely illustrated, 30/- net. Write for prospectus.

(Uniform with "Sailing Ships and their Story.")

MINES AND THEIR STORY

GOLD, DIAMONDS, SILVER, COAL AND IRON.
By J. BERNARD MANNIX.

With over 100 half-tone and line illustrations. Coloured Frontispiece and designed cover. Extra Royal 8vo, 16/- net.

HISTORICAL VIGNETTES

By BERNARD CAPES.

22 of Mr. Capes' brilliant thumbnail sketches of historical characters, most of which have not been collected in book-form before. Fcap 8vo, cloth extra. 2 6 net.

All in Cloth and Paper.

PLAYS

Cr. 8vo.

Cloth, 2/- net. Stanley Houghton
HINDLE WAKES Paper, 1/6 net.

Cloth, 2/6 net. Githa Sowerby
RUTHERFORD & SON Paper, 1/6 net.

Cloth, 2/- net. Allan Monkhouse
MARY BROOME Paper, 1/6 net.

Cloth, 2/- net. B. Macdonald Hastings.
THE NEW SIN Paper, 1/- net.

Cloth, 2/- net. LOVE—AND WHAT THEN Paper, 1/- net.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S GREAT POEMS

THE EVERLASTING MERCY. (6th Impression.)

THE WIDOW IN THE BYE-STREET.

Cr. 8vo, 3/6 net each, cloth gilt. (2nd Impression.)

NEW FICTION

ROSMARY & RUE. By BEATRICE STOTT
(Author of "Rosemonde") 6/-

THE TEMPLE ON THE HILL. By ELSA DE SZASZ.

3/6 net.

PRIDE OF WAR. By CUSTAF JANSON. 6/-

SIDGWICK & JACKSON,
LONDON, W.C.

T. & T. CLARK'S NEW BOOKS.

ETERNAL LIFE. A Study of its Implications and Applications.

By Baron FRIEDRICH VON HÜGEL. 8s. net.
[Ready in October.]

THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT CELTS.

By Canon JOHN A. MACCULLOCH, D.D. 10s. net.

TYPES OF ENGLISH PIETY.

By Rev. ROBERT H. COATS, B.D. 4s. net.

AN ANGLO-SAXON ABBOT. Aelfric of Eynsham.

By Rev. S. HARVEY GEM, M.A. 4s. net.

GREECE AND BABYLON. A Comparative

Sketch of Mesopotamian, Anatolian, and Hellenic Religions.
By LEWIS R. FARNELL, D.Litt., Author of "Cults of the Greek States." 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGIONS OF MODERN SYRIA AND PALESTINE.

By Dr. FREDERICK J. BLISS. 4s. 6d. net.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL UNDER THE KINGDOM.

By Rev. ADAM C. WELCH, Theol.D. 7s. 6d. net.

Edited by JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS.

Four Volumes ready, Vol. 5 nearly ready. Price per volume in cloth, 28s. net; in half-morocco, 34s. net.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

Complete in Five Volumes. Price per volume in cloth, 28s.; in half-morocco, 34s.

Complete Prospectuses free to any address.

T. & T. CLARK, Edinburgh and London.

London Agents: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

THE PATH.

A Monthly Magazine of Mysticism & Philosophy.

Editor: D. N. DUNLOP.

CONTENTS OF NOVEMBER NUMBER:

THE ZODIAC—THE PATH OF EVOLUTION.	D. N. Dunlop.
LETTERS OF MADAME BLAVATSKY.	Dr. Franz Hartmann.
THE CHRISTIAN HINTERLAND.	Dr. K. C. Anderson.
THE WAY OF SALVATION (Poem).	Rabindranath Tagore.
COMRADES IN COMBINE (A Sketch).	Bryan Stuart.
THE LORD MAITREYA.	William L. Hare.
THE SYMBOLISM OF THE TAROT.	P. D. Ouspensky.
REFLECTIONS AND REFRACTIONS.	The Editor.

Price 6d.; by post, 7d. READY OCTOBER 31st.

Send to Dept. E, THE PATH PUBLISHING COMPANY,
Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

NEW & SECONDHAND ENGLISH & FOREIGN BOOKS

For Sale or on Subscription
Particulars and Prices Free.

FROM

W. H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY
186 STRAND, LONDON, & BRANCHES

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

upwards of 200 societies exist for the furtherance of this language—the most effective instrument for the expression of the "Entente" sentiment.—I am, sir, etc.,

P. J. CAMERON,
Hon. Sec., London Esperanto Club,
St. Bride's Inst., E.C.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be favoured with space enough to point out to the writer of "The Neglect of German," and to you who made a note thereon, that German and English too have not their "classical friends"—poor, much-abused creatures—to thank for their neglect, but the strange medley of subjects that go under the head of "science" in our schools to-day? Greek, in Scotland, is at its last gasp; Latin is dying; German died some time ago—and for this alarming mortality science is wholly to blame. When the classics decay, English totters also on its throne, since the foundation thereof is a thorough knowledge of classics.

And yet the "Modernists" are blind enough to combine with the "scientists" against the "classicists," unaware apparently that they are cutting away the ground under their own feet! Ye gods, that there can be such folly!—I am, sir, etc.,

ETHELWYN LEMON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—There will be many delighted readers of your first number who, like myself, have read this issue at one sitting from cover to cover. Amid much that is of entrancing interest, no article, it seems to me, is so timely and so trenchant as that on "The Neglect of German." I believe that there are few who will deny the contention of the writer that the study of German has been declining for many years, nor the obvious reason for that decline, viz., that German is not a "bread-and-butter" subject.

As a schoolmaster by choice, and by chance a classical scholar, I submit that the article is not altogether free from bias, and is far from fair either to the student of the classics or to the schoolmaster. The last paragraph of the article contains the unwarranted assumption that it is the study of the "dead languages" that have ousted German from its rightful place. On the contrary, I venture to assert that it is mainly in the so-called classical schools of this country that the study of the German language and literature is taken seriously, and that the vast majority of those who can read, write, and speak German are just those who have also a working knowledge of French, Latin, and Greek. This at any rate is true of the scholastic profession, so far as an experience of twenty years may justifiably be urged in evidence upon this point. Exclude the modern language teacher from your calculations, and you are not beside the mark in maintaining that on the staff of any secondary school German is a barbarian tongue to all save the classical members. It is rare indeed for the English expert to have even a nodding acquaintance with the sister-tongue, while the science men with whom I have associated—and the circle is not small—would seem to be of opinion that the Germans in science "are sadly to seek." I have examined the bookshelves of my classical colleagues, and have come to the conclusion that one in three of their text-books and editions are of German origin and written in the German language. I think, sir, that here may be another clue as to reasons for the ignorance of German on the part of educated

(Continued on page 65.)

Two Great Books of the Hour.TURKEY OF THE OTTOMANSBy LUCY M. J. GARNETT,

Author of "Mysticism and Magic in Turkey."

SERVIA OF THE SERVIANS.By CHEDO MIJATOVICH,

Formerly Servian Minister at the Court of St. James.

Each of these books, which is profusely illustrated, gives a faithful and graphic picture of the country and its people, their history, customs, politics, etc. Those who are following with attention the startling course of events in the Near East will find the volumes of the very greatest use and interest.

Each in imperial 16mo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 6s. net.*FLEET STREET IN SEVEN CENTURIES.

Being a History of the Growth of London Beyond the Walls into the Western Liberty and of Fleet Street to our Time.

By WALTER GEORGE BELL. With a Foreword by SIR WILLIAM P. TRELOAR, Bart. Forty-six illustrations; drawings by T. R. WAY, HANS LIP FLETCHER, R. ANNING BELL, T. E. KNIGHTLEY; reproductions of old prints, original documents, maps, and photographs. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 620 pp. 15s. net.

WANDERINGS ON THE ITALIAN RIVIERA.

The Record of a Leisurely Tour in Liguria.

By FREDERIC LEES, Author of "A Summer in Touraine." With frontispiece in colour by EDITH S. LEES, and 60 photographic illustrations by the Author, and a map. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

FAMOUS SPEECHES. (Second Series.)

From Lord Macanlay to Lord Rosebery.

Selected and Edited, with Introductory Notes, by HERBERT PAUL. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 320 pp. 7s. 6d. net.

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

With Chapters on Rhodesia and the Native Territories of the High Commission.

By W. BASIL WORSFOLD, sometime Editor of The Johannesburg Star. 20 full-page illustrations, map. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

JOHN PYM.

By C. E. WADE, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. With frontispiece and facsimile. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

THE INNER LIFE OF GEORGE ELIOT.

A Study of the Mental and Spiritual Development of the Novelist.

By CHARLES GARDNER, M.A. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 5s. net.

A thrilling new Novel of the Virginia Mountains, full of colour, vitality and life, and commanding in scope and originality.

THE UNDER TRAIL.By ANNA ALICE CHAPIN. Illustrated. 6s.

The Brightest and Merriest Fiction Success.

THE PLEASURING OF SUSAN SMITH.By HELEN M. WINSLOW. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

Original in plot—bright and merry in spirit—full of kindly humour in style and incident—amusing experiences and ludicrous situations. Susan—bright, breezy and philosophical.

NONCONFORMISTS AND THE WELSH CHURCH BILL. 2nd Impression.

By J. FOVARGUE BRADLEY, Author of "The Case Against Welsh Disendowment." Crown 8vo. 1s. net.

PITMAN'S AUTUMN LIST

Now Ready and post free to all readers of "Everyman."

LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD.,
1, Amen Corner, E.C.

The Art of Self-Expression.

Speaking approximately, only one person in every hundred develops his capacity for success. The remaining ninety-nine plod along, enjoying but a fraction of the pleasure and personal prestige which might easily be theirs.

In the social world, thousands desirous of being popular fail, not because they lack social qualities, but because they do not know how to use them. They sit glum and awkward because they do not know what to say or how to say it. It is just this knowledge that is the secret of Social Success.

A well-known author has concentrated in a series of private lecture lessons all there is to know about the rules of self-culture, social progress, the development of your self-expression, and practical common-sense methods of making the best of yourself and your personality.

No handbook ever published contains the exclusive information given in this unique course of postal training.

The student who studies this spare-time self-culture course enjoys the advantages of personal correspondence with the author, and his advice on all matters likely to promote his social progress and prosperity.

If you care to write the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C., stating your present aims and needs, and any other particulars about yourself, he will send you a booklet all about this Course, which has done so much for so many and may be as useful to you.

Any way, you risk nothing, and it costs nothing to receive this interesting and descriptive little brochure, and it may mean so much for your future.

The Practical Correspondence College also conducts Courses of Postal Training in Advertisment Writing, Black and White Illustrating, Poster, Showcard, and Magazine Cover Designing, Press Photography, and Journalism.

Each of these Courses is conducted by an expert of international repute, and the fact that the majority of students are able to earn back the whole of their fees even before completing the lessons, is a convincing testimony as to the practical money-earning value of the training.

To

Everyman & Everywoman

with a taste for Art.

Designing Posters, Advertisements, Covers, etc., is one of the most remunerative occupations.

Drawing for reproduction can be learned by anyone with common sense and ambition.

A course of Home Study Lessons, and the personal help and criticism of one of London's Leading Experts, will teach you to earn guineas with your brush. You can learn by post to make sketches that are wanted, and to dispose of them to the utmost advantage.

It costs nothing and you risk nothing by writing for particulars of our Applied Art Courses.

State if you desire to work in colours or black and white. Send a small specimen of your work in any media, and it will be returned to you with a gratis criticism by our Art Director, and his candid opinion on your chances of success.

Write the Secretary,

Practical Correspondence COLLEGE,
77, Thanet House, Strand.

AVOID DRUGS

If taken frequently drugs lose their power and doses have to be increased.

For the safe and certain relief and cure of . . .
INDIGESTION, ACIDITY, FLATULENCY, HEARTBURN, and IMPURE BREATH,

Bragg's Pure Vegetable Charcoal has never yet been equalled. It absorbs the impure gases generated in the stomach and bowels and carries them out of the system, thus removing the CAUSE of digestive disturbance and at the same time cleansing the blood.

BRAGG'S CHARCOAL

may be taken regularly with constant benefit by young or old. It is invaluable also in Diarrhoea and Fever. Doctors largely recommend it and use it in their own families.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Biscuits, 1/-, 2/- and 4/- per tin; Powder, 2/- per bottle; Lozenges, 1/12 per tin; Chocolates, 1/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box.

FREE SAMPLES sent to anyone mentioning this Journal and enclosing 3d. stamps for postage in the British Empire and U.S.A.

J. L. BRAGG'S, Ltd., 14, WIGMORE ST., LONDON, W.

Light Touch Means

- Better Work
- Quicker Work
- More Work

The light touch of the Monarch makes good work just a little easier for the operator every minute of her working day than is possible with any other machine. This means much more work in the whole day and no three o'clock fatigue.

The mechanical principle exclusively incorporated in the Monarch Light Touch Typewriter is the feature which makes it so easy to operate. A test will speedily demonstrate this fact.

Monarch Light Touch

To get more work done by the same operator; to get rush work done on time; to cut typewriting cost to lowest point, instal the Monarch, the high efficiency typewriter.

Full descriptive matter will be sent on application.

The Monarch Typewriter Co., Ltd.,
165, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

Englishmen, and for the decay of its cult in schools. The fact is that German is difficult to those who have studied no language but their own and French: it is comparatively easy to those conversant with the three languages I have named. Further, in these days of intensive culture and lightning methods, when he only is the true teacher, the prophet not without honour, who doles out by spoonfuls milk for babes, prepared foods for infants, and concentrated tabloids in appetising form for maturer minds, there is a danger lest our young charges should be overstrained. In the wisdom of our overseers and taskmasters, our experts in pedagogy and psychology, our professors of method and scientific educationists, we are inhibited, doomed and damned if we dare to suggest to our pupils that a little self-help and personal endeavour are essential to the mastery of any subject. Our leaders are obsessed with the idea that how a subject is taught is all important; how much of that subject is learned is immaterial. The blame then for this neglect of German lies neither with "reactionary dons and obscurantist clergymen," nor with classical head masters and students of antiquity. In fairness and equity it must be laid elsewhere.

Too long has the schoolmaster, and especially the classical man, been the butt of journalism and caricature. Too long has the teacher been content with more kicks than ha'pence. With scarcely a soul to call his own, and certainly not a voice in the administration of education, "unwept" when he is gone, and "unhonoured" while he is alive, he is ground between the upper millstone of faddism and officialism and the lower stone of crass prejudice and blatant materialism, as exemplified in the demand of an exigent parent, "I want my son taught chemistry, but only so far as it relates to the manufacture of brown meal."—I am, sir, etc.,

HINTERSCHLAG.

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS ALREADY ARRANGED FOR

ENGLISH.

NORMAN ANGELL.
HON. MAURICE BARING.
CANON WM. BARRY.
HILAIRE BELLOC.
A. C. BENSON.
MONSIGNOR R. H. BENSON.
REV. R. J. CAMPBELL.
G. K. CHESTERTON.
SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS.
EDMUND GARDNER.
LORD GUTHRIE.
THOMAS HOLMES.
SIR EVERARD IM THURN.
SIR OLIVER LODGE.
REV. NORMAN MACLEAN.
JOHN MASEFIELD.
PROFESSOR PHILLIMORE.
STEPHEN REYNOLDS.
ERNEST RIYS.
W. H. D. ROUSE.
PROFESSOR G. SAINTSEBURY.
THOMAS SECCOMBE.
SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON.

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE,
MRS. SIDNEY WEBB. [O.M.
H. G. WELLS.
REV. ALEXANDER WHYTE.
PERCEVAL GIBBON.
Prof. ARTHUR THOMSON.

FOREIGN.

VISCOUNT D'AVENEL.
HENRI BERGSON.
Professor HANS DELBRÜCK.
VICTOR GIRAUD.
COUNT GORLET D'ALVIELLA.
MME. FELIX FAURE GOYAU.
ALBERT HOUTIN.
Prince KROPOTKIN.
Professor EMILE LEGOUIS.
HENRI LICHTENBERGER.
BORN LUMBROSO.
COUNT LÜTZOW.
MAURICE MAETERLINCK.
ARTHUR LEVY.
HENRI MAZEL.
EMILE VANDERVELDE.

A HAPPY COMBINATION FOR LOVERS OF LITERATURE

Weekly 'Everyman' One Penny

Monthly 'The English Review' One Shilling

By an outlay of $1/4$ per month readers are brought into touch with matters of more than passing interest.

'THE ENGLISH REVIEW'

first published H.G. Wells' 'Tono Bungay',
'The New Machiavelli'; Conrad's 'Under
Western Eyes'; Masefield's three great Poems: 'The Everlasting Mercy,' 'The Widow in the Bye Street,' 'Dauber';
and is noted for virile short stories, frank and fearless criticism, and the best modern Poetry.

Annual Subscription 12/6 post free to all parts of the world.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF 'EVERYMAN.'

A Specimen Copy will be sent free upon receipt of a postcard addressed to The Manager,

'THE ENGLISH REVIEW,'

17-21, TAVISTOCK STREET,

COVENT GARDEN,

LONDON, W.C.

VERDICTS ABOUT PUBLIC OPINION

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

THE BEST WEEKLY REVIEW OF WHAT
MEN AND WOMEN THINK, SAY, AND DO.

It is a unique paper, presenting the cream of all the best thought in the best Papers, Magazines and Books on all Questions of the day. It is interested in Social Problems, in Religion, in Politics, in Science, in Literature, in all Arts and Crafts.

It is a Newspaper Room, a weekly Library of New Books, and always a cheerful and well-informed companion. It goes all over the world.

Read what is said of PUBLIC OPINION by
This Distinguished Jury

Dr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE,
The Distinguished Scientist.

"PUBLIC OPINION is the best of papers.
It has a genius for perceiving not only what is of high importance, but what is of interest in highly important things. I admire the paper immensely, and never miss it."

Sir W. ROBERTSON NICOLL,
Editor of the "British Weekly."

"Though a fairly diligent reader of newspapers, I never take up my PUBLIC OPINION without finding many things I had contrived to overlook. It is not surprising that the paper is growingly a favourite with the busy man who wishes to miss nothing and cannot afford to wade through the daily newspapers."

Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

"Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women."

Lord HALDANE.

"What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form, and has in it the touch of humanity. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on the right lines."

PUBLIC OPINION

can be had at all Newsagents' and Bookstalls at 2d., or this week's special issue will be sent on receipt of 23d. It can be sent for one year in the United Kingdom for 10.10; abroad, 13/-, post free. Address
Manager, PUBLIC OPINION,

32 & 33, Temple House, Talis Street, London, E.C.

St. Ivel stands for Purity —and something more.

St. Ivel Lactic Cheese is more than pure—for purity is not all that is required in a scientifically perfect cheese. St. Ivel Lactic Cheese is nutritious because it is wholly digestible—the curd is softened and is easily assimilated. It assists the digestion of other foods.

St. Ivel Lactic Cheese is deliciously creamy in taste, and most tempting to the appetite. It is beneficial because it contains organic phosphates of the kind that your nervous system can and does absorb, and which enable it to repair the wear and tear of age, worry, work and fatigue.

But, more important still, St. Ivel Lactic Cheese contains lactic acid cultures which eliminate the poisons that other foods create, and thus keep the system in splendid condition.

St. IVEL
CHEESE
LACTIC

“The Pride of the West Countrie”

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 3. Vol. 1.

[REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1912.

One Penny.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING— Notes of the Week	PAGE 69
DEMOCRACY AND DIPLOMACY— By Hector Macpherson	70
THE PRESENT POSITION OF POLAR EXPLORATION— By Sir Ernest Shackleton, C.V.O.	71
THE GERMAN EMPEROR (Part II.)— By Charles Sarolea	72
AUGUSTE RODIN— By Henry Mazel	74
PORTRAIT OF RODIN	75
GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY— I. The Bishop of London. By E. Hermann	76
THE TRUTH ABOUT CHARLES II.— By Cecil Chesterton	77
THE ANSWER OF THE SUFFRAGIST— By Lady Margaret Sackville	78
A NOTABLE FRENCH NOVEL— By Sir George Douglas	78

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

1. SIR E. SHACKLETON,
C.V.O.
2. PRINCIPAL WHYTE
3. CECIL
CHESTERTON
4. SIR GEORGE
DOUGLAS
5. ERNEST RHYS

Pius X. A Character Sketch— By Abbé Houtin	PAGE 79
MR. A. J. BALFOUR "AS A PHILO- SOPHER AND THINKER"	80
THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS	81
WAITING. By Peter Altenberg	82
DEMOS, THE DRUNKEN GIANT— By Dr. William Barry	83
JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL— By Principal Whyte	84
THE BURNING OF MOSCOW— By Count de Segur	85
MOLIERE AND MR. SHAW— By Ernest Rhys	88
A GREAT RUSSIAN REALIST—Feodor Dostoevsky	90
LETTERS DE MME. DU DEFFAND A HORACE WALPOLE	90
LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO	90
CORRESPONDENCE	92
LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED	96

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE stars in their courses are fighting against the Turks. With dramatic swiftness reverse after reverse is falling upon them. It was known that the objective of the Bulgarian army was Adrianople, but before it could be reached Killissa had to be attacked and captured. After a battle of great fierceness, which raged for the greater part of two days, the town was taken, with many guns and great quantities of munitions of war. To the Turks this is a disaster of the first magnitude, as it enables the invaders to advance upon Adrianople, which is gradually being surrounded by the allied troops. A great enveloping movement is in progress, thereby placing the Turkish army in Thrace in a position of extreme peril. Part of the garrison of Adrianople is said to have retreated to Danotica, on the main Constantinople-Salonica Railway. In fact, the Turks seem to be in a desperate position. The Bulgarians have cut off their line of retreat, and the Ottoman troops are described as being in a state of hopeless confusion.

So far, the most dramatic incident of the war is the fall of Uskub, the ancient capital of Servia. The Turks seem to have offered little or no resistance. No fewer than 113 guns were left behind in their hurried flight. Thus after a lapse of five hundred years the Servians return to their historical inheritance. Moreover, as Uskub is the key to Macedonia, its strategical importance is at once apparent.

The Greeks are making steady progress, and are now placing Salonica in jeopardy. The Montenegrins are finding Scutari a hard nut to crack. They have scored another success, having captured the town of Plevlige, near the Bosnian frontier. Speculation is rife with regard to the attitude of the Powers, in view of the sweeping success of the past week. Not, however, till absolutely decisive results from Adrianople are recorded can the Powers do anything but speculate. One thing is admitted to be certain, that in Macedonia Turkish rule shall cease. The status quo in the Balkans cannot be restored.

The startling events of the past few days are causing uneasiness in Roumania, which has hitherto remained a passive spectator. Russian movements are causing anxiety, and in addressing his Cabinet on Monday, the King said that important decisions would have to be come to, in view of the grave circumstances with which they were confronted. Ex-Sultan Abdul Hamid has arrived at Constantinople from Salonica. He was conducted to one of the palaces on the Bosphorus. Extraordinary precautions were taken to ensure privacy. His presence in the capital may have important developments, as there is considerable dissatisfaction with the Young Turks.

Evidence is to hand of the disastrous effect of the war upon trade. The cotton trade in East Lancashire is already in a depressed state, and two mills are working on short time. Four thousand miners have had to stop work at Cardiff, owing to the stoppage of the loading of Greek steamers.

For some time there has been dissatisfaction over the congestion of business in the Law Courts. The Attorney-General moved in the House of Commons that an address be presented to His Majesty for the appointment of an extra judge. The motion was accepted. It was further announced that a Royal Commission would be appointed to enquire into the cause of the congestion.

Among members of the Opposition the suggestion has been canvassed that in order to call the attention of the country to what they deem the "farceful" discussion of the Home Rule Bill, the Opposition should walk out of the House of Commons. Speaking at a dinner of the Nonconformist Unionist Association, Mr. Bonar Law said the Opposition had no intention of adopting the suggestion.

The Select Committee on the Marconi Agreement, which has held a preliminary meeting, Sir Albert Spicer presiding, have issued a statement that the Committee will hear any person who can bring before them any facts of which they may be possessed with reference to the charges or allegations of corruption on the part of any person or official in connection with the Marconi Agreement. The Committee, it is understood, will ask the House to give them powers to call counsel on behalf of witnesses if they think fit, following the precedent of the inquiry into the War Office contracts.

A landowner in the ranks of the land-taxers is surely suggestive of Saul among the prophets. At a meeting at Dorset the other night, Lord Ashby St. Leger said that as a landowner he welcomed the movement, which was attracting general attention and had raised high hopes. He was of opinion that the capital value or site-value of land afforded on the whole a broader and more equitable basis for rating than the present method of estimating rateable value. He contended that landowners as a whole had little to fear from the proposal. It was mainly the exploiters of slum property and those who held back land who would feel the pressure. The proposed adjustment would lighten rates in country parishes.

With two dissentients, Dr. Mahaffy and the Rev. T. T. Gray, the Board of Trinity College, Dublin, adopted a resolution on Saturday expressing approval of the amendment to the Home Rule Bill, with a view to excluding Dublin University from the authority of an Irish Parliament.

The doctors are being greatly exercised over the concessions made by Mr. Lloyd George. The opinion of Sir Wm. Plender, who was chosen by the British Medical Association practically as a referee in the dispute between Mr. Lloyd George and the medical profession, should carry great weight. Sir William thinks the offer is fair—indeed, generous. Though the chemists and druggists do not give an unqualified approval to the Government's new scheme for the payment of the doctors for insurance work, it is thought probable that they will acquiesce in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals.

In the Home Rule debate in the House of Commons on Monday, the important question of the control of the Royal Irish Constabulary was dealt with. By 306 votes to 208 it was decided that the control of the Constabulary be transferred to the Irish Parliament six years after the meeting of that assembly. Other reserved services, including old-age pensions, national insurance, and labour exchanges, may be transferred at any time by resolution of the Irish Parliament.

As the result of the Turkish defeats, there is considerable unrest among the native population in India. Hindu agitators, joined by Mahometans, are holding meetings, at which violent speeches are being delivered. A boycott of British goods is being urged, on the ground that Britain is in sympathy with the Balkan States.

In dealing with their workers, Belfast Corporation are taking a new departure which will be watched with interest. They are instituting a scheme of bonuses for their employees. As far as municipal undertakings are concerned, this is said to be the first experiment of the kind.

DEMOCRACY AND DIPLOMACY

IF the present war of five nations teaches one lesson, it is the lamentable failure of European diplomacy, and to the believer in democracy, causes of that failure are not far to seek. . . .

I.

From the sphere of Diplomacy the ideals and methods of the old régime have not been dislodged. Metternich, a historic representative of the old order, never ceased to express his contempt for public opinion as a factor in Diplomacy, a contempt which was shared by the Holy Alliance, whose self-constituted mission was to parcel amongst themselves the territory of Europe without regard to the racial affinities and national aspirations of the various peoples. The picture which La Brugère drew of the diplomatist of the eighteenth century remains life-like to-day:—"His talk is only of peace and alliances, of the public tranquillity and of the public interests; in reality he is thinking only of his own, that is to say, of his masters, or of his republic."

Canning ventured to break away from the old diplomatic tradition so far as to say that British influence abroad could only be effective when it was backed up by the House of Commons. Manifestly, to secure this it is essential that the Ambassadors who represent this country abroad should be men of acknowledged ability, selected on their own merits, and having the approval and confidence of Parliament as representing the nation. As a matter of fact, the people have no voice in the appointment of Ambassadors. The diplomatic service is a close corporation. It is used as a kind of outdoor relief for needy aristocrats. Now and again a really able diplomatist makes his way to the front rank, but that is an accident, and is not of the essence of the system.

II.

Under such a system, the nation stands small chance of securing the highest talents for the diplomatic service. In his "Final Recollections of a Diplomatist," Sir Horace Rumbold, on this particular point, makes a frank admission. He says: "Ability will not suffice to secure success in the service. In no profession, perhaps, is the man whose duties keep him constantly abroad more dependent on the solicitude of friends and connections at home. Real merit makes its way in Diplomacy, as elsewhere, but it must be of the highest order to hold its own against inferior capacity, subserved by political or family influence."

Surely we have here a most serious state of affairs. In domestic matters we strain every nerve, through our representative system, to send to Parliament men of ability. In foreign affairs, in which, as at the present moment, issues of momentous importance are at stake, we are represented by men of whose capabilities we have no guarantee whatever, and whose incapacity in times of crises may involve the nation in disaster. Time and again the nation has suffered terribly from bungling diplomacy. In the Balkan imbroglio we seem to be suffering from impotent diplomacy, and yet the nation is compelled to stand idly by while the national prestige is being lowered, and the national conscience outraged. The time has come for a thorough reform of the diplomatic service.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF POLAR EXPLORATION

BY SIR E. SHACKLETON, C.V.O.

I.

THE fact that the two great prizes of Polar exploration have been gained—the North and South Poles—undoubtedly tends to rob the ends of the earth of a certain amount of the glamour that has up till now always been part and parcel of Polar exploration; but never has this work been carried on more seriously than at the present time, and the mere conquest of the Poles does not in any way turn aside the serious explorer from working in these regions. There is undoubtedly one great feat and piece of exploration remaining to be done in the Antarctic, which, if accomplished, would make the actual journeys to the Pole and back seem small in comparison. This work would be the crossing of the South Polar continent. Even at its narrowest breadth—from the Weddell Sea to the Ross Sea—the journey would be over 2,000 miles. With the equipment of modern Polar expeditions it would be possible, I consider, to do this; but as yet we know not whether great mountain ranges make a hindrance at the Weddell Sea side to inland travelling similar to the great mountains on the Ross Sea side. To accomplish this expedition successfully, every nerve would have to be strained and every care in equipment would have to be taken. There would be no room for mistakes, and there would be no line of retreat. The explorer going in from the unknown at the Weddell Sea side would work towards the known on the Ross Sea side, and, unless plentifully blessed with money, the journey would have to be made in one season. This would be the last great inland journey that one can expect in the Antarctic. There is another work almost equally important—indeed, in some ways quite as important—and that is the exploration to be made by circling the Antarctic continent, defining its general shape, by sea. This would be a much longer journey and would require two or three seasons to accomplish it thoroughly, but the benefit to hydrographic science would be tremendous. However, these are prospective journeys.

II.

What I have to deal particularly with is the actual position now obtaining in the Polar Regions. There are three expeditions in the Antarctic, working in different quarters, of which we can expect to hear nothing until next March. The last news of Capt. Scott, of the British Expedition, was that he was steadily making his way towards the Pole, and this no doubt he reached about a month later than Amundsen, who arrived at the Pole on 16th of last December. Already the British Expedition has done a great deal of valuable scientific work, and may be fortunate in doing a certain amount of new geographical work in the present Antarctic summer.

Amundsen made an entirely new route to the Pole. Favoured by the fine weather, by his intimate knowledge of the handling of dogs, by the use of ski, and by his splendid organisation and by experience—not only his own but that of his men also—he undoubtedly made the most brilliant of all South Polar journeys. We as Britishers are sorry that it has not fallen to the lot of Capt. Scott to be first at the Pole, yet we cannot but admire the energy and successful achievement of Amundsen, and tender our warmest praise to him.

We can consider now that the Ross Sea side is fairly well known, and that future exploration in this area will be of a more detailed character.

III.

On the inhospitable shores of the north coast of the Antarctic are the two bases of the Australasian Antarctic Expedition. This expedition, which is located due south of Australia, is mainly a scientific one. Its equipment is good, the ground on which it is working is all new, and when it returns it will have no doubt charted in a large part of that unknown coast, and made valuable contributions to geology and to the science of magnetism. There is no doubt that protracted journeys will be made into the interior, and more light will be thrown in a geographical way on this part of the Antarctic than has ever been done before.

Diametrically opposite; south of South America, somewhere the German Expedition is wintering. This is the only one of the four expeditions that went South last year which has not been heard of. The German Expedition is splendidly equipped, with a highly scientific staff, and the object is to penetrate as far as possible into the land towards the South Pole from the Weddell Sea side. What they have done up till now, what measure of success they have had, is all conjecture, but that they will also bring back scientific information of value is certain, for the whole organisation of the expedition and method of working is typical of German thoroughness and scientific training. This part of the Antarctic is the region in which Bruce, the Scotch explorer, has worked, and though the Scotch Expeditions under Bruce have not devoted their time and energies to land travelling, it is to Bruce that we owe the hydrographical knowledge of this quarter of the Antarctic—knowledge that is as important to obtain as the knowledge gained on sledge journeys. Quietly, and without fuss or ostentation, for years Bruce has carried out, with his devoted staff, the most arduous and most difficult sort of Polar exploration—that is, by working in these icy seas.

IV.

To sum up the Southern situation, next March we ought to have news of the British, the Australasian, and the German Expeditions. They will have come back having done a certain amount of work, but there will be still left the greatest journey of all—the trans-Antarctic journey.

To turn to the North, there are a number of small expeditions mapping in and linking up the blanks that surround the Polar Ocean; but there is only one expedition of importance, which expects to penetrate right through the North Polar Ocean, and that is the Fram Expedition under Amundsen, which will next year set out to journey across the North Polar Sea, hoping to take in the Pole on the way.

Good work has been done by Mikkelsen, who has been in the Arctic for nearly three years, and has made many journeys in the north-east of Greenland. There is not so much to be done in the North as there is in the South, but from time to time no doubt expeditions of various sizes and with various objects in view will be starting out. There is one fascinating journey to be made. Peary on his last march thought he saw, from a lofty cape, land to the north-west of the mainland. He named this Crocker Land. An American Expedition was planned to start for this land this year, but the tragic death of the leader, Borup, who, after going through the hazardous journey with Peary, was drowned near New York, has put back the plans of this expedition for another year.

Thus, briefly, is the state of Polar exploration up to the moment of writing.

E. H. SHACKLETON.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR BY

CHARLES SAROLEA PART II.

I.

HIS PERSONAL IDIOSYNCRASIES AND VERSATILITY.

We have tried to set off in full relief the impress of the Hohenzollern tradition and heredity. But it would be to convey an entirely wrong idea of the Kaiser to represent him as a mere replica of a general type. Whether he is a strong man or not it will be for the reader to judge. One thing is certain, that he is a personality, that he has a decided originality, and that his individual idiosyncrasies are so striking that they sometimes almost seem to obliterate the family likeness.

The first trait we associate with the Kaiser is that of an impulsive and irrepressible sovereign.

The impulsiveness of the Kaiser expresses itself equally in his words and in his deeds, in his indiscretions and in his tactlessness. The distinction between his words and his deeds is perhaps more formal than real, because every word of the Emperor is equivalent to a deed. The most insignificant of his utterances may bind or compromise the nation in whose name he speaks. It is unnecessary to point out that the indiscretions of William have been innumerable. He is the irresponsible talker and speech-maker on the throne. There has hardly been a crisis in contemporary German history which cannot be traced to one of the "winged words" of William, and their consequences have often been incalculable. They partly explain the failure of German foreign policy. They explain how, in recent years, with every trump card in her game, Germany has on the whole achieved few substantial results.

The Kaiser has a restless temperament. He seems to be perpetual motion incarnate, and his restlessness at times almost assumes a morbid character, and has often been connected with the hereditary nervous complaint from which the Kaiser suffers.

II.

The Kaiser's restlessness is not only physical but it is also mental, and one of the forms which it takes is his abnormal versatility. As he is unable to remain in the same spot for two days on end, so he is unable to concentrate on the same topic. He changes his interests from day to day. He claims universal competency. His authority is not confined to the sphere of government, to matters of the army or navy or foreign policy. Every problem, human and divine, comes within his ken. He is an architect and an artist, and has drawn the famous cartoons illustrating the Yellow peril. He has given his support to, or withheld it from, various schools of painting or literature. He has assisted Direktor Bode in deciding which works of art are genuine and which spurious. He has appeared as a Biblical critic, and has lectured Professor Delitzsch on the Bible-Babel controversy. He has pronounced his verdict in the great battle between classical and modern languages, and he has declared in favour of a modern education. He has appeared as an authority on aeronautics, and has proclaimed Count Zeppelin the greatest German of the century.

In the sphere of politics the Kaiser's versatility has brought in its train political instability. His changeableness is not that of the realist and opportunist who adapts himself to circumstances. Rather is it that of the despot who follows the inspiration of the moment. No ruler has so often altered his opinions on persons and events. Again and again he has withdrawn his favour from statesmen or advisers who hitherto had enjoyed his absolute confidence. When a man has served his purpose he discards him. And as he is constantly changing his personal interest in men, so he is constantly shifting his political point of view. He has been in turn Anglophile and Francophile, or Turcophile or Russophile. He has no guiding principles in foreign policy, and he has imparted to German diplomacy that incoherence which has been its main weakness in the last generation.

III.

It is extraordinary that after all the mistakes he has made, and all the disappointments he has suffered, he should not have been sobered by events, and that after twenty-five years his chequered reign should not have made him a cynic and a sceptic. But the Kaiser remains an optimist. He hates and despises pessimists. He has enthusiasms rather than enthusiasm. He is always speaking in superlatives; and he continues to be brimful of youth. He makes us forget that he has ruled the empire for a quarter of a century. We still think of this father and grandfather of a patriarchal family, sufficiently numerous to fill all the thrones of Europe, as if he were a young man. And, in fact, he still possesses all his early juvenile exuberance.

IV.

His optimism may be due to his superabundant vitality, but it is due even more to his healthy and superb egotism, to his unshaken belief in himself. He has no misgivings; he is not addicted to introspective moods. He is not "sicklied o'er," like the Danish Prince, "with the pale cast of thought." Even though the whole of Germany were of one opinion, once William has made up his mind he will continue to think that he is right; always reserving to himself the privilege of changing the right opinion of to-day into the wrong opinion of to-morrow. He is not in the least likely to commit suicide, as Frederick the Great threatened to do after a severe defeat. Nor is he likely to abdicate, as William the First threatened to again and again. When Maximilian Harden demanded his abdication, after the Daily Telegraph crisis in 1908, the famous journalist only proved how little he understood either the temper of the Kaiser or that of his people.

V.

The Kaiser's egotism, which might have been dangerous to himself and might have induced the fate of Louis the Second of Bavaria, is tempered by his delightful vanity. All those who have approached him agree that it is vanity rather than pride which characterises the Kaiser. Vanity may be the characteristic of a weak man, yet to a ruler like William the Second vanity is rather a source of strength than a cause of weakness. For the proud man is satisfied with his own approval. Pride would have isolated William on the pinnacle of power. The vain man depends on the applause of others. The Kaiser's vanity has brought him nearer to his subjects, has made him more human and more sociable.

But there is one evil consequence of the Kaiser's unbounded vanity—namely, that it places him at the mercy of unscrupulous flatterers. All despots are exposed to that danger, but strong characters and enlightened rulers, like Frederick the Second, realising the danger, deliberately invite criticism, and surround themselves with able advisers. William the Second has generally been surrounded with courtiers and sycophants.

VI.

The boundless egotism, combined with the despotic temper, the vanity of a comparatively weak and amiable and sociable sovereign depending an applause, have been indulged for so many years that in the course of time it has degenerated into megalomania. In a Wittelsbach prince such megalomania would have led to madness. In the Hohenzollern it has only resulted in extravagance. That extravagance expresses itself in a thousand ways, especially in such striking manifestations as his fifty residences or his three hundred uniforms. It is characteristic of the Kaiser's total absence of humour that with his extravagant habits he is constantly preaching the simple life. It would have been well for him if he had practised a little more what he preaches, and if he had followed a little more the example of his ancestor, Frederick the Great, for he would have escaped the financial worries which have been his lot from the beginning of his reign. The Kaiser ought to be the richest man of his empire. His civil list has been repeatedly increased, yet William finds himself in an almost chronic state of bankruptcy, and his close relations with American millionaires and Jewish financiers have not sufficed to relieve him of his anxieties.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR (continued)

VII.

The Kaiser's megalomania also explains the theatrical aspects of his personality. All sovereigns love to surround themselves with the pomp and circumstance of the throne. Without it half of their prestige would vanish, and only giants like Frederick the Second or Napoleon could afford simplicity of dress and manner. But there is in the Kaiser something more than the ordinary love of splendour. There is something almost histrionic and Neronian in his composition—qualis artifex! The Kaiser loves to astonish, to dazzle his subjects. His appearances and his poses are those of an Imperial actor, and are always studiously calculated to produce a sensation. Hence his surprise visits, his startling appearances in regimental barracks in the dead of night or in the early morning; hence his Eastern journeys; hence, especially, the extraordinary importance he attaches to the ritual of dress and uniform. William the Second is obviously a believer in the clothes philosophy of Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus." No man will understand the Kaiser who does not attach as much importance to this side of his character as he does himself. It has been said that the Kaiser has such a nice perception of the fitness of things in this matter that when he visits an aquarium he thinks it necessary to put on the uniform of an admiral, and that when he eats an English plum pudding he thinks it necessary to don the uniform of the Dragoon Guards. Certainly the three hundred uniforms of Kaiser William will become as legendary in German history as the simple threadbare coat of Frederick the Great.

VIII.

The love of the sensational and the theatrical also explains the so-called romanticism of William. Although he has often been compared to Lohengrin, his is by no means the romanticism of Wagner. He makes no appeal to the emotions or to the imagination, but only appeals to the senses. He may not be impervious to certain aspects of poetry. Some of his utterances, like the speech on Drake and the Pacific, are distinctly poetical. But as a rule William's romanticism is mainly a certain Sinn für das Äussere—a love for external splendour.

IX.

"Tell me what a man believes, and I shall tell you what he is," is an often quoted saying of Carlyle. We may safely apply this criterion to the psychology of the Kaiser. For his religion is part of his personality, and, like his personality, it has often been misunderstood. We are continuously told that he is a Christian mystic; but, indeed, there is in his disposition little of the Christian and still less of the mystic. It is true that he delights in preaching sermons, because he has a natural gift of speech, and he delights in preaching just as he delights in yachting, drawing, and painting. But he has none of the Innerlichkeit, none of the sense of mystery which characterises the genuine mystic. And he has as little of the humility and of the sense of sin which characterises the genuine Christian. The Kaiser's Christianity is essentially political. It is that of most despots who have used religion for political purposes. Christianity is useful to fight the enemies of the empire, and in these days of social unrest the altar is the necessary prop of the throne.

"I believe that to bind all our fellow-citizens, all our classes together, there is only one means, and that is Religion—not, indeed, religion understood in a narrow, ecclesiastical, and dogmatic sense, but in a wider, more practical sense, with relation to life." (August 31, 1907.)

"I expect from you all that you will all help me, priests and laymen, to maintain religion in the people. Whoever does not establish his life on the foundation of religion is lost, and therefore I will pledge myself to-day to place my whole empire, my people, my army, symbolically represented through this staff of command, myself and my family, under the Cross and its protection." (June 19, 1902.)

X.

The title of Bossuet's famous treatise, "Politics based on Holy Scripture," might sum up the Emperor's political creed. Politics must be based on religion; they are bound up with it. The Kaiser believes in an ever-present Providence, and he believes that Providence has chosen the German people as His people, and has chosen the Hohenzollern as His rulers. He has never doubted that he is the vicegerent appointed by God Almighty to carry out His will. Never did mediæval Pope believe more absolutely in his divine mission:—

"... in a kingdom by the grace of God, with its responsibility to the Creator above, from which no man, no minister, no parliament can absolve the sovereign." (August, 1897.)

"I see in the people and in the country that I have inherited a talent entrusted to me by God, and which it is my duty to increase." (March, 1890.)

"In our house we consider ourselves as . . . appointed by God to direct and to lead the nations over which it has been given us to rule to a higher state of well-being, to the improvement of their material and spiritual interests." (April, 1890.)

"You know that I consider my whole office and duty as imposed on me by Heaven, and that I have been called in the service of the Highest, to whom I shall have to render one day an account of my trust." (February, 1891.)

And the best proof that the Kaiser's religion is mainly political is that in matters of religion his tolerance verges on laxity. In matters political—that is to say, in matters where men generally are tolerant—he is narrow and intolerant. On the contrary, in matters religious, where a deeply religious mind is almost inevitably narrow, the Kaiser is marvellously broad-minded. Ex officio he is a Lutheran, he is the defender of the Lutheran faith. At the same time his sympathies are Catholic, and he has never missed an opportunity of expressing his admiration for a religion which stands for authority and discipline; and he also combines a profound sympathy for Mohammedanism. And being thus equally and impartially sympathetic to Lutheranism, Catholicism, or Mohammedanism, like a very Nathan the Wise, or like a modern indifferent sceptic, he only happens to be intolerant of the one form of Christianity which does not favour his despotic policy. In the famous speech against Stoecker he expresses his abhorrence for democratic Christianity and Christian Socialism. Yet who could doubt that Christian Socialism is one of the most genuine forms of Christianity, and that Pastor Stoecker, whom William so fiercely denounces, is on the whole a more fervid Christian than the official Court chaplains of his Majesty?

AUGUSTE RODIN

HENRI MAZEL (of the "Mercur de France")

BY

I.

IT has been said that Rodin is the greatest sculptor the world has known since the Renaissance. Even without going so far, it is impossible to deny that Rodin is the greatest sculptor of the present time. No artist in marble or bronze can be compared with him, even remotely, either in France or abroad.

Rodin is now seventy-two years old, and his vigorous and fruitful old age is the admiration of the world. Short, thick-set, broad-shouldered, and wide-faced, he conveys a feeling of calm power, reminding one rather of Victor Hugo, who also was not tall. At first one regrets that his long beard and his eyes half-closed behind eye-glasses seem almost to hide his face; but through his beard one sees his thick, readily smiling lips, and behind the eye-glasses one quickly perceives the expression of his blue-grey eyes, often dreamy, always thoughtful.

II.

He was born in Paris, and has always lived there, except during a few years after the war of 1870, when he had to live in Brussels; and he has always been a sculptor, though early in his career painting seduced him. For long he worked without recognition, unlike so many young artists who are quickly brought into prominence by an amusing or novel exhibit at the Salon. He was thirty-seven years of age when public attention was first drawn to him by his cast, the Bronze Age. This work represents a young man, naked, standing apparently awaking from sleep. Rodin wished to symbolise humanity issuing from a condition of primitive barbarism and awakening to a new civilisation, hence his title, Bronze Age, which by its mystery was intended to arouse curiosity. Surprise was legitimate, so great was the merit of this work. The beautiful body was so life-like, the chest seeming to rise and fall with natural breathing, that Rodin was accused of simply having moulded his model. He had to convince his calumniators that this was not so, and in 1880 the Bronze Age, cast in bronze, obtained the third medal at the Salon. Rodin began to emerge from obscurity; he was forty years old.

One after another he produced St. John the Baptist, the Creation of Man, the busts of Jean Paul Laurens, Victor Hugo, Dalton; to his friends he showed his casts for the Gate of Hell and the Burghers of Calais. At the time of the Universal Exhibition of 1889 he was already well known. His fame was further assured by that of 1900. At the immense World Fair, that great exhibition which closed the nineteenth century or ushered in the twentieth, a special pavilion on the banks of the Seine sheltered all the works of the master.

III.

Twelve years have passed since this official recognition, urbi et orbi, of the fame of the national French sculptor, and during these twelve years Rodin has never ceased to produce marvels. Sometimes they are finished works, sometimes they are merely roughed out. It is perhaps then that they are most impressive. His productiveness is immense, and none of his work is without value; some of it, at first sight, is of disconcerting originality. Such is his famous Balsac, a species of phantom enveloped in a winding sheet, a distorted apparition, which the municipality of Paris did not dare to erect in a public place, and to which it preferred Falguière's more conventional statue.

But in spite of this, with the Thinker, which stands before the Panthéon and above all the numerous works in the Luxembourg Gallery, a very good idea of the genius of this great sculptor may be formed by even the casual passer-by in Paris. It is in the Luxembourg that the most varied and the most striking specimens of his art are to be found: the Bronze Age, so exquisitely youthful; the St. John the Baptist, of such dominating power; the torso of the ancient Helmet-maker, a miserably wrinkled, shrivelled old woman; and the Danaïde, the most delicious crouching back of a young girl that one can imagine; the bust of Puvis de Chavannes, in vigorous relief; the bust of Madame de V. With the reduced models of Spring and the Kiss, which are always exhibited in Barbedienne's windows, and the casts of the Gate of Hell and the Burghers of Calais, which may also be seen in Paris, a sufficient knowledge of the works of the master will be obtained.

IV.

Rodin explained his work in a conversation which M. Gsell, the well-known critic, has preserved. "I must tell you that I have oscillated during my whole life between the two great tendencies of sculpture, between the conception of Phidias and that of Michael Angelo. I began by following the Classic ideal, but when I went to Italy I was suddenly captivated by the great Florentine master, and my work certainly showed signs of this passion. Since then, especially of late years, I have returned to the Classic." It is the case that Rodin's work towards the middle of his life shows the influence of Michael Angelo very markedly, notably in the Burghers of Calais, where we find the same painful effort as in the Captives of the Louvre; just as the Thinker of the Place du Panthéon, though more agonised, suggests the Penséroso of the tomb of the Medicis.

Rodin nevertheless affirms that, as sculptor, he has always implicitly copied nature; he does not even insist on his models posing. This is the habit of all sculptors; but, says Rodin, "by thus violating nature and treating human creatures like dolls, one runs the risk of producing dead, artificial work. As for me, hunter after truth and watcher of life, I take care not to follow their example. I take from the life movements that I observe, but I do not dictate them."

V.

The master is conscious of his genius, and sometimes Parisian taste, which is so subtly discreet, so measured, so inimical to anything the least out of place in a salon, has reproached him with too great a love of advertisement, and a self-esteem almost embarrassing to the mundane vanities of those with whom he comes in contact. Rodin is simple-minded and wise: "Compare me to Rembrandt," said he one day to a friend. "What a sacrilege! How can you dream of such a thing, my friend? Before Rembrandt we must prostrate ourselves; let us set no one beside him!" Even—and this is more difficult to the small-minded—he renders full justice to the great contemporary artists, his fellows. "To think that he lived amongst us!" he murmured, when speaking of Puvis de Chavannes; "to think that this genius, worthy of the most glorious period of art, has spoken to us, that I have seen him, that I have shaken his hand!"

AUGUSTE RODIN, NATUS 1840

GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY * * * BY E. HERMANN I.—THE BISHOP OF LONDON

I.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: To the man who sees London after William Blake's uncanny fashion, not with but through the eye, the title conjures up a load of responsibility too grievous, too utterly appalling, to be borne by any mere mortal. To shepherd that vast mixed multitude, of queerly pathetic and more or less hurt and wandering souls, that go to make up his spiritual vision of London is a task no man can face squarely and live. But, both unfortunately and mercifully, the title has long since lost the sharp edge of its first tremendous connotation, and to the average man of to-day the Bishop of London stands for no more than the conventional representative of an established ecclesiastical system no longer "national" in anything more than in name. This attitude may be deplorable, but it is a fact that has to be faced. The average man is not interested in Bishops. They are to him more or less harmless survivals, completely out of relation to his own life, whose only chance of safeguarding their ancient prerogative lies in refraining from its exercise. But if the average man is not interested in Bishops, he is keenly interested in men, and quite ready to ask, even concerning an "ecclesiastical survival," What sort of a man is he?

II.

Not a conventional man, on the face of it, and therefore likely to puzzle, in spite of his transparent singleness of nature. Thus timid Protestants dread him as a "Romaniser," while punctilious Ritualists describe his genuflections as "the merest bobbing," and deplore his blindness to the true inwardness of the Catholic movement, conceived in terms of ceremonial minutiae. Puritans lament his "worldliness" and the genial ease with which he disports himself at the festive boards of the wealthy. Worldlings relate how, at these same festive boards, he will turn, without any jerk or sense of incongruity, from "a rattling good story" to the most extraordinary of queer talk about "the Grace of God." Bookmen laughingly accord him a place in history as the Bishop with the smallest book bill ever known.

III.

Sticklers for dignity object to the free-and-easy, hail-fellow-well-met air with which he greets not only non-churchgoing, Socialist working men, but "even Nonconformist ministers." Socialists and Liberal thinkers gnash their teeth at his hide-bound ecclesiasticism, and his hopelessly narrow views on such questions as divorce. Through this blur of impressions there comes just one clear, unifying picture of the man—the one picture which has gripped the popular imagination as a whole. It is the figure of the then Bishop of Stepney arraigning the water companies of East London on behalf of a suffering people, and telling how, on a sweltering summer's day, he had to go back half a mile to his house and fetch some of the water he had stored for himself to moisten the lips of a dying slum girl. "Alas for the rarity of Christian charity under the sun," that this kindly act should have bitten into the consciousness of Pagan London as a rare and unforgettable thing!

Dr. Winnington-Ingram is an alumnus of the only school from which a Bishop of London should graduate—the East End. Doubtless he was born with the episcopal soul; but he learnt to possess that soul of his as Head of Oxford House and vicar of St. Matthew's. One doubts if under any circumstances he could have come at a really deep appreciation of intellectual or spiritual subtleties; but what he can appreciate—and that with a sympathy so keen and sensitive as to be almost substitutionary—is that struggle to make ends meet which is the only problem of millions of lives, and the blazing iniquity of the general economic conditions under which "the other half" lives.

IV.

And to-day as Bishop of London, Dr. Winnington-Ingram's work is still nothing more official and statesmanlike than the simple human task of understanding and helping and loving men. As in the old days he Christianised the alienated worker by the sheer warmth and reality of loving goodwill, so in these days he is Christianising the conventional churchmanship of the well-to-do by the same artless magic. He has never made a "problem" of things: he has only tried to help; and that is why he remains the most contagious of optimists. A love that owes nothing to mood or sentiment, and has the driving power of practical ability and administrative passion behind it, can work wonders even in modern London. In the closest and most real touch with its darkest problems, the Bishop is yet the brightest, merriest soul in it. He acts like a splash of colour upon our leaden-grey existence. He enjoys his work—every bit of it and every minute of it. He is in love with life, dips both hands into the stuff of it, and juggles gold out of its very mud. He has a frank relish for all valid pleasure; the most unworldly of men in the deep sense, he need not affect to despise it.

V.

A great preacher Dr. Winnington-Ingram is not. His life has left him little leisure for the cultivation of pulpit gifts, and he has learnt that a man often preaches most strenuously with his teeth shut. Direct and frank he is in the pulpit, with an abundance of homely gesture, and a delightful naturalness which make a popular appeal. Above all, there is indomitable purposefulness. Look and word intend something, and intend it doggedly. Something has got to be proven (though never to the dry intelligence merely), and he proves it so hard that at times the cart goes before the horse. He does not mince matters. His tense, large mouth, piercing eyes, and uncompromising voice tell us that before he has said the thing that crashes into our corrupt respectabilities and pious frauds. His social conscience does not allow him to give the conventional "pew-lounger" a good time. He scourges forward relentlessly, pelts with hot words, cares nothing for verbal artistry, but everything for spiritual and moral effect. At times he fails of this effect by reason of having more temperament than he can adequately express; but sooner or later the sheer driving power of a passionate intention overcomes the paralysis, and sends the shaft straight home. And then, suddenly, when he has spoken his roughest, most shattering word, one divines behind it the love whose sternness guarantees its reality. And one recognises that this downright man, whose pity for "Jenny's case" unlocks the gates of wrath, but breeds no pharisaic hatred of the society which he so fearlessly denounces as her betrayer, has a very real right to be called the Bishop of London.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CHARLES II * * * BY CECIL CHESTERTON

I.

I HAVE just been turning over an edition of Green's "Short History of the English People," which is profusely adorned with illustrations taken from contemporary engravings, woodcuts, portraits, and caricatures. I have, I hasten to add, been looking at these illustrations; not at the book. In truth, they are very much better looking at. Green said nothing that Macaulay had not already said much better; but these pictures say a great many things that both Green and Macaulay conspicuously omitted to say. For instance, there is a representation of the banner of the Covenanters, with the inscription on it of "No quarter." But that is not what I want to talk about.

II.

Among the reproductions in this book I have found a quite extraordinarily good portrait of Charles II. It is from a miniature of Cooper in the Royal Collection at Windsor. I imagine it is not the picture upon which Charles made the famous comment that if he was like that he was an ugly fellow—though it well might be. But I have seldom come across a representation of one long dead that seemed so startlingly convincing. When your eye lights upon it you are sure that just so did he look to those who saw him alive.

III.

It is curious how little things about a man which the historians tend to leave out as personal, accidental, and unimportant change the whole picture when once you get your imagination to grip them and work on them. For instance, I am sure that those who have got a vague idea of Charles II. from the superficial tradition started by his later detractors would naturally think of him as sauntering gracefully through life, and would picture his movements as languorous and even lounging. In fact, he walked at such a break-neck pace that his courtiers panted to keep up with him. I am sure they would conceive him as uttering his polished epigrams in appropriately dulcet accents: they would not associate his personality with a loud voice and a great roaring laugh like Dr. Johnson's. They would feel that such a man as they were thinking of would lie abed late in the morning in soft and luxurious repose. They would not conceive a man who always rose at six, until three days before his death.

IV.

Not^e again his favourite recreations; how he loved anything that involved working with his hands. Carpentry fascinated him, and he could not rest till he had mastered the craft of ship-building. While his restless brain was keenly interested in the new science which was the fashion of his court, he liked best the manual part of it, dabbling in chemicals or dissecting out tendons and organs. That craving to handle and carve, to deal with material substances in a strong and sure fashion, goes with the same bodily vigour and power of bodily outbreak which were the first things that struck those who actually met the second Charles Stuart.

Yet the fact remains that this very able and very energetic man has left to later ages the reputation of a trifle. That is fact that has to be explained. It is, perhaps, worth while to hazard a guess at the explanation.

V.

To me it always seems that Charles II., with all his brains, with all his vigour of body and mind, and with a great deal that was decent in his character, was spoiled for greatness by the fact that he had no ultimate ties. There was nothing that he quite felt to be worth being great for.

Note with what cruelty fate cut every one of the ties that might have bound him to some purpose or some idea.

His father had been a king—with the great traditions of English kingship. He lost that kingship when the younger Charles was a mere boy, and it never returned. Charles I. rode out of London to set up his standard at Nottingham, the last real King of England. Charles II. returned to London from the Hague a salaried servant of his Parliaments—of the Great Houses. He played the political game against them superbly, and, for the moment, triumphantly. But it was a mere brilliant rally. Kingship had gone down in battle in the previous generation. Charles did not believe in it quite enough to fight for its restoration; and political intrigue, great as were his talents for it, could not make him king, it only made him a highly successful politician.

VI.

As it was with his royalty, so it was with his nationality. He was driven from his country as a lad. Exile, continued until manhood, inevitably made him a cosmopolitan.

Then, he had no legitimate offspring. I am certain that this misfortune was always eating out his heart, and subtly perverting his nature. Had he had a son by his marriage, he would have been a good father—perhaps a good husband too. He lavished tenderness on the children of his loose amours, but they could never be to him what a child would have been that could have borne his name and continued his line.

Finally, he had a religion which he sincerely held to be true. The presentation of him which makes him a careless sceptic frightened on his death-bed into piety is certainly and demonstrably false. He was of nature a religious man; but the religion in which he believed he was never till his last hours suffered to profess. He was forced into scoffing as a refuge from hypocrisy.

VII.

Those are the elements of the tragedy of Charles II. It is not always the sovereigns who end their lives on the scaffold whose fate is the most tragic. When all is said, I fancy that Mary Stuart suffered less torments than the Queen who put her to death. And, when I remember all that this man did, and all that he did not do, all that he was, and all that he would have chosen to have been, I am not at all sure that the second Charles Stuart was a more fortunate man than the first—though he was assuredly an abler and probably a better one.

For there were elements of greatness, not only intellectual, but moral, in Charles II. There was magnanimity in him, there was courage. There was charity, and at root not a little humility. Many kings and many subjects have left a very respectable reputation with a less decent moral outfit. Yet so little came of him; he wasted so much, not merely of his substance only, but of his soul.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CHARLES II

(continued)

VIII.

And then I look again at the marvellous portrait of which I spoke at the beginning, and the contemplation of which started me on this train of thought. It shows a dark, ugly, powerful face framed in one of those toppling wigs of the age, which makes it seem even swarthier and more lowering than before. The mouth is large, and at once firm and sensual. It is flanked with deep lines, and its corners are twitched into a half-smile that nothing else in the face reflects. It is a smile of mere irony—certainly not of happiness. The chin is deeply cloven, the jaw square and determined. But the eyes interest me most; one cannot help staring at them; they seem to stare from the page. They are the eyes of a man of genius, and of a humorist. There is irony in them also, but something more than irony, something deeper than irony. I am not sure that I know its name, but I think it is Pain.

Then again, I think of what this man did, but yet more of what he failed to do, of what he was, and of what the deeper part of him wished to be; and again, I look at the imprisoned vitality of the face that stares so convincingly from the pages I have been poring over.

And I am certain that I am right. I am looking at the portrait of one of the least happy of the sons of men.

CECIL CHESTERTON.

THE ANSWER OF THE SUFFRAGIST

"WE will die for you in your need, but we will not give you bread,

Nor the wage of bread, though ye seek through the length and breadth of the land,

O Woman, whom we adore!" said the World; and the Woman said:

"This is a hard saying, O World, and we do not understand!"

"But open your doors at least, let us tread an equal way.

Since live we must, we ask no aid; we will fight alone.

For our very daily bread we will fight." But the World said, "Nay,

What will ye do in the mart who should sit crowned on a throne?"

"Alas!" said the Woman; "but thrones we have none, and the years roll by.

Wilt thou keep us then, wilt thou give us aid, lest we spend our youth

Homeless, toiling alone?" But the World said, "Live ye, or die,

For what has the World to do with homeless women in sooth?"

"But ah!" cried the Woman, "World, who adores us, how shall we live,

Since closed is the door of Life, and thou hast the key?

Have ye no other gift, no better counsel to give?"

Said the World: "We are old and heavy with slumber; what has been, shall be."

LADY MARGARET SACKVILLE.

A NOTABLE FRENCH NOVEL*

I.

THERE is solid satisfaction in hailing the advent of a successful French novel, which is characterised on the one hand by a proper reticence in regard to the nefanda of human life, and on the other by rare beauty and refinement, both of tone and feeling and of literary style. To compare this book with the book which, from their common connection with the Goncourt Prize, most obviously challenges it to comparison—the over-praised "Marie-Claire" of Marguerite Andoux—would profit nothing. For, whilst the earlier novel owed much, if not most, of its notoriety to the fact that it was understood to be the work of a sempstress, the later book rests its claim to regard upon literary merits only.

There is about it nothing sensational or exotic, no attempt to pique or stimulate curiosity. For it is, in fact, simply a sober and faithful study of a single normal character, viewed in relation to subsidiary characters, and to its own individual setting or environment. It is true that the author dates this "Story of a Country Gentleman" in the year 1840. But the date seems to me to take away from, rather than add to, the interest of the narrative. For, if we omit one or two incidental references, to bygone modes of travel or of hair-dressing, there is really nothing left which might not be applied to the life of the present day. Be it understood, however, that the life depicted is a very special life—a life in the depths, or wilds, of the country, and of a special country at that: to wit, Le Bocage, which, together with its nobility and their patriarchal relations with their tenantry, has been so well described, as it was at an earlier date, by Madame de la Rochejaquelein.

II.

Monsieur des Lourdines is a landowner, of rather more than middle age, whose energies have been driven inward, rather than drawn out, by the peculiar circumstances of his life. His wife is a self-centred invalid, his son a selfish spendthrift. Neither has early education done much to liberate his character. Yet his nature is deeply affectionate, and demands the warmth of kindly relationships. It is artistic, too, for he is a musician, though without an audience. Under a quaint and somewhat quizzical exterior, he nurses delicate and lofty sentiments, a poet's passion for Nature, a true patriot's love of the soil. There are some respects in which his habits are scarcely above those of the peasantry whose confidence he enjoys, for he will relish a meal in his own kitchen, or turn superfluous space in his own house to account for storing hay.

This story, when all is said, is as brief and slight as it is touching. It is simply that of the man whose code of honour, possibly over-strained, calls him to resign what he most loves. And it is no doubt a weakness in the book that it leaves us unconvinced of the fruitful and abiding character of the spendthrift Anthime's conversion. But it is not upon incident that this book relies for the charm and fascination which characterises its every page. It is rather upon minute and sympathetic analysis of a lovable character, on graphic sketches of peasant-life, on admirable transcripts of the aspects and atmosphere of Nature, and, last, not least, upon a delicate and unfailing literary art.

GEORGE DOUGLAS.

* "Monsieur des Lourdines." Par A. de Châteaubriant. Paris: Bernard Grasset. 1912. English translation. "The Keynote." Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

PIUS X.

I.

EVERYONE KNOWS, or has known, men gifted with no extraordinary talent, but absolutely devoted to their business, who have slowly worked their way through the lower grades, and who, thanks to some lucky chance, have ended by reaching the highest position. This has been the history of the present Pope. The son of poor and honest parents, he was brought up by and for the Church. He drank in its spirit, he made an excellent pupil, an excellent curate. At forty he was still a country priest. His Bishop, having need of a vicar-general, naturally chose this hard-working priest, who knew his theology by heart. The Abbé Sarto made such a good administrator that, nine years later, his Bishop proposed him for the Bishopric of Mantua.

In 1895 Leo XIII., wishing to put an end to the rights of patronage which the Italian Government claimed over the See of Venice, decided to appoint to that See a Churchman against whom the Government could put forward no insuperable objection, and whose appointment they would be forced to accept—compromises such as this being frequent between the Vatican and the Quirinal. The Pope chose Mgr. Sarto, made him a Cardinal on June 12th. Three days later he was proclaimed Archbishop and Patriarch of Venice. Circumstances prevented the Bishop-elect from taking possession of his See for some time, but at length, on November 24th, 1894, the new Patriarch made his entrance into his devoted town.

II.

Eight years later, at the first scrutiny taken at the Conclave after the death of Leo XIII., the votes were divided among ten Cardinals, Rampolla having 24, Gotti 17, and Sarto 5. The Austrian veto having set aside Rampolla, Sarto received an increasing number of votes. His kindly ways and his lack of all ambitious designs rallied to his side the bewildered electors. At the seventh scrutiny Sarto had 50 votes, Rampolla had only 10, and Gotti only 2. The Patriarch of Venice was elected. When he was asked what name he would take, he answered, "Trusting in the support of those holy pontiffs who have honoured, by their virtues, the name of Pius, and who, especially of late, have shown so much courage in the defence of the persecuted Church, I wish to be called Pius!" Thus his mind turned first to the warrior Popes—Pius VI., victim of the French Revolution; Pius VII., the prisoner of Bonaparte; Pius VIII., the enemy of Freemasonry; Pius IX., the Pope of the Syllabus.

III.

Nine years have passed since then. In the recent history of the Church few Popes have suffered, during so long a period, so many insults, so much ridicule. How often have we heard of "poor Sarto"—who forsooth was nothing but a plain country priest, and who had retained the low intellectual level, the cunning and the incapacity of his origin! How many times has he not been compared to his predecessor, the diplomat, whose memory is surrounded with a halo! A low type of anticlericalism is dominant on the Continent, and its supporters delight in repeating that the Pope is a fool, that the ancient and glorious diplomacy of Rome has failed at last, that the Church is dying. Such things give them pleasure, and further inspire them to continue the fight. But how far do they correspond to the truth?

Pius has at least one characteristic of the country priest, or, rather, of the old type of country priest, which is rapidly disappearing, a strong and simple faith. He certainly has never doubted the divine institution of the Catholic Church. He believes himself to be the successor of Peter and the Vicar of Christ. A strong faith, an absolute confidence in the assistance of the Holy Spirit, the conviction of his own infallibility may have their disadvantages, but they can also inspire a salutary sense of authority, and in dangerous times can carry through successfully difficult negotiations, avoiding the rocks and triumphing in the storm.

IV.

In his first Encyclical (November 4th, 1903) Pius X. gave as his programme "the restoration of all things in Christ"—of course, Christ as understood by himself—Christ as understood by the Papacy—whose image differs from that which has been revered by millions of other Christians, and who differs still more from the historical Christ—this legendary Christ who established a Church, who founded it upon Peter, and who said to Peter, "Feed My sheep, feed My lambs." This programme Pius has laboured incessantly to fulfil.

In order that the ecclesiastical government should be more prompt, more elastic, and better adapted to modern times, he reorganised the Roman Curia—that is to say, the bureaucracy of his spiritual kingdom. He ordered a general revision and remodelling of all ecclesiastical law—an enormous labour, not yet completed, but which has been carried out so admirably that there can be no doubt of its eventual success. He has reformed the education and the instruction of the secular and of the regular clergy, so that the Church may have more capable ministers. And as there exist in the Church "false reformers," sham "modernists," who, having struck out a new line of their own, yet pretend to maintain the continuity of Roman doctrine and tradition, he has reduced them to silence or driven them from the fold.

V.

As to the faithful, he has called them to their one and only duty with a brevity which is entirely apostolic. "The multitude," he has said,* "has no other duty than to allow itself to be led and, like a meek flock, to follow its pastors." The laity are gathered round their Bishops, these in turn surround the Pope, and thus they attain the haven of eternal salvation. Each diocese has to have religious and social activities, which include all the faithful, and in these they are trained, so to speak, from the cradle to the grave—shelters for children, homes for young boys and girls, groups of young Catholics, study circles, associations of workmen, of labourers, of women, whose object is to further piety, or mutual benefit societies, savings banks, etc." Those associations "have to be administered by men who are Catholics, not only in name, but also in deed and spirit, who show in everything the respect due to the Bishop and the Sovereign Pontiff." No one is admitted who might lead the association "out of the narrow path of the Faith." No one unless he is thoroughly orthodox can be elected to their management. These associations must proclaim themselves Catholic. "It is neither straightforward nor right that they should hide their Catholic characteristics, disguising them as if they were damaged or contraband goods."†

VI.

Such is the network of religious and social activities which have to embrace the whole Catholic world, and by means of an extremely detailed inquiry sent to all the Bishops,‡ which they have to answer at set intervals, the Sovereign Pontiff can always know what state his people are in in every diocese.

Marvellous centralisation of the Roman Church! In

* "Encyclique Vehementer," No. 1, February 16th, 1906. "Multitudines officium sui gubernari se pati, et rectorum sequi ductum obedienter."

† Letter from Pius X. to Count Medalgo-Albani, November 22nd, 1905.

‡ "Décret de la Sacrée Congrégation Consistoriale," December 31st, 1909.

PIUS X. (continued)

the Middle Ages, at a time when all Western Europe owned the sway of the Roman Church, national and local usages, rights recognised by lay or spiritual lords, still showed some variety and freedom. Then there existed Catholic unity. Pius seems to be realising the dream of his predecessors—Roman uniformity. Since rapid communication now allows of the immediate transmission of the Papal decrees, since an absolutely obedient hierarchy executes these orders, since a Press carefully organised in all parts of the world can keep these decrees before the public view, one can say that never has the Roman Church known a centralisation so powerful as that which Pius X. has given her.

VII.

"How he deludes himself—that poor old Pope!—worthy of the Middle Ages!" Protestant journalists and anti-clerical writers are heard to exclaim when they read his Encyclicals and Ordinances. And how often have they represented the feeling caused by certain Pontifical restrictions as a check suffered by the Pope! Pius has suffered no check. Certainly, he has not been able to raise the clergy to the moral elevation for which he had hoped, but he has materially reformed them. His decrees, which have caused surprise, and even protest, have become part and parcel of Catholic habits; even those which related to the age of the first Communion, or those which summon ecclesiastics before the tribunals. The decree "Ne Temere," relating to marriage, is carried out even in Ireland and Canada—countries in which, men said, it would arouse serious resistance.

Death can attack Pius X.; age or sickness can paralyse his activity; his name will always stand in ecclesiastical history as that of a great reformer. And when it is remembered that this son of a peasant has slowly won his way through all the degrees of the hierarchy, one can understand, without difficulty, how, having become Pope, he can show himself to be a wise administrator, and how his deep piety has discovered so many ingenious means of remedying the shortcomings which he had witnessed and from which he has suffered. He defended the "Lord's flock" bravely. Has he added to it? Since the success of so many efforts depends on a system of supervision which daily becomes more difficult, one cannot reasonably blame him for not being more successful than Gregory VII. in his attempt to establish a universal theocracy. That he has known how to maintain and to preserve the Catholic Church is sufficient for his glory. ABBÉ HOUTIN.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR "AS A PHILOSOPHER AND THINKER"*

I.

Now that Mr. Balfour has retired from the leadership of his party, it is natural that attempts should be made to sum up his career so far as it has gone. Help in this direction is afforded by the volume of selections from his writings and speeches compiled by Mr. Wilfrid Short. An article in the current number of the Edinburgh Review will further assist the reader in understanding the composition of one of the subtlest minds of modern times. We come near to understanding Mr. Balfour if we think of him, with reservations, as a nineteenth-century David Hume. It is not meant that he accepts Hume's conclusions, but that his cast of mind is of the Humian type, analytic and sceptical. Hume reduced the philosophy of his time to chaos by his superb employment of the critical method. He so undermined philosophy by weakening the foundations that the consternation thereby caused drove

* "Arthur James Balfour as a Philosopher and Thinker." By W. M. Short. (Longmans.)

Kant to the task of reconstructing the science upon an entirely new basis.

In the spirit of Hume, Mr. Balfour, in his "Defence of Philosophic Doubt," deals with the naturalism of modern science. Hume, taking the assumptions of Locke and Berkeley, showed that they could not bear the metaphysical structure erected upon them, and in like manner Mr. Balfour shows the unsubstantial nature of all naturalistic speculations when they are made the basis of a theory of man and the universe.

II.

Having disposed of the scientists, Mr. Balfour, in his latest book, "The Foundation of Belief," directs his critical shafts against German Idealism, as expounded by its Scottish and English advocates. Mr. Balfour has no constructive system of his own. His delight consists in tearing to pieces the constructive systems of other thinkers. Hume was quite content to discredit reason as a discoverer of truth. His agnostic attitude to philosophy he carried over to religion. Mr. Balfour's sense of the seriousness of life prevents him finding repose in the shallow scepticism of the eighteenth century.

Having discredited reason in philosophy and science, he can get from it no guidance in the sphere of religion; consequently, Mr. Balfour is driven back upon a theory which savours of Butler's Probability; as expounded in the Analogy. Mr. Balfour accepts the orthodox system from a feeling of despair of finding anything better. Accepted in this spirit, religion can have no driving power, and the mind is left on the verge of pessimism. And here we have an explanation of Mr. Balfour's political creed. Hume was a Tory because he was sceptical of progress. In his opinion, that form of government was the best which maintained order and kept in subjection the anarchic elements of life. This is the function of Toryism; therefore Hume was a Tory.

III.

For the same reason, Mr. Balfour is a Tory. His negative attitude to science and philosophy he extends to politics. In his Glasgow rectorial address he discourses thus on progress: "The future of the race is encompassed with darkness; no faculty of calculation that we possess, no instrument that we are likely to invent, will enable us to map out its course or penetrate the secret of its destiny. It is easy, no doubt, to find in the clouds which obscure our path what shapes we please: to see in them the promise of some millennial paradise, or the threat of endless, unmeaning travel through waste and perilous places. But in such visions the wise man will put but little confidence; content in a sober and cautious spirit with a full consciousness of his feeble powers of foresight and the narrow limits of his activity to deal as they arise with the problems of his generation." With such a meagre political outfit, with such a pessimistic outlook on human life, Mr. Balfour was bound to become distasteful to the forward section of his party in their desire to recover lost ground with a progressive programme. The Tory party of the day believes in progress in a way of its own, and naturally has no desire to be led by a philosopher, the practical outcome of whose theory of life is political stagnation.

In politics, as in religion and philosophy, Mr. Balfour lacks conviction. His clear, piercing intelligence discovers so many weak points in any system of thought or line of action that his utterances when expounding—not denouncing—a policy teem with qualifications and ambiguities.

[The Editor does not hold himself responsible for the views expressed in this review.]

THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS

December 1.—Up betimes, and put on my new mulberry breeches and coat, which pleases me mightily. This day, in going abroad, I did see the most amazing of sights I ever did see in my life. All Westminster and the town, so far as I could see, was strange to me, and altered exceedingly, that I could not believe my eyes, but stand gazing with astonishment. All buildings were strange and of a vastness wonderful to behold, and such multitudes of people and vehicles in the streets that I did think a great war must be suddenly broken out. And all people dressed so strangely that it seemeth it must be a great masquerade, or everybody must be mad. I did accost a common lad and did ask him what year this was, to which replied he, who was I getting at? Why, 1912, of course. By which it seems I must be now going out of my right senses, against which calamity God preserve me. 'Tis true no one seemed to notice or molest me, but I was greatly frightened and did return home speedily, and sat gazing from my window the whole of this strange day.

December 2.—Up betimes, and ventured forth again, hoping to find that I am now waked, and that yesterday's strange occurrence were but a dream. To my horror I find that it is not, and that London is now a wonderful city such as I have never imagined. What has happened to me I know not, but it seems in some strange way I am arrived in London some 200 years to come. God pity me, for now I know that I am afflicted with witchcraft. But this day I was not so exceedingly frightened, and, finding no one molest me or notice me, did go as far as Charing Cross. But, Lord, to see how the place is altered now such as I never could believe. And the houses of such a height that I in mortal fear lest they should fall down upon me. My neck did ache mightily looking up at them. To-day, did stay out till nightfall, and tho' mighty hungry too afeard to get something to eat. And when dark did come, the shops and streets did light up with such a flare of lights that I thought the whole town must soon be a blazing fire. And so, with great fear, home again.

December 3.—Up and forth again, still feeling strange, but with less fear than before, and mightily curious to see what this strange place is like; and to further my comfort did put my rabbit's foot in my pocket, which will protect me from evil happenings. So I did now go in my journeyings with more boldness. London, methinks, must now be the richest city ever known, for all the roads and pavements are laid with marble or some smooth stone or other. This is so wonderful to me that I can hardly take my eyes from it, and this day, as I was gazing at it, a tremendous vehicle did rush almost upon me, so that I was like to have been killed. And I was further frightened to see that this vehicle was without a horse, which did strike me dumb with astonishment, until I reflected that as it was certainly moving the horse must be concealed within it. This mishap did so fright me that I entered a place for refreshment, but every victual and drink so strange that I knew not which to choose. A most pretty maid did invite me to have some tea. I knew it not until I remembered that my wife had had some to cure some ill or other. I knew this beverage was mighty dear, but did not like to say anything, for fear the maid should think me a common person, as everybody seems to be of the gentry these days. So I gave her a gold coin, and to my astonishment she gave a great quantity of silver and copper coin in exchange, so I should think there is no drink so cheap as this tea. Except that I scalded my tongue a little, the tea seemed a pleasant refreshment. It seems all shops are kept by the nobility nowadays, for this tea-shop was all of marble tables and fittings, grander than his Majesty's palace almost. So home with my head aching with the ceaseless noise of the town, which nobody seemeth to mind.

December 4.—Up and out again, and was exceedingly astonished to observe a vehicle going at a very rapid rate, and yet too small to have a horse concealed within it. During the day I did observe many vehicles and wagons journeying in this wise, and never a horse that I could see. Some of these vehicles exceeding large and noisy, carrying a great many passengers, but Lord keep me from going on one. It seems true now that these coaches do verily go without horses, and so there must be great dealings with witchcraft these days. It is lucky I have my rabbit's foot safe. I did hardly anything all this day but gaze at these motor-cars, as folk call them. Did have some more tea where my pretty serving-maid is, tho' she is exceeding forward for a serving-maid, yet not unpleasant and mighty handsome.

December 5.—This day did venture to stop out late, till the town was well lit up. And such an astonishing blaze of lights, bright and all colours, some forming strange words and pictures on the houses, as I never did see in all my life nor should have believed. And how strange it is to see; nobody seems to think ought of it, nor even looks at these lights. Some of these lights will not blow out or go out with rain or wet, tho' how it is I know not. All the way home down Whitehall there was not a link-boy to be seen, nor was any necessary, it being as light as day by the street lamps.

December 6 (Lord's Day).—Up, and the town mighty quiet. It seems, then, that the Lord's Day is much as it was in my time. Not a soul to be seen hardly about, which was a great relief to me, and I went a great distance and saw many great streets and fine buildings, quietly and with great content, tho' such a mighty and great place, that I shall never be able to tell in sober language what I see. But, Lord, to see the places all so quiet and shut up did make me think the plague was come again upon us. The streets busier again in the afternoon, when to Westminster Abbey, which is the same as in my day. Dull sermon, and few people at service. Going homeward, I was accosted by a ragged old beggar-woman, a sad sight, for I did not think there were such nowadays. She prevailed on me to purchase some matches, tho' I knew not ought concerning them. Arrived home, I did rub one on the box, as it said, upon which it flashed and made a great explosion of fire in my hand, to my great fright. I did throw the rest away, and now I know that the old beldam was a witch. These days must be very dangerous in some ways, and I am troubled at what may come of this.

December 7.—Up betimes, and do now begin to walk very boldly about, and mighty curious to see all I can. With great content of looking at bookshops, tho' the printing of the books be greatly different to mine; yet I can decipher it with little trouble. Some characters mighty quaint, but the beauty of the books nowadays passes all belief. I did ask the price of one with a fine picture on its binding, all done in colours like an oil painting, and it was but a few coppers. Indeed, one can purchase a whole closet full of books for less money than it cost for one in the old days. And they do pictures these days such as I cannot think how they are done. I saw some pictures I knew by Lilly done exactly to the painting, yet they were but a few pence.

THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS

(continued)

December 8.—To my great surprise, saw to-day what I had not noticed before, that Whitehall Palace was still as it was in my day. And, Lord, to see how small and wretched it seems with such mighty new palaces all round it. But I was so excited to see it, that I did forget myself, and demanded admittance to see the King. A man did make me pay a small coin at a little iron gate, which was strange, methought, and there was nothing within but some strange things I did not understand, except some models of ships and flags very well done. Nobody lives there now, it seems, and I remembered that the people of my day are all dead, which is a sad reflection to me.

December 9.—To-day did see a mighty curious monument at Charing Cross, a great pilaster high in the air, very black, with four lions at the corners. It is called Trafalgar Square, and I asked one, To which King is this great monument? And he said Nelson, but I know not who this King Nelson can have been. Again did stay out till the town was all lit, and such a wonderful sight was it, that I never tire of it. At last I came to a great place that was a blaze of lights, and of magnificent proportions, and I asked a lad if this was the King's palace. And says he, No, the King's palace is round the corner; this is the Alhambra. I asked if his Majesty dwelt within, and he laughed and said not half. He did seem to be making mock of me. I saw mighty crowds going into this building, and one informed that it was not the King's palace, but a music hall. I know not what a music hall is, but I think it is a playhouse. I will go to it one night; so to bed.

December 10.—Up and out, and thinking of yesterday, what a grand palace a mere playhouse was. I could not imagine what a house the King must live in. So I asked to be directed to the King's house, which was called Buckingham Palace, and was along the Mall. Strange to see the Mall almost as it was in my day, except for the buildings. But when I got to Buckingham House—Lord, what a dull place it seemed, that I could hardly believe my eyes. This is a strange town for the King to live in such a place, methinks; neither is it lit but little at nights. Did walk a great distance in the town, and so home, with snow falling and mighty cold.

This day I did receive another great affright. While walking in St. James's Park, astonished at the great changes all about here, my ears did catch a strange sound in the air, and I observed many folks running and pointing upwards. Whereupon I gazed up, and did see approaching a monstrous bird, yet which did not fly with wings. Then I did perceive it was no bird, but a carriage flying in the air, and did have a man within it. Such fear came over me that I made great effort to be calm without, so that the people should not think me strange. But, Lord, how my knees did tremble, as with ague! How this carriage kept in the air I know not; and I much troubled at the impiety of it, for man was never intended to fly in the clouds.

(To be continued.)

WAITING

SHE could not take the poodle with her to the theatre, so the poodle stayed in the café with me, and together we waited for his mistress.

He took up a position from which he could keep the entrance door in view, and see everyone who came in.

I admired his vigilance, but it struck me as being slightly absurd, for it was just a quarter to eight, and we had to wait till a quarter to twelve.

We sat and waited.

Every passing carriage awoke hopes in his breast, and every time I assured him it wasn't possible. "She can't be here yet," I said. "Don't you see it's quite out of the question?" Several times I murmured to him, "Our kind, charming mistress —" and this made him sick for longing, and he turned up his eyes to me wistfully. "Is she coming, or isn't she?" he asked.

"She's coming, she's coming, of course," I replied.

Once he abandoned his post, and came and laid his paws on my knee, as much as to say, "Tell me the truth. I would rather know the worst and be done with it."

I kissed him and reassured him again.

At ten o'clock he began to despair, and I said to him, "Dear old boy, don't you imagine that it is not just as bad for me as it is for you? But we must control our feelings."

But he could not control them, and became still more despairing and hopeless.

Then he started moaning softly. "Is she coming, or isn't she?" he asked.

"She's coming, she's coming," I answered, to comfort him.

But he would not be comforted, and now he stretched himself out quite flat on the ground.

He ceased to whine, and fixed his dejected gaze once more on the entrance door, while I leaned back in my chair.

Quarter to twelve! And she came—came with her swift, gliding gait, her sweet, graceful movements, and greeted us both in her cool, self-possessed manner.

The dog whooped and sang for joy, and curveted on his hind legs.

But I helped her to take off her silk opera wrap, and hung it on a peg. Then we all three seated ourselves.

"Did you think I was never coming?" she asked, as indifferently as if she were saying, "How do you do?" or "Yours truly, N. N."

Then she remarked, "The play was simply heavenly. . ."

I said nothing, only thought to myself. Longing, longing, that gushes from the hearts of men and beasts. What becomes of it? Where does it flow to? Does it take refuge in the universe, as water in the clouds? The air cannot be more heavy with moisture than the world is full of these longings and desires which have flowed forth in rapture and met with no soul ready to absorb them. What is to become of longing, the best and tenderest thing in life, if it finds no soul eager to respond to it, to suck it into itself greedily, and make it part of its own essence and strength? Oh! Longing, Longing, that gushes perpetually from the heart of men and beasts, out into the world, what becomes of you, whither do you flow?

PETER ALTENBERG.

DEMOS, THE DRUNKEN GIANT

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY

I.

ABSOLUTE power always flatters itself and likes to be flattered. Its delight is in adjectives, fulsome, imperial, complimentary to its head and heart. Cæsar and Demos—the Single Person, as Cromwell was described, and Everyman (which I take to be English for democracy) will have this golden cup at their lips all day long, filled with spicy liquor. Well did the poet know that much, when he brought his Athenian Demos on the stage. Sober Nicias doubts whether inspiration is born of wine; but he gets this answer from the sprawling giant:

"I tell you what,

It's a very presumptuous thing to speak of liquor
As an obstacle to people's understanding;
It's the only thing for business and despatch."

Now, what is the daily draught of our modern Everyman, our high-and-mighty Demos, who calls himself the world's master? Though I tremble pronouncing it, I will utter the word—it is Journalism. The printing-press made democracy on a great scale possible. And it threatens to make a sober, wise democracy impossible.

II.

From Aristophanes to Burke and Carlyle the opinion prevailed that a government of the people, "told by the head," was sheer madness. Numbers did not spell wisdom; quite the reverse. A prophet said in his haste, "Everyman is a liar," and he hardly repented. The hoi polloi were thought in Greek proverbial language to be scoundrels. Burke once growled an indignant phrase about "the swinish multitude." Carlyle defined his own generation as "mostly fools." When we quote such sayings in the ear of Demos we are bound to smile away their obvious intention, as if they were only the fun of a Gilbert and Sullivan extravaganza. It would be as much as our place is worth to look serious over them in the presence of the sovereign people—the omnipotent, therefore the omniscient, impeccable, infallible, just and kind (dare we whisper in an aside, also the gullible?). Everyman, thus collected and crowned with Cæsar's diadem, is the State which can do no wrong, the Whitehall that educates us, the Cabinet that rules the Commons with a rod of iron, the Golden Horde of financiers that manage the people's money for them. And the voice, the enchanting voice, is that of Journalism, with its hymn of praise while it mixes the liquor, telling Demos not to heed Aristophanes, or Burke, or Carlyle. For is not Everyman the heir of all the ages, and by consequence fittest to survive, inspired to speak and understand oracles? Our giant may drink as long as he will; the cup is inexhaustible. Journalism pours, and sings, and smiles.

III.

Yet the People and their Prophet must be ever the question for all who, loving or hating democratic rule, see it to be inevitable, and want the best they can get. Their giant should have his wits about him. Why should he be a staggering, purblind monster, falling this way and that, a danger to every precious and delicately beautiful thing he stumbles against? Will he never grasp his own problem? It is surely one that gods might undertake with diffidence. What is a crowd in front of cannon, or in a moment of panic? Even that same is an untrained democracy. To be disciplined in such wise that Everyman shall find and keep his place—is not this the one thing needful to popular government, and the most difficult?

Who, then, shall teach us how it is to be done? The average journalist, answers England day by day. But, I return, how can you teach if you do not know, and how will you know what is here to be taught without principles, without a sound philosophy of life?

IV.

Let us be fair to the newspaper-man. He does not pretend to have any philosophy at all. He is a seeker after news, not the finder of truth. He works on a treadmill which never has been his property. The vast entrenched monopolies of the world use him, wear him out, and, when he is finished, buy another in open market. Two things are expected of him—to advance the interests of his employers, and to persuade the People that those interests are a national benefit. So he manufactures advertisements, money-articles, leaders, correspondence, the wholesale and retail that make up a great modern daily or weekly paper, to be consumed by the million. Far be it from me to imply that in all this enormous output of mind and pen there is nothing of the true or the Humane. Demos would not taste a draught so nauseous. But to the infinitely clever catches of journalism when it goes a-fishing we cannot add the rare prize of Principle.

There is doubtless a kind of newspaper circulating among the more educated, and there are well-known organs of propaganda, which pursue a definite policy, or which even boast that their aim is distinctly ethical, and therefore revolutionary. But we have to take our journalism as a whole. It usurps the functions once peculiar to the Christian Church, of teaching and informing public opinion. It ought, then, to be in possession of a creed, and to be guided by certain ideals. It has no creed, no ideals, except to interest the crowd by whatever means, to make the largest profits, and to let the world wag as it will.

V.

But, oh! my still beloved Demos, when will you digest the wine that you have drunk? You work hard, early and late; you produce all the commodities useful to life that exist in this country, or that serve as exchange for imports of a like nature; and reflect how little of such necessities or luxuries you enjoy. What millions of your families are huddled into single rooms! What massacre of infants is always going on! What filth, disease, and misery your folk wallow in, if contentedly, so much the worse! But I do not find among your unlucky, school-taught myriads the spirit of association much developed which would end these horrors. You are a democracy in name, not in fact. Why do you let yourself be victimised by a terrible system which throws up millionaires at the top and flings off paupers at the bottom? Why do you steep your eyes in the foul offence of the Sunday newspaper? Why are you not awake to the demands of your children for a real education, instead of leaving them to Whitehall, with its pedants and its bureaucrats? If you would only try to reckon up in how many ways you, Demos, are yet a drunken slave—a Caliban, said the late M. Renan, contemplating you disdainfully—perhaps you would begin to think. You have need of journalism, better known as prophecy. The true philosophy of life is even now to be had in wise old books. But reform your printing press, and be not drunken with the dregs of a base liquor, compounded of all uncleanness, distilling at this hour in the columns of unbelief, scepticism, avarice, frivolity, and impurity that are scattered over your land.

Another kind of journalism you may have for the asking. Try it here and now.

JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL BY PRINCIPAL WHYTE

I.—JOHN WESLEY AS HE IS REVEALED TO US IN HIS "JOURNAL."

Nothing could be better than what Mr. Birrell says of THE JOURNAL in his Essay on JOHN WESLEY. "He began his published JOURNAL on October 14th, 1735, and its last entry is under date Sunday, October 24th, 1790. Between those two Octobers there lies the most amazing record of human exertions ever penned or endured. John Wesley contested the three kingdoms in the cause of Christ during a campaign which lasted forty years. And he did it for the most part on horseback. He paid more turnpikes than any man who ever bestrode a beast. Eight thousand miles was his annual record for many a long year, during each of which he seldom preached less frequently than a thousand times." And Mr. Macdonald, in his excellent Introduction to Mr. Dent's edition, says: "From the time he sailed for Georgia, October, 1735, Wesley's JOURNAL becomes a record of his travels, studies, labours, varied adventures, and intercourse with persons of all kinds, of his views also on questions practical and speculative; and, generally, what had been mainly a religious timetable broadens out into an autobiography."

II.—AT OXFORD.

In a remarkable letter giving an account of the religious nurture and admonition of her children, John Wesley's mother says, "I resolved to begin with my own children, in which I observe the following method: I take such a proportion of time as I can spare every night to discourse with each child apart. On Monday I talk with Molly; on Tuesday, with Hetty; Wednesday, with Nancy; Thursday, with Jacky; Friday, with Patty; Saturday, with Charles; and with Emily and Luky together, on Sunday." And she began to receive her wages for all that work when Jacky and his brother went to Oxford, and there began such a noble manner of life as led to her two sons and their likeminded companions being nicknamed Methodists, and the Holy Club. That so nicknamed club had this for its constitution and programme of life and service—to read the Greek Testament and the classics together; to converse with young students; to visit the prisons of the city; to instruct poor families on week-days and Sundays; to hold religious meetings in the parish workhouse; to rescue younger members of the University from bad company, and to lead them into a sober and studious life. On Wesley's College life Mr. Birrell has this: "John Wesley received a sound education at Charterhouse and Christ Church, and he remained all his life very much the scholar and the gentleman. No company was too good for John Wesley, and nobody knew better than he did that had he cared to carry his powerful intelligence, his flawless constitution, and his infinite capacity for taking pains into any of the markets of the world, he must have earned for himself place, and fame, and fortune. Coming, however, as he did, of a theological stock; having a saint for his father, and a notable devout woman for his mother, Wesley from his early days learned to regard religion as the supreme business of his life. After a good deal of heart-searching, Wesley was ordained a deacon in 1725, and in the following year was elected a fellow of Lincoln, to the great delight of his father. Whatever I am, said the good old man, my Jack is Fellow of Lincoln." With all his good behaviour, with all his great talents, and with all his hard work, we quite well understand John Wesley when he says in after years that all the time he was laying a foundation of his own beneath the One Foundation that God had laid for him, and for all men, in Zion.

III.—IN GEORGIA.

In 1735 old Mr. Wesley died, and the Epworth home was broken up. About this time a proposal was made to John Wesley that he should go out on a mission to Georgia, in America, to minister to a body of British settlers there, and to preach the Gospel to the Red Indians around. When he consulted his mother about the proposal, in her widowhood and poverty she replied, "Go! For had I twenty sons I should rejoice to think they were all engaged in such work, though I should never see them more." "My chief motive," said Wesley, as he came to his decision, "is the hope of saving my own soul. I hope to learn the true sense of the Gospel of Christ by preaching it to the heathens."

The pages of the JOURNAL that were written on ship-board are of the deepest interest and importance to the student of John Wesley's inner life. "17th October, 1735. I began to learn their language in order that I might converse with the German emigrants on board." Then follows a circumstantial and most impressive account of his habits of life and work on board ship. But it is in his account of the great storm that fell upon them, and of the way that the several passengers bore themselves in the face of death, it is then that the vivid narrative attains its greatest interest and value to us. The Moravian pietists from Germany contrasted nobly with the English passengers all through that terrible storm. "When the sea broke over us, split the mainsail in pieces, covered the ship, and poured in between the decks as if the great deep had already swallowed us up, the Germans sang psalms all the time, while the most terrible screaming came from the English."

"God is our refuge and our strength,
In straits a present Aid;
Therefore, although the earth remove,
We will not be afraid.
Though hills amidst the seas be cast;
Though waters roaring make
And troubled be: yea, though the hills
By swelling seas do shake."

From that day to the day of his death German piety and German preaching took a great hold of John Wesley's mind and heart. So much so, that some of his greatest attainments in the spiritual life, and some of his most powerful and fruitful preaching, are all seen to have had their first beginnings away back in that heart-searching and faith-testing storm on the Atlantic Ocean.

Humbled and self-emptied by the result of his Georgian experiences, Wesley returned home in 1738. "I saw no fruit of my labours. It could not be, for I neither laid the true foundation of repentance nor of preaching the true Gospel. In one word, I did not preach faith in the blood of the covenant." One thing his Georgian JOURNAL discovers to us: the extraordinary clearness of his eye, and the extraordinary soundness of his judgment in treating of the lives of men and of the conditions of human existence. Those pages of the JOURNAL that deal with the agricultural and the horticultural and other external conditions of life in that province read like the report of a competent emigration commissioner, or that of an able consul giving to the home government a complete account of the country put under his charge. All through his wonderful JOURNAL we come on the same clear eye and strong head that first revealed themselves to us in Georgia. Let this suffice for a specimen: "1776. In travelling [preaching remember] through Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Bristol, Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Staffordshire, Cheshire, Lancashire, Yorkshire, Westmorland and Cumberland, I diligently made two enquiries: the first was concerning the increase or decrease of the people; the second, concerning the increase or decrease of trade. As to the latter, it has, within these two last years, amazingly increased, in several branches in such a manner as has not been known in the memory of man; such is the fruit of the entire civil and religious liberty which all England now enjoys! As to the former, not only in every city and large town, but in every village and hamlet, there is no decrease, but a very large and swift increase. One sign of this is the swarm of little children which we see in every place." And so on, all through these four open-eyed volumes till we often call to mind Mr. Birrell's words: "Had John Wesley carried his powerful intelligence, and his infinite capacity for taking pains, to any of the markets of the world, he would have earned for himself peace, fame, and fortune." As it was, what he did earn all the world knows.

WESLEY'S JOURNAL (continued)

(To be continued.)

ZARATHUSTRA

ON READING AND WRITING

Of all that is written I love alone that which the writer wrote with his blood. Write with blood, and you will learn that blood is spirit.

I hate the reading loafers. . . . That everybody is allowed to learn to read spoils, in the long run, not only writing, but thinking.

Mind was once God; then it became man; now it is becoming a mob.

He who writes aphorisms with his blood does not want to be read, but to be learnt by heart.

There is always a madness in love; but there is always a reason in madness.

ON FRIENDS

If you would have a friend, you must always be ready to wage war with him; and in order to wage war, you must be capable of being an enemy.

Your friend should be your best enemy. You will be nearest him in heart when you resist him most.

Have you ever seen your friend asleep, so as to learn what he is like? . . . Were you not terrified to see your friend looking like that?

Are you fresh air and solitude and bread and tonic to your friend? Many who cannot escape from their own chains can release their friends.

If you are a slave you cannot be a friend; if you are a tyrant you cannot have friends.

And in the love of woman there is injustice and blindness towards everything that she does not love. Even in the sanest love of woman there are surprises and thunderstorms under cover of night.

In woman both slave and tyrant have been hidden too long. Thus woman is not yet capable of friendship; she is capable only of love.

Women have no more idea of friendship than cats or birds.

. . . Those half and half ones, who neither learnt to bless nor curse from the bottom of their soul.

—NIETZSCHE.

THE BURNING OF MOSCOW

By COUNT DE SEGUR

(Aide-de-Camp to Napoleon)

I.

NAPOLEON did not enter Moscow till after dark. He stopped in one of the first houses of the Dorogomilow suburb. There he appointed Marshal Mortimer governor of that capital. "Above all," said he to him, "no pillage! For this you shall be answerable to me with your life. Defend Moscow against all, whether friend or foe."

That night was a gloomy one: sinister reports followed one upon the heels of another. Some Frenchmen, resident in the country, and even a Russian officer of police, came to denounce the conflagration. He gave all the particulars of the preparation for it. The Emperor, alarmed by these reports, strove in vain to take some rest. He called every moment, and had the fatal tidings repeated to him. He nevertheless intrenched himself in his incredulity, till about two in the morning, when he was informed that the fire had actually broken out.

II.

It was at the Exchange, in the centre of the city, in its richest quarter. He instantly issued orders upon orders. As soon as it was light, he himself hastened to the spot, and threatened the young guard and Mortimer. The Marshal pointed out to him some houses covered with iron; they were closely shut up, still untouched and uninjured without, and yet a black smoke was already issuing from them. Napoleon pensively entered the Kremlin.

At the sight of this half Gothic and half modern palace of the Ruriks and the Romanofs, of their throne still standing, of the cross of the great Ivan, and of the finest part of the city, which is overlooked by the Kremlin, and which the flames, as yet confined to the bazaar, seemed disposed to spare, his former hopes revived. His ambition was flattered by this conquest. "At length, then," he exclaimed, "I am in Moscow, in the ancient palace of the Czars, in the Kremlin!" He examined every part of it with pride, curiosity, and gratification.

III.

Two officers had taken up their quarters in one of the buildings of the Kremlin. The view hence embraced the north and west of the city. About midnight they were awakened by an extraordinary light. They looked and beheld palaces filled with flames, which at first merely illuminated, but presently consumed, these elegant and noble structures. They observed that the north wind drove these flames directly towards the Kremlin, and they became alarmed for the safety of that fortress in which the flower of the army and its commander reposed.

IV.

At this sight, a strong suspicion seized their minds. Can the Muscovites, aware of our rash and thoughtless negligence, have conceived the hope of burning, with Moscow, our soldiers, heavy with wine, fatigue and sleep, or, rather, have they dared to imagine that they could involve Napoleon in this catastrophe: that the loss of such a man would be fully equivalent to that of their capital: that it was a result sufficiently important to justify the sacrifice of all Moscow to obtain it? It was at this moment that the furious flames were driven from all quarters towards the Kremlin; for the wind, attracted no doubt by this vast combustion, increased every moment in strength. The power of the army and the Emperor would have been destroyed, if but one of the brands that flew over our heads had lighted on one of the powder wagons. Thus upon each of these sparks that were for several hours floating in the air depended the fate of the whole army.

THE BURNING OF MOSCOW (continued)

Most of us imagined that want of discipline in our troops and intoxication had begun the disaster, and that the high wind had completed it. We viewed ourselves with a sort of disgust. The cry of horror, which all Europe would not fail to set up, terrified us. From these thoughts and paroxysms of rage against the incendiaries we were roused only by an eagerness to obtain intelligence. All the accounts, however, began to accuse the Russians alone of the disaster.

IV.

All had seen hideous-looking men, covered with rags, and women resembling furies wandering among these flames, and completing a frightful picture of the infernal regions. These wretches, intoxicated with wine and the success of their crimes, no longer took any pains to conceal themselves. They proceeded in triumph through the blazing streets: they were caught armed with torches, assiduously trying to spread the conflagration.

It was necessary to strike down their hands with sabres to oblige them to loose their hold. It was said that these banditti had been released from prison by the Russian generals for the purpose of burning Moscow; and that, in fact, so grand, so extreme a resolution could have been adopted only by patriotism and executed only by guilt.

Orders were immediately issued to shoot all the incendiaries on the spot. The army was on foot. The old guard, which exclusively occupied one part of the Kremlin, was under arms; the baggage, and the horses ready loaded, filled the courts. We were struck dumb with astonishment, fatigue and disappointment, on witnessing the destruction of such excellent quarters. Though masters of Moscow, we were forced to go and bivouac without provisions outside its gates.

V.

While our troops were yet struggling with the conflagration, and the army was disputing their prey with the flames, Napoleon, whose sleep none had dared to disturb during the night, was awoken by the twofold light of day and of the fire. His first feeling was that of irritation, and he would have commanded the devouring element; but he soon paused, and yielded to impossibility. Surprised that when he had struck at the heart of an empire he should find there any other sentiment than submission and terror, he felt himself vanquished and surpassed in determination.

This conquest, for which he had sacrificed everything, was like a phantom which he had pursued, and which, at the moment when he imagined he had grasped it, vanished in a mingled mass of smoke and flame. He was then seized with extreme agitation: he seemed to be consumed by the fires which surrounded him. He rose every moment, paced to and fro, and again sat down abruptly. He traversed his apartments with quick steps; his sudden and vehement gestures betrayed painful uneasiness; he quitted, resumed, and again quitted, an urgent occupation, to hasten to the windows and watch the progress of the conflagration. Short and incoherent exclamations burst from his labouring bosom. "What a tremendous spectacle! It is their own work! So many palaces! What extraordinary resolution! What men! These are Scythians indeed!"

VI.

Between the fire and him there was an extensive vacant space, then the Moskwa and its two quays; and yet the panes of the windows against which he leaned felt already burning to the touch, and the constant exertions of sweepers, placed on the iron roofs of the palace, were not sufficient to keep them clear of the numerous flakes of fire which alighted upon them.

At this moment a rumour was spread that the Kremlin was undermined: this was confirmed, it was said, by Russians and by written documents. Some of his attendants were beside themselves with fear; while the military awaited unmoved what the orders of the Emperor and Fate should decree. And to this alarm the Emperor replied only with a smile of incredulity.

VII.

But still he walked convulsively; he stopped at every window, and beheld the terrible, the victorious element furiously consuming his brilliant conquest; seizing all the bridges, all the avenues to his fortress, inclosing, and, as it were, besieging him in it; spreading every moment among the neighbouring houses; and, reducing him within narrower and narrower limits, confining him at length to the site of the Kremlin alone.

We already breathed nothing but smoke and ashes. Night approached, and was about to add darkness to our dangers; the equinoctial gales, in alliance with the Russians, increased in violence. The King of Naples and Prince Eugene hastened to the spot. In company with the Prince of Neufchâtel, they made their way to the Emperor, and urged him by their entreaties, their gestures, and, on their knees, insisted on removing him from this scene of desolation. All was in vain.

VIII.

Napoleon, in possession of the palace of the Czars, was bent on not yielding the conquest, even to the conflagration, when all at once the shout of "The Kremlin is on fire!" passed from mouth to mouth, and roused us from the contemplative stupor with which we had been seized. The Emperor went out to ascertain the danger. Twice had the fire communicated to the building in which he was, and twice had it been extinguished; but the tower of the arsenal was still burning. A soldier of the police had been found in it. He was brought in, and Napoleon caused him to be interrogated in his presence. This man was the incendiary: he had executed his commission at the signal given by his chief. It was evident that everything was devoted to destruction, the ancient and sacred Kremlin itself not excepted.

The gestures of the Emperor betokened disdain and vexation; the wretch was hurried into the first court, where the enraged grenadiers dispatched him with their bayonets.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONTENTS OF THE FOURTH NUMBER

IN the next number of EVERYMAN Principal Whyte will continue his interesting article on Wesley's Journal, and Monsignor Benson will contribute an article entitled "Westward Ho!" Mrs. Sidney Webb writes on the "War Against Poverty," and her wide experience in social work and her knowledge of the masses lends to her article a special importance. Professor Sarolea will discuss "Why Living is Cheaper in France than in England." The number will also give its readers a continuation of "The Dream of Pepys."

For all Player-Pianos.

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

bear the words of the Song opposite the accompanying chord or phrase.

THESE Rolls are just what Player-Pianists require to complete their satisfaction in possessing a self-playing instrument. They can now accompany themselves or accompany others with perfect success.

The words on the Rolls are clear and correctly placed. In all other respects "SONGOLA" Music Rolls leave nothing to be desired. They are perfect in notation, phrasing and tempo, also climate-proof, and practically indestructible.

Send for Songola Catalogue and particulars of Music Roll Circulating Library. (Mention "Everyman.")

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., LTD., 94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.
Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE ST., ED. NBURGH.

AGENTS—

LIVERPOOL: Rushworth & Dreaper, Ltd., 11-17, Islington.
CHELTENHAM: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., Promenade.
CARDIFF: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., High Street.
BRISTOL: Duck, Son & Finker, 1, Royal Promenade, Clifton.

BATH: Duck, Son & Finker, Pulteney Bridge.
CARLISLE: C. Thurnam & Soos, Whitehall House.
STOCKTON-ON-TEES: John Burdon, 52, Yarn Lane.
NOTTINGHAM: H. Farmer & Co., High Street.

KEEP AN OUTFIT AT THE OFFICE.

Just a touch with the brush and a flick with the pad and you will leave the office with your boots looking as "spick and span" as when you arrived.

Of all Bootmakers & Stores, or direct from THE NUGGET FOLISH CO., Ltd., London, S.E., on receipt of 1/- (or in Metal Case, 1/3).

One of the blocks in "An Aesthetic Conversion."

"AN AESTHETIC CONVERSION."

THE above booklet describes in a thoroughly interesting manner the visit of a captious critic to Heal & Son's showrooms. This discerning seeker of the beautiful relates how he has listened to exquisite music, examined portfolios of rare and beautiful prints, and handled the most delicate of ivories, in rooms where the furniture was commonplace and utterly devoid of beauty.

His experience—a by no means uncommon one—reveals the need of an artistic awakening in domestic surroundings such as that which has found expression in the admirable work of Heal & Son. The book is finely printed on paper of hand-made texture, and illustrated with good line drawings. It is a little work which should find a permanent place on the bookshelves of those appreciative of suggestive ideas that kindle thought in the correct furnishing of the home.

A copy of "An Aesthetic Conversion" will be sent free by post to all readers of "Everyman."

HEAL & SON

TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, W.

MOLIÈRE AND MR. SHAW

By ERNEST RHYS.

I.

A FRENCH appreciation of George Bernard Shaw which dubs him straight off and in the very title of the book, "Le Molière du XXe. Siècle" * is clearly more than another sign of the entente. M. Hamon, the author, has every reason to know his Shaw well, since he and his wife have been at work translating him for some time, and doing it with an almost uncanny intelligence. A few summers ago the present writer, during a visit to Port Blanc, on the north Breton coast, had the fortune to make M. Hamon's acquaintance in his own abode, which has a very strange name—Ty an Diaoul (Devil's House)—so called, I believe, in order to flaunt the superstitious, and defy the religious, traditions that hold fast in the neighbourhood. M. Hamon himself is not exactly to be described, however, as a devil's advocate. Rather he is a devotee, a ferocious humanitarian, a professed anti-militarist, a tender lover of most things which the dark spirit is believed to hate. True, one day he appeared with a gun, and that might suggest Chouan ideas; but he was only going to shoot rabbits, which he probably looks upon as a kind of vegetable. When we discussed Mr. Shaw, his enthusiasm was impressive; and now it is all down on paper in this remarkable book, which first reached this table in MS. a year or two ago, and on a second acquaintance seems even more of a portent.

II.

Apart from its bold, comparative idea—which is hardly to be sustained, seeing that Molière worked from the inside of comedy, while Shaw too often elects to laugh outside—the book is vital biographically, and it is written with a lucid pen and immense conviction. M. Hamon has the sense of the milieu, and has cared to envisage his man apart from the dramatic and Fabian issues. His opening has some personal glimpses not unlike others we have had, it may be, but used in a significantly telling fashion. He speaks of the early days in Dublin and the characteristic first London beginnings—at the time when Irish poets like Mr. W. B. Yeats were still unknown, and when, as one recalls, a Sunday night supper at William Morris's house in Hammersmith could be a symposium of incompatibles, with both Mr. Shaw and Mr. John Burns of the number. He tells how Science as well as Art touched his hero: how at first Mr. Shaw helped to induct the telephone; studied Helmholtz and Wagner; eschewed beef and mutton, and became a vegetable eater. He leaves out nothing of importance, the probation as musical critic on the Star included, and the writing of a book of prophetic manifesto, "The Quintessence of Ibsenism," in 1891, on the eve of the founding by Mr. Grein of the Independent Theatre. Then came, just as the new theatre was at its wits' end for a new dramatist, the first play, "Widowers' Houses," which saved the situation, and made Shaw famous and, for a time, infamous.

III.

This does not bring us to Molière. But M. Hamon is working towards it. He tends to believe that the comic spirit is justified of itself on the stage when, being kindled by the absurdity of the habitual life and the humbug of everyday ethics, it produces its flame of laughter and explodes the windbag. But in his parallel between the theatres of Molière and Shaw, interesting and stimulating as he makes it, he overlooks one cardinal discrepancy between the two men. If you see or read "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," you are left with the feeling that comedy there was rich, hearty, constructive and recreative. But when you see or read a typical Shaw play, you laugh consumedly at the discords he makes, and you rejoice in his infernally clever art in turning the counters upside down, but you are left without any sense or vision of the humane deliverance to follow.

IV.

This is, I suppose, why a recent too ingenious critic in an Italian paper was led to say that Mr. Shaw was the last word of the British bourgeoisie and the final fulfilment of its ugliness. That is an extravagance. It would be fairer—pushing to extreme M. Hamon's contention that what Shaw really cares about is ideas, and that his theatre is the theatre of ideas—to say that Molière recreates men and women in the spirit of comedy, whereas Shaw has, with four or five brilliantly alive exceptions, only disintegrated them as real beings, or criticised them, humanly and inhumanly, to pieces. This is why, in the end, one is obliged to differ, too, from M. Hamon when he speaks of the beauty of Shaw's theatre, or when he decides that Shaw is a man not of to-day but of to-morrow. There is no beauty in or of Shaw's theatre; he has deliberately eliminated it. Beauty in art is akin to that romance which he thinks anathema, but which does project a vision of the future, painted from the memories of wild life and delightful life and great adventure in the past. Mr. Shaw is a man of to-day, a great medicine-man; and to-morrow will take care of itself; and if a French parallel were wanted, a much more stimulating one than that with Molière would be that with Voltaire, as Mr. Lodge suggested the other day; in which we could play off the Candide of the Gallic, against the Candida of the Celtic, satirist.

THE SERVILE STATE.

MR. BELLOC's new book, entitled "The Servile State" (Foulis, 1s.), should be read by everyone who is interested in the ultimate issue of the political and social changes of the day. Its thesis is, briefly, that the existing state of society is in process of gradual conversion, not into a Socialist State, but into what he calls a Servile State—that is, a State based upon the permanent division of its citizens into free and unfree, and the legal compulsion of the latter to work for the profit of the former.

In maintaining this thesis Mr. Belloc begins by pointing out that the original basis of European civilisation was servile, and that it remained servile until the Christian Faith, by its indirect operation, converted the slave into an owner. Later Mr. Belloc shows—and this is a most important part of his thesis—that this system was broken, not by the industrial revolution, which, as he says, fell upon a society already capitalist, but by a series of attacks upon it, beginning in the sixteenth century and completely victorious by the eighteenth.

Following upon this historical summary Mr. Belloc examines the condition of society to-day and the proposed remedies, and shows that they all tend to the servile solution. Especially interesting in this connection is his criticism of Socialism. He shows that, while the Socialist theoretically asks for the transfer of property from private to public ownership, no attempt is ever made to give practical effect to this demand, which is inevitably canalised into a demand for the regulation of the relations between capital and labour—that is, for the recognition of two classes of citizens, each with a status defined by law, which is the necessary basis of the Servile State.

* Figuiere et Cie., 7, Rue Corneille, Paris. 3fr. 50.

NEW FOULIS BOOKS

THE 'EVIL STATE

By Hilaire Belloc.

Author of "Examination of Socialism." Crown 8vo, 234 pages. Boards, 1s. net. Library Edition in Buckram, 2s. 6d. net. A brilliant and sensational exposition of the trend of modern legislation and ideas towards an imminent state of slavery in England.

THE ENGLISH CHARACTER

By Spencer Leigh Hughes, M.P., "Sub-Rosa."

16 Illustrations in colour, depicting types of English Character, by Frederick Gardner. Extra Crown 8vo, 280 pages. Buckram, 5s. net. Leather, 7s. 6d. net. Vellum, 10s. 0d. net. Mr. Hughes "talks merrily" of politicians, statesmen, official people, and of music, sport, and dress. The unique personality of the author has never been more faithfully projected in any piece of writing. The most amusing book of the season.

THE DICKENS ORIGINALS

By Edwin Pugh.

Author of "Tony Drum," etc. With thirty mounted Illustrations in collytype. Extra crown 8vo, 343 pages. Buckram, 6s. net. Vellum and Gilt, 10s. 6d. net. Traces the originals of the characters in the novels of Dickens.

POEMS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON

Illustrated in colour by Capt. G. D. Giles. Crown 8vo, 336 pages. Buckram, 5s. net. Bound in Velvet Persian, 7s. 6d. net. A fine presentation edition of the Australian poet.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS

By Hilda T. Skae.

Author of "The Life of Mary, Queen of Scots." With 16 Illustrations in colour and eight portraits in collytype. Ex. Cr. 8vo, 220 pp. Buckram, 5s. net. Velvet Persian, 7s. 6d. net.

PRINCE CHARLIE

By William Power.

With 16 Illustrations in colour, and 8 portraits in collytype. Extra Crown 8vo, 220 pages. Buckram, 5s. net. Velvet Persian, 7s. 6d. net.

THE R. L. STEVENSON ORIGINALS

By E. B. Simpson.

Author of "R. L. Stevenson's Early Edinburgh Days," "Sir James Y. Simpson." Four Illustrations in colour and twenty-six mounted Illustrations in collytype. Extra Crown 8vo, 260 pages. Buckram, 6s. net.

T. N. FOULIS, 91, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, LONDON; AND EDINBURGH.

THE ROYAL ROAD TO MIND TRAINING.

THE nearest approach to a Royal Road to Mind-Training is the World-famous Course, "Scientific Concentration." It is recognised by all competent to judge as the most thorough, most practical, most scientific all-round mental training the world has ever known. Scientific Concentration teaches you to see things clearly, to have a steady purpose in life, and to go straight ahead without swerving from the path you have marked out. Scientific Concentration teaches you the Laws of Attention, Observation, Interest, Fatigue, Memory, Habit and Will-Power, and Thought-Control. With Scientific Concentration you can concentrate upon your Studies, Profession or Business with that intensity that leads steadily and surely onward to success, with a minimum of fatigue and nervous waste.

The late Mr. W. T. STEAD, shortly before going on his ill-fated voyage on the Titanic, said:

"I have read with much interest and satisfaction the series of Booklets and Lessons on Concentration published by the Concentro Company, of Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne. I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, and wish it every success."

Members of All the Professions

(especially the Church, Law, and Medicine), and Business Men of every degree of standing in every part of the world, are doing splendid work with the aid of Scientific Concentration. Learn what it will do for you. Send to-day for Free Booklet and the most convincing testimony you have ever read to the—

CONCENTRO CO.,

46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

For Those Interested in the Stage.

TWO SHILLING BOOKS
By RATHMELL WILSON

The Experimentalists

(WRITTEN WITH MURIEL HUTCHINSON).

The Three-Act Comedy recently produced so successfully by the Drama Society.

Stage Sketches.

A THEATRICAL MISCELLANY,

With Pictures by Alfred Field-Fisher.

JOHN OUSELEY, LTD.,

London: Fleet Lane, Farringdon Street.

REMAINDERS.

BOOKS AT BARGAIN PRICES.

Send a card for GLAISHER'S General Catalogue No. 389, 160 pages of

Publishers' Reminders,

which contains Books in all departments of

Literature offered at REMARKABLY LOW PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

THE INFORMATION and AGENCY BUREAU.—Established to procure INFORMATION on literary, social and other subjects, and to carry out EXECUTIVE AGENCY work. Researches at the British Museum, Somerset House and elsewhere. Reasonable charges. Apply for PROSPECTUS to THE SECRETARIAT, 26, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.

A LOST MANUSCRIPT.

Quite recently a valuable manuscript was reported to have been lost in transit. The product of much strenuous mental effort could not be replaced. Yet no man need run the risk of so serious a loss, seeing that several clear copies can be made simultaneously with the original writing by means of the Oliver Typewriter, which is specially adapted for this work.

"HOW IT LOOKS IN PRINT."

Another point, writers, whether of prose or poetry, who like to see how their creations "look in print" find "Printype" peculiarly suited to their needs. The author or critic revising or reviewing a literary creation produced in Oliver "Printype" is, as it were, reading the printed page. "Printype" is the latest style of type supplied with the

OLIVER

Ask for Booklet No. 913.

OLIVER
TYPEWRITER CO., Ltd.,

75, Queen
Victoria Street,
London, E.C.

"A GREAT RUSSIAN REALIST: FEODOR DOSTOIEFFSKY" *

THIS is an excellent book on a difficult but fascinating subject. Although it is twenty years since Robert Louis Stevenson said of "Crime and Punishment" that it was "the greatest book he had read in ten years"; although as early as 1902 Messrs. Constable published an English translation of Merejkowski's famous essay, Dostoieffsky, until recently, remained comparatively unknown to all but a happy few. It is only within the last two or three years that a succession of illuminative studies and adequate translations have introduced Dostoieffsky to a wide circle of readers. Maurice Baring devoted to him a penetrating study in his "Landmarks of Russian Literature." Lawrence Irving adapted "Raskolnikov" for the stage. Mrs. Constance Garnett undertook an admirable rendering of the complete works. Messrs. Dent published in "Everyman's Library" a popular edition of "The House of the Dead" and of "Crime and Punishment."

Notwithstanding Dostoieffsky's supreme greatness, it may be questioned whether, outside those two works, the Russian writer will ever be as universally read in this country as Tolstoy or Turgenev. Mr. Lloyd tells us that "he will be accepted finally as the Russian voice of the nineteenth century." I am afraid this expectation is not likely to be realised. Dostoieffsky is a Russian of the Russians. To understand a book like the "Brothers Karamazov" implies an acquaintance with the conditions of Russian life which few Englishmen can be expected to possess. On the other hand, Dostoieffsky is too depressing, too morbid, as well as too chaotic, ever to attract the ordinary student, who will be rather disposed to accept the more critical estimate of Prince Kropotkin in his "Ideals and Realities in Russian literature" than the enthusiastic glorification of Mr. Baring and Mr. Lloyd.

"LETTRES DE MME. DU DEFFAND À HORACE WALPOLE" †

IT is owing to an extraordinary combination of circumstances that this first edition of a great French classic should appear one hundred and thirty-two years after the death of the author, and that it should have been left to an English publisher and to an English scholar to achieve its publication. The explanation is that the French correspondence of Madame du Deffand to Horace Walpole remained in England and in the possession of his executors. Only a portion of the letters were published in 1810, and, incomplete and inaccurate though the edition proved to be, it was the literary event of the year, and it at once placed Madame du Deffand in the front rank of French letter-writers, immediately below Madame de Sévigné. Every subsequent critic, from Sainte Beuve to Professor Lanson, has endorsed the verdict given a hundred years ago.

But these letters are not only masterpieces of lucid and incisive style, they are not only the expression of the personality of the cleverest and wittiest woman of her age, they are hardly less important as a historical document.

For they give us a striking picture of French

* "A Great Russian Realist: Feodor Dostoieffsky." By J. A. T. Lloyd. 10s. 6d. net. (Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co.)

† "Lettres de Mme. du Deffand à Horace Walpole." By Mrs. Paget Toynbee. Three vols. £3 3s. net. (Methuen.)

society immediately before its final and tragic dissolution. In these three volumes we can study from the inside the intellectual and moral conditions of the French aristocracy before it was swept away by the revolutionary flood.

It is almost unnecessary to commend the editing of this correspondence; the names of the editors, Mr. and Mrs. Paget Toynbee, are in themselves a sufficient guarantee of sound and exact scholarship, and the historical and critical introduction deserves the highest praise.

"LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO" *

I.

MONSIEUR ROMAIN ROLLAND is by far the most original and the most interesting of the younger French novelists. He is one of the moral assets of contemporary French literature. His "Jean-Christophe," of which ten volumes appeared in the French edition, and of which the greater part has appeared in an unusually good English translation, is perhaps the greatest, as it certainly is the most elaborate, achievement of recent French fiction. Its lofty inspiration, its serene wisdom, its humanity, its pathos, its variety of incident and character, its insight into human motive, its broad outlook on life, have made its author one of the spiritual advisers of the present generation, and those characteristics of "Jean-Christophe" are in striking contrast with the characteristics generally associated with the French novel.

II.

But Romain Rolland is not only the author of the longest single novel, he is also the author of the best short biographies in modern French literature.

The "Life of Michael Angelo," which has just been issued by Messrs. Heinemann, is typical of a series which includes Tolstoy, Beethoven, and Millet. It is noteworthy that Mr. Rolland's sense of the heroic almost invariably attracts him to the giants of Literature and Art. As he says himself in his Preface to the present volume: "Great souls are like mountain summits. The wind beats upon them, clouds envelop them; but we breathe better and deeper there than elsewhere. The air on those heights possesses a purity which cleanses the heart of its defilements, and when the clouds part we dominate the human race."

III.

Whilst imbued with a true Carlylean spirit of hero worship, Rolland is never uncritical. His giants always remain human, and it is this combination of reverent appreciation and sympathy and critical penetration which constitutes the freshness and originality of the writer's treatment of the subject. For instance, in the present biography, Michael Angelo ceases to be the conventional Titan of legend, who seems more like his own "Moses" than an ordinary mortal. Rolland does not conceal Michael Angelo's weaknesses, he sees in the life of the Florentine artist a "Hamlet-like tragedy," the poignant contradiction between an heroic genius and a will which was not heroic, between imperious passions and a will which willed not. He sees in the life of Michael Angelo a tragedy of destiny, of innate suffering, which had its origin at the root of his being.

* "Life of Michael Angelo." By Romain Rolland. 6s. (Heinemann.)

WHAT DO YOU KNOW ABOUT BUSINESS?

An Article for All in Business.

To the thoughtless, the easy-going, or the very young man this question may at first glance seem an insult.

Such a one would answer in an off-hand sort of way: "Why, I am in Business—I am a Business man. I know all about Business—or I ought to do so."

Aye, there's the rub. He ought to do. But does he?

Let me put the same question to you.

How much do you know about Business? Unless you are a rare and brilliant exception, you will probably own, after a mortifying self-examination, that it is precious little indeed of sound Business knowledge that you really know—confidently and surely enough to bank on.

Yet without this Business knowledge your chances of doing well for yourself in the business world are very poor ones indeed. With it there is

No Position You Cannot Aspire To.

Now, what do you know about Business?

For instance, do you understand Book-keeping thoroughly? Could you draw up a balance-sheet? Do you understand a profit and loss account? Do you know when recovery of book debts is barred?

Do you know the law as it specially affects your own particular trade, business or calling? Do you know anything at all about manufacturing? Do you know how to figure depreciations? How to check leakage? Do you understand time-keeping systems?

Do you know much about the Income Tax? Do you know Company Law? Do you know all about County Court Business, Judgments, etc.?

Yet these matters are Business Knowledge. And if you want to make money in business you must either know them or know where you can get authoritative and complete and up-to-date information concerning them. What are you to do? You must get the "Business Encyclopædia."

You cannot do without it, whether you are an ambitious young man on the threshold of your commercial life, or a mature business man who dreads that he may be crowded out of the Business fight owing to the present-day stress of competition.

Messrs. J. S. FRY & SONS, Ltd.,
Bristol, write:

"The volumes have already proved of great use to us, and we would not be without them on any account. We strongly advise all commercial men to purchase the work. It is THE work par excellence for every business man to possess."

A FREE BOOK.

The Caxton Publishing Co., Ltd.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge, a copy of the book describing the "Business Encyclopædia," and how it may be obtained for a first payment of 1s. 6d., the balance to be paid by small monthly payments.

Name
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address

IS BALZAC IMMORAL?

An Unexpurgated Edition.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the recent announcement of an edition of that great French author, Balzac, in its complete and unexpurgated form, caused a considerable stir in certain quarters.

Fortunately, however, the publication is now an accomplished fact. For, though the prurient-minded may see wrong where none is meant—and Balzac certainly did write of nature as he found it—it would have been a thousand pities if the public had been deprived of this, its first chance of reading Balzac as he meant to be read.

THE NAPOLEON OF LITERATURE.

For Balzac was to literature what Napoleon was to arms—a man of giant brain who saw all life, all character, and all events as material to be turned into stories, and who did not believe that there were any events that could not be told with advantage. And so his novels made their appeal to all.

BALZAC'S BEST NOVELS.

And all those who realise this will hasten to take advantage of the offer of his Best Novels in 14 volumes, specially selected by that famous Balzacian, Mr. Clement Shorter, Editor of the Sphere.

CLEMENT SHORTER'S CHOICE.

Cousine Bette.	The Lily of the Valley.
Cousin Pons.
La Duchesse de Langeais.	The Illustrious Gaudissart.
The House of the Cat and Racket.	The Village Cure.
Gobseck.	The Country Doctor.
Old Goriot.	The Magic Skin.
Eugenie Grandet.	The Unknown Masterpiece.

WHAT "UNEXPURGATED" MEANS.

"Something has been said of the fact that the publishers advertise that their Balzac is 'unexpurgated.' This is of the utmost importance. The charge that a translator 'betrays' is justified where there is a prurient attempt to modify and alter phrases in the interest of Mrs. Grundy. Nothing can justify that. When face to face with a great classic we want the book as near as possible as the author presented it.

"Altogether it would be impossible to speak too highly of the excellence of translation of this edition of Balzac's novels."

The whole forms 14 fine volumes, handsomely bound in green and gold. The illustrations are by many of the foremost French artists, and the frontispieces are etchings printed from copperplates. The originals were exhibited in the Salon.

A FREE BOOKLET.

To the Caxton Publishing Co., Ltd.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge, and without any obligation on my part, detailed prospectus of "Balzac's Best Novels," with terms of easy payments.

Name
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address

THE ILLUSTRATED CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

A Remarkable Offer.

First Payment, 2s. 6d. only.

Lord Morley once said that it was a matter for regret that there are so many houses in England—some of considerable social pretension—where you will not find a good Encyclopædia of Reference. "That is a very discreditable fact," he said, "because I defy anybody to take up a single copy of the newspaper and not come upon something in it upon which if his interest in the affairs of the day were active, intelligent, and alert as it ought to be, he would consult a Cyclopædia of Reference."

If you agree with Lord Morley as to the necessity for an Encyclopædia, you will be wise to send the coupon at the foot of this column for a free booklet about the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia."

WHAT CHAMBERS'S IS.

The "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work that really fulfils this purpose. Its contributors include 1,000 of the most famous men of our time, and be- tween them they deal with every detail of human knowledge.

It consists of ten handsome half-leather volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross-references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

ALWAYS UP-TO-DATE.

Chambers's is the only Encyclopædia that is always up-to-date. It is a standard work, being sold every day, and constantly being reprinted, so that at each reprinting it is possible to correct it and to bring it up to date. For instance, it contains articles by Sir E. Shackleton on the Antarctic, by Major Baden-Powell on Aeroplanes and Ballooning, and many other subjects of topical interest at the present moment.

TWO OPINIONS.

F. E. SMITH, Esq., K.C., M.P., writes:

"I have long regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as a model of concise and accurate information. The last edition is certainly a great improvement on its predecessors. I have tested the work by referring to a number of subjects on which I have some special knowledge, and have invariably found the information reliable, well expressed, and, above all, up to date."

LORD CURZON of KEDLESTON writes:

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

A FREE BOOK.

The Caxton Publishing Co., Ltd.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Kindly send me free of any charge or obligation your illustrated book on the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and particulars of the special terms of delivery on a first payment of 2s. 6d.

Name
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address

MEMORY BUILDING

By T. SHARPER KNOWLSON

(Pelman Instructor),

Author of "The Art of Thinking," "The Education of the Will," etc.

The Pelman School has the finest group of students in the world. They come from every class of society; they stand for progress and efficiency in every trade and profession under the sun; they represent all the chief nationalities of the great continents; and last, but not least, they are hard workers. Football, tennis, cycling, bridge, whist, and what not are nowadays calling loudly to tired hands and weary brains; but the Pelman student turns a deaf ear to these calls, and begins his text-book work and the exercises involved. Quite true, I assure you. This is no desirable fancy—a thing one would like to believe as against hard facts. It is extremely real, for the thousands of Pelman pupils keep the examiners busy all day and every day.

To be candid, I am not surprised, nor are the Directors of the School, for they spent much time and money in producing a really interesting and profitable course of mind and memory training. There is nothing dry and overpoweringly technical in these lessons; we teach efficiency by means of the things that form part of a man's ordinary life—his reading, his walks abroad, his conversation, even his games at cards.

I am going to show you what a specimen day's work in the Pelman School is like—a pen-picture of some of our pupils as they appear to us from their correspondence and exam. sheets.

Before me is a pile of exam. sheets fresh from the industrious pens of many pupils.

Here on the top is one from a clerk, who entered for our course of general mental training; he wants to make the best of himself and his chances. His weak point is mind wandering. He says in a note: "I sit down to a book or to work out some figures, and almost immediately I begin to think of something else. I bring myself round again, but in a minute I am off wool-gathering. Can you help me?" We can, and we do.

The next paper is from T. Q. M.—those are not his initials, but they will suffice. He is an M.D. of a great University, and an honours man at that. What is his trouble? No trouble at all really. As an educated man, he knows there is a best way of doing everything, and in organising a hundred and one details respecting the duties of a busy hospital life he wishes to adopt the method that is most efficient.

We are teaching him that method, and he is working out an application of it for his own benefit. In a little while he will be able to remember every detail respecting the patients who pass through his hands; all particulars of medicines and operations will file themselves away in his brain, ready for use at an instant's notice. Efficiency is important for the medical man—just as important for us.

A lady teacher comes next. She has just concluded Book 12, the last of the course. To the test questions she has returned admirable answers; and to the final question (as to definite results) she replies that one of the things she has valued most, next to Mr. Pelman's technical help, is the truth that the sense of fear is the most destructive force in the world. I am glad to notice his, because of its truth and because to realise it makes life a different thing altogether.

The day moves on. Luncheon is over—tea time comes—the pile of papers to be examined has decreased; the end, for the time being, is in sight. I have been dealing with doctors, lawyers, engineers, directors, managers, shop assistants, apprentices, miners, school teachers of both sexes, and many more. As the last paper leaves my hands, I begin to wonder why even more than the thousands who have passed, and are passing, through the school do not enrol for the Pelman Course. Is it because advantages are so numerous that they have become stale? Many pupils tell us that they wish they had had many years ago the benefits our course offers to them; they would then have had many more chances of success.

WRITE FOR FREE COPY OF THE "PELMAN MAGAZINE."

If you are unable to call, send your application by letter or post-card to-day for free copy of the "Pelman Magazine."

Address your application (a postcard will do) to the Secretary,

THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND,
52, Wenham House,
Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Branch Schools—

47, Queen Street, Melbourne; 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay;
Club Arcade, Durban.

CORRESPONDENCE

A PROTEST BY ARNOLD BENNETT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have been reading the singular article on myself signed "C. S." in your first issue.

The writer states that I have "deliberately chosen to suppress" my autobiography, and he gives the reason: "Mr. Bennett . . . naturally prefers to divert attention from the indiscretions of his youth." "C. S." has no justification for such a statement. It is untrue. The book was remaindered years ago by the publishers, who now probably regret their rash act as much as I always did. If it has not been reissued in England the fault is not mine. I am, and have been, very anxious to restore it to the public. Unhappily, I have not been able to inspire the publishers with my own enthusiasm for a very honest piece of work of which I shall never be ashamed. The publishers control this book. I have reissued it in America, and for years past I have included it in the list of my works which appears at the beginning of all my books. By the way, "C. S." is wrong in supposing that it has "almost entirely escaped the notice" of the critics. It has been utilised in scores of articles about me by scores of critics English, American and French.

The writer further states: "On the risky subject of 'La Maison Tellier,' Maupassant only dares to give us a short story; Bennett has given us the longest of his novels." This statement is scandalously untrue. The subject of "La Maison Tellier" is the licensed brothel and its inmates. Will any reader of "The Old Wives' Tale" come forward and assert that the subject of "The Old Wives' Tale" is the brothel? It is true that a couple of prostitutes appear in the novel as subsidiary characters, but the single episode in which they are concerned occupies forty pages out of nearly six hundred. If "C. S." has read "The Old Wives' Tale" he has a treasonable memory which unfits him for his task as a critic. If he has not, then how shall his conduct be described? Perhaps he has not read it. (He misquotes the very title twice.) In the face of it he says that the comic not the tragic "aspect of humanity" appeals to me. Conceivably "The Old Wives' Tale" may gradually become known as a comic work! Indeed, I should like to know what works of mine "C. S." really has read. He says that I am "never conscious of a moral purpose," and that I have "no exalted moral ideals," and no "didactic purpose." It does just happen that I have published four purely didactic books concerning the right conduct of life. One might almost suppose that "C. S." has read no book of mine except my autobiography. It is difficult to believe that he has read even his own article, which is full of absurd contradictions. For example, in one column I "always maintain a high artistic ideal." But in another column my "scale of literary values is primarily so many pounds per thousand words."

"C. S." amplifies this insult thus: "Those who, like the present writer, have the profoundest admiration for his magnificent gifts, will be most sincere in their regret that he should have sold his birthright as a man of genius for a mess of pottage." It appears that I helped to write "Milestones" "mainly to make money." "C. S." is here guilty of another serious libel. The basis of his accusation is that in 1901, when I was poor and needed an advertisement for my realistic novels, I spent, on my own confession printed at that time, a trifling portion of my leisure in writing plays for money and notoriety. (They were the best plays

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

I could then write.) On the strength of this candour, he asserts that "on my own admission," in 1911, when I had a great deal of money (for an artist) and more than enough notoriety, I wrote "Milestones" "mainly to make money and to win the kind of fame which is convertible into hard cash." This is the worst libel.

"C. S." ought to be ashamed of himself.

Perhaps I may be allowed to remark, as pertinent to the subject, that though I have not suppressed my autobiography, I have suppressed my early plays, none of which has ever been performed. I have been told by pained experts in these markets that in suppressing them I have incidentally suppressed at a moderate computation some forty thousand pounds.

I make no comment on other gross offences in "C. S.'s" article, and I should not have deigned to offer even this limited protest did I not deem it my urgent if unpleasant duty to do so, and had I not a certain regard for the editorial ideals of EVERYMAN.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARNOLD BENNETT.

14, St. Simon's Avenue, Putney, S.W.,
October 18th, 1912.

REPLY TO MR. ARNOLD BENNETT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I very much regret that my article should have inflicted pain and given offence to an eminent man of letters for whom I entertain, and for whom in that very article I have expressed, the most profound admiration. I also regret that my paper should contain one statement which, as Mr. Bennett proves, is not correct, and another which is misleading. These two statements I unreservedly withdraw, and for these I tender my most sincere apologies.

(1) I state in my article that Mr. Bennett, "after publishing his autobiography, has deliberately chosen to suppress it." I reasonably inferred that so fascinating a book by so famous an author could only have been withheld from the public for nine years because the author himself chose to withhold it. But my inference is obviously not correct. It is Mr. Bennett's publishers, and not Mr. Bennett himself, who for some mysterious reason have refused to republish a work of which Mr. Bennett himself anxiously desired a re-issue.

(2) I state that "The Old Wives' Tale" deals with the same subject as Maupassant's masterpiece, "La Maison Tellier." Mr. Bennett is quite right in protesting against this misleading assertion. In comparing Mr. Bennett to the greatest short-story writer of France, I meant, of course, to be complimentary, and the lavish praise which I give to the novel could certainly not be interpreted as an insult. At the same time, I admit that the phrase objected to is undoubtedly misleading. It is true the episode referred to seems to me the central and most impressive episode in the novel, and the decisive one in the life story of the heroine, and that its consequences affect the whole second part of the book. But the fact remains that the episode itself only occupies forty pages.

(3) In calling Mr. Bennett a "typical business man of letters," and in dwelling on the preoccupation of the money problem, I have only quoted Mr. Bennett's own words. It might be fairly argued that the author must not be taken too literally, and that Mr. Bennett has not done himself justice. And certainly an author who, like Mr. Bennett, refuses to put on the stage early plays which do not satisfy him, and who thus, as he informs us, has sacrificed forty thousand pounds

"The World Is After All Not Going to the Devil."

A remarkable letter sent to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION by that distinguished artist, Sir Hubert Von Herkomer, runs in this way :

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER AND PUBLIC OPINION

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on Art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

OBJECT OF PUBLIC OPINION.

Now the object of PUBLIC OPINION is, while focussing the opinions and news of the week as given in the world's best newspapers and magazines and books, to emphasise those movements and opinions which are becoming important, and which promise to loom large in the future.

PUBLIC OPINION emphasises the fact that there is news in ideas as well as in the ordinary facts of life—for ideas rule the world: and is always on the look out for the hopeful thing and the helpful thing, the men and the women and the movements and the opinions which tend to lift the world forward.

PUBLIC OPINION

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

The Art of Self-Expression.

Speaking approximately, only one person in every hundred develops his capacity for success. The remaining ninety-nine plod along, enjoying but a fraction of the pleasure and personal prestige which might easily be theirs.

In the social world, thousands desirous of being popular fail, not because they lack social qualities, but because they do not know how to use them. They sit glum and awkward because they do not know what to say or how to say it. It is just this knowledge that is the secret of Social Success.

A well-known author has concentrated in a series of private lecture lessons all there is to know about the rules of self-culture, social progress, the development of your self-expression, and practical common-sense methods of making the best of yourself and your personality.

No handbook ever published contains the exclusive information given in this unique course of postal training.

The student who studies this spare-time self-culture course enjoys the advantages of personal correspondence with the author, and his advice on all matters likely to promote his social progress and prosperity.

If you care to write the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C., stating your present aims and needs, and any other particulars about yourself, he will send you a booklet all about this Course, which has done so much for so many and may be as useful to you.

Any way, you risk nothing, and it costs nothing to receive this interesting and descriptive little brochure, and it may mean so much for your future.

The Practical Correspondence College also conducts Courses of Postal Training in Advertisement Writing, Black and White Illustrating, Poster, Showcard, and Magazine Cover Designing, Press Photography, and Journalism.

Each of these Courses is conducted by an expert of international repute, and the fact that the majority of students are able to earn back the whole of their fees even before completing the lessons, is a convincing testimony as to the practical money-earning value of the training.

DECEIVED BY DIABOLUS!

The well-known proverb should read: "God sends the Food, but the Devil sends the Spoopans," which boil and wash out the valuable salts, tonics, natural aperients, and life-giving essences of meat and vegetables, which are designed to revitalize and reinvigorate body and brain. On account of this "washed out" method of cookery, many suffer from "Brain Fog," Dyspepsia, Insomnia, Neuralgia, and Aemia, seeking relief in drugs, stimulants, narcotics, and quack nostrums, in a vain attempt to make up for that which, in folly, has been thrown away. But the evil has been overcome at last by the aid of a Simple, Scientific, and Conservative Cooker, which conserves all the vital essences of Meat and Vegetables. This Cooker is called—

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

Don't Delay
but
Send To-day.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot, above 212 degrees, yet never burns the food. As it is Self-Acting, it requires no attention, and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER" (Hospital).

The Ideal Cooker for Porridge, Milk, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jam and Marmalade Making, Beef Tea, &c. A Speciality for Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT & VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

By which means all the valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and Life-Giving Properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

BEAUTIFUL BOILERETTED BEEF.

Better than Roast. The boilerette browns meat. Fat eats like marrow. Lean so tender that it can be spread like potted meat, yet so thin that it can be thinly sliced. Very delicious as a cold joint.

"THE OLD CONVERTED INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat tender and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

THE COOKER THAT LOOKS AFTER ITSELF.

You simply put a complete dinner in the Boilerette, go right away and leave it to take care of itself. When you are ready to dine, it will be found beautifully cooked, ready to serve. Please Note.—These Boilerettes can be left for hours without attention.

Full Particulars, with Booklet of Remarkable Testimonials, Post Free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, BANBURY,
LONDON DEPOT: 105, Newgate Street, E.C. Tel. 5796 City.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

to satisfy his literary conscience, cannot be said to write in a mercenary spirit.—I am, sir, etc., C. S.

October 21st, 1912.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—All readers of EVERYMAN will feel deeply grateful to Mr. R. J. Campbell for expounding in such eloquent language the vital question of the Union of the Churches. Many thoughtful readers will agree, however, that he has contributed little towards its solution.

Mr. Campbell believes in meetings and gatherings and discussions. Has he not yet discovered that Congresses rather tend to increase religious differences than diminish them? Has his own practical experience not taught him the futility of Congresses for the noble object he has in view? Has he forgotten that the World Congress of Religion in Chicago, which was wonderfully organised, proved so disastrous a failure that it has never been repeated?

On the other hand, Mr. Campbell makes the insistence on dogmas and creeds responsible for the religious divisions amongst men. I beg entirely to differ from him. Men are divided, not because they believe too much, but because they believe too little. Religious impotence is due to religious anarchy, not to religious dogmatism. Indeed, the only Church that is more efficient and more powerful than all the others together—I do not examine whether she uses her power for good or evil—is the Roman Catholic Church. And that is because she is the one dogmatic Church. It is probably for that very reason that Mr. Campbell ignores her marvellous influence.

In this connection I may point out that Mr. Campbell entirely misreads the religious situation of the Continent. In the most intellectual country of Europe, namely France, the Roman Catholic Church is certainly more powerful to-day than she has been for the last fifty years. The premier literary review of the world, La Revue des Deux Mondes, is under Catholic influence. The most popular weekly, Les Annales Politiques et Littéraires, which is the representative organ of the cultured middle class, would not dare to publish an article with an anti-Catholic bias. Half of the members of the French Academy are professed Catholics.

Do those facts agree with Mr. Campbell's astounding assertion that "men of intellect, especially on the Continent, are almost ashamed to be known as associating themselves with the practice of religion."—I am, sir, etc., SCOTUS NOVANTICUS.

Jedburgh, October 21st, 1912.

THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have just finished reading the first number of your excellent periodical, to which I became a subscriber the moment I heard of its existence, and its perusal stimulates me to make two observations.

The first is about the neglect of German. I took my degree in the Classical Tripos of 1860. It was the custom at that time for every graduate, who was or wished to be distinguished, to go to Germany and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the language. One of our favourite resorts was at a pension at Dresden.

Anyone visiting this pension in the summer or early autumn would be certain to find there the flower of young Cambridge, and Oxford as well, gathered within its walls. Alas! few of these are alive to support my testimony. I do not pretend to be specially a German scholar, but during the first twenty-five years after taking my degree I read more in German than any other language. This was the result of a purely classical education. Now, when classical training is decried and education has become modern, German is ignored. The time saved from Greek and Latin has gone into science and sport.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

The second observation is about my dear friend Oscar Wilde. When I went to Oxford, in 1876, to stay with my old pupils, George Barnes and W. R. Paton, Barnes said to me, "There's a man at Magdalen named Wilde, who is very anxious to make your acquaintance. He says that he has heard you so much abused that he is sure you must be a most excellent person." He then added, "He's the man who said he wished that he could live up to his Blue China." So that M. Mazel's story is older than he imagines. The friendship thus begun continued to Wilde's death.—I am, your obedient servant, (Signed) OSCAR BROWNING.

THE REAL NEWMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the criticism of Newman in the number of EVERYMAN dated October 25th, M. Houtin remarks upon the narrowness of his attitude at the time of his secession to the Roman Church. He bases this estimate upon the fact that for Newman the whole question turned upon the validity of the Anglican claim to apostolical succession. But surely this is not narrow: or, if it is, then what are we to say of such things as the split between Catholic and Orthodox, or the crisis of the English constitution? For these matters hung upon even smaller technicalities than apostolical succession. The Eastern and Western Churches finally divided on the question of the insertion of the word Filioque in the Nicene Creed, while the whole fabric of the English constitution once depended on whether the royal power could be said to be "over and above," or merely "out of" the law. Such technicalities are trivial in themselves, but they often signify momentous changes. And it is a matter of considerable importance whether or no sacraments administered by the Anglican clergy are valid, which Newman believed to be impossible if the apostolical succession had been broken.

Besides, the stress laid on this very question indicates that he was already, while in the English Church, a Catholic in spirit. And how great a gulf has yet to be spanned before the Vatican is reached by one in this position—a gulf created solely by technicalities—can only be appreciated by those who have stepped across it.

The last two sentences of M. Houtin's article are not a little provocative—at least, they are dogmatic. The progress of science, and the spirit of the rising generation as shown in the universities, seems more likely to refute than to confirm the incompatibility of scientific research with orthodox belief. It is not yet proved that orthodoxy is the "past," or science the "future." The pendulum of the young life of England—at the present—is swinging far out in the direction of Rome—a fact which does not seem to alter either their belief in science or their logical abilities.—I am, sir, etc.,

CATHOLIC.

Balliol College, Oxford, October 25th.

GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY FOR INVESTORS.

10%, 15%, 20% Return, instead of Paltry 4%

Dwindling Incomes and Shrinking Capitals have lately been the rule rather than the exception.

Consequently the prudent Investor is reconsidering his position. He is not content to watch his Income slowly fade away into nothingness, neither is he content with a 4% return when, with greater security, he can obtain 10% or more.

One of the most profitable forms of investment possible to-day is the purchase of an Annuity from the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

The Investor is not tied down to a particular and general form of Annuity, but can take his choice from a dozen or more forms. There are Annuities which protect the Financial future of the Annuitant alone, the Annuitant and his wife, the Annuitant and his wife and family (for a fixed period after his death), and there are Annuities which secure educational benefits for children and far better terms for Annuitants whose health is unfortunately impaired.

By making small annual payments, Annuities can be purchased which mature at a later date. For instance, by depositing £13 2s. a year, a young man aged 26 secures an income of £100 a year, beginning at 60.

No Life Office in the world has better assets than the Sun Life of Canada; no Insurance Company in the world offers more generous terms. All assets are invested in conformity with the Canadian Government requirements.

Further particulars cannot be given here, but readers who are anxious to provide for their future, or to increase their present "unearned" Income, should send the Enquiry Form provided below to the Manager (Mr. J. F. Junkin).

To the Manager (Mr. J. F. Junkin),
SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA,
 94, Canada House, Norfolk St., London, W.C.

Please send me particulars, explanatory booklets, etc., of your various forms of Annuity Insurance. (Enquirer should state age and particulars of annuity required, the communication being regarded as confidential.)

NAME

ADDRESS

AGE..... ANNUITY REQUIRED.....

The Gift of Apt Expression is the Writer's greatest Asset.

It is, however, a gift which is not always at command. Sometimes at the crucial moment it fails one. Even the best of men experience failure in this direction.

Now is the Writer's Opportunity to become possessed of this Asset in a manner which will never fail him.

FOR THE NOMINAL OUTLAY OF 2/-

ROGET'S
 THESAURUS

is included in the latest additions to

"EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY"

This Thesaurus is a real treasury of English words and phrases. It is in a true sense the Writer's Philosopher and Friend. It enables him always to devise forms of expression which faithfully portray his ideas.

Roget's Thesaurus, as revised by Andrew Boyle, furnishes on every topic a copious store of words and phrases adapted to express all recognisable shades and modifications of the general idea.

It is not merely a dictionary of synonyms. It is more—much more—than that. That is why it has hitherto been so expensive to obtain.

It is now published in

TWO VOLUMES AT 1/- EACH, and can be had of all booksellers

100 Copies in 10 Minutes*

of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof, complete outfit, foolscap size.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON

WHO SAID THE STUDY OF GERMAN WAS DECLINING?

Write to: THE SECRETARY, Eversley Language Institute, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C., for particulars of CORRESPONDENCE COURSES IN GERMAN & NINE OTHER LANGUAGES.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPE-WRITING of every description under expert literary supervision from 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper included.—THE NATIONAL TYPE-WRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

H. G. COMMIS, 100, OLD CHRISTCHURCH ROAD, BOURNEMOUTH—ANTIQUE and New Bookseller. BOOKS BOUGHT, SOLD or EXCHANGED. Libraries arranged, Catalogued, Sets Rebound. A NEW CATALOGUE of RECENT SECOND-HAND PURCHASES JUST ISSUED and SENT TO ANY ADDRESS UPON APPLICATION.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount, 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogue No. 614, and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. Foyle, 135, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

AUTHORS' INCOMES TREBLED by placing their work through the Cambridge Literary Agency, who obtain the HIGHEST PRICES. 16 pp. Prospectus free.—115, Strand, W.C.

Advertisers are requested to note that the circulation of No. 1 of EVERYMAN was 147,355 copies and for No. 2 149,500.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY, 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	1/3 Page	1/4 Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3 1/4 inches wide), 21s. Depth of Page, 10 1/2 inches.

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS, 1s. per line (Minimum 3s.) Orders for Advertisements are subject to approval and to the space being available. The Proprietors also reserve the right to omit any advertisement at any time, and they decline responsibility in the event of any advertisement being omitted from any cause whatever.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED*

- Andoux, Margaret. "Valserine." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
- Auchan, Baroness Albert D'. "Fourteen Years of Dramatic Life in Japan." (Paul, 18s.)
- Barclay, F. L. "Through the Postern Gate." (Putnam, 6s.)
- " " "The Rosary." (Putnam, 6s.)
- Barker, J. Illis. "Modern Germany." (Smith, Elder, ros. 6d.)
- Beach, Rex. "The Net." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Begbie, Harold. "The Lady Next Door." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Benson, E. F. "Mrs. Ames." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Bradley, A. G. "The Gateway of Scotland." (Constable, ros. 6d.)
- Bradley, J. Fovargue. "Nonconformists and the Welsh Church Bill." (Pitman, 1s.)
- Bradstock, Burton. "Not at Grubbin's." (Lynwood.)
- Blake, William. "Songs of Innocence." (Dent.)
- Cambridge "History of English Literature." Vol. viii. (University Press.)
- Cantley, C. Holmes. "The Weaving of the Shuttle." (Duckworth, 6s.)
- Carlyle of Inveresk, The Autobiography of Alexander. (Foulis, 6s.)
- Clercq, Pierre le. "The Enchanting Mysteries of Kathleen Carter." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
- Crane, Walter. "Robin Hood." (Jack, 7s. 6d.)
- Chateaubriand, Alphonse de. "The Keypnote." A Translation. (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Comfort, Will Levington. "Fate Knocks at the Door." (Lippincott, 6s.)
- Courlander, Alphonse. "Mightier than the Sword." (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)
- Crockett, S. R. "The Moss Troopers." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Cockburn, Lord. "Memories of his Time." (T. N. Foulis.)
- Dix, B. M. "The Fighting Blade." (Holt, 6s.)
- Doyle, Conan. "The Lost World." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Dubois, L. Paul. "Contemporary Ireland." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
- Duckworth, F. R. G. "From a Pedagogue's Sketch Book." (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)
- Figgis, Darrell. "Studies and Appreciation." (Dent, 5s.)
- Forster, Mary Ansell. "Happy Houses." (Cassell, 6s.)
- Fortescue. "The Royal Visit to India." (Macmillan, ros. 6d.)
- France, Anatole. "Bee, the Princess of the Dwarfs." (J. M. Dent, 7s. 6d.)
- Frazer. "The Golden Bough." 2 vols. (Macmillan.)
- Garvice, Charles. "Two Maids and a Man." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Gilbert, W. S. "The Gondoliers." (Bell, 3s. 6d.)
- Gouldsbury, Ellen. "Songs Out of Exile." (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)
- Gouldsbury, C. E. "Life in the Indian Police." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)
- Gran, Gerhard. "Jean Jacques Rousseau."
- Grant, Sybil. "The Chequer Board." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Gregory, Trans. by Lady. "The Kiltartan Moliere." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
- Hackwood, W. Frederick. "William Hone: his Life and Times." (Fisher Unwin, ros. 6d.)
- Harraden, Beatrice. "Out of the Wreck I Shall Rise." (Nelson, 2s.)
- Hone, Percy F. "Southern Rhodesia." (Bell, 6s.)
- Innes, A. D. "The History of the British Nation." (Jack, 3s. 6d.)
- Kauffman, Reginald. "Daughters of Ishmael." (Swift, 6s.)
- Kennedy, J. M. "English Literature, 1880-1905."
- Lamb, Charles. "All the Tales from Shakespeare." Two vols. (Heinemann, 21s.)
- Lang, Mrs. Andrew. "Men, Women, and Mixes." (Longmans, 7s. 6d.)
- London, John O'. "London Stories." Vol. I. and II. (Jack, 6s. per vol.)
- Littlewood, S. R. "The Story of Pierrot." (Herbert and Daniel.)
- Lloyd, T. A. F. "A Great Russian Realist."
- Lumbrose, A. "Napoleon."
- MacLean, Donald. "John Scarlett." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Maclean, Bridget. "The Mistress of Kingdoms." (Duckworth, 6s.)
- Maclaren, Ian. "Books and Bookmen." (Nisbet, 1s.)
- Macdonald, Greville. "The Trustee's Quest." (Fifield, 5s.)
- Man who was Warned, The. "The Day that Changed the World." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Masefield, John. "The Widow in the Bye-Street." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d.)
- Macauley, Rose. "The Lee Shore." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Mason, A. E. W. "The Turnstile." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Montessori, Maria. "Montessori Method."
- McCabe, Joseph. "Goethe." (Nash, 15s.)
- Napier, Rosamund. "Tamsie." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
- Nicoll, Sir W. Robertson, LL.D. "The Problem of Edwin Drood." (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)
- Neuman, B. Paul. "Simon Brandin." (Murray, 6s.)

(Continued on page 98.)

* A further list of books received will be published next week.

Mr. Sandow on "The Wretched Life of the Liverish."

"Life is only worth Living when the Liver is Right."

Slang may not always be beautiful, but it is expressive.

"The Hump," "the Blues," are both familiar slang expressions that describe a condition which most people have at some time experienced, but cannot often understand or explain.

The true explanation is physiological or material, not mental.

The mind may be quite sound and normal, the brain strong and stable, yet these fits of depression will arise from time to time if the liver gets out of order.

How to Know the Liverish Man.

Then the whole world becomes opaque. One huge inky cloud of depression settles on the mind. Matthew Arnold's phrase, "Sweetness and light," is something "the man with a liver" cannot understand.

He is irritable, peevish, pessimistic, either insanely daring or effeminately timorous. His appetite vanishes to a fine, almost invisible point. His palate craves for sharp acids and piquant spices. His skin becomes dry and feverish, alternately between hot flushes and cold shiverings. He is all nerves but has no nerve. His hands burn at the palms, his vision is marred, his mind wanders or jumps from one subject to another. He cannot read, think, or sleep, but he is always heavy and sleepy. He is afraid of everything, afraid of others, afraid of himself, afraid of being afraid, and afraid of being thought afraid.

Evidences of Liver Trouble.

Life depends upon the liver, that great secretory and excretory organ, which stands sentinel over the blood, but which, sometimes, alas! falls asleep at its post.

When the liver becomes torpid and inactive the physical symptoms are easily read. The tongue becomes rough and furred, the white of the eye takes on a dirty yellow hue, the eyes themselves ooze water at intervals or continuously, sometimes there is actual pain in the right side of the abdomen, often there is headache or a feeling of numbness and pressure in the brain, the whole body seems to curl up and lose all its vigour and elasticity.

These are certain unmistakable evidences of liver trouble.

What is the remedy?

Any doctor will tell you that exercise is the best liver tonic in the world.

But even that does not go quite far enough.

You might ride and row and swim and cycle and golf and play tennis, or cricket, or football for half a century and still suffer from liver disorder. Many well-known athletes suffer keenly from liver disorders.

Exercise is admittedly the correct, and, indeed, the greatest remedy for functional liver troubles, but the exercise must be specific, must be skilfully prescribed and graduated, and must be scientific and physiological in its action and results.

You might as well take the first medicine bottle you see on a doctor's shelf for your liver as to blindly take up some form of physical exercise recklessly.

It is to meet just such cases as these that the light, pleasant, and skilfully graduated psycho-physical movements in the Sandow Treatment are arranged to suit the individual peculiarities of each separate patient.

The exercise that would help one might very readily be detrimental to another.

Movements that Massage the Liver.

In the Sandow Treatment for derangements and disorders of the liver you will find a safe, natural, scientific and physiological method of rousing out of its lethargy the most torpid liver. Special movements are selected that massage the liver, increasing gradually its power to secrete bile and its ability to eliminate impurities and those waste products and self-engendered poisons that are the results of internal fermentation, and which produce a species of self-poisoning or auto-intoxication.

The treatment can be carried out in your own home under postal direction, or at my Institute. It occupies but a few minutes daily, and in no way interferes with the usual daily routine.

Free Literature and Advice.

You will find the whole subject of the liver and its functions treated at length in my book on "Liver Troubles," which any reader can obtain gratis and post free by filling in the attached coupon and posting it to me at The Sandow Institute, 32, St. James Street, London, S.W. This book describes the various troubles that beset this most important organ of the body, in a very thorough manner, indicating the various symptoms of each, and proving convincingly that the skilful and scientific physical and physiological movements employed in the Sandow treatment (which is quite inexpensive) are the only absolute and permanent cure for all liver disorders of a functional nature. Those who suffer from these liver worries will be well advised to obtain a gratis copy of this book.

I am always glad, too, to receive those who can call personally upon me at my Institute in St. James Street, S.W., where I am in attendance daily for consultations. Whether you write or call no preliminary fee is charged, and no obligation incurred. If I do not think my treatment can benefit you, I will tell you so at once, as I undertake no case of any kind unless I can promise a complete cure, or at least considerable relief. For the convenience of those who write, a form of application is appended below. Address, Eugen Sandow, The Sandow Institute, 32, St. James Street, London, S.W.

POST THIS FORM FOR THE BOOK

To Mr. EUGEN SANDOW,
The Sandow Curative Institute, 32, St. James Street, London, S.W.
Please forward me (free and post free) your book on "Liver Troubles."

NAME
State whether Mr., Mrs., or Miss, or title.

ADDRESS

Occupation..... Age.....

A letter giving fuller information should be attached to the Coupon if desired.
Everyman. Nov. 1, 1912.

"The most remarkable Single"

Volume ever published."

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

Containing over

400,000 REFINED WORDS AND PHRASES.

2,700 PAGES. 6,000 ILLUSTRATIONS.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

Divided page: important words above, less important below. The "New International" is the only Dictionary containing this important feature.

Encyclopædic Information is given upon thousand of subjects. This one volume contains the pith and essence of an authoritative library.

Literary Quotations. No Dictionary approaches "Webster" in the number and variety of its Illustrative Literary Quotations. In the "New International" these have been much increased in number.

Synonyms are more skillfully treated than in any other English work.

Gazetteer and Biographical Dictionary have been thoroughly revised and brought up to date.

Pronunciation is phonetically indicated by the "WEBSTER" SYSTEM of re-spelling. The simplest and most effective method used in any work of reference.

New Discoveries and Inventions in Medicine, Science, and Technology are fully described and illustrated.

£90,000 and Ten Years' Labour have been devoted to making better what was already regarded as THE BEST.

Sir SYDNEY LEE, D.Litt., says:—

"No more complete and satisfying presentation of our language in all its forms has yet. I think, been achieved in a single volume. . . . 'Webster's New International Dictionary' is indeed a library in itself, and no collection of books, whether small or large, should be, in my opinion, without a copy."

A FREE BOOK.

On receipt of this Coupon, or a postcard mentioning "Everyman," Messrs. BELL will send, gratis and post free, a copy of the Illustrated Booklet, with Specimen Pages, describing the "New International Dictionary."

Name

Address

London: C. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Dept. IV., Portugal St., W.C.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED (continued).

- Neitzche. "The Young Neitzche." (Heinemann, 15s.)
 Mildeberg, Alma Bahr, and Hermann Bahr. "Bayreuth and the Wagner Theatre." (T. Fisher Unwin.)
 Palmer, John. "The Censor and the Theatres." (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)
 Rice, Alice Hegan. "A Romance of Billy Goat Hill." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Richardson, John. "In the Garden of Delight." (Harrap, 3s. 6d.)
 Richards, Grant. "Caviare." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
 Rosegger, Peter. "The Forest Farm." (Fifield, 2s.)
 Reynolds, Mrs. Baillie. "A Makeshift Marriage." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Saintsbury. "History of English Prose Rhythm."
 Shott, Beatrice. "Rosemary and Rue." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 6s.)
 Schofield, Lily. "Elizabeth, Betsy, and Bess." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 Stuart, John A. "The Rock of the Ravens." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Sudermann. "Roses." (Duckworth.)
 " " "Morituri." (Duckworth.)
 Strindberg. "There are Crimes and Crimes." (Duckworth.)
 " " "Miss Julia the Stronger." (Duckworth.)
 Strindberg, August. "Legends." (Melrose, 5s.)
 Staepool, H. de Vere. "The Street of the Flute-Player." (Murray, 6s.)
 Sullivan, Seumas O'. "Poems." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
 Sygne, John M. "The Arran Islands." (Maunsel, 5s.)
 " " "Two Plays." (Maunsel, 5s.)
 " " "Four Plays." (Maunsel, 5s.)
 " " "The Wicklow, West Kerry, and Connemara." (Maunsel, 5s.)
 Shuster, W. Morgan. "The Strangling of Persia." (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d.)
 Stevenson, R. L. "Edinburgh." (Seeley, 12s. 6d.)
 " " "Letters." Four vols. (Methuen, 5s. each.)
 Stevenson, Thomas. "Chrysanthemums." (Jack, 1s. 6d.)
 Short, W. M. "Arthur James Balfour as a Philosopher and Thinker."
 Swayne, Martin. "The Sporting Instinct." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Tempest, Evelyn. "A Rogue's March." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Vance, Louis Joseph. "The Bandbox." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
 Virgil. "The Aeneid." Trans. by Foster. (J. M. Dent.)
 Wallace, Mackenzie. "Russia." (Cassell, 12s. 6d.)
 Walpole. "Lettres à Horace Walpole." Three vols. (Methuen, 63s.)
 Ward, Wilfred. "The Life of Cardinal Newman." Vols. I. and II. (Longmans, 36s.)
 Waterman, Nixon, and Grace Bartruse. "The Girl Wanted." (Harrap, 2s. 6d.)
 Waterman, Nixon, and Fred Burnby, B.A. "The Boy Wanted." (Harrap 2s. 6d.)
 Wells, H. G. "Marriage." (Macmillan, 6s.)
 Wilde, Oscar. "Collected Works." Twelve vols. (Methuen, 5s. each.)
 Wilson, Catherine. "The Modern Evangeline." (Gay and Hancock, 6s.)
 Whittaker, Joseph. "Far-off Fields."
 Wyndham. "The Correspondence of Sarah Lady Lyttelton." (Murray, 15s.)
 Weeks, John H. "Among Congo Cannibals." (Seeley, Service, and Co., 16s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor will endeavour to return manuscripts only when a stamped envelope is enclosed. All manuscripts should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d. Foreign—
8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS' LIST.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net each volume. A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English Literature and English thought.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY. By Prof. JAMES SETH, M.A.
ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY. Prof. W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A. [Prospectus.]

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: Historical—Pictorial—Colonial.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Prospectus.]
ATHENÆUM.—"Will certainly find a place among intelligent readers."

THE LAST LEGITIMATE KING OF FRANCE.

By PHEBE ALLEN. With Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Prospectus.]

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Prospectus.]

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

Vol. II. By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each volume. Vol. III, ready shortly. [Prospectus.]

PRAYERS: Ancient and Modern.

By WILLIAM ANGUS KNIGHT, Emeritus Professor of Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews. F'cap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

TRIANGULAR CRICKET:

By E. H. D. SEWELL. With Illustrations. 5s. net. [Prospectus.]
PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A record of the greatest contest in the history of the game."

JOSEPH CONRAD'S 'TWIXT LAND AND SEA. 6s.

TIMES.—"A masterpiece."

MORNING POST.—"A haunting power of imagery."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A high and masterly artist."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"He has never done better."

[Prospectus.]

FLORENCE CONVERSE'S THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT.

Author of "The House of Prayer." Crown 8vo. 6s.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"It is charming, interesting and thrilling."

PERCEVAL GIBBON'S THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

PUNCH.—"I never want to read a more finished, . . . deliciously exciting set of adventures."

A Book of Verse by EVELYN UNDERHILL. IMMANENCE. Crown 8vo, gilt top, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

THE HENRY JAMES YEAR BOOK.

Selected and arranged by EVELYN GARNAUT SMALLEY; with an Introduction by Henry James and William Dean Howells. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

By WILLIAM CANTON. With Illustrations in Colour by HERBERT COLE. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net. Uniform with "A Child's Book of Saints."

BEE: The Princess of the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Retold in English by PETER WRIGHT. With Coloured Illustrations and many Decorations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large F'cap 4to. 7s. 6d. net.

THE SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OTHER POEMS.

By WILLIAM BLAKE. With Coloured Illustrations and Decorations by CHARLES and MAY ROBINSON. Small 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

With many charming full-page Drawings in Colours depicting the various episodes described in the famous Lyric. By MARGARET W. TARRANT. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

JOLLY CALLE AND OTHER SWEDISH FAIRY TALES.

By HELENA NYBLOM. With several Illustrations in Colour by CHARLES FOLKARD. Square Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN.

By Mrs. RODOLPH STAWELL. Illustrated with Pictures in Colour and in Line by FRANK C. PAPE. 3s. 6d. net.

FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

By HILLEL SAMSON. Illustrated Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

Let us send you a Special Prospectus of these Children's Books.

A postcard from you will ensure your promptly receiving a Prospectus of any of the above books so marked.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER.

← 5 1/2 in → Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

Agents Wanted.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm. It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to go to the theatre or have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/6 or 2/-. That is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster. Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. You know before you were told that air improves a fire, or why do you blow it to make it go? Just fancy, only half a smother coal to be bought. You must then send your postal order now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5 1/2 in. wide), 2/-; or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide) 1/6. Postage on each, 3d. Go to the Post Office NOW, and start this investment of 1/6 or 2/- earning big dividends for you at once. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years, an unheard of saving. Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

Agents Wanted.

Burning half coal, half air. Result: Great Heat with V. & H. Coal Saver

1/6

Postage 3d.

NO MORE GOLD FEET

Cold feet can now be a thing of the past. The new "Slipon" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm non-irritating woolly material. Worn next to the skin. Your sock or stocking is worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/- per pair, post. 1d. extra. State boot size. P.O.'s only.—VAUGHAN & HEATHER, (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

Agents Wanted.

Post. 1d.

1/-

SOFT BEDROOM SLIPPERS, 6d. per pair just the thing for Dainty Feet. Post. 2d. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

The Business Pen

If you want a pen that is essentially a business pen—a pen for heavy, strenuous work—a pen that can be depended upon always—that never has fits of obstinacy, never spouts, spatters or blots—buy The W.H.S. Pen.

The W.H.S. Pen is instantly responsive, has a delightful touch, and is self-filling. It fills in five seconds without a filler. It saves time, trouble, and mess. For the business of writing you need The W.H.S. (Self-filling) Pen.

There are 36 styles to choose from: every hand can be suited. The nib is of genuine 14-carat gold, tipped with iridium. Every pen is guaranteed for two years.

BUY ONE TO-DAY OF YOUR STATIONER 3/9

Refuse Substitutes. Insist on the pen with the W.H.S. on the barrel

THE W.H.S. PEN

To

Everyman & Everywoman

with a taste for Art.

Designing Posters, Advertisements, Covers, etc., is one of the most remunerative occupations.

Drawing for reproduction can be learned by anyone with common sense and ambition.

A course of Home Study Lessons, and the personal help and criticism of one of London's Leading Experts, will teach you to earn guineas with your brush. You can learn by post to make sketches that are wanted, and to dispose of them to the utmost advantage.

It costs nothing and you risk nothing by writing for particulars of our Applied Art Courses.

State if you desire to work in colours or black and white. Send a small specimen of your work in any media, and it will be returned to you with a gratis criticism by our Art Director, and his candid opinion on your chances of success.

Write the Secretary,
Practical Correspondence COLLEGE,
 77, Thanet House, Strand.

Monarch Light Touch

means all-day speed—no mid-afternoon fatigue. It means more work from a given amount of energy—increased output—decreased cost of typewriting to the employer. Let us give you a demonstration of this and other Monarch advantages.

The Monarch Typewriter Co., Ltd., 165, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

NEW & SECONDHAND ENGLISH & FOREIGN BOOKS

For Sale or on Subscription
Particulars and Prices Free.

FROM
W.H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY
 186 STRAND, LONDON, & BRANCHES

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 4. Vol. 1.

[REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1912.

One Penny.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	101
SYNDICALISM	102
WESTWARD HO!—
By Monsignor R. H. Benson	103
JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL (Part II.)—
By Principal Whyte	105
MR. PEPYS'S PORTRAIT—
By Ernest Rhys	106
PORTRAIT OF PEPYS	107
ENGLAND AND GERMANY—
By Sir John Brunner	103
"WAR AGAINST POVERTY"—
By Mrs. Sidney Webb, D.Litt.	109
GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY—
II. Monsignor Benson	110
By E. Hermann	110
THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS;	111
EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM—
By Oscar Browning, M.A.	112

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

1. MGR. R. H. BENSON
2. SIR JOHN BRUNNER
3. MRS. SIDNEY WEBB
4. PRINCIPAL WHYTE

MOTH AND RUST—	PAGE
By Dora Owen	113
"LARGELY EMOTIONAL"—
By Dr. William Barry	114
THE OMISSIONS OF MR. NORMAN
ANGELL. By Cecil Chesterton	115
THE CHANCE OF THE PEASANT—A
REJOINDER	116
THE LOWER DECK	117
"THE TURNSTILE"	118
THE CRAFTSMAN	118
A NEW POWER ARISING IN THE EAST	120
THE TRUSTWORTHINESS OF ANDREW
LANG. By A. Blyth Webster	122
"THE LIFE OF GEORGE TURRELL"	122
MR. WELLS ON MARRIAGE	124
"THE LEE SHORE"	126
CORRESPONDENCE	127
LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED	123

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WITH the crushing defeat at Lule Burgas vanished the last hope of Turkey's success. It was more than a defeat; it was a rout. "Nothing like it since the retreat from Moscow," is the comment of the enterprising correspondent of the Daily Chronicle. During the terrible days of one of the most sanguinary battles in history, 40,000 of the flower of the Turkish Army fell, and 75 of their guns were captured. A Constantinople telegram puts the figures at 20,000 men killed and wounded. The Bulgarians, who seem to have fought with a valour positively irresistible, paid dearly for their victory. On the list of the Ministry of War there are 4,000 dead and 20,000 wounded. The Turkish troops made a stubborn resistance, but at all points the soldiers were hampered by insuperable obstacles. The commissariat and transport services were hopelessly bad; the artillery was no match for the superior guns of the Bulgarians, and the men, weak with want of food, could do nothing to check the tremendous rush of the enemy. The troops, broken and disorganised, have fallen back in the direction of Constantinople, where the last scene in the terrible tragedy of blood and war will be enacted.

In despair the Ottoman Government has invited the Great Powers to interfere. France, in agreement with other Powers, notably Great Britain and Russia, has informed Turkey that her overtures cannot be accepted until she submits definite proposals with regard to conditions of peace, and guarantees for their fulfilment which could be accepted by the Allied States.

The Allied States, for their part, declare that the conditions of peace must be settled with Turkey direct. Flushed with success, the Balkan Armies are naturally anxious to reap the fruits of victory. Meanwhile, as a precautionary measure, warships of the Great Powers have received permission to pass the Dardanelles, en route to Constantinople. This has had a reassuring effect on the Europeans in the capital.

On Saturday, King Peter made his triumphal entry into Uskub, the ancient capital of Servia. In reply to loyal addresses, his Majesty assured the late Turkish mayor that the Turkish inhabitants would be unmolested under the new régime.

The Greeks are still having a run of success. They won a great battle on the way to Monastir, they have occupied Preveza, which capitulated, and in the course of their march on Salonika they routed a force of 25,000 of the enemy, capturing fourteen guns.

The new situation created by the war has completely upset the calculations of the diplomatists, who are now endeavouring to find a basis for the common action of the Powers. It is stated unofficially that M. Poincaré proposed that the Powers should accept the upsetting of the territorial status quo in the Balkans, and agree to the restriction of Turkish sovereignty to Constantinople and the region about the capital. Austria-Hungary, with the support of Germany, it is understood, would not assent to the terms of the French proposal.

The dispute between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the doctors has been advanced another stage. The Council of the British Medical Association have issued to the divisions and representative body its report on the present position of the medical profession in relation to the National Insurance Act, and on the future action to be taken. In view of the meeting to be held on the 19th and 20th inst., representatives are to be asked whether they will refuse service under the Act or accept under certain conditions.

Particular interest attaches to the Layard Collection which is to be added to the National Gallery, inasmuch as it contains a portrait of Mehemet II, the Sultan who took Constantinople in 1453.

The Admiralty have contradicted the reports which have been circulated as to the mobilisation of his Majesty's ships. No movement of ships in home waters is in contemplation.

An action involving a Constitutional point of great importance has been decided in the Chancery Division by Mr. Justice Parker. Mr. Gibson Bowles claimed against the Bank of England the return of £52 10s., which had been deducted as income-tax from dividends due to him before the Finance Act of the year had been passed. The Judge held that income-tax cannot be deducted from dividends until there is an Act of Parliament authorising it. Judgment was therefore given for Mr. Bowles, and the Bank ordered to pay his costs.

This week the House of Commons in Committee dealt with the important question of the composition of the Irish House of Commons. Following upon the decision to apply proportional representation election to the Irish Senate, a proposal was made to elect the Irish House of Commons by the same method. The proposal, which took the form of an amendment, and which was supported by Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, and Mr. T. M. Healy, was rejected by 265 votes to 162. An amendment to reduce the number of representatives was also rejected.

With reference to the statement that the Chinese Government had decided to accept the protest of the six-power group and some of the Legations against the declared intention of the Government to allot a portion of the salt revenue as a guarantee for the payment of the Crisp loan, the Chinese Minister has issued an important correction. Nothing, it is stated, has happened to impair the security of the loan. Out of deference to the protest, the Chinese Government have decided to offer Mr. Crisp some other security. Other revenues have been allotted, to be applied monthly.

The speech of Lord Roberts on Anglo-German relations and on the possible danger of a war with Germany has been provocative in more senses than one. It has provoked no end of replies, both from platform and Press. Following the protest of the Anglo-German Conference comes a strongly worded resolution passed at a meeting of the Council of the International Arbitration League. The Council regards an Anglo-German understanding as the keystone of a lasting European peace, and assures the people of Germany that Lord Roberts speaks for a small section of fanatical militarists, whose violent language is a measure of their failure to place the yoke of conscription on the shoulders of the British people. At a gathering of Germans in Manchester, special reference was made to the speech, which was described as harmful to the good understanding between the two nations. Their friends in Germany were assured that Lord Roberts's words did not reflect the opinion of the majority of English people.

The dear meat agitation in Germany is giving the authorities considerable trouble. The endeavour of the Berlin municipality to provide an adequate supply of Russian meat at reasonable prices is being thwarted by the Berlin butchers. They refused to sell the meat, on the ground that it is of poor quality, and, moreover, does not allow them as much profit as the sale of German meat. This difficulty was being surmounted, when trouble arose from another quarter. A number of the German slaughterers in the Warsaw slaughtering-house, which has been taken over by the Berlin municipality, have gone on strike.

SYNDICALISM *

AS an economic theory and as a practical remedy for the evils of the existing industrial system, Syndicalism, so far, has not commended itself to workers in this country. Trade Unionism is a long-established institution, and Socialism boasts of an increasing number of adherents, but Syndicalism makes few converts. Syndicalism had a momentary popularity during the period when the workers made an attempt to give practical effect to its theory of a general strike. But the actual experience of the miners' strike has led to a change of attitude on the part of the more sensible Labour leaders, who are now placing their hopes on Parliamentary action as the true method of raising the status of the working classes—the very methods which M. Sorel, the French apostle of Syndicalism, so vigorously denounces. The English artisan, unlike his French comrade, does not trouble himself with theories which do not work in practice, and therefore he is in no mood to listen to those enthusiasts who advocate Syndicalism as a short cut to the millennium. Those, however, among the workers who are curious enough to study Syndicalism will find competent guidance in Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's book. As distinguished from Socialism, which would place in the hands of the State the instruments of production and distribution, Syndicalism asks that each industrial group of workers should control the instruments of production which it uses—the railwaymen the railways, the miners the mines, and so on. How is this control to be secured? Socialists hope to achieve their ends by means of political control. By repudiating political methods, Syndicalists are driven to revolutionary methods. The first step is the general strike, which is revolution at the passive stage. Prolong the general strike long enough, and it reaches the active stage—rioting and general turbulence—which brings the military upon the scene. The end may easily be predicted. Suppose Syndicalism triumphed, what of the industrial organisation of the future? "Oh, but," say the Syndicalists, "the general strike is not to be taken seriously." To use Sorel's now famous metaphor, it is "a myth," calculated to fire the imagination of the workers and produce solidarity—just as "the myth" of the approaching end of the world fired the imagination and produced solidarity among the early Christians. But there is this great difference—had the early Christians been told they were dealing with a myth and not a coming reality, their imaginations would not have been fired, nor would solidarity have been produced. Tell the worker that the general strike is "a myth," but that, all the same, he is to treat it as a method of securing his emancipation, and, in this country at least, he will turn and rend those who try to make him play the fool. Mr. J. H. Harley, in his book on Syndicalism in the sixpenny series of Messrs. Jack, puts some pertinent questions on this head which must be answered if Syndicalism is to be other than sheer economic mysticism.

Falling back upon the intuitivism of Bergson, M. Sorel would have us believe that the ramparts of capitalism can be rushed by the great body of workers with no definite plan of campaign, but simply animated by the intuitive belief that the millennium lies along the path of unreasoning enthusiasm. The fundamental defect of Syndicalism lies in its substitution of passion for thought in the creation of a complex industrial order.

* "Syndicalism." By J. H. Harley. The People's Books. (Jack.)

"Syndicalism." By Ramsay MacDonald.

"Syndicalism and the General Strike." By Arthur D. Lewis. 7s. 6d. (Fisher Unwin.)

WESTWARD HO! BY MONSIGNOR R. H. BENSON

PART I.

I.

THERE are few books in the English language so deservedly well known, so finely written, so brilliantly descriptive, so passionately patriotic, as Charles Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" It treats of the most stirring period in English history, of the days of Drake and the Armada; its scene is set in the West Country; and it is full of fighting and navigation, of treasure ships and gallantry: it is exactly the kind of book that appeals to romantic boys, and is admirably framed to colour their thoughts and to persuade them by the most subtle of all arts. It is all the more regrettable, therefore, that the whole underlying plan of the book should be that of a polemical religious tract, and its main religious portraiture and argument fallacious and abusive.

It is probably true that in books that are to appeal to patriotism, it is necessary to represent the fatherland as altogether sublime and praiseworthy; "Westward Ho!" is no exception. From the beginning to the end England is God's own country, and its children are worthy of it: their very faults are nearly admirable; Amyas Leigh's anger against the Spaniard is just, though excessive. . . . But it ought not to be necessary to belittle or misrepresent the honour of England's enemies, still less that of her children who do not share the religious or political views of their critic. Certainly there are one or two moments of chivalry even among the Spaniards; there is even one tolerable Spanish priest; but, for the rest, the Spaniards are all cruel and devilish, and priests, especially English priests, liars and knaves. For very shame the author has made John Brimblecombe, the parson, ridiculous once or twice, but has taken pains to show him gallant and sincere as well; but Campion and Persons—both of whose names are misspelt throughout—are always ridiculous, except when they are villainous.

II.

NOW if there are two figures of the Elizabethan period about whom we happen to know a good deal, it is these very Jesuits. Both of them lived in England at peril of their lives; both were scholars and gentlemen; Campion, a convert of Oxford, was an exceptionally fine orator, and of such a personality that his disciples and fellow-students gave him an almost adoring hero-worship. Upon his capture he was racked a number of times to compel him to reveal the names of his co-religionists, and was finally half-hanged and disembowelled at Tyburn, when a word of yielding would not only have relieved him, but set him in a place of high honour. The two men were complementary one to the other—Persons, a deep and cautious organiser; Campion, the ardent preacher; Persons, the experienced man of designs; Campion, the warm-hearted agent. Yet their portraiture in "Westward Ho!" classes the two together as absurd, snivelling, Puritanical skulkers, always futile, always seen through and foiled by honest, deep-hearted Englishmen. There was no need, we are told, for them or their fellows to hide at all; but priests "found a sort of piquant pleasure, like naughty boys who have crept into the store-closet, in living in mysterious little dens in a lonely turret, where they were allowed by the powers that were to play as much as they chose at persecuted saints." The two are always making grotesque fools of themselves: they have "thin shanks," their swords get between their legs, they tumble down, they are run away with by horses, and cry aloud in Latin meanwhile; they are perpetually plotting and absolving and cheating their stupid dupes. The Catholic gentry fare little better: they "give up a son here, and a son there, as a sort of sin-offering or scapegoat, to be carried off to Douay or Rheims or Rome, and trained as a seminary priest; in plain English, to be taught the science of villainy on the motive of superstition." So was Eustace Leigh sent off, "to be made a liar of at Rheims"; he was also a coward and a villain. And this in the days of Topcliffe the tormentor, and Walsingham the unscrupulous!

III.

NOW if Charles Kingsley really believed that all men who refused to be bullied or cajoled into accepting Protestantism must be unpatriotic Englishmen (he makes a grudging exception of Lord Admiral Howard, by the way, who commanded the English fleet against the Armada), and that the object of seminary training was to make men liars, he is justified in saying so. But he is not justified in misrepresenting their religious faith and practice, as he does repeatedly. For example, for the furtherance of their designs, Campion and Persons and Eustace Leigh go to the Protestant service one day. Now this was the very thing offered to prisoner after prisoner as the price of his release. If a Catholic would "go to church," he was troubled no more either by fines (amounting generally to £20 per month) or by torture or death. "Old Daddy Long-legs," says a nursery rhyme of the sixteenth century, "wouldn't say his prayers." That was his crime. Again, there is an amazing paragraph about the confessional. Father Campion demands to hear Eustace's confession instead of the chaplain. "Poor Father Francis" (seminary priests, by the way, unlike Religious, did not use the title "Father") "dared not refuse so great a man, and assented with an inward groan, knowing well that the intention was to worm out some family secrets, whereby his power would be diminished, and the Jesuit's increased." Eustace is finally absolved from no crime except that of being in love—he is under no vows, by the way, that would make this a sin—and then entreats Father Campion to come and see the lady, and "judge whether (his) fault is not a venial one." "My son," says the priest, "have I not absolved you already?" This is worthy of Paternoster Row at its worst. Surely the writer must have known that for a priest to worm out family secrets, with a view to using his knowledge and increasing his power, would itself be a crime and a sacrilege. Or, knowing it, did he intend to blacken Campion, who died later for his faith with extraordinary heroism, even further?

IV.

THese are two of the worse blunders. But there are innumerable others. A man dies after making his confession, unabsolved when a word or two would have done it, and Father Persons fatuously says, "Confession in extremis is sufficient." A layman brings "the wafer," contrary to Catholic practice, and assists as interpreter of the confession; while a strong Protestant declares, "I can't stand this mummary any longer." A bishop is hanged, entreating for time to make his confession, and, instead of being absolved by a priest who accompanied him, is exhorted by him to confess to God only; (the bishop, of course, is a fat, over-eaten libertine). An amazing letter is given in extenso, entitled at the top, "S. in Christo et Ecclesia," in which it is said, of such sins as "lying, theft, drunkenness, vain babbling, profane dancing, and singing," "what of these things while the holy virtue of Catholic obedience still flourishes in their heart?" And ends, though it is supposed to be written by a priest, with language worthy only of a Puritan hypocrite in the time of the Commonwealth.

WESTWARD HO! (continued)

Spaniards fare no better. They are, in every place, the persecutors and slayers of Indians; they baptise children, and then brain them in order to send them to heaven; while the English, of course, are the saviours and protectors of the poor savages throughout; and this in spite of the fact that, roughly speaking, in America at the present day, wherever the Latin nations have had dominion, the Indians have survived and flourished, and wherever the English-speaking race has prevailed, the Indians have approached extinction. The Spaniards are the seducers always, and the English the rescuers, of damsels in distress; the Spaniards are the aggressors, and the English the defenders. Drake's piracies are represented either as playful exuberances, or as necessary safeguards to England's integrity; while Spanish rights over countries they have conquered are displayed as unwarrantable claims. Of course, the chief crime of the Spanish nation is that it is Catholic, and, therefore, always wrong; and the glory of England that it is Protestant, and, therefore, always right.

V.

Now it would be unreasonable (as has been said) to claim that in a book written for patriotic ends the full truth should have been told; yet it would surely have been an infinitely stronger case if the writer had hinted at, and repudiated with something of the vigour that he uses against the Inquisition, the reign of terror that Elizabeth maintained. Only once, I think, is the execution of a seminary priest mentioned at all, and then with an unworthy attempt to deprive him of his glory. Mr. Cuthbert Maine, the first of the long line of seminary priests to die for religion, is spoken of, indeed; but it is expressly said, clean contrary to fact, that it was for treason that he was sentenced. And there is not one word, from beginning to end of the book, of the tragedies of Tyburn, and York, and Derbyshire, of Margaret of Clitheroe, pressed to death for refusing to plead lest she should incriminate her fellow-Catholics; of the priests huddled in prisons in the Fleet and at Wisbech and in country gaols; of the ruin of countless families, who preferred faith to wealth; of the rack and the scavenger's daughter, so seldom idle in those very years. Of course, there were Catholics who perished for treason; Ballard and the other conspirators in Babington's plot fully deserved their sentence; and there were others, such as Mr. Bost, upon whom it was attempted to fasten the same crime. But that this was not the real point is shown clearly enough by the offer, repeatedly made to those found guilty of "treason," of their lives being spared if they would but attend a Protestant service. And if the author of "Westward Ho!" was really zealous to tell the truth, why did he make no mention of these things? He must, surely, have known of them, since he manipulates with great skill every doubtful enterprise on which Catholics were engaged, even going so far (without the slightest evidence) as to attempt to connect Campion and Persons with the unhappy raid in Ireland, and using, of course, English prejudice against Ireland to heighten the appeal of his pictures; but he makes nothing of all the rest, and deliberately omits all adequate reference to the appalling brutality used by England against those whom he describes repeatedly as the "Irish savages."

VI.

The fact is, of course, that men's ideas, at that date, on both sides, with regard to the relative values of dogma and human life were completely different from those of the present time. On the one hand, the old religion of England (which was the religion of the rest of Europe, and most emphatically of Spain) became inextricably confused with secular questions, so that Spain became a kind of symbol of Catholicism, as well as its principal supporter; and, on the other side, England stood for Nationalism in religion, that is, for the claim of a nation to determine its own creed. Never for one instant did Elizabeth intend to tolerate individual and private judgment in matters of faith, as is shown by her treatment of the Independents. Both these secular powers, therefore, each confident of the rightness of her cause, used freely methods and policies that would not be for one instant imaginable at the present day. Spain used the Inquisition; England used the machinery of her laws against treason. But, firstly, Spain's methods were continually condemned by Rome, to whom, indeed, refugees from Spain flocked in great numbers; and, secondly, even Spain never used the pains of the Inquisition (as is represented in "Westward Ho!") except for the crime of "relapse." It is as flagrantly unjust, therefore, to charge the Sprituality of Rome with the auto-da-fé and the torments of Spain, as to charge Protestantism, as a system, with the crimes of Tyburn and York. But Charles Kingsley avoids any difficult argumentation on this latter point by simply omitting the latter facts altogether.

VII.

His book, therefore, stands as a kind of monument of injustice. He consistently whitens England's Protestantism, seeing, no doubt sincerely, his own genial and warm-hearted, if rather vague, principles reflected in his country's history of three hundred years ago, and, equally consistently, he blackens Spain and Catholicism, seeing them through the glasses with which he regarded, from his own private standpoint, every man who would not cry, "My country, right or wrong." He would, no doubt, repudiate fiercely any personal responsibility for the horrors of Tyburn; but he will not allow Campion to have been innocent even of the Irish resistance. Mr. Kingsley is an Individualist, and, therefore, guilty of nothing but himself; Father Campion is a Catholic, and, therefore, guilty, at least by implication, of every crime that can be alleged or imputed against any member of his Church.

It would be absurd to charge Charles Kingsley with deliberate falsification of history; he would have shrunk from that as the most detestable of crimes: truth, or, rather, that which he took to be truth, was the dearest ideal he possessed. But, as was shown in his unhappy conflict with Newman, he was simply incapable of seeing truths with which he had not a temperamental sympathy; it was enough for him not to understand a system to condemn it. And it is probably this intense narrowness (which believed itself broadness) that enabled him to write a romance so enthusiastic, so alight with conviction, and so eloquent as to be one of the best historical novels of the world—historical, that is, only in the sense that its scene is laid in an earlier century than our own. It is a little ironical, however, that one who so greatly loved youth and truth should have succeeded so completely in poisoning the minds of the one by a caricature of the other.

ANNOUNCEMENT

FEATURES of special interest in No. 5 of EVERYMAN will be "John Knox's Influence on Scottish Education," by Lord Guthrie; an article on Industrial Unrest, by M. Vandervelde; and a continuation of Mrs. Sidney Webb's valuable contribution, "War Against Poverty." We shall also give our readers one of Mr. Stephen Reynolds's inimitable short stories of sea-faring life, and a Nietzsche article by Professor Lichtenberger. The new addition to EVERYMAN's Portrait Gallery will be a sketch of Norman Angell.

JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL

PRINCIPAL WHYTE

BY

PART II.

IV.—IN GERMANY AND UNDER PETER BÖHLER.

What we in England and Scotland owe to Germany can never be told. For myself, Sir, from Luther and Behmen, down to Ewald and Delitzsch and Herrmann, I can never sufficiently confess my daily debt. And what the evangelical Wesleyans owe to Peter Böhler can never be sufficiently told. The John Wesley of Oxford and Georgia would never have been the John Wesley of the whole Wesleyan world but, under God, for Peter Böhler. What that great teacher taught to John Wesley may be put into a nutshell. But the tree that has grown out of that nutshell now covers the whole Wesleyan earth, and far beyond all the Wesleyan borders. "Saturday, 4th. I found my brother at Oxford recovering from his pleurisy, and with him Peter Böhler, by whom (in the hand of the great God) I was, on Sunday, the 5th, clearly convinced of the want of that faith whereby alone we are to be saved. Immediately it struck into my mind, Leave off your preaching! How can you preach to others when you have not attained to faith yourself? I asked Böhler whether he thought I should leave off preaching or not? He replied, 'By no means! Preach faith till you have it, and then preach it because you have got it.' Accordingly, Monday, 6th, I began preaching this new doctrine." And he never left off preaching the new doctrine till he died under the power of it, and though long dead he yet preaches that same doctrine through thousands of eloquent lips.

"Thursday, 4th, Peter Böhler left London in order to embark for Carolina. O, what a work hath God wrought by that man! Such a work as shall never come to an end till heaven and earth pass away." Paul, Luther, Böhler, Wesley. "Not that I have attained," wrote Paul when far on in his apostolic preaching, "but I follow after." "Follow after saving faith like Paul," said Peter Böhler, "and meantime preach nothing else." "Die etling after faith," said our own Scottish Peter Böhler, Samuel Rutherford.

V.—ON HORSEBACK.

"He did it for the most part on horseback. He paid more turnpikes than any man who ever bestrode a beast. Eight thousand miles was his annual record for many a long year. Had he but preserved his scores at all the inns he lodged they would have made by themselves a history of prices." Most graphic, and most true. But the best remains to be told. It was the unheard-of way that Wesley turned his saddle into a study chair, and his horse's shoulder into a study desk, that makes Wesley an altogether incomparable and unapproachable equestrian. His saddlebags were always full of books of all kinds, and he did ample justice to them, as a thousand entries show. "Sunday, 5th. On the road I read Dr. Campbell's excellent reply to Hume." "Wednesday, 16th. Gave a second reading to that lively book, John Newton's 'Experiences.'" "Monday, 5th. Last week I read over as I rode great part of Homer's 'Odyssey.'" And then follows a comparison of Homer with Milton. "Monday, 4th. Coming and going I read Mr. Guthrie's ingenious History of Scotland." And then follows some pungent remarks taken on his horse's neck about "that odd mixture, King James the First, and upon that much-injured Queen, Mary of Scots." "Wednesday, 17th. In a little journey I took into Radnorshire I finished Dr. Burnet's 'Theory of the Earth.'" "On my way to Wallingford I read Dr. Hodge's 'Esther,'" which is severely criticised. "Monday, 21st. As I rode to Chatham I read Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered,'" which is severely censured. "Saturday, 7th. On my way home I finished the first volume of Mr. Hook's 'Roman History.'" "Sunday, 5th. Read a little more of Swendenborg:

"His mind has not yet lost
All its original brightness: but appears
Majestic, though in ruin."

"In riding to Dorking I read Mr. Jones's most ingenious tract." "Tuesday, 11th. I casually took with me a volume called 'A Sentimental Journey,'" which is very severely handled. "On my way to Perth I read the first volume of Dr. Robertson's History of Charles V. I know not when I have been more disappointed." "From Aberdeen to Arbroath I read Dr. Beattie's 'Enquiry after Truth.' He is a writer quite equal to his subject." "Monday, 23rd. In returning to London I read 'Balisarius.' Also, Mr. Hutcheson's 'Essays on the Passions.' He is a beautiful writer, but his scheme cannot stand unless first the Bible falls." "Thursday, 15th. On my way to London I read that strange book, 'The Life of Pope Sextus Quintin,' on whom Wesley's severest verdict is pronounced." And so on and on through the whole wonderful JOURNAL. How could he do it, and preaching every night and every morning! you will exclaim. I will let him answer, your exclamations himself. "How is it that no horse ever stumbles while I am reading? No account can possibly be given but this. I throw the reins on his neck, and I aver that in riding above a hundred thousand miles I scarce ever remember any horse to fall, or to make a considerable stumble while I rode with a slack rein. To fancy that a tight rein prevents stumbling is a capital blunder." And then this is Dr. Hood Wilson's remark: "Wesley continued the practice of reading on horseback for forty years, in this way going the whole round of literature. He thus preserved a freshness and variety in his preaching beyond most evangelists."

VI.—BOOKS READ AND NOTICED BY MR. WESLEY."

That is the heading of ten closely packed pages of index in the fourth volume of Mr. Dent's scholarly edition of THE JOURNAL. And it is a reproof and a stimulus to read the suggestive and enriching list. At the same time some of Wesley's judgments, both on men and on books, only go to show that with all his ability, and with all his goodness, he was still one of ourselves. As Mr. Macdonald truly and wisely says, "Wesley's JOURNAL, while it is written in perfect honesty and good faith, reveals at the same time some of his limitations and some of his defects." For myself, I have not felt his limitations and defects so much anywhere as when he writes on Martin Luther and on Jacob Behmen and on William Law. I shall content myself with setting over against Wesley's depreciation of Luther's great "Galatians" what John Bunyan says about that, to him, epoch-making book in his classical paragraph in "Grace Abounding." And as to Behmen, all I shall here say is this. If any reader of these lines cares to see what some of the greatest and best men since his day have testified as to their indebtedness to Jacob Behmen, let them read a shilling booklet on Behmen, published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier in Edinburgh, and they will get their eyes opened to the Teutonic Philosopher. And if any reading apprentice-boy wishes to know about Behmen, and whose poor mother cannot spare a shilling, if he will send me his name and address he will get Behmen by return, on condition that he will send me a postcard when he has read the little book, telling me about the good he has got from Jacob Behmen, the working shoemaker, but all the same the founder of German philosophy, and one of the saintliest of men.

MR. PEPYS'S PORTRAIT * * BY ERNEST RHYS

I.

"THIS day I began to sit," said Mr. Pepys in his vanity, on the 17th March, 1695, "and do almost break my neck looking over my shoulder to make the posture for him to work by." Hales, who had already painted Mrs. Pepys, and had £14 for it, was the artist, and the contract was that the husband's should be as good as the wife's. And now Mr. Caffyn has interpreted Hales's portrait and made it live afresh in pen and ink; and the likeness is warm and cordial. The Indian gown which the sitter had hired to be painted in does not help the illusion; but the face—the shrewd eyes full of business, the well-rooted nose, the appetent, garrulous, sensuous lips, good for eating and speaking—the face is all Samuel Pepys. You see in it the report and abstract of human nature. There is the man who had seen gold bars melted at the Mint, and sat up poring over his accounts, watched a Coronation and feared the plague; who had gloated over his silver chafing-dishes, and enjoyed two dinners and a supper in one day. A breakfast on turkey pie and goose might be added, but that belongs to another day. As for dinners, take that which Mrs. Pepys got ready at my lord's lodgings one January day, namely: "A dish of marrow-bones; a leg of mutton; a loin of veal; a dish of fowl, three pullets, and a dozen of larks all in a dish; a great tart, a neat's tongue, a dish of anchovies; a dish of prawns and cheese." If it seems out of proportion to call up so many of these gourmand's details, you must remember that the amount of eating and drinking in the Diary is really prodigious. It is almost as remarkable as the intermittent orgy that goes on in the "Pickwick Papers," and has helped to endear the book to a hungry public.

II.

Let us turn from food to affairs. If you wish to realise Pepys in his effect as a constructive figure of his time, you would have to paint in his hand, not a piece of music, but a navy account, or, better still, a little ship. Dr. Tanner has edited Pepys's "Memoires of the Royal Navy, 1670-1688," a book to make you appreciate the share this Secretary to the Admiralty had in building up the British Navy; for he did not by any means only conceive of ships on paper, or their names as secretarial items. You may gather the range of his interest from many entries, as from one on the 6th of April, telling how he went to the Tower Wharf to watch the soldiers embarking: "and pretty to see how merrily some, and most, go; and how sad others—the leave they take of their friends, and the terms that some wives and other wenches asked to part with them: a pretty mixture." When he scanned those ships, he did so with a thorough professional eye. He knew what timber was in their sides, whether it were foreign plank, "of the growth of Bohemia, distinguished by its colour, as being much more black than the other, and rendred so (as is said) by its long sobbing in the water during its passage thither," or whether it were of English oak. From some "Resolutions" taken after a confabulation of shipwrights at the Navy Office in April, 1686, we find that the English long planks were not thought so good as the foreign, because of "the general wanniness and ill method of conversion of our English plank," so that the foreign went much further in the building, and was more durable. Pepys countersigned this document; and all his comments in these Navy Memoires prove the good sense their writer brought to bear on what he called the Sea-Economy of England.

III.

If one thing is more symptomatic than another in Pepys's face, it is the way in which the lines of sensibility pursue the official wrinkles. Those Navy-Office eyes were capable of melting, and of looking disdainful. One May Day, he relates how he got together after dinner his father, his brother Tom, and himself: "and I advised my father to good husbandry, and to be living within the compass of £50 a year, and all in such kind words, as not only made both them, but myself, to weep." Not so long before, he had emptied a bag of £50 with much joy to see he was able to part with such a sum. It is a wise son indeed who can teach Economy to his father, and do the spiriting so gently as to make both of them weep. His scornful glance was more rapidly induced, as it would appear, by occasional references to insufficient folk who have no proper spirit or natural curiosity. One of these was Mr. Stankes, whom his father brought to dinner; "but, Lord!" says the chronicler, "what a stir Stankes makes; with his being crowded in the streets, and wearied in walking in London." He did not care to go to a play, nor to Whitehall, nor to see the lions: "I never could have thought there had been upon earth a man so little curious in the world as he is." Pepys's own curiosity is masked, but not altogether lost, in the lineaments Hales gives him. We see him out for adventure on the same day when he wept with his father, riding to Hyde Park; and, finding his own jade too dull, borrowing "a delicate stone horse of Captain Ferrers." On the way he is lucky enough to spy a little crop black nag, with black cloth ears on, and a false mane, which a horse-thief had left for another. That evening he saw morris-dancing, and went to hear Mrs. Turner's daughter play on the harpsichord. A typical Pepys day.

IV.

The mention of the harpsichord brings us back to the piece of music that figures in the picture—Pepys's own song, "Beauty, retire thou," of which he was as innocently proud as of anything he did. He learnt, rather late, to sing, but he sang continually; and even in the street, when it would have hardly been becoming to a Secretary of the Admiralty to sing aloud, he hummed and trilled over a tune that he wished to learn. Music, in fact, played a great part in the lives of the average citizen in that time. Ladies and gentlemen were expected, as a matter of course, to be able to join in a madrigal at sight; that is why the lyric poetry of the time has the singing note in it. And those who have had the good fortune to spend an evening with the Madrigal Club will have an idea of the kind of music and the words in which Pepys revelled. One night he went home, he leading Mrs. Rebecca, who seemed, he knew not why, to be desirous of his favours. There she would needs have him sing. "And I did pretty well," he says. Later there was more music at Captain Allen's; and next morning that gallant man came to visit him, and after doing some business they "withdrew, and sang a song or two, and, among others, took great pleasure in Goe and bee hanged; that's twice good-bye!" If one had not seen a Lord Chief Justice sitting at the head of the Madrigal Club, one would say great officials did not woo the muse like that nowadays. But this picture by Hayes suggests many ideas, and one of them is that possibly Mr. Pepys is still with us. No doubt strange things go on, that are not told in the papers, behind the scenes at the Admiralty.

SAMUEL PEPYS, NATUS 1633, OBIT. 1703

ENGLAND AND GERMANY ✻ ✻ ✻ BY SIR JOHN BRUNNER

I WILLINGLY comply with the request of the Editor that I should further explain my attitude on the Anglo-German question, which I set out the other day in a letter addressed to the Chairmen of Liberal Associations.

I.

Briefly, my position is this. For six years the Liberal party has made unflinching efforts to improve the lot of the people by an increasing warfare against privilege and monopoly, and a whole-hearted support of Free Trade. But foreign affairs have received too little attention. The Foreign Office and the Admiralty have been allowed to break away from the traditional policy of peace and friendship with all nations, advocated by the Liberal party in 1906, until foreign relations have now come to dominate all other issues.

Our understanding with France has been perverted to the injury of our relations with Germany. British diplomacy has used its influence steadily on the side of France, and Germany has been permitted and encouraged to think that we should support France in a war against her.

II.

Great Britain has extended to Russia her special relations with France, and has thus countenanced the oppression of Finland and the attacks upon Persia. German suspicions have been intensified by warlike preparations in this country, unparalleled in cost and magnitude. While Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman lived, the extravagant demands of the Admiralty were to some extent held in check. But, with his death, prudence and economy were completely thrown to the winds. The success of the scandalmongers was seen only too clearly in the naval panic of 1909, when Parliament was misled, and estimates were based upon false reports of German naval construction. Since that time, no less than thirteen millions have been added to the British Naval Estimates, though the German expenditure has increased by only four millions. The feverish preparations on this side of the North Sea have naturally deepened the suspicions of Germany, and German Dreadnoughts have been multiplied with the consent of the Reichstag as a means of protecting German trade against a naval attack from England.

III.

The Morocco crisis a year ago led England and Germany to the brink of war. It has passed by, but the bitter feeling which accompanied it remains. The mission of Lord Haldane to Berlin last spring was marred by Mr. Churchill's bellicose speeches, and the race of armaments continues. The situation, therefore, is extremely serious, and demands the urgent attention of the Government; for if the present disastrous rivalry is allowed to continue unchecked, it will destroy the very framework of society. Vast sums, which are sorely needed for removing slums, for the reform of housing, and numerous other purposes of social regeneration, both in this country and in Germany, will be utterly wasted in expanding armaments, even if the horror of war can be avoided.

In my view, it is the duty of the Government at once to undertake the task of removing the causes which create suspicion and rivalry between England and Germany. It would thus enable a reduction of armaments to be effected. The exemption from capture of peaceful property and shipping at sea in time of war would remove a potent source of mistrust. The main object for which the German navy exists is the protection of the German mercantile marine. With the necessity for protecting shipping would vanish also the necessity which German commercial men feel for a strong fleet. At the same time, our own food supply in time of war would be assured to us, and our immense mercantile marine would be protected against the ravages of hostile commerce destroyers more effectively than could at present be the case. At the last Hague Conference the German delegates supported the proposal of the American delegates to exempt private property from capture, but the British representatives opposed it.

IV.

On the other hand, Germany objected to the proposal which the British Government favoured, of prohibiting floating mines. Why should not both Governments withdraw their opposition, and thus secure an improvement in the rules of warfare in accordance with the march of civilisation?

It rests with the rank and file of the Liberal party to see that an end is put to the intolerable state of affairs. While continuing our friendly relations with France, it should be clearly understood that no understanding or intention is thereby implied as to military or naval action against any other Power. Equally friendly relations ought to be established with Germany, who is our best customer, and has many interests in common with us. To prove that we desire the security of commerce, we should enter into international treaties with the United States, Germany, and other Powers for the purpose of securing all peaceful shipping and merchandise from capture or destruction in time of war.

Only by a policy of international goodwill can we hope to continue upon the path of internal progress and social reform.

A PAGAN'S TESTAMENT

WHEN these tired eyes are closed in that long sleep

Which is the deepest and the last of all,

Shroud not my limbs with purple funeral pall,

Nor mock my rest with vainest prayers, nor weep;

But take my ashes where the sunshine plays

In dewy meadows splashed with gold and white,

And there, when stars peep from black pools at night,

Let the wind scatter them. And on the days

You wander by those meadow pools again,

Think of me as I then shall be, a part

Of earth—naught else. And if you see the red

Of western skies, or feel the clean soft rain,

Or smell the flowers I loved, then let your heart

Beat fast for me, and I shall not be dead.

THOMAS MOULT.

“WAR AGAINST POVERTY” * * * * BY MRS. SIDNEY WEBB, D.Litt.

PART I.

I.

I SOMETIMES think the columns of the daily newspapers—especially of the London newspapers—give an altogether false impression of what people are thinking about. This is particularly the case with regard to the great and growing army of working men and working women who are keenly interested in public affairs. There will be next to nothing about it in the Times or the Daily Mail, but during this autumn, and extending into December and January, there will be going on among the working class, in all the great centres of population, a great deal of keen discussion about the practical means of securing a national standard minimum of civilised life for the whole body of the people. A widespread campaign of propaganda is being started on the subject by the combined forces of the I.L.P. and the Fabian Society, which will be carried on by some four hundred branches, in connection with about ten thousand local working-class organisations all over the country. Whilst the politicians are talking at Westminster, working-class opinion is being moulded on lines quite different from those along which the Parliament men are thinking.

II.

To get passed the legislation necessary to prevent destitution is the object of the present “War Against Poverty.” It is of no use talking about the beneficence of the Poor Law. It has just been weighed in the balance—by a Royal Commission appointed by a Conservative Government—and unanimously condemned. What that Commission discovered, beyond any conceivable doubt, was that the Poor Law did not prevent destitution; that it was powerless to stop, or even to lessen, the unemployment and sickness, the feeble-mindedness, or the unduly low wages to which this destitution is due. All that the Poor Law does is to relieve destitution when it has actually occurred, and to relieve it under such deterrent conditions that as few persons as possible care to apply for the help against starvation that we have deliberately made shameful and degrading.

III.

A whole host of charitable organisations are also at work giving relief, sometimes wisely and sometimes foolishly. This great machinery of dole-giving is perpetually face to face with a tragic dilemma: if the doles are given in a lavish and benevolent fashion, then many persons on the brink of destitution actually become destitute, in order to qualify for this relief. If, on the other hand, the relief is given grudgingly, and under conditions which are degrading or painful, deserving and self-respecting citizens, however destitute, refuse to accept it. Meanwhile the great causes of destitution—wages below subsistence level, long and irregular hours, insanitary workshops and dwellings, unemployment and under-employment—all go on adding, daily pressing down new victims into the great morass of destitution.

IV.

Now, we know to-day, a great deal better than our fathers did, how and how far we can, by mere Acts of Parliament, prevent these causes of destitution. Take, for instance, the question of wages and hours. Forty years ago enlightened persons of the governing class believed in leaving wages to be settled freely by “supply and demand.” They would have scouted the idea of interfering by a law. No educated person who has heard of the Factory Acts believes that to-day; and when, in the Trade Boards Act of 1908, Parliament made it a penal offence to pay less than a specified minimum wage in certain trades, there was actually no opposition to the principle. Similarly, our forefathers even believed in the inevitability of “the iron law of wages”; they honestly believed, that is to say, that wages and the other conditions of employment have necessarily to fall right down to bare subsistence point, and even below it, in order that the calamitous and ever-present “increase of population” might be checked.

V.

We have now discovered that by raising wages, shortening hours, and improving sanitation, by Acts of Parliament when necessary, we steadily improve the quality of labour, while we certainly do not increase—indeed, it seems that we actually diminish—the number of persons who are born to compete for employment. The respectable artisan, enjoying good wages and permanent employment, having leisure for citizenship and a high level of health and safety in the workshop and the home, is the one who prefers a small number of children, in order to be able to give them greater advantages. It is the casual labourer and his wife, who are perpetually in and out of the Poor Law and charitable assistance, who are found to have the largest family. Even in England, there are, at all times, vacancies for competent men and women which the Labour Exchange cannot fill.

VI.

Moreover, there is plenty of work to be done and plenty of wealth to be produced in our under-populated Colonies by men and women of vigorous bodies and well-trained minds. What these Colonies will not have at any price are the men and women whom we have degraded and demoralised by permitting them, through sickness, unemployment, or feeble-mindedness, to become chronically destitute. And, whilst the old-fashioned objections to a legal minimum wage and a reduction of hours have passed away, we have the positive proof, yielded by the experiments, at home and in our Colonies, that it is feasible and expedient to make a “living wage” and decent conditions of employment the first charge of industry. This means the enactment of a legal minimum wage, and a maximum working day, in all industrial or wage-earning employment. There is no policy so suicidal as permitting machinery to depreciate through bad surroundings except the policy of permitting labour to depreciate through bad conditions. Hence an extension of the Trade Boards Act of 1909, and of the Factory Act, so as to secure to every wage-earner at least the standard minimum wage and the standard maximum day, will be the first of Labour’s demands.

GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY * * * BY E. HERMANN II.—MONSIGNOR BENSON

"MONSIGNOR BENSON!—oh, he wrote 'Dodo,' of course. . . . Clergymen do such queer things nowadays, don't you think? But I'm awfully anxious to hear him preach."

I.

The place was St. James's Catholic Church, London; the speaker a Protestant lady visitor, flushed with the unwonted excitement of indulging in a thing which was at once delightfully wicked and reassuringly respectable. One did not feel inclined to correct her, for at least three good reasons: first, because the gratuitous imparting of useful knowledge does not, as a rule, bless either the giver or the receiver; second, because genuine interest in a preacher, even on the score of a book he did not write, is sufficiently valuable to merit considerate treatment; third, because if the lady was endowed with a modicum of sense and sensibility, she would be convinced before listening to Monsignor Benson very long that, whatever he has done or left undone, he has not nor ever could have written "Dodo." So I fell to wondering how many more of those present hailed him as the author of "Dodo" or "The Challoners," and if there were any who credited him with looking out upon the world through a College Window or sowing seeds of gentle and "edifying" philosophy beside Still Waters. To the real student of what may be called "comparative Bensonology," no confusion between the three remarkable sons of the late Archbishop Benson is possible.

II.

Meanwhile Monsignor has ascended the pulpit and snapped the thread of one's meditation. "An impressive preacher" is one's first verdict, and while one has no doubt as to its rightness, it is not so easy to justify it at first sight. Impressive in the palpable, dramatic, dynamic sense, Monsignor Benson is certainly not, nor does his personality make an immediate and inescapable impact upon the consciousness of the hearer. Indeed, it seems easy to escape its influence: whether it really is easy or not remains undecided, for, as a matter of fact, one has no wish to try to escape. What one does try to do is to locate and focus that influence. It is quite unexternal. There is nothing imposing in the figure and bearing of the preacher. There is no magic in the dry, roughened voice, with its crust of ice and its core of fire; no magnetism in the somewhat restless eyes. Yet, after listening to the level torrent of words hurled forth with an energy that makes muscles go tense and veins protrude, "impressive" remains the last as it was the first word about him. Why?

III.

To begin with, because he strikes the note of naked reality from first to last. He is far more than convincingly, burningly sincere. He speaks as one who is naturalised in the Unseen; one with whom the Unseen is not only a vague inspiration but a tremendously influential force, the determining and valuating factor in life. The man whose sole reality is the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eye and the pride of life is met by an equally "live," level-headed, practical man, whose sole reality is found in that which condemns and crucifies the worldling's trinity, and, for the first time in his life, perhaps, he finds it not quite so easy to relegate it to the world of moonshine and pious hallucination. Not a few men possess this vivid and practical realisation of the spiritual world; very few can convey it so convincingly as Monsignor Benson.

IV.

Springing out of this instant sense of eternity brooding over time, the preacher's unsparing insistence upon the stern exactions of any religion worth the name constitutes another essential element of his power to arrest and impress. An emasculate and pedestrian convention, rooted in a sentimental helpfulness rather than in a redemptive passion, has domesticated the fiery spirit of religion into the angel in the house, till it was left to the novelist and the essayist to remind us that the Cross is something other than a symbolical mascot on the chain of kindly family feeling; that "a man's goodness must make him smart"; that religion is "at once a splendour and a nuisance"; or that, to put it in the suggestive words of a Salvation Army street preacher, "Jesus cannot be loved with impunity." Monsignor Benson preaches the same hard but perennially attractive doctrine in the name of a Church whose watchwords are authority and mystery, preaches it with an utter absence of sentiment, and with a hard, dry, unfaltering practicality which grip the man who is impervious to what he would call "pi-jaw," or emotional slop.

V.

When we turn from the preacher to the novelist, we are met by precisely the same elements of power and reality, for the man and his books are one. On the more purely literary side we are struck by his genius for vivifying superficialities and endowing conventional details with a significance that evokes a sense of the terror of commonplace life. He has little of the large, warm kindness that makes Canon Sheehan's books a healing delight; nor the liberal and disciplined culture of Dr. William Barry; nor, in his more devotional books, the sunny, artless spiritual intimacy and directness of approach by which the late Father Russell lives in simple, loving hearts. Indeed, if his stern conception of eternal demands falls short of compelling force, it is because he does not always root it in that tenderness of love which gives it its sharpest edge. But where he is supreme is in his unflinching vision of the human soul in the light of the supreme call—grim and unlovely in the nakedness of its défaillance, yet invested with one outweighing dignity—the possibility of hearing the call of God and responding to it. In nearly all his books that call crashes into the torpor of our comfortable religious mediocrity, and readers who might dismiss his apologia for the monastic vocation with a smile and a shrug are pricked to the heart by his ironic castigation of the religion of the average Englishman. For upon one thing all thoughtful men, of whatever creed, are agreed: that unless we can find a moral equivalent for the hair-shirt and the scourge, our religion will be reduced to one among many efforts to be pleasantly sociable and communicative. To this universal demand for a religion which is not a tea-party, but a holy war, Monsignor Benson speaks with a significant and haunting voice.

THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS

PART II.

December 11.—This day did venture on a coach drawn by horses, which I ascertained to be going to the Exchange and London Bridge. At first I was in doubt which seat to take, as the common people seemed to take the top seats, and the gentlefolk inside. But one can see mighty fine from the top, so I on top. Sad to me not to recognise the 'Change, it is so altered, and, Lord, to see the multitudes of folk and traffic; I marvelled greatly one was not killed. To London Bridge, yet neither did I recognise it, there being not a single house on it. But mighty pleased to see the Tower still standing, and alongside it a most singular bridge, which opened in half, like shears, to let some monstrous big vessels through. And here on the water was another wonderful thing, some ships did go at a great speed, with smoke and fire issuing from within them, but with no sails. These things do fright me.

December 12.—Up and abroad, and find a great fall of snow in the night, and the whole town exceeding dirty. But to see the mighty strange sight of how they cleanse the streets is wonderful to behold: long lines of men run quickly along the road with strange besoms, that squeeze the mud to one side, leaving the road as clean and fresh as new. This day did drink more tea at my pretty serving-maid's, and afterwards to a tavern for some wine in Leicester Square; a most rich and wonderful tavern was it, like a king's palace.

December 13 (Lord's Day).—To the Abbey to service, and after walked to Hyde Park, which is now mighty fine gardens. A great many folks there, tho' cold. There saw a man who was shouting to the crowd, reviling the Church and King scandalously; it was a great shame the man's friends did not stop him for his good, as it is certain the poor wretch will be drawn and quartered.

December 14.—Up and at the bookshops, where I did see, to my surprise, beautifully printed and bound, my own journal, with title "Pepys' Diary." How they deciphered it I know not, and I mighty curious in the reading of it. And to see what a toil I was in, wanting to buy it and take it home, and yet did not for fear my wife should see it. Strange to see so many shops selling things I know not the use of, and some mighty strange looking, it seems for Christmas.

December 15.—All day to looking at shops again and in the evening to the playhouse, a house called the Palace. The most magnificent I ever did see inside, and the stage with wonderful paintings for scenes. Yet no play that I could see, only singing of songs, and doing of strange tricks. Neither does the wit seem of any fun in it, the players seeming not to speak such plain language as our day. A girl did perform very pretty and quaint in dancing, and yet with such mighty little clothes on that I did not think well of it. Anon the playhouse went dark, and some pictures came on a great white sheet, and how it was done Lord knows, but I was dumb to see these pictures move just like life, with boats and water and animals so real that I was in mortal fear lest they should jump out at me. I cannot believe it was as I saw, but a trick of the eyes surely it must be. Everywhere one sees witchcraft these days, and no one seems to go in fear of it. So home to bed, merry but with astonishment.

December 16.—This day, walking abroad, did come upon a mighty curious thing, a maid, and pretty too, holding forth to some bystanders in the street. I drew near to hear what she said, and it seems she was talking of politics, and did say some very severe words of one Lloyd George, and another Asquith, names I know not. It seems that she and other women of these days do desire to be in the Parliament, and vote like men, so things have come to a pretty pass methinks when womenfolk do interfere in such matters that do not concern them. I came away feeling very vexed at her frowardness, although she mighty pretty.

December 17.—Up and out, and did go into a small playhouse, and did see some more of these animated pictures, as they are called. And to see how everywhere nowadays hath the most beautiful printed sheets to announce their shows, so that I know how it is done, all in colours as they are. And I did see and gaze in fear at these pictures to-day, for the most devilish things did happen in them, among other things a scene where everything did go backwards in it, and also a man that did jump into another's hat, and of a piece of dirt that did jump about and form itself into mighty pretty statues. I did try earnestly to see how these things be done, but it do baffle me so that I am forced to believe it is verily magical arts that are used.

December 18.—Walking abroad many miles to-day, and now I do perceive that London must extend over the whole world, for I keep journeying and never come to the end of it. I did look for the fields and lanes of Vauxhall, where we used to take many a country walk, but now not a field to be seen, and nothing but houses. And such a multitude of playhouses now in London that I never would have believed. Surely the folk must be more wicked these days with so many playhouses. I will go to another to-morrow.

December 19.—Did go this night to a playhouse, "His Majesty's," tho' it is not where the King's house stood in my day. A mighty fine playhouse; but the play did confirm my thoughts that nought is done now but by witchcraft: a scene was shown of Hell, the most terrible I ever did see in all my life, and so many devils and witches in it that I was frightened and I came out, and saw not the end of it. For I am resolved they were real devils and witches.

December 20 (Lord's Day).—All quiet again and to service; strange to see but few people going to church in town. And with so many playhouses it must seem folk are more wicked. Tho', to say the truth, folk do seem much more civil nowadays; neither do I see one tipsy, or cruel to dogs and animals, such as in my day. It seems there has not been an execution these many days, as I do not see any heads gibbeted anywhere, so it seems that people do not commit so many crimes as formerly.

December 21.—I did not know how folk do get to hear the foreign news, but this day did find the reason thereof. It seems common lads do sell printed sheets with the news thereon, and to-day for a small coin I did purchase one of these sheets from a lad that was a-crying "All the winners," tho' I know not what he meant thereby. But such a wonderful printing for such a small coin I should never have believed, and with pictures mighty well done. From curiosity I did purchase a many of these papers, and Lord! to see what a lot of reading there is for a few coppers, that would take me all my life to read almost. So home with great content to read my papers.

THE DREAM OF SAMUEL PEPYS

(continued)

December 22.—To another playhouse, the "Alhambra," and there did see the most splendid scenes and displays I ever did see. One play with no words spoken, yet the players did tell the story with motions and dancing, and a mighty good plot. And some of the scenes were the most wonderful, large numbers of maids dancing mighty prettily in all manner of costumes and jewels, which must have cost millions of pounds. The maids did so attract me that, thinking of Knipp and the others, I did go round to the stage door as a gentleman to be introduced to some of and perhaps escort one to supper. But I was reprov'd mightily by the doorkeeper, and I remembered sadly I knew not one to introduce me. So was disappointed, but home, nevertheless, mighty merry.

December 23.—Up, and the weather very cold, and all the bustle in the town is now preparing for Christmas, which it seems is a great festival to what it used to be. All the shops full of the most strange things, and I did go into a big place called a bazaar, which was crowded with folks a-buying of gifts and toys for children. And I did see a small box with a kind of trumpet on it, and the shopman did start it going, and yet, tho' it was but a few inches in size, I swear there was a man within it that did sing a song, at which I marvelled greatly. And again the shopman started it, and lo! there was a band of musicians within it. Doubtless the shopman was a magician, though he seemed but ordinary.

December 24.—Out again, and great multitudes of people in the streets, and all the talk is of Christmas, and buying of puddings and favours. To-day I saw a strange sight: a great crowd of men in poor clothing marching with flags with "We are Hungry" on them. It seems these men have no money, not having work to do, which is mighty strange, methinks, with such vast stores of wealth and business about that I did think there would not be enough people to do all the work. Strange to see soldiers marching with these men, dressed in blue, but without arms. I did not think there were any poor folk these days, but now perceive there are many. The town all lit at night and the noise and merry bustle past belief.

December 25 (Christmas Day).—Up betimes and out early, all eager to see the festivals and merry-making. But all strangely quiet, and all the way from Westminster to Oxford Street and the Strand, hardly a living soul to be seen. All the shops closed, and everything so strange that I think a great calamity must have happened. Some taverns I did see open at midday, but not many folks in them, though all decorated for the festival. So it was all day until evening, when some of the great coffee-houses did open in the West End. Many coaches and motors about of people going to dinners, but no festival that I did see. In the evening I went for my Christmas dinner to a dining-house of such magnificence and grandeur that it was better than a king's palace—it was named the Savoy, and near where the old Savoy Stairs were in my day. And there had a mighty fine dinner, and such wealthy appointments that I thought they would charge me fifty guineas, but they did not. And so home mighty merry, but no festival that I could see.

EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM

By OSCAR BROWNING, M.A.

I.

I HAVE been asked to take part in the Educational Symposium inaugurated in the second number of EVERYMAN by Mr. A. C. Benson and Dr. Rouse. I should like to see the term Secondary Education abolished, and that there should be one public education, for which I should have no objection to use Mr. Benson's term "Civic Education." My friend, Prof. Earle Barnes, who came from America to England to study our educational system, told me that after three years' careful investigation he was unable to attach any distinctive meaning to secondary education. He had asked many authorities to tell him the difference between secondary and primary schools, and all he had gathered from them was that the term secondary implied a higher social status and a greater devotion to sport. Indeed, there are at present two classes of secondary schools, entirely different in character: one, public schools and those which are derived from them; the other, schools which spring from our primary schools, and have raised themselves to a higher standard.

II.

Nowhere, perhaps, is this distinction between primary and secondary more senseless than in Training Colleges. The method of training teachers is one and indivisible, and the only difference between these two departments is that the secondary training is much more expensive and far less effective.

In the course of a long life I have had unusual opportunities of seeing every kind of education in the working. I was for fifteen years a master at Eton, where I was educated as a boy. I was for more than thirty years engaged in University and College work at Cambridge, and for eighteen years of that time I was Principal of an elementary Training college.

III.

I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the best and most successful of these three systems of education is the primary; the worst and the least successful, the secondary. It is often held that intending teachers educated in primary schools will be improved by being sent for a time to secondary schools. My experience teaches me that those who do this are much more likely to be corrupted than improved, and that they learn in secondary schools a passion for sport and habits of idleness from which in primary schools they would be free.

IV.

I must now deal with the curriculum, and especially with the classical languages. I am a devoted supporter of what is called "compulsory Greek," that is, that the Greek language should be an essential part of the training of all those who aspire to the higher culture and the best standard of education. For myself, I was brought up, to the age of three-and-twenty, on the strictest classical diet, and I taught classics as an Eton master. In spite of this, I have an intimate knowledge of French, German, and Italian. I can talk them fluently, and am well acquainted with their literature. I wrote the articles on Dante and Goethe in the tenth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. I am perfectly certain that my capacity for learning these languages is due entirely to having had a thorough classical education.

V.

There is no more fatal mistake than to suppose that giving less time and thought to Greek and Latin will increase the knowledge of German and French. It is admitted that the knowledge of German, which fifty years ago was the mark of a scholar, is rapidly dying out; that Italian, which a hundred years ago was studied by all cultivated English men and women, is now entirely neglected; and I doubt very much whether French is as familiar to Englishmen as it used to be. The best way of learning French and German is to begin with Greek and Latin.

EDUCATIONAL SYMPOSIUM (continued)

VI.

What, then, do we recommend? A parent who sends his son to an expensive school ought to have some guarantee that he has spent his time there profitably, and has been properly taught. This can only be effected by the establishment of a State leaving examination, not for honours, but for a pass—not one which it is a credit to have passed, but one which it is a disgrace not to have passed. Let this examination be of three kinds: one including Greek and Latin, one Latin without Greek, one with neither Greek nor Latin.

These examinations should also include, in different degrees, a certain amount of history, mathematics, and science, and should exhibit a power of writing English. When these examinations have been established, it should be determined to what occupations they should be the necessary avenue, to what University degrees they should give access, for what professional examinations, of which there are now a bewildering number, they should be a substitute. An examination of this kind would organise primary and secondary, better called civic, education as it has never been organised before.

VII.

To sum up, I recommend three things for the improvement of our national education. First, that the distinction between primary and secondary education should be entirely abolished; secondly, that Greek should be regarded as an essential part of the highest school education; and thirdly, that proficiency in school work should be tested by a leaving examination of different degrees, closing the school career and admitting to such occupations in after life as shall be determined upon after careful consideration.

❖ ❖ ❖

MOTH AND RUST

I.

I SUPPOSE there are times when all of us feel the spirit within us, the mysterious denizen of eternity, beating against the flesh that imprisons it, and crying, like the caged starling, "I can't get out! I can't get out!" The weary monotony of bodily life becomes maddening; the burden of a mechanism that cannot do as the spirit wills is intolerable. The body must be fed and washed and dressed and put to sleep. When there are hills to climb, it must lie down; when there is work to do, it wants to sleep; it is unreasonable and unmanageable; it can even prevent you from thinking and from feeling happy by some absurd ache or some obscure disorder in its mechanism. It thinks itself so intelligent and so useful, but what a hindrance it can be! You want to hear the morning stars singing together for joy—and it compels you to listen to the barrel-organ in the street. You desire to behold the very soul of the fire springing up in marvellous shapes of wing and leaf and wave—and your detestable body persists in seeing all the surrounding man-made squalor of an ordinary fireplace. The ugliness of all that the body desires is so outrageous that most of us must sometimes have longed to be in our native eternity to be rid of it all. Knives and forks, easy-chairs, coal-scuttles, wall-papers, teapots, how laboriously full of petty and fatiguing detail, how senselessly elaborate in grotesque ugliness are one and all.

This unnecessary cumbrous horror of furniture and fine clothing, this burdensome detail of the belongings of our dying carcasses, drives us at times to revolt. Why should we be condemned to pass our time among such things? We are built for eternity, and eternity is all beauty. Nothing eternal can be meaningless, nothing unnecessary. But an umbrella or a coal-scuttle are horrible in a mean way, and no man can be the better for them. We long to escape from them and to be at rest.

The more civilised we grow, the worse it is. Kipling may try to make us believe that machines are beautiful; it is but another specimen of his perverted ingenuity. Machines are subtle, marvellous, monstrous, and irredeemably ugly. Put a machine made by a man beside a machine made by God, such as a bird, and judge for yourself.

II.

What caddis-worms are we, covering ourselves with scraps and patches, sticks and straws and stones, till we barely leave a crack to see the sky through. How much longer must we accumulate rubbish around us, and call it civilisation? We cannot store honeydew in a Thermos flask, or preserve the heavenly manna in the most cunningly devised refrigerator. The sword of the spirit is not welded in the vast and smoky furnaces of Sheffield. Surely those hermits, now so much out of fashion, were wiser than we; they hid in caves, with the barest necessaries of life, which are therefore the most beautiful of perishable things, and in solitude fixed their "inward eye" upon Eternal Beauty.

We have need in this century, more than ever before, of the Franciscan ideal: an ideal of simplicity and poverty, a heart fixed on the realities of life. These are strange days, when men will fast for the good of their stomachs who would never do it for the good of their souls; when men will lead the "simple life" for a whim, and spend what they save thereby on fresh luxuries when the whim is over. We have need, now more than ever, of object-lessons in the true "simple life," led with the single burning aspiration for the true full life of eternity: such a life as that of the religious orders now taking refuge in England from persecution abroad, whose example can do us nothing but good. Here are men and women who believe in Eternity, who have faith in the glorious abundant life after death, and who have given up human joys for joys spiritual. There are spirits like these among Protestants. Let them ungrudgingly welcome their fellow-spirits, and take fresh heart from their faith. The same vision sustains Salvation Polly and Sister Mary Joseph, and a great white angel has charge of each. But what angel can abide in the luxurious dustbin that is a modern house?

The nearer we come to bare necessities, the nearer we come to true beauty; for true beauty is service-ability. A cottage kitchen, with its table and dresser and settle by the fire, its pewter and plain crockery, is a far more beautiful place than a modern drawing-room. In such surroundings life is life, to be faced willingly, with the knowledge that the day's work brings the day's wages, and that moth and rust will find little to corrupt of all the treasure we leave behind us when we go.

DORA OWEN.

"LARGELY EMOTIONAL"

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY

I.

WE speak of "the People" as a man; but journalism always proceeds on the supposition that democracy is, in fact, a woman, and to be treated accordingly. For the man, however ill-trained, has by nature some capacity for reasoning; he professes to argue the merits of his case, to be a judge, not a mere special pleader. Not so the pattern woman. Her glory is in feeling and in obeying the impulses of her heart. This, too, is a democratic watchword, or, as Americans would phrase it, a slogan. "The great heart of the People" decides all issues at last, and decides them rightly. So we are told by the orator on countless platforms, in election addresses, from the lips of men as unlike as Robespierre was to Lincoln, or Gladstone to Gambetta. It is Rousseau's first principle, "the People are naturally good"; and goodness here means kindness, benevolence, incapability of hurting a fly, unless he belonged to the opposition. A more cautious thinker than Rousseau would perhaps be led by observation of history to apply to mankind thus envisaged what was said of Diderot, "How good he is! and how bad he can be!"

II.

To prove that their candidate, Mr. Roosevelt or Dr. Wilson, is the only right one, American electors scream themselves hoarse during twenty-five or forty-five minutes without taking breath. In this primitive form of affirmation we may detect the antecedent of all election cries, posters, placards, flags, cockades, true-blue favours, emblems green, red, orange—the whole of that fighting heraldry which goes back to Totemism, and which is pictured for our delight in the "Seven against Thebes." The monsters open their jaws, threatening to devour, hissing out death and destruction to the other side, whence an equal storm of menace comes back on the instant. Emotion is at the height, but where is reason? We ought to be very sure of our cause and its righteousness before we cultivate an epileptic seizure, to be spread through the crowd over half a continent in its behalf. These lightning speeches, whirlwind campaigns, and appeals to the chaos that lies couching beneath our hard-won civilisation, are dangerous. They do not make for progress. They are an insult to the principle of democracy, which takes even the multitude to be in some degree rational. Is it a small thing to say that they are vulgar? Not so, I think. Why should the apostles of true freedom, of justice and humanity, come before the public stripped of decorum, having torn off the last shreds of good manners, as if they were dancing in the presence of South Sea Islanders? Yet to this undignified and demoralising sight a past or possible American President is required to treat the most advanced of democratic nations.

III.

These humours of the American election are symptoms, broad enough in their grotesque indecency and inanity, to arrest the gaze and to provoke the somewhat discouraged thought of an old Liberal like myself. I, too, believe in the great heart of the People. But I do not hear it beating in such a ghastly tumult of unreason as the wire brings to my ears across the Atlantic. Democracy, as I learnt it half a century ago, was not wanting in emotion. It may be said to have sprung from the passion of pity, stirred into a crusade of deliverance by the awful wrongs that had been endured for ages under bad laws, stupid governments, a self-seeking propertied class. But its appeal was to the Higher Law, and to the common good. These are matters of principle which determine how we shall feel; they lead us to the heart of ethics, not to the hysterical frenzies and wild contortions of a Zulu medicine-man whose god drives him to foam at the mouth. In 1789 there was first a question of the Rights of Man which, if they exist, belong to him in virtue of his manhood—that is to say, of his personality. And personality is a fact in quite another rank of ideas and of truths than feeling. Right is right, whether I feel it, or you, or none of us. No doubt, from the very make of our bodies and souls, it incarnates itself in emotions, it creates an imagery to illustrate its claims, it has a befitting language, Miltonic in height and eloquence. But if we take emotion for our guide, we shall never know the way we are going. Yesterday we were all swearing our great oath of freedom in the Field of Mars; to-day we are executing Madame Roland in the Place of the Revolution, while she murmurs, "O Freedom, what a fool they have made of you!" It was all emotion, the swearing and the guillotining; "France got drunk with blood to vomit crime," exclaimed the English poet, bearing hardly on a chivalrous and refined nation which had been captured by maniacs.

To reason with one man is not difficult, with a dozen not impossible. But how with a whole people? This task Providence has given over in the present age to writers mostly anonymous, to speakers mostly impromptu. It must be granted that rhetoric tends to sacrifice truth on the altar of effective expression; and that the tongue is not the natural instrument of a statesman or a philosopher. Free speech means too often "folly doctorwise controlling skill." An orator like W. E. Gladstone or Mr. Roosevelt can say what he chooses; the audience will applaud and believe. He may be sophist, cynic, hypocrite; but give him the eloquent tongue and he can persuade his people to march on catastrophe, cheering. He has done it before now.

IV.

Rhetoric, by itself, is a poor thing. An emotional, improvised philosophy is absurd. We want religion, then we may let rhetoricians play round it a little—religion applied to democratic problems. Whatever have been the faults of the Christian pulpit, we must allow that it did not prophesy smooth things, but told rich and poor the most unpalatable truths in stern language. It put into the hearts of men and women strength, not weakness. In its palmy days it was so far from indulging sentiment that its occupants went to the other extreme and preached as if the heavens were thundering, then and there, upon guilty heads. But emotion followed faith instead of being made a substitute for its absence. What is the faith, the living faith, of democracy? What it once was, I know. If we are to judge faith from its reading and its amusements, its leaders and its spokesmen, to-day, it has arrived at a critical point, and is falling under the spell of motives which are hard to withstand, but which it would be the ruin of ideal and spiritual aims to accept. Since it can be true to itself only so long as it is true to the principles out of which it sprang, there is something better for its advocates to do than to shriek in one another's faces by the hour. Let them find out the meaning of justice and freedom, and see by what laws they can be reconciled under modern conditions. Emotion will not greatly help them; reason and religion will.

THE OMISSIONS OF MR. NORMAN ANGELL * * * BY CECIL CHESTERTON

THE two articles which Mr. Norman Angell has contributed to EVERYMAN on his favourite subject of the inutility of war possess a special interest, since, while the first one is merely in the main a statement of that position with which he has long familiarised the public, that war is commercially unprofitable, the second makes, for the first time, some attempt to meet those critics for whom this conclusion, even though proved, is inconclusive.

In regard to the first point, I find it extraordinarily difficult to get near enough to Mr. Angell's point of view to discuss the matter with him. There is a hoary anecdote about a man who asserted that any honest person could always answer a plain question with a plain "yes" or "no," and who was promptly asked: "Have you left off beating your wife?" The feelings of that unfortunate controversialist bear some resemblance to mine when I am confronted with what is in essence Mr. Angell's query: "Should usurers go to war?"

I may say, in passing, that I am not clear that even on the question thus raised Mr. Angell makes out his case. His case, broadly stated, is that the net of "Finance"—or, to put it plainer, Cosmopolitan Usury—which is at present spread over Europe would be disastrously torn by any considerable war; and that in consequence it is to the interest of the usurers to preserve peace. But here, it seems to me, we must make a clear differentiation. It may easily be to the interest of a particular usurer, or group of usurers, to provoke war; that very financial crisis which Mr. Angell anticipates may quite probably be a source of profit to them. That it would not be to the interest of a nation of usurers to fight is very probable. That such a nation would not fight, or, if it did, would be exceedingly badly beaten, is certain. But that only serves to raise the further question of whether it is to the ultimate advantage of a nation to repose upon usury; and whether the breaking of the net of usury which at present unquestionably holds Europe in captivity would not be for the advantage, as it would clearly be for the honour, of our race.

To sum up briefly that side of the question, it may be stated thus. A certain number of cosmopolitan money-lenders (mostly of Asiatic origin) have recently preached the doctrine that paying certain Europeans to fight for the economic advantage, not of the fighters, but of the said money-lenders, is for those money-lenders a good investment. Mr. Norman Angell endeavours to convince them that it is a bad investment. I hope he will succeed. The sword is too sacred a thing to be prostituted to such dirty purposes. But whether he succeeds or fails in this attempt, it will make no difference to the mass of plain men who, when they fight and risk their lives, do not do so in the expectation of obtaining a certain interest on their capital, but for quite other reasons.

I turn to the much more interesting question which Mr. Angell raises in his second article, the question of the moral effect of war. Mr. Angell is of opinion that war has never succeeded as a method of enforcing ideas. My own view may be briefly expressed by saying that I do not think that any other method except war has ever decisively so succeeded.

Mr. Angell's latest appeal comes, I think, at an unfortunate moment. I wish to be strictly fair to him and to his views, and I therefore readily admit that he has not maintained that war is impossible to-day, but only that it would be impossible if the combatants calculated their chances of advantage with due intelligence. But the present conflict in the Balkans cuts much deeper into Mr. Angell's theory than that. It is not merely that the Balkan States have refused to be convinced by Mr. Angell as to their chances of commercial profit from the war. It is that if Mr. Angell had succeeded to the fullest extent in convincing them that there was not a quarter per cent. to be made out of the war, nay, that—horrible thought!—they would actually be poorer at the end of the war than at the beginning, they would have gone to war all the same.

And here is a living example of the futility of Mr. Angell's attempt at a second line of defence. It is tenable that neither Bulgaria, Serbia, Montenegro, nor Greece will have more money as a result of their victories. But to say that no result will be produced by those victories is to say something palpably absurd. At the end of the war, if the success of the allies continues, this solid fact will remain. Where the Turkish Pasha, the Turkish soldier, the Turkish Bashi-bazouk was for four centuries, he will no longer be. That may make no difference (or an unfortunate difference) to the cosmopolitan financiers. But it will make a great deal of difference to the people who live in Macedonia, Albania, and Thrace. And that issue will have been decided in the only way in which issues are generally decided in the long run. It will have been decided by the sword. The sword established Turkish rule in Europe; after centuries of futile diplomacy have failed, the sword may, perhaps, destroy it.

Since Mr. Angell's argument clearly applies as much, or more, to civil as to international conflicts, I may perhaps be allowed to turn to civil conflicts to make clear my meaning. In this country during the last three centuries one solid thing has been done. The power of Parliament was pitted in battle against the power of the Crown, and won. As a result, for good or evil, Parliament really is stronger than the Crown to-day. The power of the mass of the people to control Parliament has been given as far as mere legislation could give it. We all know that it is a sham. And if you ask what it is that makes the difference of reality between the two cases, it is this: that men killed and were killed for the one thing and not for the other.

I have no space to develop all that I should like to say about the indirect effects of war. All I will say is this, that men do judge, and always will judge, things by the ultimate test of how they fight. The German victory of forty years ago has produced not only an astonishing expansion, industrial as well as political, of Germany, but has (most disastrously, as I think) infected Europe with German ideas, especially with the idea that you make a nation strong by making its people behave like cattle. God send that I may live to see the day when victorious armies from Gaul shall shatter this illusion, burn up Prussianism with all its Police Regulations, Insurance Acts, Poll Taxes, and insults to the poor, and reassert the Republic. It will never be done in any other way.

There is one further thing which I wish to say. Mr. Norman Angell is much too clear-headed a person not to see that war can only be finally suppressed by declaring war upon it. To take the parallel which he himself adopts, private war between individuals was not put down by preaching to them the duty of being "charitable" or cowardly, or even by pointing out to them that they would not ultimately make money by blacking their neighbours' eyes. It was put down by erecting a thing called the State, sufficiently powerful to restrain individuals. If arbitration is ever to take the place of war, it must be backed by a corresponding array of physical force. Now the question immediately arises: Are we prepared to arm any International Tribunal with any such powers? Personally, I am not.

The only terms upon which any free man (and, similarly, any free nation) will consent to allow such power to be exercised against them is that the tribunal exercising such power is administering a clearly defined law, to which they are consenting parties. We have drifted dangerously far from this condition in England to-day; but even here we should not tolerate a legal system under which a particular judge could take away the property of one man and hand it to another on the ground of certain vague preferences personal to himself. Very well. Your International Tribunal must be administering the law; and the only law that it can possibly administer is the law as defined by existing treaties.

Now turn back some fifty years to the great struggle for the emancipation of Italy. Suppose that a Hague Tribunal had then been in existence, armed with coercive powers. The dispute between Austria and Sardinia must have been referred to that tribunal. That tribunal must have been guided by existing treaties. The Treaty of Vienna was perhaps the most authoritative ever entered into by European Powers. By that treaty, Venice and Lombardy were unquestionably assigned to Austria. A just tribunal administering international law must have decided in favour of Austria, and have used the whole armed force of Europe to coerce Italy into submission. Are those Pacifists, who try at the same time to be Democrats, prepared to acquiesce in such a conclusion? Personally, I am not.

I do not trust an International Tribunal. I know very well that that tribunal will be representative, not of the peoples of various countries, but at best of their Governments. At worst, it will be representative of the wealthy cosmopolitan financiers who have lent those Governments money. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Norman Angell that it will be to the interests of such financiers to strengthen such a tribunal.

But I am quite sure that it will be in the interests of the peoples who are caught in their net to break it in pieces.

THE CHANCE OF THE PEASANT.

A REJOINDER.

THE article under this heading in the first number of EVERYMAN was interesting, and, like most contributions to the discussion of the social problem, open to question. The writer begins by asserting that "two very extraordinary and rather unexpected things have happened in the recent political thought of this country," and goes on to say that the two things in question are the simultaneous collapse of (1) "the thing called Individualism," and (2) "the thing called Socialism." Now, is either of these statements correct?

So far as Individualism is concerned, would it not be true to say that the main current of British thought would have taken a very extraordinary and rather unexpected turn, politically and economically, if it had continued to exercise its former influence? And, though I agree with the writer that Individualism has practically collapsed, I differ very materially from him when he says that its collapse was extraordinary and unexpected. If he means this in the Pickwickian sense, then I agree, but not otherwise. He tells us that "Individualism has been destroyed by Individualists, not by Socialists." Exactly. But it is only to the extent that the destroying Individualists became Socialists that they caused the destruction or collapse of Individualism. And may I suggest that the reason why Socialists did not accomplish what he credits Individualists with accomplishing is this, that the former had only the will, whilst the latter had both the will and the power. Is it necessary to add that it is only given to those possessing both these qualifications to either build or destroy?

Then, if, as he says, Individualism has collapsed, why does he wish to revive it by establishing peasant proprietors? If this is not Individualism, what is it? Peasant proprietorship has had a chance in Ireland, and does the writer seriously contend that, because this is so, therefore there is no Irish labour problem? Is it not a fact that the labour problems of Ireland are as real and as acute as are the labour problems of any part of Great Britain? And is it not apparent that, once Home Rule is conceded, one of the very first things the Irish Legislature will have to consider is the living conditions of those who possess no land, viz., the town and country labourers of Ireland? Peasant proprietorship may be all right so far as it goes, although even on this point I have grave doubts; but the trouble is, that it doesn't go far enough. In other words, we cannot all become peasant proprietors, because there isn't enough land to go round. In view of these circumstances, it would be intensely interesting to hear from the writer first of all, since he doesn't believe in Socialism or Society or Committees, what sort of agency he would set up to divide the land; secondly, upon what principle he would have this agency distribute it; thirdly, what is to be the relationship between those who get land and those who don't; and lastly, what sort of stake is the landless man to have in the country.

Then, so far as Collectivism is concerned, certainly things would have taken a "very extraordinary and rather unexpected turn" if it had collapsed; but is it true that it has collapsed, or that the workers have lost faith in Socialism or Society?

I question very much if he is right when he states that Collectivism has collapsed, and that its collapse is due to the fact that the democracy of Britain lacked faith in it. I submit that the very opposite is the case. Is it not a fact that the whole trend of all that is best in British thought at the moment is in the direction of Collectivism? In support of my contention, I point to the unification of the labour forces throughout Britain; the advent of the Parliamentary Labour party, and to all the recent ameliorative industrial and social legislative enactments. What has he to say in support of his assertion? He says, "among all those miners" and "all those dockers," and I suppose he would permit me to add "all those factory workers" who have asked for higher wages lately (and he might have added, have not got them), most would have preferred to have no wages, and would prefer to have a piece of private capital. He then goes on to talk of miners owning "a garden no bigger than a carpet," and of dockers "owning a loose boat in some little harbour." Is it necessary to remind him that the tendency is for all British industries, such as mines, factories, and docks, to be conducted on a large and ever-increasing scale, and that this tendency is not peculiar to Britain, but is world-wide? A corresponding tendency is for the workers engaged in these industries to become highly specialised, and, though highly specialised, still, in many cases, performing very simple functions, which, at any moment, might be rendered unnecessary through the adoption of some ingeniously devised labour-saving device. In this way the most highly skilled artisan is in hourly danger of the industrial scrap-heap, just as a modern destroyer is in hourly danger of becoming obsolete immediately it is launched. To talk, as the writer does, about "the chance of the peasant," in view of recent industrial developments, is simply begging the whole question so far as contributing to the solution of the problems of modern industry is concerned. There is not much wisdom in his talking about a miner or docker liking a private interest in preference to receiving wages, if he fails to show how this interest is to be acquired. I certainly want the workers to have an interest in the industries of the country, but I cannot see how it is possible for them to secure anything but a collective one. And since it is a question of all, and since the writer of the article under review has only in it provided for some getting a private interest in their country, perhaps he will tell us what is to happen to that other some, which is by far the greater part of the whole, who, under no conceivable circumstances, could possibly have "the chance of the peasant."

F. MCL.

THE LOWER DECK *

THE bluejacket, unlike the soldier, whose daily round has formed the theme for so many popular tales, hitherto has been left very much in obscurity, so that this book, materialised as it has at so opportune a time, should be the more warmly welcomed. We strongly recommend it, first, to the lower deck themselves, if only that they may see how strenuous an advocate is pleading their cause; secondly, to the naval officer, since its pages put forth with moderation the views of his subordinates; and, lastly, we recommend it to the owners of the Navy, the great British public, who, nurtured on the idea that a sailor's life is one of ease and sunshine, of merry songs and horn-pipes, are lamentably ignorant of the real life between-decks. Their admiration of the bluejacket, based as it is on the "pretty-pretty" of naval tournaments and reviews, lacks stability. Let their pockets be threatened, and they burst forth into a tirade against "swollen armaments." Moreover, sailors have no desire for cheap admiration, and say, in their own inimitable lingo, "Damn your sympathy; give us the brass." No doubt, after a great naval disaster, the public subscribe liberally to relief funds, but such emotional and spasmodic charity does more harm than good in the long run, in that it creates a vicious circle, for the wider the public open their purses on these terrible occasions, the tighter will the Admiralty and Treasury clutch theirs. As Nelson pointed out:—

"Our God and sailor we adore
In time of danger, not before.
The danger past, both are alike requited—
God is forgotten and the sailor slighted."

Landsmen, with fatal obstinacy, refuse to believe that the lower decks of our magnificent ships are seething with discontent—a state of things that, as Mr. Reynolds shows, is largely due to the extremely bad pay in the Navy. Bluejackets, as a rule, are ultra-conservative in all things, even in politics; and, recognising that most Service improvements in the past have been due, not to Liberals but to Conservatives, they vote, like the practical men they are, for those most likely to ameliorate their lot. Nevertheless, the present First Lord has won golden opinions amongst them by his personal investigations into their grievances; besides, they trust a man who, on many occasions, in submarines and destroyers, has subjected himself to the same risks they themselves have to face. He is, indeed, the type of man to instil confidence into sailors. Hence, when he promised increased pay, the murmurs of discontent were hushed from one end of the Fleet to the other, and the old-time cheerful patience was restored. But this patience cannot be strained indefinitely, as the nation may discover should the long-promised improvements not be forthcoming. Mr. Reynolds says: "My own impression is that Mr. Churchill would have done more and have made more sweeping changes but for obstacles placed in his way." It is an anomaly that a Liberal Government should be so illiberal as to place obstacles in the way of meting out justice to those who so uncompromisingly dedicate their lives to the maintenance of the Empire's integrity.

* "Men of the Lower Deck." By Stephen Reynolds. 1s. (Dent.)

Mr. Reynolds recounts an amusing anecdote in connection with a recent visit of the First Lord to one of the ships: "Said Mr. Churchill to a stoker, 'D'you like your job?' 'I can't say I do, sir,' replied the man. 'Well, what's wrong with it?' asked Mr. Churchill. 'What's wrong with it?' repeated the stoker, looking very frankly into his face; 'well, what's right with it?' And for once Mr. Churchill was nonplussed."

One grievance that Mr. Reynolds has against the Admiralty seems somewhat illogical. He requires Admiralty sanatoria for men invalided out of the Service with consumption. Now, when a bluejacket joins the Service, he knows full well that, should his health fail in this respect, in view of the infectious nature of this fell scourge, he is bound to be invalided out. It is a case of being cruel to be kind; the individual must be sacrificed for the welfare of the total force. Once invalided, all public hospitals and sanatoria are as open to him as to his non-naval confrères.

Lord Charles Beresford is the idol of the lower deck, simply because, having realised that there are genuine grievances, he works with bulldog pertinacity until those grievances are removed. "How is it," we once asked Lord Charles when he was an admiral afloat, "your fleet returns show so small a percentage of leave-breakers as compared with those of other fleets under similar conditions?" "Because," came the answer, "I endeavour to look upon my men as human beings, and not as so many movable pieces on a chess-board." Mr. Churchill has given due consideration to the question of punishments, and has caused to be removed some of the more harmful and irritating. Again, his scheme of promotion from the ranks will be a great encouragement to men to keep clear of the defaulters' list, as well as an inducement to ambitious boys to enter the Navy. Into all questions of discipline the personal equation enters largely, and this may mean all the difference between justice and gross injustice. As Mr. Reynolds so aptly says, "The Navy is a maze of wheels within wheels, all of them greased or gritted, where they intermesh, with the personal factor." One commanding officer, possessing tact and common sense, will have a happy and well-behaved ship, a principal contribution to fighting efficiency; another, swollen but empty-headed, will bring into being phenomenal punishment returns and mess-decks rankling with dissatisfaction.

Enough has been said, we hope, to stimulate the reader to look more closely into the matter, and he cannot do this better than by reading Mr. Reynolds's book, and, having read it, we feel convinced he will be determined to see fair treatment administered to these cheery but long-suffering defenders of our shores. To modify the words of a great philosopher: "Posterity will cry shame on us if we do not at once remedy this deplorable state of things. Nay, if we live but a few years longer, our own consciences will cry shame on us."

NAVAL OFFICER.

"THE TURNSTILE"

By A. E. W. MASON

CAPTAIN RAMES, the hero of Mr. A. E. W. Mason's latest novel, "The Turnstile" (London: Hodder and Stoughton), is a naval officer and an Antarctic explorer. He tries to reach the South Pole, fails gloriously, returns to England, and gets married at the age of forty. Mr. Hemming, his lieutenant on The Perhaps, sets off to make a fresh attack on the South Pole, also without success. Whereupon Captain Rames hears once more the "call," and, leaving his wife and a promising political career behind, sails for the Great White South. Now readers of Mr. Mason—and they are no small company—need no reminding that Captain Scott, R.N., conducted an expedition to the Antarctic in 1900-4, that one of his officers on that occasion, Lieutenant (now Sir Ernest) Shackleton, led a new expedition towards the South Pole in 1907-9, that Scott, in 1910, started on another voyage, hoping to attain the hitherto unattainable; and "Who's Who" will give them the further piece of information, if they do not already possess it, that Captain Scott was married in 1908, at the age of forty.

Under these circumstances it is scarcely surprising that Mr. Mason considers some explanation necessary. It takes the form of a brief note on the back of the title-page: "In view of recent events, I think it proper to say that this book was planned and the writing of it begun by the spring of the year 1909." Some, no doubt, will see in this a subtle form of self-praise: "How true a prophet I was!" The more charitable will read Mr. Mason's foreword as a sort of apology, or excuse: "You must not blame me if fact has followed closely in the footsteps of fiction."

Of course, others before Mr. Mason have grafted romance on reality; have borrowed for the purposes of fiction living characters and actual current events. Meredith, for instance (to take only moderns), introduced relatives, under a thin disguise, into his novels; the "Dop Doctor" draws freely on the story of Mafeking and its defenders; Mr. Kipling has been made the hero of an able French novel called "Dingley"; Mr. Barrie used to embarrass friends and acquaintances by bestowing their names in full upon the creations of his fancy.

Obviously, Rames (a not very likable man) is not, and is not intended to be, a character-sketch of any living explorer. Yet, somehow, one regrets Mr. Mason's making the Scott-Shackleton situation the framework for his story. The prefatory note offers no valid excuse. Shackleton had married and gone out again when Mr. Mason began his novel; Scott was not long married, but it almost stood to reason that he would not rest till he had the South Pole under his heel. Had

Mr. Mason's story been a masterpiece of fiction, one would not have minded, perhaps; but it is not. "The Turnstile" is quite an interesting story; the story of the clash and reconciliation of a husband's grim ambition and a wife's romantic enthusiasm, of a relentless summons of an unfinished, dangerous task, just when love has come to life.

Mr. Mason, in fact, has been making "copy" out of the people he has seen and heard, and events that have been taking place during the last year or two. Much of it—his election scenes and sketches of the different types of M.P., for example—is very entertaining "copy," but even the best of "copy" rarely makes durable literature. Had the artist in Mr. Mason kept the journalist in restraint, fewer readers might have gone through "The Turnstile" to-day, but more would have done so to-morrow.

THE CRAFTSMAN

By the strength of your right hand,
Craftsman, the old houses stand,
And the new endow the land.

By your craft, and what you make,
With subtle tools, and arms that ache,—
The Seven Cities are awake.

For now, the leases being run
Of war's ordained destruction,—
The Golden Bough should feel the sun.

The mystic carpenter that drew
The line that ran the zenith thro',—
He is content, and lives in you.

And Lucifer's lost energy,
That falls from heav'n eternally,
Is reborn in your carpentry.

And Adam's delving, Eve's delight;—
The moonward rapture of the bright
Rebellious wave;—the fall of night;—

The wintry dawn that hears a noise,
Like Cheops' hammer sound and rise;—
They lend a measure to your eyes.

And for that paradise, or aisle
Of youth, you dreamt of all the while,
What if it lay within a mile?—

And pipe should play, and tabor beat,
And you should find it at your feet,
At your own door, in your own street?

For old roads end where new began,
And the new road turns where the old one ran:
These are the words of Everyman.

E. R.

OATINE SHAVING POWDER

AN UNIQUE OFFER.

"A really comfortable shave" is possible for all if it is conducted with the help of OATINE SHAVING POWDER, which is specially manufactured from the finest ingredients and possesses special properties whereby it lathers quickly, giving a free, smooth, lasting, and agreeable lather which does not dry on the face.

To use OATINE SHAVING POWDER is to know what a really clean shave is, and, by reason of the special construction of the cap of the bottle, it is possible to shake out just sufficient powder for each shave, the rest of the powder remaining untouched, and is thus kept dry and clean. OATINE SHAVING POWDER, as illustrated, is sold by all Chemists and Stores, price 1s. per glass bottle.

To relieve the irritation caused by shaving there is nothing so effective as OATINE FACE CREAM, which should be gently rubbed into the skin after the shave is completed. The face is rendered sore after shaving because the razor and the Alkali in the soap used removes the natural oil of the skin. OATINE FACE CREAM restores this as no other Face Cream can.

THIS TOILET OUTFIT FREE.

In order to thoroughly introduce the Oatine Toilet Preparations, some of which appeal specially to gentlemen, the Proprietors have decided to distribute absolutely free to all who send their name and address on a postcard, a packet of Oatine Shaving Powder, or for 3d. in stamps (4d. stamps preferred), to cover cost of postage and packing, the dainty Toilet Outfit illustrated herewith, which contains the packet of Shaving Powder, sufficient for 6 shaves, also a tin of Oatine Cream, which is invaluable for use after shaving, also samples of OATINE TOILET SOAP, SNOW, FACE POWDER, SALVE, TOOTH POWDER, also a full-size 2d. SHAM-POO POWDER, and a 50-page Book on the Care of the Skio.

CV

THE OATINE CO., 181a, Oatine Buildings, London. S.E.

Be sure it's

VELMA

REG.

chocolate

—the result of years of study in blend and make. Side by side with Velma other chocolates taste flat. Velma is delicious, true chocolate, as true as it is fine, as fine as it is true—the greatest achievement in chocolate yet

C. In the red packet with the gold corner.
3d. 6d. 1s.

SUCHARD

Sole maker, 86 years' reputation

Built for Business

The Seal Pen is designed and made for service. It can be carried upside down or flat in the pocket without risk of leakage. It will write the instant it is brought into use. It is always ready, for the nib is in the ink whilst the pen is closed. It fills without taking apart and has a larger ink capacity than any other pen of equal size. The nib is heavy and strong.

The Seal Pen

writes right and is ink tight.

The Seal Pen is made in three sizes: The Long Seal (for the desk), The Middle Seal (for the vest pocket), The Short Seal (for the lady's handbag). In each size there are twelve styles of nib to choose from. Your exact type of nib is amongst them.

Every Pen Guaranteed for 2 Years

Your Stationer Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Sons, Wholesale and Manufacturing Stationers, Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

WARM YOUR ROOM NOT THE CHIMNEY

Everyone knows, to their cost, the tremendous amount of coal consumed by the ordinary bar grate, and how little heat is given out in proportion. The reason is that, owing to the old-fashioned construction of the bar grate, the heat is wasted in the chimney instead of warming your room. The "HUE" Fire is barless, will burn for hours without attention, and is guaranteed to give out more heat WITH ABOUT HALF THE COAL CONSUMPTION. It can be adapted to any existing stove without removing the mantelpiece, and your local Decorator can supply and fix the "HUE" Fire from 15/- upwards.

Insist upon having a "HUE."

Send a postcard to-day for our illustrated descriptive list, giving details and prices, to

YOUNG & MARTEN, Ltd.,
(Dept. E), Stratford, London, E.

A NEW POWER ARISING IN THE EAST

I.

THE startling triumphs of the Bulgarian armies recall to memory a prophetic remark which was made to me in 1906 in the course of an interview with the then Prime Minister, M. Petkoff, the peasant patriot, the little man with the mutilated hand, who was murdered shortly after my visit by a political fanatic. I had just travelled through Bulgaria, and had been intensely impressed, not only by the beauty of the scenery, but by the thriving aspect of the country. I ventured to communicate my impressions to the veteran statesman, and to say to him, by way of compliment, that the countryside of Bulgaria, with its smiling orchards and market gardens, reminded me of the prosperity of the Flemish Provinces of Belgium. The little man with the mutilated hand straightened himself in a movement of protest, and said in a tremulous voice, in which indignation was mingled with contempt: "My dear sir, if you mean this as a compliment, allow me to say that Bulgaria has a higher ambition than to be merely as prosperous and as impotent as Belgium; she wants to become the Prussia of the Balkans."

II.

Little did I know how soon this phrase of Petkoff's would become a reality, but even at that time I could read a very definite meaning in his utterance, for, coming from Belgrade to Sofia, I had been struck, as every traveller must be struck, with the startling differences between the national characteristics of the Servians and those of the Bulgarians. These differences are similar to those which divide the Prussian and the South German. Like the South German, the Servian is artistic, emotional, imaginative, impulsive. Like the Prussian, the Bulgarian is dour, matter-of-fact, silent, restrained, disciplined. He is a descendant of those wild hordes, those "Bougres" who struck terror into mediæval Europe, and the admixture of the Tartar element in his blood, the iron in his composition, has given the Bulgarian a toughness, a hardness, and staying power which is lacking in the Servian.

III.

The sudden expansion of new Bulgaria is certainly one of the miracles of recent history. We are familiar enough with the mushroom growth of American cities, but here it is not a single city, it is a whole nation which has grown up in less than a generation. Only thirty-four years ago Bulgaria was under the heel of the Turk, groaning under misgovernment; she could only be liberated by the help of Russian power. To-day the Bulgarian people are provided with all the organs of civilisation. They are highly educated, well administered. Notwithstanding a crushing military expenditure, their credit stands high, and it is morally certain that to-morrow the Bulgarian nation, reaping the fruits of victory, will become one of the decisive factors in European politics, will indeed become the "Prussia of the Balkans," thus opening a new chapter in international relations.

IV.

What are the causes of this wonderful expansion of Bulgaria? No doubt, they are primarily moral. The Bulgarians have learnt the invaluable lesson of discipline in the only school where such a lesson can be learnt—the school of experience. The ever-threatening perils of the present have kept burning the flame of an exalted patriotism. The sufferings endured during centuries of oppression have inspired the people with a stern idealism; they have made them realise the blessings of liberty. They have caused them to submit to sacrifices from which older and richer nations would have recoiled. Both the memories of the past and the aspirations of the future have made them into a nation of citizens and soldiers.

V.

But, whilst giving due prominence to the moral and military factors, we must not forget the economic and social causes of Bulgarian greatness. If Bulgaria has succeeded, it is largely because it is built on the solid foundations of a rural democracy. There does not exist a more democratic State in Europe. There is no aristocracy; there is hardly a middle class. There are only six thousand industrial workers in a population of over four millions. The Bulgarians are not only a nation of soldiers, they are in a literal sense a nation of peasants and of peasant proprietors.

And the establishment of this rural democracy has been the result of a deliberate policy. If things had been left to chance, the Bulgarian peasant proprietor would probably have disappeared, as he has disappeared in Roumania, before the encroachment of the landlord or the usurer. But in Bulgaria statesmanship has done everything in its power, first to call into being and then to maintain that rural democracy. The present Prime Minister, M. Gueshoff, explained to the writer of this article how the Bulgarian Government has systematically fostered agriculture and protected the peasant against his enemies and against his own ignorance. He explained how they got rid of the great landlords, the ichorbadgis, how the large estates, or tchifliks, were broken up; how in 1889 the Bulgarian Government adopted the Code Napoleon, which in all countries which adopted it has always resulted, and must inevitably result, in the dividing of large estates. He explained how, out of 546,804 proprietors, there are only sixty-six men owning more than two hundred and fifty acres. He explained how the Agricultural State Bank defended the peasant against the moneylender, and how the State Railways (1,200 kilometres of the railways out of 1,600 belong to the Government) ensured cheap rates and a market for the agricultural produce.

VI.

There lies the true lesson of the Bulgarian victories. To different observers, the war must necessarily convey different meanings. To some it means merely a failure of European diplomacy. To others it may mean the collapse of German military prestige. For have not the vanquished Turks been the trained pupils of Von der Goltz and German officers, and have not the victorious Bulgarians proved the superiority of the French artillery?

But to the student of politics, the victory of the Balkans means something much bigger. It means the victory of true democracy; it means a victory of peasant proprietorship. The Bulgarians have achieved military power because they had previously achieved political liberty; and they achieved political liberty at home because they had secured that economic independence which is the only foundation of political independence. Bulgarian patriotism has worked wonders because every Bulgarian peasant has a stake in the soil of his native country.

Can you spare a penny a day for four months and three days? Put it by, and then spend it all at once on a "Swan" Fountain-pen. That's our way to show you how little a "Swan" costs. Can't your imagination picture how it could then save many pennies' worth of time daily?

Once get the "Swan" habit—and it is easily acquired—and you won't go back to steel pens again.

Prices from 10/6 upwards.

SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS & JEWELLERS.

BE SURE YOU GET

THE SWAN

New Catalogue free on request.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 79 & 80, High Holborn, London, W.C.

38, Cheapside, E.C.; 95a, Regent Street, W., London; 3, Exchange Street, Manchester; 10, Rue Neuve, Brussels; Brentano's, 37, Ave. de l'Opera, Paris; and at New York, Chicago, Toronto and Sydney.

THE QUILL CLUB

PRESIDENT . . . MAX PEMBERTON.

Vice-Presidents: T. P. O'Connor, M.P., W. W. Jacobs, H. B. Marriott Watson, A. St. John Adcock, A. E. W. Mason, Hilaire Belloc, G. K. Chesterton.

LITERARY ASPIRANTS AND THOSE INTERESTED IN THE STUDY OF LITERATURE

are invited to join the Quill Club, a co-operative organisation established in 1898, and managed entirely by honorary officers elected annually. Affords London and provincial literary beginners assistance, publishing advice, criticism of manuscripts, protection against fraud, use of Club's library, etc. Monthly meetings at the Premier Hotel, Southampton Row, W.C. Subscription, ten shillings and sixpence per annum; no entrance fee.

Prospectus and full information furnished on application to the Chairman—

JUAN W. P. CHAMBERLIN, 23, Nassington Road, Hampstead, London, N.W.

(Correspondents should mention "Everyman.")

A LOOSE LEAF BINDER for 3d.

The L. E. B. Binder Clip.

Will instantly make a book of any papers, with the title on its back.

You can instantly remove any paper therefrom or add any paper thereto. It is the simplest, cheapest, and handiest filing system ever devised. With it letter-files are kept on shelves just the same as books. After the Binder Clip is applied the arms may be reversed and snapped against the documents and thus kept out of the way. When one arm is reversed against the papers the other forms a good hook or hanger.

Sample, with Catalogue of Office Specialities, 4d., post free. One dozen, 3/- post free.

Stocked by leading Stationers.

THE GEM SUPPLIES CO., Ltd. (Dept. S), 67, Southwark St., London, S.E.

A NUGGET

Boot Polishing OUTFIT

for 1/6

A "NUGGET" Outfit contains:—

- 1 Tin of "NUGGET" Polish,
- 1 Special Brush (Pure Bristles).
- 1 Polishing Pad ("Selvyt").

Of all Bootmakers and Stores, or direct from the NUGGET POLISH CO., Ltd., London, S.E., on receipt of 1/6 (or in metal case, 1/3).

A LOST MANUSCRIPT.

Quite recently a valuable manuscript was reported to have been lost in transit. The product of much strenuous mental effort could not be replaced. Yet no man need run the risk of so serious a loss, seeing that several clear copies can be made simultaneously with the original writing by means of the Oliver Typewriter, which is specially adapted for this work.

"HOW IT LOOKS IN PRINT."

Another point, writers, whether of prose or poetry, who like to see how their creations "look in print" find "Printype" peculiarly suited to their needs. The author or critic revising or reviewing a literary creation produced in Oliver "Printype" is, as it were, reading the printed page. "Printype" is the latest style of type supplied with the

OLIVER

Ask for Booklet No. 913.

OLIVER TYPEWRITER CO., Ltd.,

75, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

THE TRUSTWORTHINESS OF ANDREW LANG*

By A. BLYTH WEBSTER

I.

IF the late Samuel Butler had been persuaded to write a History of English Literature (which, I admit, is most unlikely), the result might have been curiously near Mr. Andrew Lang's vivacious seven hundred pages, "From Beowulf to Swinburne." There would have been the same wealth of unexpected allusion and irrepressible digression; the same waggish charm to so many pages; the same trick of half-hidden scholarship beneath the flippant epithet; the same incomprehensible omissions; the same disdain for leadership; the same refreshing freedom from the virtues of the specialist; the same frank suspicion of the bizarre, the esoteric, the pretentious; the same striving to rescue the subject from bigots and prigs and pedants; the same sunlit paganism, as of a happier Italian Renaissance.

II.

Butler, for an instance at random, might have written, and would have joyed to read, so cool a comment on the Meredithian profound: "The preceding sonnet to Modern Love may contain the secret; it closes thus:—

"But listen in the thought, so may there come
Conception of a newly added chord,
Commanding space beyond where ear has home,
In labour of the trouble at its fount,
Leads up to an intelligible lord
The rebel discord up the sacred Mount."

We 'listen in the thought,' but conception of a newly added chord does not readily arrive—not where ear has home, at all events, and nothing leads us to an intelligible lord, if that means an intelligible poet. Persons cultivated enough to love English poetry more obscure than an 'unseen' piece of Pindar find much matter in lines like these." Also, if Butler would have given less space and a scantier honour to the dreary Americans who bulk so largely in Lang's later sections, he would have been pleased with this analysis of the similes in The Psalm of Life: "You meet some shipwrecked brother, who, though he has piled up his bark on some reef, is still sailing o'er time's dreary main, and taking comfort in observing, through his glass, that somebody has left footprints on the sands."

III.

You may doubt how far Lang was temperamentally the man to write history at all. Certainly, when Latimer and Nicholas Breton, Peter Pindar and Hannah More, Godwin and Lord Chesterfield, Cobbett and Clough escape even mention, to make room for Ouida, Harrison Ainsworth, William Black, and Mrs. Henry Wood, there is ground for complaint. In the same way you may doubt if Butler was temperamentally the critic to discuss the authorship of the Odyssey, or make a way through the mysteries of the Shakespearean sonnets. You may, with the best will in the world, tire of Mr. Lang's interspersed and repeated little essays on Homer, Mary Queen of Scots, Joan of Arc, and Charles Wogan, just as you would probably have heard more than enough about the machinations of the late Charles Darwin from Ercwhon's author. But unless you are woefully stricken with the heresy of "impartial" criticism and "impersonal" history, you may perceive that this same tart uncovering of likes and dislikes achieves, within its limits, a style of history that may be fairly called trustworthy. Now, trustworthiness—that creation of a writer's individual responsibility—is what no amount of impartiality and impersonality need ever be expected to achieve.

* "History of English Literature." By Andrew Lang. 6s. (Longmans. 1912.)

IV.

That there has ever been such a thing as impartial history is open to doubt. That there has been, and can be, such a thing as trustworthy history may be maintained. And I am coming to think that it was written by Cobbett, by Froude, by Macaulay, by Carlyle. It is mere fallacy to say these men are unreliable through their obvious prejudices. It is simply because their prejudices are so obvious and so healthy, so little withheld from the reader, that to people not wholly ignorant or wholly stupid their histories are in the end reliable. If Andrew Lang cannot be counted among the greater combative historians, it is because he lacked their genius for sustained and effective narrative. If he can be thought of in connection with them, it is thanks to a fine set of picturesque faiths he was prepared to fight for, and because he understood the honour and chivalry of the fight.

"Impartial history," Lang writes, in a page on Froude, "is notoriously dull." But it is worse, it is monstrously misleading. If a man writes for the pleasure of praising what he loves and the fun of fighting what he hates, he can be trusted as well as appreciated. But if, like the barber in George Eliot, he starts out thanking God (or Evolution) that he will not fetter his judgment by entertaining an opinion, he will trap you on every page.

"THE LIFE OF GEORGE TYRRELL"*

I.

THE "Life of the late Father Tyrrell," the famous Modernist thinker and writer, whose convictions led at last to the severance of his connection with the Jesuit Order, has just been published by Messrs. Edward Arnold. The first volume consists of an autobiography left in MS. by Father Tyrrell, and covering the period of his life from his infancy and youth in Ireland until his mother's death, the latter event having occurred after her son had become a distinguished member of the Jesuits of the English province.

The second volume, which includes much valuable correspondence by Father Tyrrell with persons all over Europe, is compiled by the authoress, Miss M. D. Petre. Unlike de Lamennais and many other Catholic leaders of thought who have been condemned by Rome, George Tyrrell claimed to the end to be—as, by the terms of his will, he is styled on the headstone of his grave at Storrington—a "Catholic Priest."

II.

However opinions may differ as to the possibility of Catholicism undergoing such an evolution as to represent a synthesis which should include the progressive and liberal as well as the more static and traditionalist elements of religion—the combination and persistence in Tyrrell's subtle and powerful brain, as well as in his imagination and affections, of ideals, so often deemed contradictory by shallower natures, such as those involved in organic Catholicism, and in intellectual, spiritual, and social progress—is a remark-

* "The Life of George Tyrrell." By Miss Maud Petre.

(Continued on page 124.)

This slides back.

This BOOKCASE and
New Patent WRITING-DESK

FREE

With the 10-Volume
Harmsworth
Business Library

which is sent, carriage paid, on payment of a first subscription of

2/6

This Combination Bookcase and Writing-desk, made in fumed oak and beautifully finished, will be presented free to every subscriber to the Harmsworth Business Library. With this Combination Bookcase and Writing-desk and 10-Volume Business Library in a handy place in your business or home, you will quickly discover them to be great practical helps in your business.

There is not one man in the world of business but can learn how he may increase his earnings or profits from 10 to 1,000 per cent. by acquiring the business success knowledge contained in these ten volumes.

The Library contains 4,000 pages of business information and advice. It will stimulate your enthusiasm and guide it along the lines of greatest profit to you.

The greatest business men of the day have placed their wonderful profit-making knowledge at your disposal in these pages.

The HARMSWORTH BUSINESS LIBRARY occupies a prominent position in the private offices of the most successful Managing Directors of to-day. Will you let it occupy a similar position in your home or office, there to act as your guide to success in the business world—there to act as your inspiration—there to help you to solve every business problem—there to prepare you to face any business contingency with beforehand knowledge of what to do?

There is not a business subject upon which you require any information that it not dealt with in these volumes by an expert. You learn about business management, organisation, manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, salesmanship, importing, exporting, advertising, banking, financing, and commercial law in this most indispensable of all helps to business success. This business library shows you how to make more money and how to be a more rapidly progressive and a much more successful man in the business world.

Nothing can stop you being a success but your own want of knowledge of how to earn success.

Do not delay; the matter is so important to your business welfare. Sign the following Information Enquiry Coupon to-day, and by return of post you will receive an illustrated description of the Business Library in specimen pages.

Write for this information to-day. The cost to you is 2d. or 1d. for postage; but the result of your deciding to acquire the HARMSWORTH BUSINESS LIBRARY will be the direction of your energies in a straighter and shorter line towards success.

Thus by writing to-day you will secure the option of a FREE COMBINATION BOOKCASE and WRITING DESK as illustrated—a desk which will prove extremely useful to you in your home or place of business, besides always keeping the volumes of the HARMSWORTH BUSINESS LIBRARY in a definite place for instant reference at any moment.

The prominent men who, in the 10 volumes of the Harmsworth Business Library, advise you how to attain business success include:—

- | | | |
|-------------------------|--------------------------|--------------------|
| Lord Furness. | Mr. Charles Duguid. | Sir Joseph Lyons. |
| Sir T. Vezey Strong. | Mr. H. Gordon Selfridge. | Mr. Walter Martin. |
| Sir Hiram Maslin. | Professor W. J. Ashley. | Mr. R. Burbidge. |
| Sir William Flender. | Capt. H. M. Jessel, M.P. | Mr. A. W. Garbage. |
| Sir William Trehear. | Sir Thomas Lipton. | Mr. W. B. Catesby. |
| Mr. J. Morgan Richards. | Sir Thomas Dewar. | Mr. E. S. Daniels. |

There you have the Kings of British Commerce. Will you listen to them and learn their secrets? Can you afford to neglect the opportunity? The question is "How much will the Harmsworth Business Library cost you?" The question is "How much will it save you?" Please fill in the coupon and you will receive full particulars by return of post without any cost to you, and free of all obligation to order the Library.

Coupon for FREE
Bookcase and Desk

To the Educational Book Co., Ltd.,
(EM) Temple Chambers, London, E.C.

Sirs,—I should like to receive full particulars of how to obtain a FREE Combination Bookcase and Writing Desk with the Harmsworth Business Library, both to be delivered to me on first subscription of 2s. 6d.

Name.....

Address.....

Occupation.....

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM WITHIN.

By the RIGHT HON. ROBERT FARQUHARSON, P.C., M.D., LL.D. Author of "In and Out of Parliament." With a sketch of the Author (never before published) by J. S. SARGENT, R.A. Medium 8vo. Cloth, 7 6 net. [READY.]

WITHIN: Thoughts During Convalescence.

By Sir FRANCIS E. YOUNGHUSBAND, K.C.I.E., LL.D. Square Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5 6 net. [READY.]
"A most remarkable human document, a book of great beauty, and the revelation of a mind tender, strong and spiritual—the man of action as a teacher of men."—Public Opinion.

THE LATTER DAY SAINTS.

A Study of the Mormons in the Light of Economic Conditions. By RUTH KAUFFMAN and REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN. Medium 8vo. Cloth, 10 6 net. [READY.]

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

By FRANCESCO RUFFINI, Rector of the University of Turin. Translated with a special introductory chapter for English Readers by Prof. J. B. Bury, of Cambridge. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 12 6 net. [READY.]

AN INTERPRETATION OF RUDOLF EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY.

By the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D. (Jena). Translator of Professor Eucken's greatest work, "The Truth of Religion." Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5- net. [NEARLY READY.]

INITIATION INTO PHILOSOPHY.

By EMILE FAGUET of the Freech Academy. Translated by Sir HOME GORDON, Bart. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 2 6 net. [READY.]

THE LOST LANGUAGE OF SYMBOLISM.

An Inquiry into the Origin of certain Letters, Words, Names, Fairy Tales, Myths and Theologies. By HAROLD BAYLEY. Author of "A New Light on the Renaissance," etc. With about 1,400 Facsimiles. Two Volumes. Medium 8vo. 25- net. [NEARLY READY.]

THE MINERAL KINGDOM.

By Dr. REINHARD BRAUNS, Professor of Mineralogy in the University of Bonn. Translated by C. J. SPENCER, M.A., F.G.S. Demy 4to. With 275 figures in the text, and 91 full-page plates, of which 73 are chromo-lithographs, and 18 from half-tone blocks. Beautifully bound in Half Morocco. £2 16s. net. [READY SHORTLY.]

NERVATION OF PLANTS.

By FRANCIS G. HEATH. Author of "Our Woodland Trees," "The Fern World," etc. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 3 6 net. [READY.]

Standard Works by Herbert Spencer

Library Editions, bound in Red Cloth, Gilt,

A SYSTEM of SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY.	2 vols. (Revised and Enlarged)...	36/-
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY.	2 vols.	36/-
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY.	Vol. I.	21/-
	Ditto Vol. II.	18/-
	Ditto Vol. III.	16/-
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS.	Vol. I.	15/-
	Ditto Vol. II.	12 6
JUSTICE (Separately)	6/-

OTHER WORKS.

THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY	10 6
ESSAYS.	3 vols.	30/-, or each vol. 10/-
FACTS AND COMMENTS	6/-
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS.	Enlarged Edition	6/-
SOCIAL STATICS and MAN v. STATE	10/-
MAN v. STATE (Separately)	1/-
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM.	Third Edition, with Additions	3d.

CHEAP COPYRIGHT EDITIONS.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. Finally revised edition. Cloth, 2 vols, 1/- net per vol.; or in 1 vol., 2- net.

EDUCATION: INTELLECTUAL, MORAL, AND PHYSICAL. With all the author's corrections made about a year before his decease. In cloth, 1- net.

DATA OF ETHICS. Reset, uniform with popular edition of "FIRST PRINCIPLES." Cloth, 3/- net.

LONDON: 14, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, W.C.

"THE LIFE OF GEORGE TYRRELL"

(continued)

able phenomenon, and probably one more intelligible in the present than in any previous age.

It is interesting to note that Father Tyrrell was an Irishman, born in Dorset, Dublin, of a family of gentlefolk in very poor circumstances. His parents and brother were persons of high intellectual capacity and literary gifts. His father was a journalist, his brother (long ago deceased) was one of the most distinguished Greek scholars ever produced by Dublin University.

III.

George Tyrrell was the close friend of another Irishman, noted in a very different department of religious activity, the Anglo-Catholic—Father Dolling, the well-known Mission priest.

The warm sympathies of both were with progressive Democracy, although Father Tyrrell did not come into the same close practical connection with the problems of poverty and labour that his friend Dolling did in the slums of Portsmouth. But, like the latter, the illustrious ex-Jesuit must be counted among the sympathisers with Irish Nationalism and Home Rule.

Baron von Hügel, the most learned of Tyrrell's host of friends, has described the latter as having a "German brain and an Irish heart." Few men so profoundly philosophical in cast of mind have had affections so deep and hearts so warm.

MR WELLS ON MARRIAGE.*

"I'm a spiritual guttersnipe in love with unimaginable goddesses," said that child of the age, George Pondero, in "Tono Bungay." That is the answer to those who, touching life with the coarseness of the sentimentalist, cry out that this is the age of materialism, and that men are turning from things of the spirit. The moral unrest of the day is the result of the conviction of modern men and women that, tested by some mystic, absolute standard outside themselves, life is not fine enough. "Marriage," Mr. Wells' last book, represents this spiritual dissatisfaction brooding over the dinginess that has come between us and the reality of Love. With the exception of the more brutal ascetics, people have always realised the value of love. To avoid its profanation they adopted the rough-and-ready test of marriage; outside the circle of the wedding-ring all relationships were evil, within it all were sacred. It was a good working hypothesis. But now, when we have developed a more determined thirst for beauty, it seems too brutal and mechanical a law. It is not only because it falls so heavily on so many delicate flowers of the spirit that men such as Mr. Wells rebel against it, though of that aspect he spoke in "The New Machiavelli." It is also the licence, which is the necessary corollary of law, which disgusts him. With a sharp sense of the values of life, he cannot bear the artificial sanction given to gross, destructive, mutual raids on personality which often form marriages.

The blame for the ignobility of marriage he places primarily on the modern woman. He finds her guilty, first of all, of a carelessness of destiny, even as regards her motherhood. As old Sir Rodrick Dover says: "If there was one thing in which you might think woman would show a sense of some divine purpose in life it is in the matter of children, and they show about as much care in the matter—oh, as rabbits! Yes, rabbits. I stick to it. Look at the things a nice girl will marry; look at the men's children she'll consent to bring into the world. Cheerfully! Proudly! For the sake of the home and the clothes. . . ." That was the crime Marjorie Pope was about to commit when the book opens. She was a creature compact of galantry and sweetness, with a vigorous, beautiful body, and a quick mind stimulated by University discipline. Yet, simply because she was afflicted with an intolerable father, who could not be allowed to carve the chicken because he "splashed too much and bones upset him and made him want to show up chicken in the Times"; and because she had got into debt at Oxbridge, she was on the verge of marriage with Will Magnet, the humorist, "a fairish man of forty, pale, with a large, protuberant, observant grey eye—I speak particularly of the left—and a face of quiet animation, warily alert for the wit's opportunity."

* "Marriage." By H. G. Wells. 6s. (Macmillan.)

MR. WELLS ON MARRIAGE (continued)

Then Professor Trafford appears, and his coming is symbolic of the promise of beauty and dignity he brings to Marjorie's life. While she is playing croquet to an obligato of facetiousness from Mr. Magnet, Trafford plunges down from the skies in an aeroplane. Overcome by the clear magic of this man, who has taken great risks, who is disciplined by mental work to athleticism of character, she elopes with him.

At first sight it seems like a fine sacrifice of this girl, with her warm, purring love of ease, to marry the scientist whose long-inspired days in the laboratory brought him only a few hundreds a year. But Marjorie was one of those who make the best of both worlds. By her quiet, graceful pursuit of her own tastes, she robbed from him all peace that made his brain smooth and quick to work; then she drove him into breaking up his laborious day by desperate money-making excursions into lecturing and journalism; and finally she took him from his work altogether, and turned him into a busy commercial prostitute, perverting his splendid, fearless research to a reticent and hidden investigation of synthetic rubber for a Jewish syndicate. For she sucked him dry of money. She begins by furnishing her house too richly, and goes on to lead him into preposterous social obligations. She uses the love that brought them together as a barrier behind which to level this relentless attack on his genius. She dangles her babies at him and preens herself on the majesty of her motherhood to avert discussion. And though she knows that her latter prosperity has been bought by the joy of his life, she does not relent.

In the end he rebels, and takes her away from this "busy death" in London to the quiet snows of Labrador, to think out the hopeless riddle of their irritating existence. He finds the secret of the shabby haste of the modern world in the victory of the grabbing spirit over the spirit of pure research into life. And he attributes—as did that vulgar and vital genius of America, David Graham Phillips—the unseemly scramble of latter-day human activity to the efforts of men to satisfy the spendthrift passion of women. It seems to him typical that Marjorie should have killed his passion for the remoter beauty for truth by her thirst for the trivial immediate beauty of a well-ordered house. And her triumph was so petty: it was like the work of the Yellow Book School, who sacrificed the difficult beauty of issues of the soul to the trivial loneliness of phrases and episodes.

The Traffords' marriage was what that Chatterton of philosophy, young Otto Weininger, said the relationship of men and women in the world must always be, "the binding of eternal life in a perishable being, of the innocent in the guilty." REBECCA WEST.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Boswell, the Biographer

By GEORGE MALLORY.

With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 6s. net.

A Home Help in Canada

By ELLA C. SYKES, Author of "Through Persia on a Side Saddle."

Daily Mirror:—"With its vivid descriptions of actual life, its observation, from personal experience, of the inner conditions of labour in domestic service in Canada, Miss Sykes' book becomes a valuable document."

With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Scenes and Memories

By WALBURGA, LADY PAGET

Pall Mall Gazette:—"Pleasant, vivid, varied memories, they make a delightful book. Lady Paget makes them all live again by the sparkle and humour and faithfulness of her descriptions."

With a Frontispiece. Small Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sixty Years in the Wilderness:

More Passages by the Way

By Sir HENRY LUCY (Toby, M.P., of "Punch"), Author of "A Diary of Two Parliaments," etc.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

When Every Tree was Green

By G. F. BRADBY, Author of "Dick," "The Awakening of Bittlesham," etc.

With a Map. Small Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

The Conquest of New Granada

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., Author of "The Incas of Peru," "The Story of Majorca and Minorca," etc.

With 40 pages of Illustrations and a Map. Small Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Dawn in Darkest Africa

By the Rev. JOHN H. HARRIS, Organising Secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the EARL OF CROMER, O.M., P.C., G.C.B.

ON NOV. 14TH.

With Coloured and other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Dogs and Their Masters

By MARION CHAPPELL.

. An anthology which draws on prose as well as poetry.

ON NOV. 14TH.

With Illustrations from Photographs by the Author, and a Map. Small Royal 8vo, 9s. net.

The Land that is Desolate:

An Account of a Tour in Palestine

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., etc., Serjeant-Surgeon to H.M. the King, Author of "The Cradle of the Deep," etc.

ON NOV. 19.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

On the Track of the Abor

By POWELL MILLINGTON, Author of "To Lhasa at Last," etc.

ON NOV. 21.

Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

God's Playthings

By MARJORIE BOWEN, Author of "The Viper of Milan," "Black Magic," etc.

NEW 6s. FICTION.

Honey, My Honey

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Erica

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE (Lady Clifford).

The Grip of Life

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Chess for a Stake

By HAROLD VALLINGS.

Promise of Arden

By ERIC PARKER.

Seven Scots Stories

By JANE FINDLATER. With 5 Illustrations in Colour.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

NOW READY.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS
AND SOCIAL PROGRESS.By the Rev. J. Wilson Harper, D.D.
Large Crown 8vo, 5/- net.

This is a book for the times. No volume with the same wide range of Christianity and philosophy has yet appeared within the limits of this book. The chapter on Bergson is, in itself, invaluable.

ARRESTED FUGITIVES.By Sir Edward Russell, With Portrait. 6/- net.

"This delightful volume. . . Readers of this eloquent and thoughtful collection of essays will return often to Sir Edward's pages."—Daily Chronicle.

CHANGING CHINA.By the Rev. Lord William Cecil. Illustrated.
Cheap Edition. Price 3/6 net. (5th Impression.)

"A brilliant and fascinating volume."—Standard.

THE ADVENTURE OF LIFE.By W. T. Grenfell, M.D., C.M.G. With Portrait.
Large crown 8vo. 3/6 net.

"His lectures reveal an intensely earnest, practical, and 'live' personality, and their direct and simple sincerity will ensure them interested and admiring readers."—Glasgow Herald.

Ready November 15th.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY.By the Very Rev. Henry Wace, D.D. (Dean of Canterbury).
With Portrait. Demy 8vo, 6/- net.

Second Impression in the Press.

CONCERNING BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.By Ian Maclaren, With Portrait. 1/- net.

JAMES NISBET & CO., Ltd., 22, BERNERS STREET, LONDON, W.

The English Review 1/-
NOVEMBER, 1912MARVELLOUS INSECT STORIESBy HENRI FABRE (The Insect's Homer)

THE ENGLISH REVIEW have acquired the exclusive right of publishing a series of these wonderful stories, the first of which, "The Weaving Spider," will appear in the NOVEMBER number of THE ENGLISH REVIEW.

Other Contents as follows:

LITERARY

A BELLY GOD	R. B. Cunninghame Graham
ENGLISH SEA TERMS	L. Pearsall Smith
THE TRAGEDY OF A SPIRIT	G. Villiers Stuart
AUGUST STRINDBERG	Aust'n Harrison

POETRY

Richard Middleton	T. Sturge Moore	Geoffrey Cookson
	Ernest Rhys

CRITICISM

MALTHUS & THE PUBLISHING TRADE	P. P. Howe
MR. LLOYD GEORGE & THE COUNTRY	L. M. Phillips
HIGHER EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND	S. M. Murray
PLAY AND BOOKS OF THE MONTH

ANOTHER BANNED PLAY

EDGE O' DARK Gwen John

THE ENGLISH REVIEW,
17-21, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C."THE LEE SHORE"

A "£1,000 PRIZE NOVEL"

"THE LEE SHORE" is glaringly advertised on a slip-cover as the novel "with which Rose Macaulay won the First Prize in Hodder and Stoughton's Prize Novel Competition of £1,000." Consequently those who read it will take it up with either an initial prejudice against it or a preliminary bias in its favour. Both types of reader will probably be disappointed, the sceptical agreeably, the sanguine disagreeably. "The Lee Shore" is undoubtedly a clever work, but it is questionable whether its cleverness is such as will be fully appreciated by those on whom a "£1,000 Prize Novel Competition" in titanic type makes a correspondingly big impression. There is nothing cheap and showy inside the covers of "The Lee Shore." It is clear that the book was not written specially for a competition; and that is no doubt one reason why discriminating judges have awarded it the prize.

Wherein do its merits lie? "The Lee Shore" is not what you would call a "powerful" story. Nor can it be described as essentially an intellectual novel. Its style is good, but not exceptionally so. Its craftsmanship is not beyond reproach. Its philosophy of life is fascinating, but not compellingly true. It shows taste, a well-developed artistic sense, a love of Nature—but it isn't that. The real secret of its success is that the novel centres round a character whom everyone must love, a character drawn with a delicacy and sympathy of touch that is irresistible.

Peter Margerison is his name, and he is a hero. Not a Victoria Cross hero, nor one of your footlight heroes, but a real human hero, whose heroism is the thing not of a day, but of a lifetime. Peter reminds one, more than anyone else, of Charles Lamb; he has Lamb's gentleness, Lamb's humour, Lamb's unworldliness, and, above all, Lamb's wonderful lasting power of self-sacrifice.

"Margery," as his friends inevitably dub him, loves all beautiful things—works of Nature and works of Art. From boyhood upwards he has the deepest admiration and affection for Dennis Urquhart, a rich, handsome, amiable youth. Peter is not good-looking, nor is he rich; and the keynote of the novel is the quotation: "That division, the division of those who have and those who have not, runs so deep as almost to run to the bottom." To Dennis, who has, is given much (Lucy Hope, Peter's cousin and twin-soul, included) that ought to have gone to Peter; while from Peter is taken away even that which he had. From start to finish, Peter keeps on giving up to others, sacrificing himself to his friends—and everybody is his friend—with a simplicity, a sweetness, a cheerfulness that is beyond all praise.

For a moment, towards the end, it seems as if the novelist is about to drop Peter into the lap of Luxury and Success, which he himself is constitutionally incapable of scaling; but the "Lee Shore," which, according to Rose Macaulay, awaits poor battered mortals like Peter Margerison, is not the Land of Heart's Desire, but the glorious Open Road—a land where "there is no grabbing; a man may share the overflowing sun, not with one, but with all. The down-at-heels, limping, broken army of the Have-Nots are not denied such beauty and such peace as this, if they will but take it, and be glad. The lust to possess here finds no fulfilment; having nothing, yet possessing all things, the empty-handed legion laughs along its way. The last, the gayest, the most hilarious laughter begins when, destitute utterly, the wrecked pick up coloured shells upon the lee shore."

CORRESPONDENCE

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—As one who has withdrawn from the Church's fold, permit me a reply to Mr. Campbell's article on "The Future of the Churches."

Too often this discussion is maintained between the supporters and opponents of religion or faith. Too seldom do we hear the point of view of those (and they must now be many) who, while acknowledging the eternal and spiritual in life, feel that the necessity of its organised expression is now passing away.

Mr. Campbell would have carried greater conviction had he not so confused religion with its organised expression. He commences by speaking of "organised religion as represented by the Christian Churches"; he finishes by identifying the Church with that communion which throughout all time has testified of the soul and its relations in time and eternity. Now that spirit may belong to every or to no denomination. Like the wind, it bloweth as it listeth. Or, to make the metaphor more perfect, like the wind, it obeys laws which are beyond man's laws.

Therefore, when he turns round in a spirit of optimism, and says that "the Church of Christ has a marvellous way of righting itself," he leaves us in some doubt whether he means merely the organised body or the living witness to the truths which Christ taught.

But many of us are in no doubt whatever. We do not believe in "the Churches," but in the Church, and not in the Church as distinct from the State, but in the Church as the spiritual aspect of the State. We believe in the City of the future, the New Jerusalem, in which "there shall be no Temple, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb dwell there." Or, in the words of another, and a more modern seer: "In my dreams it is a country where the State is the Church, and the Church is the people; three in one, and one in three."

We believe at the present day the form of organised Christianity has served its purpose, and is a source of division, and not of union. We think that a state which is animated by Christian ideals has no need of another organised body to keep it up to the mark. It dissipates power. It absorbs the wealth and energy of men, who might be doing useful service in perfecting national and municipal life. It performs a round of duties of supposed special sanctity which compete with claims of more fundamental urgency.

But is there no danger that, apart from a combined witness to the things eternal, things transitory and mundane will prove irresistible? Will not people desire some outward expression of their faith, some communion for devotion and worship? That is just what no organised Church can secure. People do not cease to be less mundane because they sing Hebrew psalms and medieval chants. They only become archaic—they are obsessed by old thought forms. He only has the spirit of the eternal who can bring the spirit of the past into the forms of the present. The pulpit and the so-called "service" are becoming obsolete, and those who see the modern trend, the purpose of man's evolution, will assist, and not hinder, the change. They will bring the dignity and beauty of worship into their work. They will cease to maintain an arbitrary division into sacred and secular. Whatever common meetings they may hold, we may be sure that they will not be organised expressions of a fixed ritual, or a series of regular addresses by a specially trained caste. Whoever has a message will

"IT KEEPS ALERT A TIRED WORLD."

People read PUBLIC OPINION to-day because it is supremely interesting. As readers are constantly saying, it is readable from beginning to end.

"It keeps a tired world alert," says Mr. J. L. Garvin, the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette."

It conveys, in the most handy form, something of life's variety, vivacity, and eternal interest. It is a weekly cinematograph of what people are Doing, Saying, and Thinking. It gives a rapid survey of the events of the week.

PUBLIC OPINION (2d.) has increased its circulation four times in the last four years. It has just begun its 52nd year, and will give 52 of the best numbers ever issued.

FOR BUSY PEOPLE THERE IS NO OTHER PAPER WHICH SO EASILY HELPS THEM TO KEEP IN TOUCH WITH ALL THOSE THINGS WHICH INTEREST INTELLIGENT PEOPLE AS

PUBLIC OPINION

It is a unique paper presenting the cream of all the best thought in the best Papers, Magazines, and Books on All Questions of the Day.

It is interested in Social Problems, in Religion, in Politics, in Science, in Literature, in all Arts and Crafts. It is just the paper for those who, like Trafford in Mr. H. G. Wells' new story, "want to get into touch with men who are thinking—into the souls of their books."

PUBLIC OPINION is non-party, and seeks only reliable facts and information. It is a great acquisition to any house, as it covers so wide a field and interests everyone, for it is interested in everything. It is a Newspaper Room, a weekly Library of New Books, and always a cheerful and well-informed companion. It goes all over the world, and makes an ideal present.

The information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of much money, much time, and much labour. Buy it, and you will save what PUBLIC OPINION spends.

GET THIS WEEK'S ISSUE.

PUBLIC OPINION can be had at all Newsagents' and Bookstalls at 2d., or this week's special issue will be sent on receipt of 2½d. It can be sent for one year in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; abroad, 13s., post free.

Address Manager:—PUBLIC OPINION, 32 & 33, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of what people Say, Do and Think.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

find an outlet. But the professional exponent of spirituality, and the organised "Church," will no longer be required.—I am, sir, etc.,
 CHAS. E. SMITH,
 Cobden Chambers, Birmingham.

HOW TO SAVE THE CLASSICS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—You cannot save a dead language by attempting to teach it, as though it were a living one, through the medium of speech. This is not the natural method, surely. Nor is Greek or Latin "so direct and simple" as Mr. Rouse would have us believe. Materialism is a shibboleth that is invariably used by those who urge the retention of the classics. The classics, surely, have not the monopoly of culture. A very large percentage of the boys who have spent the best part of their lives over Greek have wasted their time on the language and scarcely entered the broad field of literature. Scarcely one man in ten of those who have taken an Honours degree at Oxford or Cambridge read Greek for pleasure in after life, schoolmasters excepted. Then we must recognise that these languages are beyond the capacity of the average schoolboy. The study of the mother tongue has for him a far greater culture value than the study of any foreign language. The æsthetic training to be given through the medium of our literature is a more potent antidote against the present materialism than the study of the classics.

What Mr. Benson says is, of course, far truer of the Public School than of the ordinary Secondary School. The aristocratic institutions lag behind the times longer than the democratic schools. When the large public schools are subjected to the same criticism and inspection as the ordinary secondary school, then, and not till then, will there be any advance.—I am, sir, etc.,
 43, Oakfield Road, A. S. ROBERTS.
 Southgate, London, N.

"THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If you can still find space for any further correspondence on this subject, I should much like to supplement the admirable letters of this week's issue from the point of view of a private person whose knowledge of German has been acquired without reference to scholastic or commercial requirements, which in my case did not exist.

The love of scholarship and literature which led me to make the nearer acquaintance of the German tongue was implanted in me solely by the studies of my youth in the Greek and Latin classics. My experience, moreover, coincides exactly with that of "Hinterschlag." At school, and at the University, the best, or perhaps the only, English students of German whom I met were classical men. And when the question is discussed from the point of view of general culture, love of learning, or of literature, we could surely hardly expect that we should find anything else. The man whose intellectual life has been nurtured on the highest and noblest thoughts of the ancients is the most likely person to love and appreciate the great German masters of a more recent day.

It seems a poor and short-sighted policy, in the supposed interests of the scholarly study of modern languages, to sow dissension between those who have every reason to feel themselves natural allies.—I am, sir, etc.,
 VERBORGEN.

London, October 26th, 1912.

THE REFUGEES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The slashing attack made on Sir A. Conan Doyle's novel, "The Refugees," by your anonymous contributor raises a point of great literary interest and dispute, discussion of which might merit a little space in your columns. This question, put briefly, is: In what relation does the historical novelist stand to the history on which he bases his story, and in what measure is he justified in departing from the accurate course of events as investigated and proved by the historian and antiquarian? Sir Philip Sidney, in his eloquently poetical and "ever praise-worthie" "Defence of Poetry," makes a point in this connection: the poet, he says, never lies, because he never pretends to give an account of the truth (in dealing with incidents, of course, for the remark would not apply where the poet is dealing with ultimate realities); and Sidney was not thinking of verse-writers only when he wrote "poets." We do not go to the Waverley Novels, to Dumas, to G. P. R. James, Ainsworth, Lytton, or Reade, if we desire to study the history of any particular period in the spirit of the historian, whose search is ever after the truth: for that purpose there are text-books in plenty. A novel, as much as an epic or a drama, is a work of the imagination, which will not be bounded by the limits of actuality; and if the novelist finds that a re-arrangement of circumstances satisfies his artistic sense more completely than the historical facts, I hold that he is justified in making that re-arrangement. If space permitted, I could produce a long list of inaccuracies in Scott, the so-called "father" of the historical novel, apart from the general kind exposed and condemned by Froude in his remarks on "Ivanhoe"; yet who comes away from a "Waverley" novel in the spirit which "The Refugees" has aroused in your contributor? I admit that there is some excuse for a learned reader becoming irritated when he comes upon anachronism after anachronism, and his sense of accuracy is buffeted at every turn. But let him reflect, and cease from attacking a writer for not doing something he never set out to do. How many readers of "The Refugees" know that Corneille died in 1684, or that Massillon and Fenelon had not emerged into publicity in 1685? If readers went to novels to learn history we might make it a capital crime to write or publish a book like "The Refugees"; but, fortunately, they don't, and never will, as long as one can discriminate between two kinds of literature.—I am, sir, etc.,

THOMAS HUFFINGTON.

Leeds, October 26th, 1912.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Anonymous. "Turkey and the Turks."
 " " "The Triuniverse." (Knight, 5s.)
 Bacon, B. W. "The Making of the New Testament." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Bahr, A. and H. "Bayreuth." (Fisher Unwin.)
 Ballantyne, R. M. "Deep Down." (Blackie, 1s.)
 " " "The Lighthouse." (Blackie, 1s.)
 " " "The Lighthouse." (Blackie, 2s.)
 Barnes, Earl. "Woman in Modern Society." (Huebisch, $1.25.)
 Begbie, Harold. "The Distant Lamp." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Belloc, H. "Warfare in England." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 " " "This and That." (Methuen, 5s.)
 Bennett, Arnold. "How to Live on Twenty-four Hours A Day." (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s.)
 Bennett, G. R. "Boys of the Border." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Benson, A. C. "Thy Rod and Staff." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)
 " " "The Leaves of the Tree." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

(Continued on page 130.)

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the
PLEX DUPLICATOR.
 Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof, complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
 Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

WHO SAID THE STUDY OF GERMAN WAS DECLINING ?

Write to: THE SECRETARY, Eversley Language Institute, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C., for particulars of CORRESPONDENCE COURSES IN GERMAN & NINE OTHER LANGUAGES.

REMAINDERS. BOOKS AT BARGAIN PRICES.
 Send a card for GLAISHER'S General Catalogue No. 389, 160 pages of Publishers' Reminders, which contains Books in all departments of Literature offered at REMARKABLY LOW PRICES.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

THE INFORMATION and AGENCY BUREAU.—Established to procure INFORMATION on literary, social and other subjects, and to carry out EXECUTIVE AGENCY work. Researches at the British Museum, Somerset House and elsewhere. Reasonable charges. Apply for PROSPECTUS to THE SECRETARIAT, 26, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 169, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported, METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

AUTHORS' INCOMES TREBLED by placing their work through the Cambridge Literary Agency, who obtain the HIGHEST PRICES. 16 pp. Prospectus free.—115, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision from 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper included.—THE NATIONAL TYPE-WRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

A SET OF SCOTT FOR EVERY MAN.—The Waverley Novels. New Century Edition. Complete in 24 vols. Neatly bound in cloth, 50/- net, for 26/-, carriage paid, from W. & R. Holmes, Central Book Shop, 3 and 5, Dunlop Street, Glasgow.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Accuracy and dispatch. Miss E. RISDON SREDINA, 28, Alexandra Road, Kingston Hill, Surrey.

A GREAT BIOGRAPHY OF A GREAT MAN.—The Life of Principal Rainy. By Patrick Carnegie Simpson, D.D. Published at 7/6, for 3/10 post free, from W. & R. Holmes, Central Book Shop, 3 and 5, Dunlop Street, Glasgow.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY, 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	1/3 Page	1/4 Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3 1/2 inches wide), 2s. Depth of Page, 10 1/2 inches.

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS, 1s. per line (Minimum 3s.)
 Orders for Advertisements are subject to approval and to the space being available. The Proprietors also reserve the right to omit any advertisement at any time, and they decline responsibility in the event of any advertisement being omitted from any cause whatever.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
 Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

LIBERAL THEOLOGY.

- Crown 8vo, 150 pp., 2s. net.
THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS. By Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.
- Crown 8vo, 176 pp., 2s. net.
THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle.
- Crown 8vo, 200 pp., 2s. net.
PAUL: Study of His Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.
- Crown 8vo, 141 pp., 2s. net.
THE APOSTOLIC AGE. By Prof. E. von DOBSCHUTZ, of Strasburg.
- Crown 8vo, 163 pp., 2s. net.
CHRIST: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg.
- Crown 8vo, 231 pp., 3s. 6d. net.
THE HISTORICAL JESUS AND THE THEOLOGICAL CHRIST. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.D.
- Crown 8vo, 76 pp., 1s. 6d. net.
WHOSE SON IS CHRIST?
 Two Lectures on Progress in Religion.
 By Prof. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH.
- LINDSEY PRESS, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

The Westminster Gazette

is an evening paper that is not bought casually. After the first introduction of the reader to its columns it is read regularly because of its accurate treatment of the news of the day, its informative articles on political and social events, its Parliamentary reports, "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons, and its leading article. Its outlook on public affairs is sane and reasoned, and provides a reliable guide on all questions of the day.

Subscribe now to the ONLY PENNY LIBERAL PAPER IN LONDON.

The Saturday Westminster

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER has all the interest and charm of a magazine and the information of a review. It is a unique weekly paper for thinking men and women.

The week's political and social events are dealt with in special articles and notes, while all "F.C.G.'s" cartoons of the week are included, in addition to one specially drawn for the issue. The literature of the day is ably reviewed, while special and general articles, short stories, and sketches from the pens of some of the best writers of the day, form regular features.

The literary minded will find exercise and recreation in the page of literary problems, while the Photographer, the Naturalist, the Sportsman, and the lady reader will find items and articles of personal interest.

PRICE ONE PENNY

Of Newsagents and Bookstalls. By post, 6/6 (United Kingdom), and 8/8 (Abroad), for 12 months.

Offices: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

W. H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY

Send for NOVEMBER ISSUE of the

CLEARANCE CATALOGUE

10,000 BOOKS IN ALL BRANCHES OF GENERAL LITERATURE AT EXCEPTIONAL REDUCTIONS.

IRELAND and THE IRISH QUESTION, TURKEY and THE BALKAN STATES, and many others of particular interest.

186, STRAND, LONDON; and Branches.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED (continued)

- Bligh, S. M. "The Ability to Converse." (Froude, 2s.)
 Bourne, G. "Change in the Village." (Duckworth, 5s.)
 Boigne, Comtesse de. "Recollections of a Great Lady." (Heinemann, 10s.)
 Bradley, J. F. "Nonconformists and the Welsh Church Bill." (Putnam, 1s.)
 Breton, F. S. "Foes of the Red Cockade." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Brooks, S. "Aspects of the Irish Question." (Maunsel.)
 Bryce, Alex. "Dietetics." (Jack, 6s.)
 Burke, "Reflections on the French Revolution." (Cambridge University Press, 4s.)
 Bickley, F. "J. M. Synge." (Constable.)
 Birrell, A. "Men, Women, and Books." (Duckworth, 5s.)
 Carter, T. "Shakespeare's English Kings." (Harrap, 5s.)
 Chambers, Robert. "Traditions of Edinburgh." (Chambers.)
 "Chambers's Biographical Dictionary." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Chesterton, G. K. "What's Wrong with the World." (Cassell, 1s.)
 Chesterton, G. K. "A Miscellany of Men." (Netmen, 5s.)
 "Children's Annual." (Blackie, 5s.)
 Cooke, E. A. "500 New Words." (Gay and Hancock.)
 Collingwood, H. "Two Gallant Sons of Devon." (Blackie, 5s.)
 Cockburn, Lord. "Memories of His Time." (T. N. Foulis.)
 Corder, F. "Beethoven." (Jack, 1s. 6d.)
 Corkran, Alice. "The Romance of Woman's Influence." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Crockett, S. R. "Sweethearts at Home." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Cowan, Sir F. "Mozart." (Jack, 1s. 6d.)
 Davis, F. H. "Myths and Legends of Japan." (Harrap, 7s. 6d.)
 Duncan, F. M. "The Seashore." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
 Ellis, H. "The Task of Social Hygiene." (Constable, 8s. 6d.)
 Ellis, B. "The King's Blue Riband." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Faguet, E. "Initiation into Philosophy." (Williams and Norgate, 2s. 6d.)
 Flitch, J. E. C. "The National Gallery." (Grant Richards, 2s.)
 Fossard, A. R. "Wit and Wisdom from Dickens." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Frazer, J. G. "Letters of W. Cowper." Two vols. (Macmillan.)
 Gate, Ethel M. "The Broom Fairies." (Fifield, 1s. 6d.)
 German Crown Prince. "From My Hunting Day-Book." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)
 Graham, R. B. "Success." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
 Green, F. E. "The Awakening of England." (Nelson, 2s.)
 Griffiths, W. E. "Belgium, the Land of Art." (Constable, 5s.)
 Hall, Cyril. "Conquests of Engineering." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Hall, Edgar V. "The Romance of Wills and Testaments." (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)
 Harrison, F. "Among my Books." (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.)
 Haynes, E. S. P. "Divorce Problems of To-Day." (W. Heffer and Sons.)
 Heath, F. G. "Numeration of Plants." (Williams and Norgate, 3s. 6d.)
 Heath, S. "Exeter." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Henty, G. A. "At Agincourt." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Hermann, E. "Eucken and Bergson." (James Clarke and Co., 2s. 6d.)
 Horton, R. F. "Great Issues." (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.)
 Holmes, T. "London's Underworld." (Dent, 7s. 6d.)
 Hudson, W. H. "The Story of the Renaissance." (Cassell, 5s.)
 Hutchinson, H. G. "The New Book of Golf." (Longmans, Green, 6s.)
 Irwin, S. T. "Clifton School Addresses." (Macmillan.)
 "Jack and Jill." (Blackie, 6d.)
 Jerrold, W. "Hampton Court." (Blackie, 2s.)
 "John Gilpin." (Blackie, 6d.)
 Kettle, T. M. "The Day's Burden." (Maunsel and Co.)
 Kingsley, C. "The Water Babies." (Chapman and Hall, 3s. 6d.)
 Ker, D. "Under the Flag of France." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Lang, Andrew. "Short History of Scotland." (Blackwood, 5s.)
 Lang, Andrew. "History of English Literature." (Longmans, Green, 6s.)
 Lang, Elsie M. "Old English Towns." (Lawrie, 6s.)
 Lecky, W. E. H. "Clerical Influences." (Maunsel and Co.)
 Lecky, W. E. H. "Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland." Two vols. (Longmans, Green, 5s.)
 Leighton, G. "The Greatest Life." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
 " " "Embryology." (Jack, 6s.)
 Lewis, A. D. "Syndicalism and the General Strike." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Lodge, Sir O. "Modern Problems." (Methuen, 5s.)
 " " "Man and the Universe." (Methuen, 1s.)
 Lucas, E. V. "A Little of Everything." (Methuen.)
 " " "A Wanderer in Florence." (Methuen, 6s.)
 Mackail, J. W. "The Life of William Morris." Two vols. (Longmans, Green, 4s.)
 Macdonald, G. "Trystie's Quest." (Fifield, 5s.)
 MacLagan, B. "The Mistress of Kingdoms." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 MacKirdy, Mrs. A. "The White Slave Market." (Stanley Paul, 5s.)
 Mansfield, Katherine. "In a German Pension." (Stephen Swift.)
 Marson, C. J. "Plato's Apology and Crito." (Melrose, 3s. 6d.)
 Marchant, B. "The Youngest Sister." (Blackie, 5s.)
 O'Neill, E. "A Nursery History of England." (Jack, 5s.)
 Parkman, F. "The Conspiracy of Pontiac." Two vols. (Macmillan, 6s.)
 Parkman, F. "The Jesuits in N. America." (Macmillan, 6s.)
 Parkman, F. "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV." (Macmillan, 6s.)
 Paul, H. "Queen Anne." (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d.)
 Perry, F. T. "Science and Christianity." (2s.)
 Phillimore, J. S. "Philostratus Apollonius of Tyana." Two vols. (Clarendon Press, 7s.)
 Pope, Jessie. "Babes and Beasts." (Blackie, 2s.)
 " " "How England Grew Up." (Grant Richards.)
 " " "Three Jolly Huntsmen." (Blackie, 2s.)
 Ponsonby, A. "The Decline of Aristocracy." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Pound, Ezra. "Ripostes." (Swift, 2s. 6d.)
 Raybould, W. "London Bells." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Reade, A. Arthur. "The Tragedy of the Streets." (A. Arthur Reade, Wilmslow, Manchester, 5s.)
 Richards, E. E. "The Louvre." (Grant Richards, 2s.)
 Robertson, J. M. "The Evolution of States." (Watts, 5s.)
 Russell, G. W. "Co-operation and Nationality." (Maunsel and Co.)
 "Russian Review." Vol. i., No. 2. Two copies. (Nelson, 2s. 6d.)
 " " " " Vol. i., No. 3. Two copies. (Nelson, 2s. 6d.)
 Shaw, B. "Selected Passages." (Constable, 5s.)
 Sladen, F. W. L. "The Humble Bee." (Macmillan, 10s.)
 Slack, G. B. "Radical Views About the New Testament." (Watts, 6s.)
 Smith, W. B. "Ecce Deus." (Watts, 6s.)
 Snowden, P. "The Living Wage." (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s.)
 Sombart, W. "Socialism and the Social Movement." (Dent, 3s. 6d.)
 Sonnenschein, E. A. "A New French Grammar." (Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.)
 Spears, J. R. "Master Mariners." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Stephens, J. "The Hill of Vision." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
 Stanley, J. "Lest We Forget." (Stockwell.)
 Stuttaford, C. "The Poems of Catullus." (Bell, 6s.)
 Swift, J. "Gulliver's Travels." (Blackie, 2s. 6d.)
 Taylor, M. A. "Delfina of the Dolphins." (Fifield, 1s. 6d.)
 Taylor, A. E. "Aristotle." (Jack, 6d.)
 Thomas, E. "Lafcadio Hearn." (Constable, 1s.)
 Thompson, D'Arcy. "Daydreams of a Schoolmaster." (Harrap, 2s. 6d.)
 Toynbee, William. "Diaries of William Charles Macready." Two vols. (Chapman and Hall, 32s.)
 Trent, Erskine. "Great Writers of America." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Tyrrell, G. "Through Scylla and Charybdis." (Longmans, Green, 5s.)
 Tyrrell, G. "Oil and Wine." (Longmans, Green, 5s.)
 " " "Lex Credendi." (Longmans, Green, 5s.)
 " " "Lex Orandi." (Longmans, Green, 5s.)
 Wain, L. "The Cat Scouts." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Walker, G. F. "Aviation." (Jack, 6d.)
 Watt, L. M. "Carlyle." (Jack, 6d.)
 Waithman, H. M. "The Soul of a Gardener." (Fifield, 2s.)
 Wavell, A. J. B. "A Modern Pilgrim in Mecca." (Constable, 10s. 6d.)
 Wells, H. G. "The Great State." Two vols. (Harpers, 6s.)
 Whitam, G. I. "The Lord of Marney." (Blackie, 2s. 6d.)
 Whitman. "German Memories." (Heinemann, 7s. 6d.)
 Whittaker, J. "Far-off Fields: Dartford and Bexley Heath."
 Williams, A. "A Wiltshire Village." (Duckworth, 5s.)
 Wilson, H. H. "A Somerset Sketch-Book." (Dent, 3s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor will endeavour to return manuscripts only when a stamped envelope is enclosed. All manuscripts should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d. Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS' LIST.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net each volume. A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English Literature and English thought.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY. By Prof. JAMES SETHI, M.A. SPECTATOR.—"This book is admirably written."

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY. Prof. W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A. [Prospectus.] SCOTSMAN.—"For the needs of the serious student this volume is admirably suited."

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: Historical—Pictorial—Colonial.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Prospectus.] ATHENÆUM.—"Will certainly find a place among intelligent readers."

STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS: A Volume of Essays.

By DARRELL FIGGIS. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Prospectus.]

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Prospectus]

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

Vol. II. By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each volume. Vol. III. ready shortly. [Prospectus.]

TRIANGULAR CRICKET.

By E. H. D. SEWELL. With Illustrations. 5s. net. [Prospectus.] PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A record of the greatest contest in the history of the game."

JOSEPH CONRAD'S 'TWIXT LAND AND SEA. 6s.

TIMES.—"A masterpiece."
MORNING POST.—"A haunting power of imagery."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A high and masterly artist."
PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"He has never done better."

[Prospectus.]

FLORENCE CONVERSE'S THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT.

Author of "The House of Prayer." Crown 8vo. 6s.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"This poetic idea and its developments are beautifully realized."

HILLEL SAMSON'S FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

A Book of Verse by EVELYN UNDERHILL. IMMANENCE. Crown 8vo, gilt top, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

THE HENRY JAMES YEAR BOOK.

Selected and arranged by EVELYN GARNAUT SMALLEY: with an Introduction by Henry James and William Dean Howells. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

By WILLIAM CANTON. With Illustrations in Colour by HERBERT COLE. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net. Uniform with "A Child's Book of Saints."

BEE: The Princess of the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Retold in English by PETER WRIGHT. With Coloured Illustrations and many Decorations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large F'cap 4to. 7s. 6d. net.

THE SONGS OF INNOCENCE AND OTHER POEMS.

By WILLIAM BLAKE. With Coloured Illustrations and Decorations by CHARLES and MAY ROBINSON. Small 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

With many charming full-page Drawings in Colours depicting the various episodes described in the famous Lyric. By MARGARET W. TARRANT. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

JOLLY CALLE AND OTHER SWEDISH FAIRY TALES.

By HELENA NYBLON. With several Illustrations in Colour by CHARLES FOLKARD. Square Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN.

By Mrs. RODOLPH STAWELL. Illustrated with Pictures in Colour and in Line by FRANK C. PAPE. 3s. 6d. net.

Let us send you a Special Prospectus of these Children's Books.

A postcard from you will ensure your promptly receiving a Prospectus of any of the above books so marked.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

TERMS AT A GLANCE.

Successful candidates will be entitled to receive the complete Course of Instruction in Advertisement Writing at half fees, balance payable only if the student earns

3 TIMES AMOUNT OF FEE

by Advt. Writing within six months of completion of the Course.

No coupons, no entrance fee, no liability of any kind incurred by entering for preliminary test.

Read carefully and send to-day for full particulars.

SCHOLARSHIP COUPON.

The SECRETARY,
Practical Correspondence College,
77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Please send me your Scholarship Examination Form Post Free.

Signed.....

Address.....

Date.....

100 Winter Scholarships

for Readers of EVERYMAN.

No Entrance Fee. No Specialised Knowledge Required.

Society owes a decent living to everyone willing to work, but to get adequate reward for labour one has to work with brain as well as muscles. Manual labour is so underpaid that to earn a comfortable living one must do mental work, work that is wanted, and well paid.

No field of labour is less crowded to-day than that of the new art of intelligent advertising.

Commonsense Training.

To write advertisements needs knowledge of the use of words, and technical training. Finding things out oneself is a slow and discouraging method of learning a business. With training a man can at once begin to turn his talents to practical account. No matter where he lives, he can earn money by writing advertisements, because most advertising work is done by post. We are so anxious that EVERYMAN readers (both men and women) should judge for themselves the unique merits of this new profession that we have arranged with the directors of the Practical Correspondence College to institute one hundred winter scholarships in advertisement writing.

Earning While Learning.

The College has arranged to offer the scholarships in advertisement writing to our readers upon the following remarkable and unprecedented terms:—

The one hundred candidates who send in the best answers to the test questions will receive the full course of postal tuition at half the regular fees, the remaining half to be paid only when the student has earned at least £10 by advertisement writings as the result of the tuition, within six months of completing the course.

There is no entrance fee—it costs a halfpenny stamp to write for gratis examination paper, and a penny to return it filled up. You are under no further liability whatever.

The successful students will not only earn back much more than the fees paid, and incidentally receive a first-class practical training free, but will acquire proficiency that may be worth from 15s. to £10 a week to them.

Clever and Enthusiastic.

The scholarships will enable the P.C.C. to secure one hundred of the brainiest readers of EVERYMAN—clever, enterprising, and enthusiastic men and women whom it will be a personal pleasure to teach, and who will eventually be numbered amongst the College's most successful students.

Every reader stands a chance of succeeding.

Many who are not considered clever at figures, office routine, or ordinary work at which they are employed for want of better openings, are full of bright ideas which, turned to account in advertisement writing, would earn guineas. Clerks, salesmen, travellers, and others, by studying advertisement writing in their spare time, have been able to add considerably to their regular salaries, while others have secured well-paid positions as advertisement writers.

Many P.C.C. students earn more than the amount of fees paid before completing the course.

The Fortunate Hundred.

The P.C.C. scholarships are only intended for those students who will be a credit to the College.

Every successful P.C.C. student, by his or her achievement and personal influence, becomes a valuable advertisement for the P.C.C. Successful P.C.C. students never tire of recommending the College which helped them to their success.

The winners of the scholarships are under no liability to pay the balance of fees unless he or she earns at least £10.

No examination papers can be received after November 25th; no more than 100 scholarships can be awarded. Applications will be dealt with in strict rotation, and notified immediately all the hundred scholarships have been awarded.

A Little Spare Time and Thought.

It is essential that you send the coupon at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Remember, this is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send off the coupon now before you forget it.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis a copy of a useful little book, "Brains and Ink," and fullest particulars of the Course and the Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three half-pence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

The act of writing for particulars to-day may prove to be the turning point in your career.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 5. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1912.

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 133
The Lesson of the American Elec- tions. By Hector Macpherson	134
President Woodrow Wilson— By A. F. Whyte, M.P.	135
"War Against Poverty" (Part II.)— By Mrs. Sidney Webb, D.Litt.	136
The London Octopus	137
A Question Put to Field-Marshal von der Goltz	138
The Confessions of Nietzsche— By Henri Lichtenberger	139
Biographical Sketch of Norman Angell Portrait of Norman Angell	140 141
The Futility of War: A Reply to Cecil Chesterton. By Norman Angell	142

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

LORD GUTHRIE
MRS. SIDNEY WEBB
JOHN MASEFIELD
PROF.
LICHTENBERGER
NORMAN ANGELL

The Beloved Vagabond (Robert L. Stevenson)	PAGE 114
The World's Defence	115
An Appeal to the Woman's Move- ment. By Dr. William Barry	115
Two Poems by John Masefield	116
Tramping Afloat—A Short Story— By Stephen Reynolds	117
Great Preachers of To-day— III. Bishop Gore By E. Hermann	149
John Knox's Influence on Scottish Education. By Lord Guthrie	150
Reviews— Francis Parkman as the National Historian of Canada	154
The Lost World	155
Correspondence	156
List of Books Received	162

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE war news continues to be a record of Turkish defeats. The Turks, driven back to the Chataljan lines, are being hard pressed by the Bulgarians. A great battle is in progress. The number of wounded arriving at Constantinople indicates that a fierce resistance is being offered by the Turks. The situation at Adrianople grows increasingly critical. Two important forts have been captured by the Bulgarians, and the fall of the city is regarded as imminent. The great event of the war, so far as the Greeks are concerned, is the fall of Salonika, the news of which was received at Athens with great rejoicings. Meanwhile great anxiety exists in diplomatic circles with regard to the new situation created by the success of the allied armies.

An important statement was made by Mr. Asquith on this head at the Lord Mayor's banquet at the Guildhall. The Balkan armies, he said, were in effective possession of Macedonia and Thrace. Salonika was occupied by the Greeks, and we might at any moment hear of the fall of Constantinople. It was the business of statesmen everywhere to accept the accomplished fact. The map of Eastern Europe had to be recast, and it might be that ideas, preconceptions, and policies which were born in what was now a bygone era would have to be modified, reconstructed, and even go altogether by the board. Upon one thing, continued the Prime Minister, "I believe the general opinion of Europe to be unanimous—that the victors are not to be robbed of the fruits which cost them so dear."

The sweeping victory of Dr. Woodrow Wilson has elated the progressive party in the United States. Importance is attached to the fact that Democrats will also have a majority in the Senate, and thus control legislation. As the result of the State Elections, woman's suffrage will probably be extended to four more States in the Union.

Something like a political panic was created on Monday night by the defeat of the Government on an amendment by Sir Frederick Banbury to the financial resolutions of the Home Rule Bill. The division resulted in placing the Government in a minority of twenty-two. On the motion of the Prime Minister, the debate was adjourned.

After a meeting of the Cabinet, an official statement was issued announcing that the amendment carried in the House of Commons was not regarded by the Government as involving any modification of their programme. The division was clearly a snap division on a motion which had not even been put upon the order paper, and was handed in without notice in manuscript. It is recalled in the official statement that the Prime Minister, in his speech at Ladybank on October 5th, stated that his course would not be affected by snap divisions in the House of Commons.

The problems growing out of the war are likely to tax European diplomacy to the utmost. Between Austria and Serbia there is likely to be friction. Serbia desires access to the Adriatic—a desire that seems counter to the designs of Austria. Austria is said to be backed by Germany and Italy.

The Bulgarian semi-official journal, Mir, says that the recognition of Serbia's demand for an Adriatic port is a sine qua non of a solution of the Balkan question. M. Daneff, the President of the Bulgarian Chamber, has arrived at Budapest on what is regarded as an important mission, and has been received by the Emperor Francis Joseph, the Archduke Franz Ferdinand, the Heir-Presumptive, and Count Berchtold, Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister. It is semi-officially stated that the chief object of M. Daneff's mission is to ascertain the views held in authoritative circles in Austria-Hungary regarding the situation created by the successes of the Balkan Alliance.

In the course of his examination before the House of Commons' Select Committee into the contracts between the Government and the Marconi Company, Sir Alexander King, Secretary to the Post Office, with reference to the rise in the value of the shares, said he did not ascribe it to the contract. It occurred when the company acquired the business of the United Wireless Company of America.

The report of the Royal Commission on Divorce is now issued. In the majority report the Commissioners recommend the decentralisation of sittings in England for the hearing of divorce and matrimonial causes; to enable persons of limited means to have their cases heard locally; the abolition of the powers of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction to make orders for the permanent separation of married persons; the placing of men and women on an equal footing with regard to grounds for divorce; the addition of five grounds for divorce which are generally recognised as in fact putting an end to married life; the addition of grounds for obtaining decrees of nullity of marriage in certain cases of unfitness for marriage. The Commissioners also recommend the amendment in several details of the present law of procedure and practice, and the making of provisions with regard to the publications of reports of divorce cases. It is accompanied by a minority report signed by the Archbishop of York, Sir William Anson, and Sir Lewis T. Dibdin. The signatories recommend that, subject to the recognition of equality between the sexes, the law should not be altered so as to extend the grounds of divorce.

In presenting a civic mace to Glasgow the other day, Lord Rosebery made his usual ironical reference to party politics. His Lordship said he had no connection with party politics, but if ever he did join any other political association or league, it would be one for the suspension of all legislation for two or three years. The body politic, as well as the body physical, ought to have time to digest what it had devoured.

The Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, has received an assurance from Mr. Birrell that Mr. Campbell's amendment excluding Dublin University from the authority of an Irish Parliament will be inserted in the Home Rule Bill in the report stage.

In reply to a question in Parliament, Mr. Masterman said the cost to the Exchequer next year of the national health insurance scheme—including the new grant of £1,650,000 for medical benefit—is estimated at just over £6,000,000. The cost of unemployment insurance to the State for the year is estimated at £766,000. These sums are exclusive of the cost of buildings, printing, and stationery.

In the House of Commons Mr. Asquith announced that it had been decided to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the legality of Sir S. Samuel retaining his seat in the House, his firm having carried through a contract for the Government.

At a Liberal meeting held at Stafford, Mr. Pease, President of the Board of Education, claimed that the Insurance Act was the greatest measure of social reform ever passed. He admitted that the Liberal Government had increased the expenditure of the country, but he claimed that under Mr. Lloyd George's Budget nobody was a penny the worse.

THE LESSON OF THE AMERICAN ELECTIONS

THE triumph of the Democratic party in the United States has exceeded expectation. That Mr. Taft would be defeated was a foregone conclusion. By chaining himself to the chariot wheels of the moneyed interests he had effectively reduced himself to impotence. As a candidate Mr. Taft's doom was sealed when, in 1906, he cynically departed from his electoral pledges by accepting the Payne-Aldrich tariff, which was expressly framed in the interests of the moneyed "bosses." Mr. Roosevelt's candidature introduced a disturbing element into the contest. A man of undoubted magnetic power, vast ambitions, demagogic instincts, and great driving force, he started on a pilgrimage of passion with many things in his favour. He has failed. His whirlwind methods, his revolutionary projects, and his spread-eagleism could not make the people forget that while in office he did nothing to lighten the terrible pressure of the high tariff system, which has caused a revolt, not only among the consumers who suffer severely from the increased cost of living, but also among a section of manufacturers who find the tariff operating seriously against them. Sufficient explanation of Mr. Roosevelt's apathy is found in the fact that the moneyed interests were huge contributors to the Republican party funds. So effectively had the financial "bosses" silenced the progressive section of the Republicans that it is said that seven-tenths at least of the colossal fortunes now in the possession of men attached to these interests are directly due to the political privileges bestowed upon them by Congress or by the State legislatures. More than fifty years ago De Tocqueville predicted the rise in America of a plutocracy which would be more dangerous to society than the old aristocracy. His prediction has surely been fulfilled when, as the result of a Commission appointed to report on the concentration of capital in the United States, we are told that, by means of what is known as the "interlocking system," more than one-third of all the active capital and resources of the United States is under the control of two men, Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Mr. J. D. Rockefeller.

President Wilson's victory is an expression of popular revolt. In entering upon his office he is confronted with a Herculean task. A man of pronounced ability, the representative of cultured America, possessed of high ideals, he will make a strenuous effort to purify the political life of the United States. The task which lies immediately to his hand is the reduction of the tariff in the direction of Free Trade. For this task, what are the forces at his command? The Democratic party commands both Houses, and were it unanimously bent on tariff reform on the lines of the President's ideal, the present elections would prove epoch-making. It must be remembered that in 1894 the Democrats, under Cleveland, failed to take advantage of the opportunity they then had of dealing with the tariff. Cleveland was openly thwarted by a group of Democratic senators, who also put a check upon the Democratic majority of the House of Representatives. It is difficult to see how the tariff can be radically reformed so long as the economic control of the nation is in the hands of a few men who live and move and have their being in an atmosphere of financial greed and political intrigue. President Wilson will make for himself an enduring reputation if he succeeds in introducing a new and a less commercial spirit into American politics.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON * * * BY A. F. WHYTE, M.P.

I.

THREE years ago the State of New Jersey was controlled by corrupt bosses manipulating its representative institutions for their own private ends. To-day the bosses are out of the saddle: popular control is a reality. The change thus wrought was the work of one man, who was given the power to accomplish it in a curious manner. Early in 1910 the strategians of the corrupt party became aware of a formidable movement of public opinion within the State which threatened to undermine their power by sweeping away the old indirect methods of popular election and substituting machinery which would place the control of the legislature under the direct influence of public opinion. Now public opinion, especially that enlightened public opinion which has grown so rapidly in America during recent times, is the worst enemy of corruption, and the bosses knew this well. They therefore cast about to find a leader for the coming campaign who could clothe their operations with a mantle of respectability; and in their search they lighted upon Dr. Woodrow Wilson, President of Princeton University. In the person of this scholar they found a public man whose reputation for sound doctrine in the region of political theory stood high, and whom they secretly believed they could lead into their own paths when the time came for political action. They rubbed their hands in glee when they found that the reformers—whom they feared—also welcomed the Princeton President as a suitable nominee for the office of Governor of New Jersey in the interests of the Democratic Party: and after the first ballot of the Democratic Convention, Woodrow Wilson was declared official candidate for the Governorship. The bosses were satisfied; the reformers were satisfied; and everything seemed to augur well for the secret plans of the former. Wilson was summoned to the convention to receive nomination. He appeared and accepted it in a speech which swept the delegates off their feet, and echoed from end to end of the American Union. His final words showed where he stood:—"I did not seek this nomination," said he. "I have made no pledge, and have given no promise. Still more, not only was no promise asked, but, as far as I know, none was desired. If elected, as I expect to be, I am left absolutely free to serve you with all singleness of purpose. It is a new era when these things can be said."

II.

The bosses were somewhat uneasy at this smiling independence of their puppet candidate; but they had made their choice, and now comforted themselves with the conviction that they could "manage" him as they had "managed" his predecessors. So Woodrow Wilson embarked on his first campaign, and soon showed that he was a campaigner of no common kind. He spoke to the voters of his State in clear and simple language, which carried conviction because the thoughts of the speaker were sincere and the speaker himself fearless.

Woodrow Wilson and his doctrine of the public good won the election, turning a Republican majority of 82,000 into a Democratic majority of 49,150. But a fiercer campaign was in store for the new Governor. Within a week of the election, the leading boss of New Jersey visited Governor Wilson and asked for his support as candidate for the United States Senatorship, presuming, no doubt, that the Governor would grant him this quid pro quo after the work he had done in placing him in the Governorship. Wilson refused, and requested the boss, James Smith, to abandon the idea, as it would certainly split the Democratic vote. Another and better candidate was in the field already, accepted by the party, "and by me," added Governor Wilson. "His nomination was a mere joke!" said Smith. "Not to me," said Wilson; "and if his nomination was a joke, his election by the Legislature to serve in the United States Senate is going to be a serious reality." The interview closed. Smith announced his candidature and rallied the full power of the corrupt "organisation" to support him. The party as a whole was sharply divided; and once more Governor Wilson intervened with a private message to Smith to say that, unless he relinquished the contest, he would denounce him as the agent of corruption. Smith persisted in his candidature; and Wilson immediately took the field against him. Making full use of the interval of time which must elapse before the Legislature assembled, he appeared before great audiences in all the principal cities of New Jersey, and told the people to see that their representatives voted right in the election of the Senator to represent the State of Washington. "You have been taught to fear and obey the 'machine' and the bosses," he declared. "Do not be dismayed. You see where the machine is entrenched, and it looks like a real fortress. It looks as if real men with real guns were inside. Go and touch it. It is a house of cards; and those are playthings that look like guns. Put your shoulder to it, and it will collapse."

III.

New Jersey followed its Governor, and the machine collapsed. It was the first of a notable series of triumphs which showed not only that Woodrow Wilson as Governor stood by the pledges by which he won his place, but that he was more than a match for the politicians at their own game. The news of his exploits sped across the United States and made his name a household word among reformers of all kinds; and, though he stood as a Democrat, he achieved his splendid work by appealing beyond the circle of his party to the public spirit of his fellow-citizens. By the time that the Democratic Convention met in Baltimore last summer Woodrow Wilson had proved that he was the national leader for whom the party had yearned, and he was nominated Democratic candidate for the Presidency in a scene of indescribable enthusiasm. His message to the United States is best summed up in his own words: "We have been calling our Government a Republic, and we have been living under the delusion that it is a representative government. That is the theory. But the fact is that we are not living under a representative government; we are living under a government of party bosses who, in secret conference and for private ends, determine what we shall have and shall not have. The first, the immediate thing that we have got to do is to restore representative government. . . . We are going to cut down the jungle in which corruption lurks. . . . That is what the people of New Jersey have meant as they have flocked out, rain or shine, not to follow the Democratic party—we have stopped thinking about parties—to follow what they now know as the Democratic idea, the idea that the people are at last to be served."

“WAR AGAINST POVERTY” * * * * * BY MRS. SIDNEY WEBB, D.Litt.

PART II.

I.

The second of Labour's demands will be continuity of employment. Here, too, although the ordinary Member of Parliament is still usually ignorant about it, we know now that it is possible confidently to demand a Parliamentary solution which would set our administrators to work. Unemployment is not any abstract "state of the labour market," but the dismissal of a workman from his situation, the breach of continuity in his employment, involving, as this does, so serious a dislocation of his own life and of all the conditions of his family existence. It is obviously better to prevent a man from losing his situation, if this can be done, than to let him be thrown out of work, with all the delay, trouble, loss, and dislocation involved in getting him into a new situation. Can this large proportion of quite undesired dismissals and quite involuntary losses of situations be prevented?

II.

The answer of the economist and the practical administrator now is that, to a very large extent at any rate, it is within the power of the Government to prevent them from happening, by rendering them unnecessary. It is impossible in a few sentences to explain the method by which unemployment can be administratively prevented. How to do it is well known to the Board of Trade, and only the hesitation of the Cabinet stands in the way. The Government can, if it chooses, prevent the greater part of all the present unemployment and under-employment by which the nation is afflicted. Those who are interested in this question should get the special literature publishing by the Standing Committee of the I.L.P. and the Fabian Society, which is now passing into the hands of hundreds of thousands of workmen.

III.

So much for the able-bodied man or woman. What about the sick, the neglected children, and the mentally defective? I have no room to detail the proposals—which are really those of the Government experts on these questions—by which we can set going a really national organisation to prevent sickness, to prevent child neglect, and prevent the increase of mental defectiveness. What the working men and working women are asking is that these things should be attended to without delay, instead of the present unnecessary destitution of health and character being permitted to continue. What is needed, in a word, is to take the sick, the neglected children, and the mentally defective out of the Poor Law, which does nothing to prevent, and to transfer the responsibility to local authorities having both the power and the duty of prevention as well as of provision.

IV.

This is a matter which it makes me sick at heart to think about. The condition of, literally, millions of children whom to-day we allow to fall below the national minimum of child nurture will be regarded with shame and horror by future generations. Forty years ago we set up a Local Education Authority to enforce throughout the length and breadth of the land a minimum standard of intellectual attainments. But hundreds of thousands of children are still so insufficiently fed, and in such a neglected condition, that they are wholly unable to obtain full advantage of the instruction that we force upon them. "I do not know how many children I examined among the poorer sort," reports the doctor who inspected the schools of one great city in 1907, "who were in a sort of dreamy condition, and would only respond to some very definite stimulus. They seemed to be in a condition of semi-torpor, unable to concentrate their attention on anything and taking no notice of their surroundings, if left alone. To give an example of what I mean; if I told one of these children to open its mouth, it would take no notice until the request became a demand, which sometimes had to be accompanied by a slight shake to draw the child's attention. Then the mouth would be slowly opened widely, but no effort would be made to close it again until the child was told to do so. As an experiment, I left one child with its mouth wide open the whole time I examined it, and never once shut it. Now that shows a condition something like what one gets with a pigeon that has had its higher brain centres removed, and is a very sad thing to see in a human being." This scandalous state of things, which continues to-day, proves conclusively that our Poor Law, whilst making no attempt to prevent destitution, does not even relieve it—does not even relieve the destitution of thousands of little children who are obviously destitute through no fault of their own.

V.

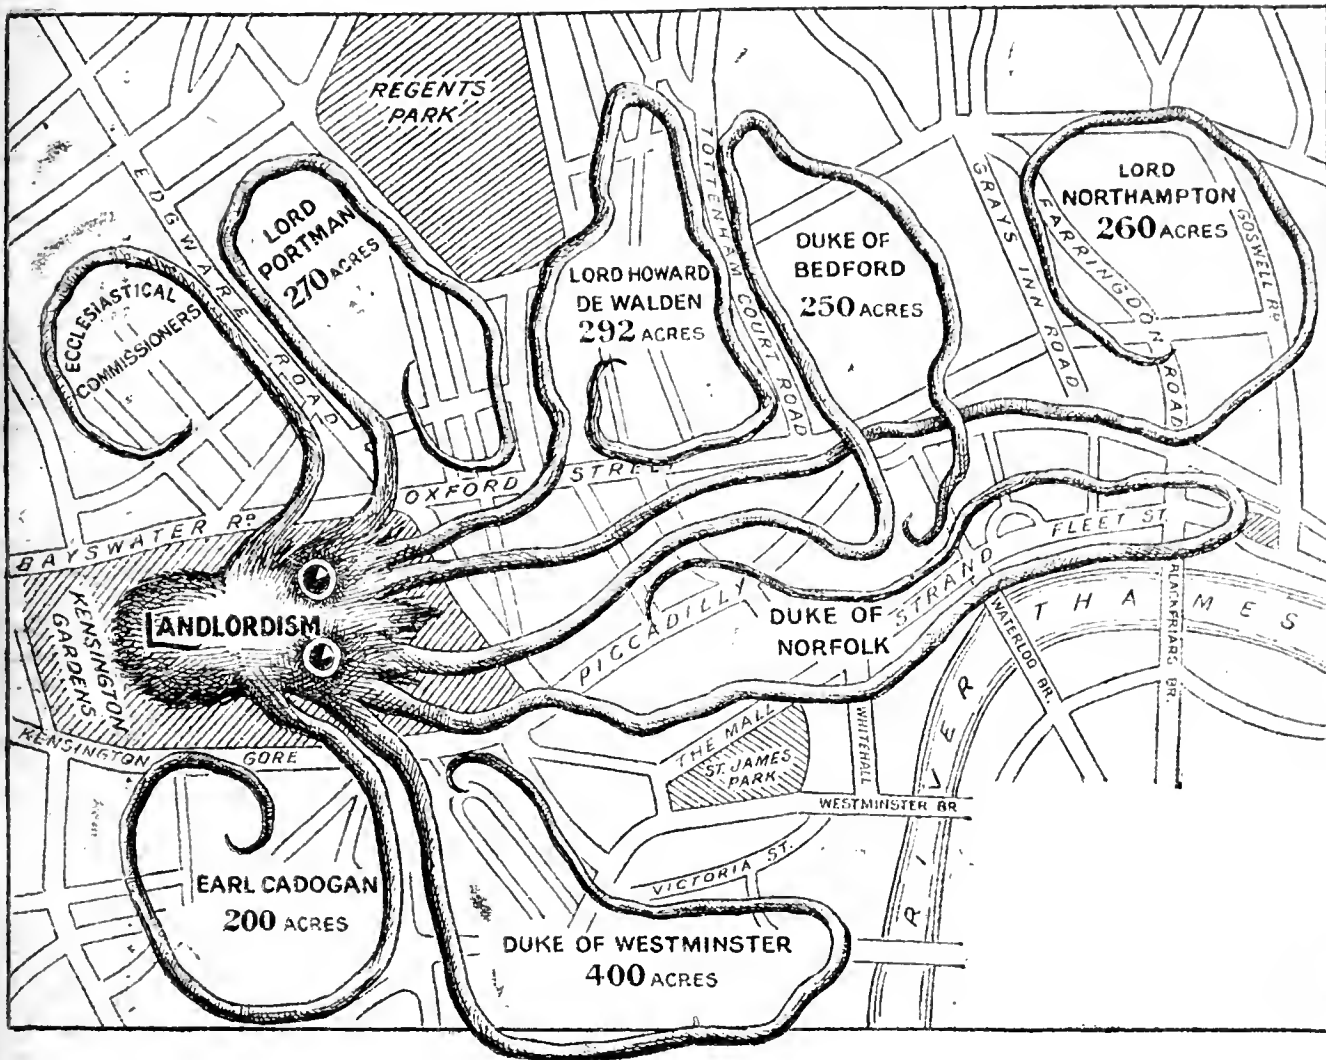

The truth is that child neglect can only be discovered and prevented by a local authority which has, necessarily and automatically, all the children under its observation. Such an authority is the Local Education Authority. What we propose is that, with regard to children of school age, that the Local Education Authority should, definitely and obligatorily in respect of all forms of child destitution, assume the same sort of control, enforce the same sort of responsibility, and proceed along the same lines as it has in respect of illiteracy. Incidentally, we propose that all children of school age now in receipt of any form of poor relief should be, in the fullest sense, "taken out of the Poor Law," relieved of all stigma of pauperism, and made instead the wards of the Local Education Authority.

VI.

Finally, there is the problem of the slums. The nation can no longer neglect the housing problem, in town or country.

These, then, are the seven points of the new charter, which, if I mistake not, the working men and working women of this country are demanding, and which (despite all the sophistry of the professional politicians) they regard as the real issues of politics. What they ask from Parliament next Session is a legal minimum wage, a legal normal day, the administrative prevention of unemployment and proper provision for those for whom employment cannot be found, complete provision for sickness and mental defectiveness on preventive lines, the enforcement of a national standard minimum of child nurture, healthy homes in sufficient number to enable every family to have, as the minimum for decency, "three rooms and a scullery," and the final abolition of the Poor Law.

THE LONDON OCTOPUS

THE LAND MONOPOLY

"It is certainly impossible," remarks the Hon. G. C. Brodrick, in his essay on Primogeniture, "to ignore the grave political danger involved in the simple fact that nearly all the soil of Great Britain, the value of which is incalculable and progressively advancing, should belong to a section of the population relatively small and progressively dwindling."

Circumstances of a political, social, and industrial nature within the last few years have directed public attention to the grave problem to which Mr. Brodrick refers. In order fully to realise the gravity of the problem, it is best to take a concrete case, like that of London, where the land monopoly is seen in its extreme form. So glaring is the monopoly that years ago the London Observer admitted that "legislation in some form will be necessary to reform a system under which nine-tenths of the inhabitants of the metropolis have no interest in their own houses, and the soil of London is rapidly passing into the hands of a few millionaires." It has been calculated that the agricultural rental of the land upon which London is built is about £250,000; yet the capital value of that land, without the buildings which have been erected upon it, is put at the enormous sum of £30,000,000.

In his "Work and Wages" the late Professor Thorold Rogers says: "I could show that land for two miles round St. Paul's has increased during the last fifty years a thousandfold in value."

Who profits by this enormous increase in the value of land? The fortunate owner of the land profits; and how he profits was well illustrated some years ago in the House of Commons by a member of Parliament—Colonel Hughes. He said: "In the parish of Plumstead land used to be let for £3 an acre. The income of an estate of 250 acres in 1845 was £750 per annum, and the capital value at twenty years' purchase was £5,000. The Arsenal came to Woolwich; with the Arsenal the necessity for 5,000 houses; and then came the harvest of the landlord. The land, the capital value of which had been £5,000, now brought an income of £14,250 per annum. The ground landlord has received £1,000,000 in ground rents already, and after twenty years hence the Woolwich estates, with all the houses upon them, will revert to the landowner's family, bringing in another million, meaning altogether a swap of £15,000 for a sum of £2,000,000."

In London, which is mainly a leasehold city, the land monopoly is seen at its worst. As is well known, the terminable leasehold system provides that all buildings erected on lease, with the permanent improvements and the goodwill of the business premises, shall, at the end of the term, fall into the possession of the ground landlord. This was brought about by means of private legislation in the old days, when the landed interest was dominant in Parliament, when ground landlords were empowered to lease their building land for terms not exceeding ninety-nine years. It is in this way, as the author of "Our Old Nobility" remarks, that the enormous revenues of the Duke of Bedford, Lord Howard de Walden, and other ground landlords have grown up. If the reader will study carefully the accompanying diagram he will get a more vivid idea of what land monopoly means in London than from pages of statistics. He will notice that the Duke of Westminster owns 400 acres; Lord Howard de Walden, 292 acres; the Duke of Bedford, 250 acres; Lord Northampton, 260 acres; Lord Cadogan, 200 acres, all with fabulous rentals, utterly disproportionate. It is quite unnecessary to point out the connection of this flagrant monopoly with the slums, the poverty, and the huddled mass of misery which makes London the despair of social reformers. Octopus-like, the land monopoly sucks the life-blood of the people of the richest city in the world. Social reforms can do little so long as twelve landlords own London, taking as their share of the realised wealth a sum computed at £20,000,000 as an annual payment "for permission merely to occupy the swampy marsh by the Thames which London labour makes so productive."

THE LAND MONOPOLY (continued)

In dealing with land monopoly, progressive politicians are in the habit of viewing it mainly from the standpoint of labour—as it affects, so to speak, the question of congestion in the towns and depopulation in the country. It is well, however, to dwell also on the cramping effects of land monopoly upon capital. Take as example the doings of the land monopolists when railways were being introduced, as narrated by Smiles in his "Lives of the Engineers."

When the London and Birmingham Railway Bill passed the Commons and went to the Lords, Committees were open to all Peers, and the promoters of the Bill found, to their dismay, many of the Lords who were opposed to the measure as landowners sitting in judgment to decide its fate. The Bill was thrown out. The promoters forthwith made arrangements for presenting it in the next session. Strange to say, the Bill then passed, almost without opposition. An instructive commentary on the way in which these noble Lords had been conciliated was the simple fact that the estimate for land had been trebled, and that the owners were paid about £750,000 for what had been originally estimated at £250,000. In this connection Professor Thorold Rogers remarks: "In the early days of railway legislation owners constantly got forty or fifty times as much as their property was worth, and, I regret to say, constantly in exchange for their votes in Parliament. One of these persons, a man of rare integrity and honesty—the late Lord Taunton—actually refunded to the Great Eastern Company £100,000, which he inferred had been paid to him for land in excess of its value." Taking the railways as a whole, Mr. Arthur Arnold, in his "Lords as Landowners," calculates that the landowners received £100,000,000 over the market value of the land. If, he remarked, the railway system had not been unduly burdened, agriculture might have had less reason to complain of railway rates, and the industry of the country would have been spared a burden it must now sustain. And thus the land octopus sucks the life-blood of capital as well as of labour.

A QUESTION PUT TO FIELD-MARSHAL VON DER GOLTZ

THERE is a general impression on the Continent that the rout of the Turk will considerably affect the military prestige of Germany, for the Turkish army has been for the last thirty years organised and trained by German officers, under the direction of Field-Marshal von der Goltz.

The Pan-Germanist Gazette of the Rhine and Westphalia, which is considered to be the official paper of the Krupp firm, publishes a violent article under the title of "A Question Put to the Field-Marshal." Because events have proved Field-Marshal von der Goltz to have been in the wrong, and because this has been taken notice of in Paris and elsewhere, the Pan-Germanist paper writes:—

"The Turkish army, with the exception of some scattered divisions, has been totally destroyed in a week. This very army has had the incredible stupidity—instead of concentrating all its strength in an attack on the most important point—to march at the same time against the Bulgarians, the Servians, and the Montenegrins; and this is what is called German strategy! This is the blunder which Field-Marshal von der Goltz, it is said, has caused the Turks to make.

"No one will believe such an improbable tale, but the danger is that the French may believe it. That rumour has spread in France from town to town, from village to village, and has been repeated, with sneers, with vengeful joy and a boasting laugh.

"It is to be feared that the prestige of German military authority will be destroyed in the eyes of a people who up till now have been prevented from declaring war against us by the apprehension of a second Sedan.

"The danger grows in proportion with Field-Marshal von der Goltz's hesitation to publicly demolish those French fairy tales. He has wielded his pen with great vigour in favour of the Turks during the Tripolitan war. He has no right to remain silent when the whole world is waiting to hear why the Turks suffered this dreadful defeat. The fate of the German nation perhaps depends on the Field-Marshal's utterance."

A PERFORMANCE DE LUXE

"THE complete realisation of an artist's dream" is Richard Strauss's own verdict on the recent performance of his latest opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," in Stuttgart. Certainly, from all accounts, there was nothing wanting to contribute to the perfection of the ensemble. Strauss was fortunate in having a delightful theatre at his disposal, and in having carte blanche to gather together from all points of the compass the most brilliant singers, actors and instrumentalists in the world.

The orchestra in "Ariadne auf Naxos" played on instruments that altogether represented a sum of 300,000 marks. There was a cello by Amati, of Cremona, two Stradivarius violins dated 1673 and 1703, and also Amati violins. The text of the opera has been written by that deft renovator of ancient classic drama, Hugo von Hoffmansthal. The introduction of Molière's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" in the first act affords scope for some of Strauss's most characteristic comic music; while the pathos of the scenes which centre round Ariadne are tremendously Strausserian. No precedent exists for this mingling of opera seria and comedia della arte, but in Strauss's "Ariadne" there can be no question of its triumphal success.

CONFESSIONS OF NIETZSCHE BY PROFESSOR LICHTENBERGER

I.

NIETZSCHE'S autobiography, written a few weeks before the crisis which put an end to his conscious life, and which has lately been placed within reach of the public by his sister, Mme. Foerster-Nietzsche, is a strange and striking book. The approach of the catastrophe which was to darken that noble intelligence is manifest. When one reads the strange titles of certain chapters, "Why I am so wise," "Why I write such good books," "Why I am a fatality,"—when one sees in the preface phrases such as this, "With Zarathustra I have bestowed on humanity the finest gift that has ever been given"—when, further on, we hear Nietzsche say that his "Transvaluation of Values" will be a "thunderbolt which will cast all the earth into convulsions"; or assure us, "I am not a man; I am dynamite,"—one has the painful sensation of the tragic hour in which the book was written, of the dark tide of madness drawing near, which in an instant was to engulf his whole being.

II.

Nevertheless, it is a work of prodigious lucidity. Never has Nietzsche found more luminous formulas in which to paint himself; never has he conceived more moving accents in which to tell of his hopes and of his enthusiasms; never has he proclaimed his entire acceptance of life, his magnificent faith in the sovereign efficacy of human thought and human will, with a more religious fervour. The shadow of madness hovers over this work, and it is at the same time a marvel of wisdom, of clearness, of serenity, of nobility.

By his state of health he was condemned to a wandering life—obliged to seek for sun or coolness, according to the time of year, in the Engadine or on the Riviera, at Nice or at Mentone; nowhere might he take root. One by one he sees his old friends break away from him, alarmed at the boldness of his thought, and unable to follow the advance of his ideas. New friendships seem to have sprung up, which, when tested, proved unstable, and caused him painful disillusionment. Even his sister, always his dearest confidante, left him to follow her husband, Bernhard Foerster, to Paraguay. There was total void, absolute silence around Nietzsche. From 1886 onwards, his sister relates, all communication was, so to speak, severed between himself and the living world.

III.

This isolation became an intolerable torment to him. His letters contain complaints one cannot read without a tightening at the heart: "Oh! Heaven," he wrote to his sister, "how lonely I am to-day! I have no one with whom I can laugh, no one with whom I can take a cup of tea, no one to give me friendly comfort." And again: "Ten years have already gone by since all sound ceased to reach me—it is like a world without rain. One must have a great fund of humanity not to perish in such a drought."

Repulsed by the external world, driven back on his "ego" by the hostility of his surroundings, Nietzsche from this time onwards shuts himself more and more into the world of his inward thoughts; he takes refuge in his marvellous dreams, in them he seeks oblivion of his sorrows. He loses all sense of the real and concrete world whilst leading this unnatural existence. He exaggerates, not the value of his individuality—he never had a shadow of personal vanity—but the value of the world of ideas which he bears in himself, and which ends in becoming to him the only truth. His philosophic work takes untold dimensions in his imagination.

IV.

The "creator of new values," the contemplator in whose brain are formulated the directing ideas which govern human life, appears to him as a superior being towering above ordinary humanity, dominating men of action who, without knowing it, are subject to the influence of his ideas, and merely give expression to his conceptions and dreams in the visible world. Jesus Christ is a contemplator whose thought has resounded prodigiously throughout the history of man: He was the Prophet of the first great "transvaluation of values." To Him, Nietzsche, the prophet of the second great "transvaluation," compares and opposes himself. He believes himself to be the continuation—that is to say, the destroyer—of the work of Christ; he is His successor, and His "best enemy"; he is at one and the same time Antichrist and a second Christ, who, like the Galilean, has known solitude and suffering and the hatred of the "Good and the Just," and, like Him, he is a fatality for innumerable generations to come. Through him Christianity must perish by "auto-suppression," giving birth to something superior to itself.

V.

This imaginary relationship between himself and Christ was present in his mind with ever-increasing definiteness during the last weeks of his conscious life. His whole being was in a state of exaltation. (His genius at the moment of eclipse shines forth for the last time with almost supernatural vividness, and seems to surround itself with a golden nimbus before disappearing to all time.) He feels happy, free, light; he sees himself soaring at an infinite height above the life of man; he believes in the all-pervading power of his creative thought (and announces that in "two years the earth will be in convulsive throes"). Across the centuries he stretches out his hand to his Forerunner, Jesus Christ, whose work he achieves by annihilating it. He entitles his autobiography, "Ecce Homo." At the moment when the abyss of madness suddenly gapes before him, he signs his last letter to Brandes, "The Crucified!" . . .

VI.

I saw Nietzsche, for the first and last time, two years before his death. It was at the modest villa at Weimar, where, faithfully watched over by his sister he was ending his life. From his invalid chair his eye could wander over the panorama of the town gilded by the fires of the setting sun, or follow the calm and gentle outline of the Thuringian hills which edged his horizon. Suffering and illness had, no doubt, set their mark upon his face, but had in no wise degraded it. The forehead remained fine. His expression, which seemed as though turned inwards, was of an indefinable and profoundly moving quality. Hans Olde's admirable engraving has caught in a most expressive manner the look of these, Nietzsche's last days. Reading "Ecce Homo" has strangely revived this memory. When I read this supreme confession of Nietzsche's, I seem again to see him in his tranquil veranda, following I know not what obscure dream, with half-closed eyes, as if collecting his thoughts in peaceful meditation before laying for ever his sufferings as a man and his ventures as a thinker in the arms of kindly death.

NORMAN ANGELL: A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

I.

It is now three years ago since a distinguished journalist, hitherto unknown outside Fleet Street circles, published an epoch-making treatise, which may well prove as decisive in the history of international politics as the treatise of Grotius proved in the history of International Law. Like the treatise of Grotius, it focussed truths hitherto only dimly perceived and, as it were, floating in the atmosphere, and it combined into a system facts hitherto disconnected. Long before Mr. Angell the cause of peace had enlisted many enthusiastic workers. As far back as the end of the eighteenth century, the greatest philosopher whom the German race has produced, Emmanuel Kant, a Prussian and a subject of Frederick the Great, wrote a plea in favour of perpetual peace. The message of Nicholas II. has been succeeded by the Transvaal War, the Russo-Japanese War, the Italo-Turkish War, and the present War of Five Nations, and has been attended by a development of military armaments such as the world has never seen.

II.

Norman Angell, this latest pioneer of a pacifist propaganda, was born in England in 1874. He was educated at the Lycée de St. Omer, in France, and afterwards went out to Western America in search of adventure. It was here that he formulated those ideas and political doctrines which were destined later to make such a deep impression on the world.

Probably his open-air life as a frontiersman in the Wild West taught him more than he ever learnt at school, for the qualities of readiness for action and decision of purpose necessary to make a successful cowboy and rancher are also of inestimable value in the field of authorship. There is a distinct foreshadowing in a journal which he kept during this time of intimate communion with Nature of the ideas embodied in "The Great Illusion." After travelling a good deal in Spanish America, Norman Angell took up journalism in Paris, and became connected in the French Capital with the management of a great newspaper undertaking. This enterprise brought him into relation with all the great political and commercial movements of the day, and kindled his enthusiasm for the work of peace and reform. Such, in brief outline, were the twenty years of preparation for the book which, in the truest sense of the phrase, has been called "epoch-making."

III.

A few months ago he returned to England. He is still a man of action, and to be found in the open air when circumstances will allow, boat-sailor, skater, rider, and scoutmaster. He was the only scoutmaster in France holding General Baden-Powell's warrant. He did not awake to find himself famous the instant that "The Great Illusion" was published. At first the work into which he had concentrated years of patient thought and study fell flat, and the reviewers and public alike received it with indifference, whereas at the present moment it is being translated into at least seventeen languages.

The whole idea of the book is that war is unprofitable—a bad investment, rather than a crime.

When all rational arguments have broken down, the Militarist ultimately appeals to what one might call the mystical and theological argument. With Joseph de Maistre, he extols the transcendental virtues of war. War is a mysterious dispensation of Providence, it is the crucible of character, the condition of moral greatness, the source of individual heroism.

Now, it is quite true that the wars of the past did provide a heroic discipline, and was a school of endurance and sacrifice. Half of the masterpieces of universal literature deal with the heroic aspect of ancient and mediæval and even of modern warfare. We still draw inspiration from the military deeds of the Crusaders and of the soldiers of the Revolution. The education of the younger generation even to-day is still largely based on the military civilisation of the ages of chivalry. And Mr. Angell would probably have strengthened his case if he had frankly recognised this point.

But those who extol the age of chivalry forget that in discussing the moral value of war we are concerned with the wars of the present, and not with the wars of the past. The heroic wars of the days of chivalry are gone, and gone for ever, and our modern warfare has absolutely nothing in common with the wars of old. The wars of Antiquity and of the Middle Ages were individual. They were a struggle between man and man. The modern war is anonymous; it is collective and mechanical. In the old wars the soldier did face his foe. In the modern war the enemy has become invisible. In the old naval battles the crew of one ship boarded that of another. In a modern naval battle one Dreadnought fires at another at a distance of many miles, and a fleet can be sunk in the dead of night by a few mines or submarines, as it may be sunk to-morrow by bombs thrown from an aeroplane. The old war was a triumph of endurance, the new war is partly a triumph of technical skill, and mainly the victory of chance and luck. The old war was human, even when it was not humane. The new warfare is even less humane, and has ceased to be human. It has ceased to be heroic; it is cowardly and treacherous.

IV.

There is no missing link in the demonstration of Mr. Norman Angell. Nor need we fear that in dispelling the "Great Illusion" of war, he will fall a victim to another intellectual illusion, namely, that it will be sufficient to demonstrate by a logical process the ghastly failure of modern warfare to put an end to its horrors. War, alas! is too established a human institution. It is too intimately bound up with human passions and human prejudices and vested interests for us to expect its immediate abolition. Still, a great beginning has been made, and the beginning has been made at the right end. Mr. Angell in his apostolate has first endeavoured to win over the politician, the financier, the merchant. Conversion must begin with the educated. Moral movements may ascend upwards, or spread by emotional contagion. Intellectual movements must slowly percolate downwards. The good seed has been sown, and in a few years has already made wonderful growth. Already there are certain solemn political commonplaces which no self-respecting publicist will dare to defend any longer. The time will soon come when they will disappear from the columns of our newspapers, until they will be removed from the school-books of our children, the last refuge of our military philosophy. When a new generation is brought up to read a new meaning into the history of the modern world, and has been taught to think out a new political philosophy, and to use a new phraseology, the ghost of war will be exorcised.

Y. H. CAFFYN.

NORMAN ANGELL, NATUS 1874.

THE FUTILITY OF WAR

A REPLY TO CECIL CHESTERTON BY NORMAN ANGELL

I.

MR. CECIL CHESTERTON says that the question which I have raised is this: "Should usurers go to war?"

That, of course, is not true. I have never, even by implication, put such a problem, and there is nothing in the article which he criticises, nor in any other statement of my own, that justifies it. What I have asked is whether peoples should go to war.

I should have thought it was pretty obvious that, whatever happens, usurers do not go to war: the peoples go to war, and the peoples pay, and the whole question is whether they should go on making war and paying for it. Mr. Chesterton says that if they are wise they will; I say that if they are wise they will not.

I have attempted to show that the prosperity of peoples—by which, of course, one means the diminution of poverty, better houses, soap and water, healthy children, lives prolonged, conditions sufficiently good to ensure leisure and family affection, fuller and completer lives generally—is not secured by fighting one another, but by co-operation and labour, by a better organisation of society, by improved human relationship, which, of course, can only come of better understanding of the conditions of that relationship, which better understanding means discussion, adjustment, a desire and capacity to see the point of view of the other man—of all of which war and its philosophy is the negation.

II.

To all of this Mr. Chesterton replies: "That only concerns the Jews and the moneylenders." Again, this is not true. It concerns all of us, like all problems of our struggle with nature. It is in part at least an economic problem, and that part of it is best stated in the more exact and precise terms that I have employed to deal with it—the terms of the marketplace. But to imply that the conditions that there obtain are the affair merely of bankers and financiers, to imply that these things do not touch the lives of the mass, is simply to talk a nonsense the meaninglessness of which only escapes some of us because in these matters we happen to be very ignorant. It is not mainly usurers who suffer from bad finance and bad economics (one may suggest that they are not quite so simple); it is mainly the people as a whole.

Mr. Chesterton says that we should break this "net of usury" in which the peoples are enmeshed. I agree heartily; but that net has been woven mainly by war (and that diversion of energy and attention from social management which war involves), and is, so far as the debts of the European States are concerned (so large an element of usury), almost solely the outcome of war. And if the peoples go on piling up debt, as they must if they are to go on piling up armaments (as Mr. Chesterton wants them to), giving the best of their attention and emotion to sheer physical conflict, instead of to organisation and understanding, they will merely weave that web of debt and usury still closer; it will load us more heavily and strangle us to a still greater extent. If usury is the enemy, the remedy is to fight usury. Mr. Chesterton says the remedy is for its victims to fight one another.

And you will not fight usury by hanging Rothschilds, for usury is worst where that sort of thing is resorted to. Widespread debt is the outcome of bad management and incompetence, economic or social, and only better management will remedy it. Mr. Chesterton is sure that better management is only arrived at by "killing and being killed." He really does urge this method even in civil matters. (He tells us that the power of Parliament over the Crown is real, and that of the people over Parliament a sham, "because men killed and were killed for the one, and not for the other.") It is the method of Spanish America, where it is applied more frankly and logically, and where still, in many places, elections are a military affair, the questions at issue being settled by killing and being killed, instead of by the cowardly, pacifist methods current in Europe. The result gives us the really military civilisations of Venezuela, Colombia, Nicaragua, and Paraguay. And, although the English system may have many defects—I think it has—those defects exist in a still greater degree where force "settles" the matters in dispute, where the bullet replaces the ballot, and where bayonets are resorted to instead of brains. For Devonshire is better than Nicaragua. Really it is. And it would get us out of none of our troubles for one group to impose its views simply by preponderant physical force, for Mr. Asquith, for instance, in the true Castro or Zuyala manner, to announce that henceforth all critics of the Insurance Act are to be shot, and that the present Cabinet will hold office as long as it can depend upon the support of the Army. For, even if the country rose in rebellion, and fought it out and won, the successful party would (if they also believed in force) do exactly the same thing to their opponents; and so it would go on never-endingly (as it has gone on during weary centuries throughout the larger part of South America), until the two parties came once more to their senses, and agreed not to use force when they happened to be able to do so; which is our present condition. But it is the condition of England merely because the English, as a whole, have ceased to believe in Mr. Chesterton's principles; it is not yet the condition of Venezuela because the Venezuelans have not yet ceased to believe those principles, though even they are beginning to.

III.

Mr. Chesterton says: "Men do judge, and always will judge, by the ultimate test of how they fight." The pirate who gives his blood has a better right, therefore, to the ship than the merchant (who may be a usurer!) who only gives his money. Well, that is the view which was all but universal well into the period of what, for want of a better word, we call civilisation. Not only was it the basis of all such institutions as the ordeal and duel; not only did it justify (and in the opinion of some still justifies) the wars of religion and the use of force in religious matters generally; not only was it the accepted national polity of such communities as the Vikings, the Barbary States, and the Red Indians; but it is still, unfortunately, the polity of certain European states. But the idea is a survival, and—and this is the important point—an admission of failure to understand where right lies: to "fight it out" is the remedy of the boy who for the life of him cannot see who is right and who is wrong.

At ten years of age we are all quite sure that piracy is a finer calling than trade, and the pirate a finer fellow than the Shylock who owns the ship—which, indeed, he may well be. But as we grow up (which some of the best of us never do) we realise that piracy is not the best way to establish the ownership of cargoes, any more than the ordeal is the way to settle cases at law, or the rack of proving a dogma, or the Spanish American method the way to settle differences between Liberals and Conservatives.

THE FUTILITY OF WAR (continued)

IV.

And just as civil adjustments are made most efficiently, as they are in England (say), as distinct from South America, by a general agreement not to resort to force, so it is the English method in the international field which gives better results than that based on force. The relationship of Great Britain to Canada or Australia is preferable to the relationship of Russia to Finland or Poland, or Germany to Alsace-Lorraine. The five nations of the British Empire have, by agreement, abandoned the use of force as between themselves. Australia may do us an injury—exclude our subjects, English or Indian, and expose them to insult—but we know very well that force will not be used against her. To withhold such force is the basis of the relationship of these five nations; and, given a corresponding development of ideas, might equally well be the basis of the relationship of fifteen—about all the nations of the world who could possibly fight. The difficulties Mr. Chesterton imagines—an international tribunal deciding in favour of Austria concerning the recession of Venice and Lombardy, and summoning the forces of United Europe to coerce Italy into submission—are, of course, based on the assumption that a United Europe, having arrived at such understanding as to be able to sink its differences, would be the same kind of Europe that it is now, or was a generation ago. If European statecraft advances sufficiently to surrender the use of force against neighbouring states, it will have advanced sufficiently to surrender the use of force against unwilling provinces, as in some measure British statesmanship has already done. To raise the difficulty that Mr. Chesterton does is much the same as assuming that a court of law in San Domingo or Turkey will give the same results as a court of law in Great Britain, because the form of the mechanism is the same. And does Mr. Chesterton suggest that the war system settles these matters to perfection? That it has worked satisfactorily in Ireland and Finland, or, for the matter of that, in Albania or Macedonia?

For if Mr. Chesterton urges that killing and being killed is the way to determine the best means of governing a country, it is his business to defend the Turk, who has adopted that principle during four hundred years, not the Christians, who want to bring that method to an end and adopt another. And I would ask no better example of the utter failure of the principles that I combat and Mr. Chesterton defends than their failure in the Balkan Peninsula.

V.

This war is due to the vile character of Turkish rule, and the Turk's rule is vile because it is based on the sword. Like Mr. Chesterton (and our pirate), the Turk believes in the right of conquest, "the ultimate test of how they fight." "The history of the Turks," says Sir Charles Elliott, "is almost exclusively a catalogue of battles. Their contributions to science, art, and literature are practically nil. Their destiny has not been to instruct or to improve, hardly even to govern, but simply to conquer." Because of the Turk's touching faith in physical force, because of his belief that, if only there were enough of it, it would solve for him the whole problem of existence, he has never learned any trade but that of conquest; he can neither build a bridge, nor run a post office, nor organise a bank, nor a court of law. He has lived (for the most gloriously uneconomic person has to live, to follow a trade of some sort, even if it be that of theft) on tribute exacted from the Christian populations, and extorted, not in return for any work of administration, but simply because he was the stronger. And that has made his rule intolerable, and is the cause of this war.

Now, my whole thesis is that understanding, work, co-operation, adjustment, must be the basis of human society; that conquest as a means of achieving national advantage must fail; that to base your prosperity or means of livelihood, your economic system, in short, upon having more force than someone else, and exercising it against him, is an impossible form of human relationship that is bound to break down. And Mr. Chesterton says that the war in the Balkans demolishes this thesis. I do not agree with him.

The present war in the Balkans is an attempt—and happily a successful one—to bring this reign of force and conquest to an end, and that is why those of us who do not believe in military force rejoice.

The debater, more concerned with verbal consistency than realities and the establishment of sound principles, will say that this means the approval of war. It does not; it merely means the choice of the less evil of two forms of war. War has been going on in the Balkans, not for a month, but has been waged by the Turk daily against these populations for 400 years.

VI.

The Balkan peoples have now brought to an end a system of rule based simply upon the accident of force—"killing and being killed." And whether good or ill comes of this war will depend upon whether they set up a similar system or one more in consonance with pacifist principles. I believe they will choose the latter course; that is to say, they will continue to co-operate between themselves instead of fighting between themselves; they will settle differences by discussion, adjustment, not force. But if they are guided by Mr. Chesterton's principle, if each one of the Balkan nations is determined to impose its own especial point of view, to refuse all settlement by co-operation and understanding, where it can resort to force—why, in that case, the strongest (presumably Bulgaria) will start conquering the rest, start imposing government by force, and will listen to no discussion or argument; will simply, in short, take the place of the Turk in the matter, and the old weary contest will begin afresh, and we shall have the Turkish system under a new name, until that in its turn is destroyed, and the whole process begun again da capo. And if Mr. Chesterton says that this is not his philosophy, and that he would recommend the Balkan nations to come to an understanding, and co-operate together, instead of fighting one another, why does he give different counsels to the nations of Christendom as a whole? If it is well for the Balkan peoples to abandon conflict as between themselves in favour of co-operation against the common enemy, why is it ill for the other Christian peoples to abandon such conflict in favour of co-operation against their common enemy, which is wild nature and human error, ignorance and passion.

THE BELOVED VAGABOND*

I.

"YOU must not be vexed at my absences. You must understand that I shall be a nomad until my days be done. I must be a bit of a vagabond. You shouldn't have had a tramp for a son." So Stevenson wrote to his mother from a London hotel in 1874. He was then but on the verge of his wanderings. For near a score of years thereafter he was to roam by sea and land, always under sentence of death, yet always gay and faithful, until, "cast out in the end, as by a sudden freshet, on these ultimate islands," he found three years' respite in Samoa e'er the end came. As he lay in bed, in a darkened room, with a clinical thermometer in his mouth, his dream was "to be the leader of a great horde of irregular cavalry (some five thousand strong) following me at a hand gallop up the road out of the burning valley by moonlight." Such was the man they wanted to make first an engineer and then a lawyer of. Once, when almost choked with blood, and unable to speak, he signed to his wife for paper and pencil, and wrote "in a neat, firm hand": "Don't be frightened; if this is death, it is an easy one." It was not death. The hand was still to write "Kidnapped," "Catriona," and "Weir of Hermiston." When death did come, it was with merciful swiftness. It found him laughing and talking gaily of work still to be done. "The noise of the mallet and chisel was scarcely quenched, the trumpets were hardly done blowing, when, trailing with him clouds of glory, this happy-starred, full-blooded spirit shot into the spiritual land." Surely Stevenson was Wordsworth's Happy Warrior. He was in love with life, and would tolerate no shadow in the eyes of his mistress. She must be as a bride adorned for her husband. And he "Was happy as a lover; and attired

With sudden brightness, like a man inspired."

II.

The appearance of a shilling edition of Mr. Graham Balfour's "Life of Stevenson" is another sign of the privileges enjoyed by the present-day book-buyer. And one wonders, sometimes, if he is alive to his privileges. Do the purchasers of this attractive-looking little volume experience anything of the thrills that agitated younger men fifteen years ago as they waited for the circulating library copy of the book that was to tell them all about a writer who had made them as personal friends? It may be doubted. Very likely the men who handle this shilling book most tenderly are the men who recall an experience. It re-awakens the sense of personal loss that smote men everywhere when the black tidings came from Samoa in 1894; yes, and the pride with which they learned how much of heroism was packed away in Stevenson's slight and fever-stricken frame, and what deliberate resolution lay behind his gay smile. Of these great qualities, of course, they knew something. He had written: "It is better to waste life like a spendthrift than to waste it like a miser. It is better to live and be done with it than to die daily in a sick-room. By all means begin your book; even if the doctor does not give you a year; even if he hesitates about a month, make one brave push and see what can be accomplished in a week. It is not only in finished undertakings that we ought to honour useful labour. A spirit goes out of the man who means execution which outlives the most untimely ending." But the full revelation came with the publication of the life story.

* "Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson." Edited by Sidney Colvin. Four vols. 5s. each. (Methuen.)

"Life of Robert Louis Stevenson." By Graham Balfour. 1s. (Methuen.)

III.

Perhaps nothing bears such tribute to Stevenson's heroism as the fact that most of his finest Scottish work was written in exile. A consumptive, driven to every climate of the world in search of health, he carried in his heart his love of Scotland and his devotion to his exquisite gift. "I feel like a gomer!" said Alan Breck, "to be leaving Scotland on a day like this. It sticks in my heid. I would maybe like it better to stay here and hing. No but France is a fine place, but it's someway no the same. It's brawer, I believe, but it's no Scotland. I like it fine when I'm there, man, yet I kind of weary for Scots divots and the Scots peat reek." It is surely of the nature of tragedy that the man who yearned for these, more than any man of his time, was compelled to live at health resorts. "The Pavilion on the Links," commenced in London, was finished in California. "The Merry Men," begun among the hills at Pitlochry, was completed at Davos. "Kidnapped" was written at Bourne-mouth, "Catriona" and "Weir of Hermiston" in the centre of the Pacific, "The Master of Ballantrae," of all books in the world, at a place called Waikiki.

IV.

It is a record that entitles Stevenson to be ranked among the greatest of Scottish exiles. In Samoa he sees "the profile of the towers and chimneys" of Edinburgh, and "the long trail of its smoke against the sunset," and hears "the sudden cry of the blackbird in a suburban lane." In California his word is this: "I'm a Scotclman; touch me, and you will find the thistle." The aspect of the Adirondacks became tolerable because it reminded him of Scotland, though "without the peat and the heather." When he was tempted to think that tropic nights were lovelier than nights in the North, he "felt shame, as at an ultimate infidelity," and immediately did penance by fancying himself in a Highland loch. When he heard a bell ring on the far shore of Pagopago, the sound suggested "the grey metropolis of the North, a village on a stream, vanished faces and silent tongues." Only once, perhaps, did Stevenson permit his poignant longing for home to master him—when he wrote, "Home, no more home to me; whither must I wander?" But to him, with his artist's eye for the light and shade of life, his exile must often have seemed a queer, romantic thing. He could admire and bow his head "before the romance of destiny." "Like Leyden, I have gone into far lands to die, not stayed like Burns to mingle in the end with Scottish soil." There never was such homesickness as Stevenson's. Yet never a touch of puling sentimentalism. Instead of sighing over the unattainable, he joyously made a Scotland for himself wherever he went.

V.

Heroic in his fight with death, Stevenson was no less heroic in his determination to pass nothing from his hand but the best. When the mood was on him he wrote in a kind of ecstasy, but behind the ecstasy lay hard discipline. In his apprenticeship days he "slogged" at his work "day in and day out," and could say, with a fine modesty, "I have done more with smaller gifts than any man of letters in the world." Some chapters in "Prince Otto" were written five or six times; one chapter, eight times. It may be that in this excessive care we face a defect. Stevenson had nothing of the large ease and splendid casualness of Scott. Indeed, it was to him a limitation in his great forerunner that, while "of the pleasures of his art he tasted fully, of its toils, and vigils, and distresses no man knew less." To Stevenson, Scott was "a great romantic—an idle child." Yet it cannot be doubted that Stevenson's fastidious pruning and almost feverish compression tend to destroy at times the romantic illusion. He felt this himself. "I am always cutting the flesh off their bones," he said of his stories. And, notwithstanding the fact that he had Meredith's approval in this—"I admire the royal manner of your cutting away of the novelist's lumber"—it may fairly be said that there are times when Stevenson gives us an exquisitely chiselled piece of statuary rather than a flesh-and-blood being. Lumber is often the hiding-place of romance. Yet no one knew better than Stevenson that "art cannot compete with life," whose "sun we cannot look upon, whose passions and diseases waste and slay us," and, further, that literature does but "drily indicate that wealth of incident, of moral obligation, of virtue, vice, action, rapture and agony with which life teems." That in his brief day he caught so much of this amazing pageant, and rendered his impressions so perfectly, is Stevenson's glory. "I never was bored in my life," he wrote once. And here he gives away much of his great secret.

W. R. T.

THE WORLD'S DEFENCE

A REPLY TO LADY MARGARET SACKVILLE

YOU read not our meaning truly, oh, Woman, whom we adore!
 Have we not opened all paths to you, and only closed one door?
 For yours are the ways of honour, of art, and sacrifice, Of influence, skill, and service, beyond a measure or price.
 And yet you would help to frame the laws, the laws that bind and make,
 Forgetting your nobler mission, of binding the hearts that break;
 Of soothing the suffering children, and giving the intimate touch
 Of your womanly love and sympathy, that mean, oh, mean so much.
 We are not slothful to mark the time—yours the delay and blame;
 We try with patience yet to prove the wisdom of your claim.
 But not by riot and ruin, by taunting threat and noise,
 Is injustice changed to freedom and woes to highest joys.
 'Tis you, oh, Woman, whom we adore, who holds the golden key
 Of life, and love, and power, and the city that is to be;
 'Tis you who must nourish the hidden good, with your work, and prayer, and tears,
 And hasten the harvest of righteousness, the glory of future years.

C. W.

AN APPEAL TO THE WOMAN'S MOVEMENT

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

I.

ADDRESSING a company of women journalists, not many days ago, Lord Northcliffe told them that, without the large regiments which they now supply to the Press, modern newspapers and magazines would never have attained to the enormous circulation that is a wonder of the age. More than fifty per cent. of journalists, he added, were women. It is equally certain that those who write and those who read novels are of the same sex; and the novel, as a form of literature, exceeds in popularity any other which the world has ever seen. The short or the long story has ousted from the circulating library most other books except works of travel, and biographies are more or less known in proportion to the scandalous gossip they contain. Women's novels, formerly but a small item in the list, now predominate. Long before votes for women were discussed, an army of writers, rushing upon the footsteps of Charlotte Brontë and George Eliot, had come to the front; and they fixed at once on the love-story as their field of conquest.

II.

Feminism in literature is the note which sounds everywhere in our ears. Poetry, philosophy, history, criticism, all masculine achievements, are giving place to the subjects that take women's hearts captive; but even motherhood yields to love-making. The theme is not any longer Faust and Marguerite, but Marguerite and Faust. Neither is any prologue demanded in Heaven, or a prelude to announce the student's despair of knowledge before he falls in love. It is true that most of these plays and stories are problems in a sense. But not the large problems of life. They turn on the same question always, which, with Goethe, we may call that of elective affinities; yet these affinities not being considered stable, our chemistry or alchemy of the passions tends to appear as a series of moving pictures. Goethe was too simple for the complex twentieth century.

III.

Anyone who looks over a railway bookstall may convince himself that current literature appeals to much the same instincts as the music-hall caters for, and in a fashion not unlike. On the covers of magazines and novels we discern the music-hall face, with its well-known type of allurements, which is also made the common feature in wall-posters, in playbills, and in newspaper advertisements. The letterpress corresponds to the pictorial art. There is seldom any other theme, except murderous adventure; and this, too, springs from thwarted passion. The change that has taken place in illustrated commercial puffery of quack medicines or of cheap clothing would have scandalised mid-Victorians, both men and women. No doubt such unpleasant Holywell Street methods are deliberately invented for purposes of exploitation. But although not solicited by the public, that they should be tolerated without one word of protest, and that great sums should be spent in spreading them over whole pages of our daily prints, are signs not very difficult to interpret. When literature, art, and commerce make such an appeal on every side to an indolent or amused people, we know what is happening.

IV.

If now we open one of the numberless novels thus commended to our study, we shall not expect to find in it any lofty, austere, bracing lesson. The women that write for women under these covers appear to be, in the strict significance of the term, anarchists. For such there is no law. Marriage is an association, not a contract. The affinities of their heroines, which justify whatever they do, are many and various, but never to be condemned. A wife may desert her unoffending husband, leave her little child to die, pursue and run down the man she fancies, quit him for another, be divorced, and take up with as many more as she chooses; yet this edifying tale, a woman's composition, will be accepted with joy by an eminent publishing house, and in cheap editions crowd our bookstalls. To say that Free Love painted with vivid imagery, told of in a language by no means reserved, with praise, with conviction, will leave readers, themselves young and impressionable, as it found them is neither hypocrisy nor sophistry, but a falsehood. One must answer, like Talleyrand, "Who is taken in here?"

AN APPEAL TO THE WOMAN'S MOVEMENT

(Continued)

V.

To read nothing but the tale of love, though unspoil by lower motives, is to relax the nerves of self-control. To deal with questions of life and conduct as merely matters of sex-attraction is profoundly inhuman. To weaken respect for the marriage-bond, making it subject to caprice, to passages of feeling, and to appetite, is a crime for which the writer (who cannot help teaching, whatever be the imaginative form selected) must answer to God and man. To woman also; and if it is a woman that sins in this manner, does she not commit treason to the sisterhood? Sentiment, avowedly changeable, invoked to justify freedom, will never have the force of law; and when desertion ceases to be illegal, it is not the man who is likely to suffer most. Break up the family by unlimited divorce, make it impossible by elective affinities ranging far and wide, the moral anarchy would be such as no civilisation could endure and live. Yet such is the aim of these female incendiaries, ethical petroleuses, who employ the pen or the typewriter instead of the torch, and are paid handsomely by a thoughtless public for their work of destruction. One pities the poor girl who sells herself to get a meal; one cannot pity these adepts in a worse than courtesan literature.

VI.

They are deadly to the character, as they would ruin the happiness, of their fellow-women. But here is the task awaiting those feminine leaders who want votes and privileges hitherto denied them in order to protect the innocent, the helpless, whom man-made laws have neglected or trodden down. Let them cleanse the literature of women from these exceedingly foul stains. Men cannot do it. The standard of female purity, in romance as in reality, must be fixed by women themselves. It is in their power to check the circulation of unwholesome books in our libraries if they will. They, by a vast majority over men, determine what kind of novels shall be in demand. This free leprosy, as it has been well called, is scattered abroad, thanks to their approval or connivance. It owes all its success to the deliberate propaganda of vice on one side, and to the prurient curiosity or disdainful acquiescence in bad customs on the other, which a movement like that for women's suffrage ought never to leave unassailed. With opportunities of action comes the duty of acting aright. Is Lord Northcliffe justified in saying that from fifty to sixty per cent. of journalists are women? If so, they must elevate the tone of this incessant teaching, or it will degrade them. Unhappily, the ideals of womanhood have been so fiercely called in question that the trumpet gives an uncertain sound. Many women prefer, so they declare, to escape the burden of maternity in marriage. And the strange, nay, the horrible, conditions that prevail in our crowded city life tell upon every class, but do not make for virtue.

VII.

In the woman's movement there is need to affirm continually that instinct should obey law—not the changing law of Congress or Parliament, but that law which is the very nature of Humanity, and in which alone is moral freedom. These energetic leaders want to do away with white slavery in all its forms, knowing it to be the slavery of their own sex. Well, in the novels and sketches that preach an unfettered passion, that decry marriage, and glorify suicide when lust cannot be otherwise appeased, they have the subject of a great crusade. Any library list, any open book-stall, will give them instances and specimens of that which they are to attack. I am not addressing pruders or Puritans. I do not invoke principles which are peculiar to one or other Christian denomination. I rely on the common faith which we all share that human affection is more than brute feeling; that marriage ought to be a life-long contract; and that motherhood is its crown. To the women called by a foolish name suffragettes, to the thousands engaged in journalism, I say, Do not praise, do not suffer, books or illustrations which tend to destroy marriage and motherhood by advocating Free Love.

TWO POEMS BY JOHN MASEFIELD

THE HARP

(From the Spanish of Don Gustavo A. Bécquer)

In a dark corner of the room,
Perhaps forgotten by its owner,
Silent and dim with dust
I saw the harp.

How many musics slumbered in its string
As the bird sleeps on the branches,
Waiting the hand of snow
That could awaken them?

"Ah me," I thought, "how many many times
Genius thus slumbers in a human heart,
Waiting, as Lazarus waited, for a voice
To bid him rise and walk."

DEAD CALM

(From Goethe)

Deep peace holds on the water,
Without stir the sea sleeps,
And the shipman grieves to see it
How calm the water keeps.
No wind from any quarter!
It is death still like a pall!
In all that width of water
No wave stirs at all.

TRAMPING AFLOAT * * * A STORY BY STEPHEN REYNOLDS

To everyone's surprise, Stokes won the humorous old boys' event at the school sports. He squatted down before his little heap of potatoes; peeled them as if, since leaving school, he had worked in a cookshop; satisfied the judging committee of ladies that his rinds were not too thick; and took for his first prize a quite good morocco pocket-case. By evening, at the old boys' supper, where his prize was passed round for a chaffing inspection, he had already placed inside it a seaman's certificate of discharge, on which—again rather to our surprise—his character for conduct and character for ability were both stamped "Very good."

"That's what won me the prize," he said; "that and the Leghorn drinking water and a sea-cook. I served my tatie-peeling apprenticeship at sea. Had to. . . It's perfectly true!"

"When I left school, you know, I wanted to go to sea, and I didn't go; and ever since then I've been bothered with a wish that I had; or, at any rate, I wished it until last spring, when I did go. Yes, and I still wish it, right at the back of my mind, only—well, I don't intend to go. I got cured of that."

"But I did go—once—just to see what it was really like—and I had an idea, although I was over-age, of worming myself into the merchant service somehow. So I shipped as purser in a little Welsh tramp, which took sticky coal-dust out to Italian ports and brought home onions, hides, bark-extract for tanning, and rotten, frost-bitten oranges. Phew! the combined stink! She is one of the smallest steamers that goes regularly across the Bay to the Mediterranean—a good deal under a thousand tons register. All the five officers were Welsh-speaking Welshmen—Evan Williams, or William Evans, mostly, by name—and her crew consisted of a couple of Greeks, a couple of English boys, steward, cook, and seven Spaniards, not one of whom could steer, except in big S's. You pointed the course to them on the compass-card; they hadn't any English worth mentioning."

"A rusty little cargo-box of a ship. . . Her sister-ship foundered with all hands in the Bay while we were coming up through it, and there wasn't any sea to speak of; we only rolled and rolled till we woke up with sore ribs. It might just as well have been us with Davy Jones—a Welshman originally, no doubt."

"Whether our old biscuit-box paid her shareholders, I don't know. She paid the shipping people who managed her, insured her against desirable wreck, and rushed her in and out of port so that her officers hardly knew their own children."

"Seeing I was paid a nominal wage of a bob a month, in order not to come under passenger regulations, I wasn't expected to do much. But I made myself pretty useful. I took one of the steam winches adrift and cleaned it, and kept parts of watches on the bridge, while the mate winked and the skipper dossed, and in the engine-room, while the chief engineer, who stood his watch in that ship, kept an eye on the mate's navigation and the mate chivvied the Spaniards round. Also I acted as interpreter ashore. You ought to have seen us buying eggs in Bastia market. The steward, in Welsh, told the skipper what was wanted; who told me in English; who told the old egg-woman's daughter in French; who told the old woman herself in the Corsican dialect of French and Italian mixed. She wanted to sell us nineteen eggs for twenty, because, she said, they were big ones, and the steward wouldn't have it. For half an hour or so we haggled, backwards and forwards along the line, and, by the time we compromised on something else, I was sweating all over.

"Besides that, I took on ship's doctor, after the skipper had nearly poisoned me with his doses of quinine. And I had my suspicions of that Leghorn drinking water. It came aboard so dirty from the little water-tank steamer. I refused to drink it except from the boiler in the galley. The others did, and they were all bad—horribly bad—with cramps in their insides and so forth. The skipper, a jolly little man, rounder than he was long, who had started his sea life as a ship's cook, and who used to light one pipe after another, saying dismally, 'More nails in me coffin!'—he thought his coffin was going to be nailed down. The mate was morosely unwell, but drove on with his work. A poor old chap, grey and solid—a thumb-like man, just out of an asylum and beyond hope of a command—he knew how to work his calculations, but his addled brain couldn't do the arithmetic, and, on the quiet, he used to get me to add and multiply for him. Otherwise he'd have lost his berth. He didn't seem a bit grateful, but one afternoon he took me along to his cabin (the mate's cabin swarmed with bugs) and pointed to a photograph on the wall of a stout, motherly-looking woman."

"My wife," he grunted.

"It was his mark of confidence, his thanks."

"The chief engineer, too, was rather ill: a fine little chap who used to read Latin and Greek for pastime. The second mate was indisposed, but nobody troubled much about him. He was so deep in love, and saving so hard for his furniture, that he used to send us all ashore for cigarettes, and invariably forgot to pay up. The steward sang hymns to console his interior, but I almost felt it served him right for giving us tinned tripe for dinner in blazing hot weather because he liked the beastly stuff himself."

"Several of the crew were more or less ill. One of the Spaniards came aft, complaining violently by signs of a sore throat and chest. 'Me bad—bad—much bad!' The skipper gave him castor oil—and more castor oil. 'That's the stuff,' he said, 'for them Spaniards. He knows we're calling at Valencia, and wants his discharge in his own country. Castor oil cures that if you make 'em drink it often enough.' The Spaniard, however, refused to get better, and at Bastia, as a safeguard, the skipper notified the Consul, who sent aboard a grubby French doctor with a long, square-cut, chestnut beard."

"'Un peu de bronchite,' said the doctor. 'Bronchitis—vot!' said the skipper. 'Them Spaniards ain't got no right to have bronchitis.' The doctor sent some medicine. The skipper continued the castor oil treatment all the same, and the Spaniard did get better."

"But it was a different matter when the cook, a young Welshman, hardly more than a boy, was taken ill with a throat and fever. That disarranged everything. The medicine chest was on the floor in the saloon, alongside the stove, and the skipper had a chair brought him, in which he sat and pondered over the chest, smoking his pipe, reading the book of plain directions—very plain directions—and fingering the bottles. He picked out a clinical thermometer."

TRAMPING AFLOAT (continued)

"That's for fever, isn't it?"

"Yes," I explained. "It's for taking the temperature—for finding out how much fever there is."

"Can you work the thing?" he asked. And on my telling him I could, he said, "Well, you better come to the fo'c'stle 'long with me, and try it. That damn young cook belongs to the next village to mine."

"Outside the fo'c'stle door there was a litter of vegetable garbage that the ship's boys hadn't cleared away, and inside . . . Good Lord! To sleep in it! To be ill in it! A sort of dim triangular steel cellar, with wooden bunks, like sacks, up the sides. The rusty iron walls were running with condensed breath and moisture, on which the light made little flickers of rainbow colours, as it does on a sluice. Two or three of the Spanish stokers had turned in, without washing, under their dirty brown blankets, and while they slept the sweat was trickling down the black on their faces. The atmosphere—well, one knows what atmosphere is considered good enough for seamen. They have to get used to it, and they couldn't have opened the ports there, because the sea was beating up the bows of the ship.

"The cook's temperature was nearly six above normal. So far as one could see in the light, his throat had greyish patches in it, and next day the greyish scum had spread all over his throat. It was diphtheria right enough.

"Very secretly I told the skipper. His eyes went almost as round as his round face, and he decided not to have the cook aft. 'If it's only them Spaniards catches it—'

"And, being odd man about ship, I took on part of the cook's job. That's to say, I acted as scullery-maid to the steward, and peeled a big bucketful of potatoes every day—got rather a dab-hand at it. Then I saw what sort of messes the crew used to fetch away from the galley in the pannikins for food. A sporting dog, fed once a day and well exercised, might have relished it. I wasn't sorry I grubbed with the skipper, though we, too, had plenty of salt junk. But one gets rather to like the flavour out of the soft woodenness of that. I could do a bit now.

"The skipper and I kept the diphtheria a dead secret between us, each for his own reasons. He didn't want to be held up in quarantine, and I . . . You see, I'm sort of engaged—"

"To Elsie Turner?"

"Why not? Confound you! But I hadn't decided when I went for that voyage whether I'd take to sea-life, which would have meant, of course, postponing any actual engagement. Then I decided quite suddenly and definitely that I couldn't go to sea, and after that I was keen to get home and get engaged—or try my luck, anyhow. I didn't want to be held up. By Jove, I didn't—not when I'd come to a decision! We watched and nursed the cook. . . . Lord, how we watched him! One could feel all the time the presence of that infernal diphtheria up in the fo'c'stle. It was like a ghost aboard.

"But we weren't held up. He got well enough for us to make out a clean bill of health at Liverpool, and, having tipped the dock-gate policeman half a dollar, I drove out with my Corsican tobacco, unsearched. The tobacco went bad, or something, but I won the fair lady, as they say, and I've won the tatic-peeling prize."

"And that," we said, "is all you wanted of sea-life? You didn't think much of the sea, after all?"

"It's the finest life on earth," Stokes replied. "Or it would be if the land sharks didn't spoil it. Only I reckon you want to start young. I don't much wonder at the cry for boys to go to sea. They wouldn't go older, unless they were starving. I wouldn't. I don't mean to say I didn't have a jolly fine time myself. Ripping little dinners we used to have ashore—the skipper, the chief engineer, and myself—even when we had to draw poached eggs on a piece of paper because we didn't know what Spanish recently-laid called themselves. But I wouldn't live in a fo'c'stle like that, and eat their grub, besides doing their work and taking their risks in well-insured ships. No. By no means. It made me uncomfortable to have to see it under one's nose. Have you ever noticed that, on the whole, the trades carried on under the worst conditions are those out of sight, out of mind; in which men start youngest; where the youngsters get ground-in early and tied up to the job; and where the oldsters, instead of bettering things, can turn round on the youngsters and say, 'I had to go through it. Why shouldn't you?'"

THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the articles on the neglect of German.

It has always appeared to me that the study of foreign languages could be made much easier if other methods could be adopted than those generally in vogue.

By placing the original in juxtaposition with a translation the student would be given a better opportunity of studying that foreign language which it is his endeavour to master.

I now send you a poem by one of our best German poets, with a translation attached.—I am, sir, etc.,

Wiesbaden, October 29th, 1912.

BOTHMER.

NACHTS

By JOSEF, FREIHERR VON EICHENDORFF, 1788-1857

(Translated from the German by Count Alfred von Bothmer)

Ich wandre durch die stille Nacht,
Da schleicht der Mond so heimlich sacht
Oft aus der dunkeln Wolkenhülle,
Und hin und her im Tal
Erwacht die Nachtigall,
Dann wieder alles grau und stille.

O wunderbarer Nachtgesang:
Von fern im Land der Ströme Gang,
Leis schauern in den dunkeln Bäumen
Wirrst die Gedanken mir,
Mein irres Singen hier
Ist wie ein Rufen nur aus Träumen.

[ENGLISH TRANSLATION.]

NIGHT

I wander through the peaceful night,
And silently the pale moon's light
Athwart the banks of dark clouds creeps,
Now and then in the vale
Awakes the nightingale,
And then again all nature sleeps.

How wondrous the night's music seems:
The distant sound of flowing streams,
The gentle shivering of the leaves
Perplex my ev'ry thought,
My ut'rances are wrought
Like fitful sighs a slumberer heaves.

GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY * * * BY E. HERMANN III.—BISHOP GORE

I.

WHEN Canon Gore was appointed Bishop of Worcester, not a few voices were raised in dismay at the prospect of so fiery a spiritual force being extinguished beneath a mitre. Canon Gore himself, indeed, gave some excuse for gloomy prognostications, for had he not said that a bishop could not be a pioneer; that one of his chief functions was to be conservative, to maintain unity, to hold things together, to be, in fact, a moderator? But while it may be a bishop's part to be conservative, while it was undoubtedly the chief glory of the then Canon of Westminster to be revolutionary, the prophesied tragic combat between prophet and administrator, in which both might perish but the former would never come off victor, never took place. For Charles Gore had long before embraced the ideal of Community life, and so learnt the lesson that a man can only do his duty by a wise and severe neglect of "duties." This art and grace of holy neglect he brought to his episcopal task, and soon recognised how many of its duties were meant to be dutifully shirked, which, in practical ecclesiastical language, works out to at least a couple of Suffragans, a secretary with brains, and an expert stenographer. By whatever means he secured it, the Bishop of Oxford stands to-day as free from the incubus of mechanical administrative activity as a man can be in this machinery-ridden world of ours. He is not an oiler of ecclesiastical machinery, but a generator of driving power; a prophet first, then an official, and a very unofficial one at that.

II.

In two main ways Bishop Gore has captured the attention of the age—as a liberal theological thinker, a "higher critic," if we like that much-abused word, and as a Christian Socialist. There are, indeed, some ultra-modern twentieth-century persons who would contend that these two things are rapidly becoming "back numbers." They would tell us that, with the passing of the nineteenth century, theology has passed from criticism to reconstruction, and Socialism from a sentiment to a policy. Like most plausible young generalisations, this is not nearly as true as it looks. As a matter of fact, few men were so palpably ahead of their time as Bishop Gore, and, looking over his early utterances, one is struck by what, for want of a better word, might be called their "recency." These things which bear dates of a generation ago might have been said yesterday; some of them, indeed, are going to be said to-morrow by men who were not yet born when Canon Gore uttered them. In theology, for instance, the combination of a broad, critical attitude with the most passionate devotion to the dogmas of the Church is anything but nineteenth-century; it is, if one may venture to prophesy, mid-twentieth. Or, to come to the more popular ground of social doctrine, how many out-and-out nineteenth-century Socialists grounded their convictions upon the sanctions upon which Canon Gore grounded his? Nothing was more characteristic even of Christian Socialism in the nineteenth century than its inadequate basis of humanitarianism, its constant appeal to the rights and brotherhood of man. There were few who, on being told that they were responsible for their brethren, asked, Responsible to whom, and to what? Canon Gore, from the first, as a Christian Socialist based his Socialism upon the mystery of the Incarnation; not upon the cry of wronged men, but upon the grace of a redeeming God. He stood for the only Christian Socialism that can co-exist with the dry, hard, materialistic Socialism which has supervened upon the early sentimental stages. And he would be a bold man who would maintain that this severe and searching type of Christian Socialism, at once awesomely mystical and quite uncomfortably practical and radical, has "arrived," even at this late day, in any wide, general sense.

III.

To hear Bishop Gore preach is to realise, once and for all, how little great preaching owes to oratory. With little grace of language or delivery, with no startling turns of thought or posing of paradoxes, he achieves that dynamic effect which spells greatness. When we attempt to penetrate to the ultimate factors in this effect, we recognise on the surface unusual gifts of forcefulness, directness, and understanding of the complex needs of men. He speaks simply, earnestly, quietly, without a trace of assumption or pretentiousness, but his words strike home where oratory often misses the mark. Delving below that, we come upon the characteristic humility of the born teacher, whose ambition it is not to show of his own knowledge, but to make his pupils understand; not to be brilliant, but to help dull minds into the kingdom of knowledge. Like every true teacher, he is not afraid of repeating himself, and never dreams of apologising for his repetitions. That is what he is there for: to say the same thing over and over again till it is grasped. But with this humility goes a more imperious thing—the note of authority. He is more than a pedagogue: he is a bearer of the Divine Word, a mediator of mysteries. That this authority makes no show and does not clamour for recognition only serves to increase its power. It is self-evidencing and self-authenticated. And tracing this unshakable and mastering conviction of authority as deeply into the recesses of the preacher's personality as a stranger can and may, we are left gazing into the clear yet unfathomable waters of a soul that lives in a first-hand intimacy with the things it proclaims. Sometimes this revealing glimpse comes suddenly, perhaps in the midst of one of his trenchant indictments of social unrighteousness. In an instant, through the passion of his vivid sympathy with the wrongs of man, one catches a flicker of that interior light which is the life of the man: one divines a "withdrawn" soul, and is granted a sudden look into its real world, the mysterious and profound world of instant spiritual communion.

IN the next number of EVERYMAN we shall publish an article by Mr. Hilaire Belloc on the "Servile State." We hope that M. Emile Vandervelde, the distinguished Belgian, will start a symposium on the burning question of Industrial Unrest, to which Mr. H. G. Wells will contribute. Canon Barry's article will deal with "Feminism in Literature." The number will also include, among other items, a sketch of Joseph Conrad, by Richard Curle, and a short story.

JOHN KNOX'S INFLUENCE ON SCOTTISH EDUCATION * * * * BY LORD GUTHRIE

I.

THE public and the experts equally acknowledge John Knox as Scotland's greatest churchman, constructive as well as destructive. But it is not so universally admitted that, through his influence on Scottish education, he was also her most influential statesman.

Before the Reformation, the Roman Church in Scotland was perhaps more vulnerable than in any other country, because she was less true to her own ideals, and because she was comparatively wealthier; accordingly, her defence was feebler, and her fall more sudden and complete than elsewhere. Her vast possessions—about half the wealth of the nation—tempted the powerful; all the more because these possessions, lands, buildings, gold and jewels, had been, in many cases, extorted, through superstitious fears, from the impenitent and the dying, whose successors had thus a plausible excuse for their forcible recovery. The support of the common people was alienated by the licence and dishonesty of the Church's officials (with shining exceptions), their undisguised use of sacred office for selfish ends, and their neglect of the poor and of the education of the young. In 1549, eleven years before the Reformation, a Provincial Council of the very Scots Catholic clergy themselves found that the two roots and causes of the troubles in the Church were "the corruption of morals and profane lewdness of life in churchmen of almost all ranks, together with crass ignorance of literature and of all the liberal arts." And Sir David Lyndesay, Lyon King-at-Arms, Knox's contemporary and friend, thus described them:—

"They grew so subject to Dame Sensuall,
And thought but paine poor people for to teach."

Notwithstanding, lay education was not, as some seem to assume, introduced into Scotland for the first time in 1560, at the Reformation. There were educational reformers, churchmen and laymen, before Knox, although their vision was less democratic. Of the four Universities, Edinburgh alone is Post-Reformation. St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen were founded during the previous century. Secondary schools cannot fairly be credited to the Reformation; for there were none in Scotland worth the name till the nineteenth century. The junior classes in the Universities did their work.

What can be credited incontestably to Knox and his associates is the splendid stimulus given by them, directly and indirectly, in theory and eventually in result, to the quantity and quality of elementary education among the masses of the Scottish people.

Before the Reformation there were Grammar Schools in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Perth, Stirling, Dumbarton, and Haddington. Perth Grammar School, in the sixteenth century, had 300 boys in it; of whom, by the way, it is told that, shortly after 1550, influenced by Sir David Lyndesay's biting "Satire of the Three Estates," they hissed down a friar, who was denouncing the Reforming preachers. And, at a time when the population of Scotland, instead of nearly five millions as it is now, did not exceed half a million, there were, according to Archbishop Spottiswoode's list, one hundred and twenty convents and twenty-three nunneries in Scotland, many of which had a school attached. No doubt the large majority of the boys in these schools were destined for the Church, but not by any means all of them. The point is that most of the boys in Pre-Reformation schools, who were not embryo priests, were the sons of the gentry, and not of those whom the old Scots Psalter calls "the humble folk." It was to the latter that this man was sent from God, whose name was John Knox. The Reformers' cardinal principle of the right and duty of private judgment (however much ignored in practice) made it essential that every member of the Church, lay as well as clerical, should be able to read for himself the Book which was to be the final standard. From a more mundane point of view, Scotsmen have always appreciated Bailie Nicol Jarvie's opinion that "the multiplication table is the root of all useful knowledge!"

As to Knox's contemporaries, the acknowledged leader of every enterprise, whether a Reformation, a campaign, or an exploring expedition, inevitably carries off most of the credit. Thus to Knox alone are usually attributed the views and utterances which were, in truth, the joint views and utterances of the able and learned men, lay and clerical, who, with Knox, held the helm and worked the guns of the Reformation ship.

These views and utterances are to be found in "The Book of Discipline," prepared by the Scots Reformers and discussed at a Convention of the Scots Estates in 1560-61, but never adopted by Parliament, which the historian, Professor Hume Brown, calls "in many respects the most important public document in the history of Scotland." It treats at length of universities and secondary schools, and of many other matters, human and divine. But its most famous passage deals with elementary education, and runs thus:—"This must be carefully provided that no father, of what estate or condition that ever he be, use his children at his own fantasy, especially in their youth-head. But all must be compelled to bring up their children in learning and virtue." Knox was the chief driving-force in the whole Reformation movement, and no doubt the Book of Discipline was dominated by his masterful spirit; but these words may just as likely have been Master John Row's or John Erskine's, Laird of Dun, of whose interest in education we have, in the case of both, the strongest evidence.

Even the idea of Compulsory Education was known in Scotland before the Reformation. By the very remarkable Act of the Scots Parliament, dated in 1496, in the reign of James IV., seventeen years before that cultured monarch fell at Flodden, it was "ordained that all Barons and Freeholders that are of substance put their eldest sons and heirs to the schools."

Yet the contrast between this passage and the one quoted above from the Book of Discipline will be at once apparent. The Act of 1496 had in view schooling for the eldest sons and heirs of nobles and wealthy commoners. The Book of Discipline insisted on education for all boys of all classes, without limitation to eldest sons and heirs. Although Knox was a scholar and had been accustomed, as a chaplain of Edward VI., to the atmosphere of one of the most punctilious Courts in Europe, he was throughout a man of, and for, the common people. In antagonism to the whole spirit of the times, he wrote: "Have respect unto your poor brethren, the labourers of the ground."

In the Book of Discipline, Knox and his colleagues appear at first sight to demand compulsory education regardless of sex, because, in the passage above quoted, they use the term "children" in contrast with "sons" in the Act of 1496. But, alas! this view cannot be supported, for the passage goes on: "The rich and potent may not be permitted to suffer their children to spend their youth in vain idleness, as heretofore they have done. But they must be exhorted and, by the censure of the Church, compelled to dedicate their sons

(Continued on page 152.)

The History of Science is the real history of man; because what he does depends upon what he thinks and what he knows. The History of Science is therefore of supreme importance and of supreme interest.

THE FREE BOOK

will give you :
 An admirable summary of each book and a list of its chapter headings.
 The names of the Scientist Authors.
 The number and scope of the illustrations.
 The cheap price and very easy terms on which this delightful series is supplied.

THE Science History
 OF THE Universe

COMPLETE IN 10 HANDY LITTLE VOLUMES.

LIST OF THE VOLUMES.

- I. ASTRONOMY
- II. GEOLOGY
- III. PHYSICS
- IV. CHEMISTRY
- V. BIOLOGY
- VI. ZOOLOGY
- VII. ANTHROPOLOGY
- VIII. MATHEMATICS
- IX. ART & LETTERS
- X. PHILOSOPHY

These little Books, any one of which can be slipped into the pocket, offer in a popular form the history of the extraordinary development of science from the earliest ages to our own time. Their aim is to give to busy men and women that general knowledge of the history, methods, and uses of every known science which it is more and more necessary for every intelligent person to possess to-day.

This series is a model of simplicity and clearness; and it is issued at a price and on terms that bring it within reach of every worker and reader in the country.

The Wonderful Story of what Man has Done.

I. Astronomy

Shows how man found out the position of the world he lives in, and goes on to explain the marvels of the Solar System.

II. Geology

Shows how man learned of what the earth is composed, and mastered the knowledge belonging to Mines and Mining.

III. Physics

Shows the laws that govern matter; explains Sound, Light, and Heat, and ends with an elucidation of Wireless Telegraphy.

IV. Chemistry

Shows the changes to which matter is subjected, and how the waste of the world is turned into wealth. Explains the great Food Markets of the universe and the part played by science to-day in their exploitation.

V. Biology

Shows us the evolution of the Science of Life, and explains how the same fundamental classes of phenomena are common to both Plant Life and Animal Life.

VI. Zoology

Shows us the truth of the saying that to know the Animal Life of the world is to know the world. A well-thought-out exposition of the origin and relationship of Animals. This little book offers an excellent foundation for the study of species. Half of the volume is devoted to Botany; this explains the wonders of reproduction, adaptation, growth and variation.

VII. Anthropology

Shows the development of the scientific study of Man; tells of black, brown, yellow, red, and white men and their various characteristics. This is the most fascinating little book ever written.

VIII. Mathematics

Shows the principles of exact knowledge and how they were at first defined. "Applied Mathematics," the second part of the book, explains mathematical instruments, and goes on to tell of the Aeroplane, the Biplane, and various Flying Machines.

IX. Art & Letters

Shows the evolution of the first Alphabets, and explains the development of learning, the modern novel, the drama of the day, and the masterpieces of the world on canvas and in stone.

X. Philosophy

Shows us the real values in life. This book tells about Law, Ethics, Religion, Society, Labour, Capital, etc., and all that these have stood for since the time of Aristotle to our own day. There is also included a sound treatise on the study of Psychology, the daughter of Philosophy, which has so recently been advanced to the dignity of a science.

SEND FOR THE FREE BOOK TO-DAY.

ACCEPTANCE OF THIS OFFER OF THE FREE BOOK CARRIES WITH IT NO OBLIGATION TO ORDER THE WORK.

If you do order, you may have the Books at once, and pay for them by a few small monthly sums after the extra Christmas expenses are over.

To the Waverley Book Co., Ltd., 7 & 8, Old Bailey, London, E.C.

Please send me your Free Book on "The Science History of the Universe," with particulars as to your offer to deliver the ten little volumes for a first payment of 2s. 6d. It is understood that I am under no obligation to order the work.

Name (Send this form or a postcard.)

Address

E.M.E., 1912.

to the profit of the Church and to the Commonwealth"; and there is a corresponding statement about the poor. There is no sign in the Book of Discipline of the modern idea, now rapidly revolutionising society and destined in time to receive universal, if reluctant, acceptance, that girls and women are entitled, not only in elementary but also in secondary schools and Universities, equally with men, to the benefits of education, and to the opportunities and careers, private and public, which education makes possible. Knox's acquiescence in the prevalent view was the less excusable when it is remembered that his first wife, Marjorie Bowes, of the great English county family of Bowes, of Streatham, in Durham County, as well as his second wife, the Hon. Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree, were both well-educated women.

II.

Another fallacy in connection with Knox's influence on Scottish education is the idea that his views received immediate and full effect. Instead of this, the leading principle in the Book of Discipline—that elementary education should be provided by the State for all boys of school age, of all classes, in all parts of Scotland—received comparatively little effect, outside populous centres, till 1696, when schools were finally organised, on a parochial system, all over Scotland, by the "Act for Settling of Schools," enacted by the Scots Parliament in that year. It did not receive full effect till the passing of Lord Young's Education Act of 1872, severing all connection between the Church and Education, and setting up a popularly elected School Board in every parish in Scotland. The design and effect of Lord Young's Act was to supersede the voluntary system; whereas the English Education Act of 1870 was intended, as Mr. Forster said in the House of Commons, "to complete the voluntary system, and to fill up gaps, not to supplant it."

Knox's other great principle, that of compulsory education, received little popular favour till the nineteenth century, and no statutory recognition till the passing of the 1872 Act. Only thirty years before 1872 it was advocated by my father, on an Edinburgh platform, before an unsympathetic audience. When he sat down a Scotch Episcopal Bishop said to him that he also approved of Compulsory Education. "Then why do you not get up and say so?" asked my father. "Get up and say so! They would think me mad!" was the Bishop's reply.

The fact is that, until last century, for a variety of reasons, neither principle was capable of anything like complete application in any part of Scotland, not even in the Lowlands. In the Highlands and Islands there were the barriers of the Gaelic language and the want of bilingual teachers, the absence of means of communication by land or sea, the poverty of the people, their fatal contentment with their wretched conditions, physical and intellectual, and their suspicion of any thing, civil or ecclesiastical, however good, coming out of the Nazareth of the Lowlands. In a lesser degree, all these causes operated in the Lowlands, except the language question, and the provincial jealousy. In addition, there was the opinion (still held by some among the so-called "better classes," but nowadays, except in anonymous newspaper letters, seldom expressed) that education takes working men and women "out of their rightful place," disqualifying them for their proper duties, and not fitting them for higher callings. It was not the fault of the authors of the Book of Discipline that the share of the endowments of the Roman Church, which they wished to be assigned to education—university, secondary, and elementary—was appropriated by the Crown and the nobles. It is all the more to their credit that, notwithstanding, they and their successors provided Scotland with a system of education that, with all its shortcomings, gave her an advantage over every other country in Europe. In 1820, Lord

Brougham, introducing his "Bill for the better education of the poor in England and Wales," stated that "in Scotland, every parish has one or more schools; while, in England, out of 20,000 ecclesiastical parishes, 3,500 have no school."

The educational principles of the Book of Discipline were among the great formative influences in the national development of Scotland, supplying, down the generations, a "stimulating ideal," to use Dr. Hay Fleming's phrase in his "Reformation in Scotland." Their adoption throughout by the Church, although not until recently by the State, made the absence of education, at least to the extent of being able to read the Bible, a reproach in the Lowlands of Scotland, among the poor, as well as among the well-to-do, as it never was, and is not now, in England. There is no feature, in decent Scottish peasant and artisan life, more singular and more hopeful than the value attached to education, even in the most unlikely quarters.

In addition, sufficient educational credit has never been given to the Presbyterian Church, which Knox and his coadjutors helped to found. At no period in the history of Scottish Presbyterianism, whether within or without the State Church, has any man been able to obtain orders, unless in the most exceptional circumstances, without a lengthened University course in letters and divinity. In the case of the laity, every Presbyterian congregation, Established and Dissenting, in every Scottish parish, has its body of elders (an office which is looked on as the supreme mark of a neighbourhood's confidence and respect), and, for the office of elder, a certain amount of education has always been required. All this has reacted on the people; thus Daniel Defoe, writing in 1717 about his visit to Scotland, reported:—"In a whole churchful of people, not one shall be seen without a Bible, a custom almost forgotten in England. In a Church in Scotland, if you shut your eyes, when the minister names any text of Scripture, you shall hear a little rustling noise over the whole place, made by turning the leaves of the Bible."

It must ever remain a matter of wonder how the men of the Reformation and their successors (the ministers and the Burgh magistrates, to their everlasting honour, leading and stimulating the State) contrived, with their meagre resources, to make Scotland, one of the poorest countries in Europe, into the best educated. Perhaps Oliver Goldsmith, himself an Edinburgh medical student, was right when he suggested that the slender incomes of the Scotch University professors stimulated them to industry! If so, the same must have happened with the elementary school teachers, if one can judge from the Education Act passed in the Parliament of 1803. By that Act, the minimum salary of the Scotch parish schoolmaster was raised to £16, and the maximum to £22, with, in addition, a house "not consisting of more than two apartments, including the kitchen!" The latter part of the Act, however, incurred the strenuous opposition of many landed proprietors. As one of them picturesquely, if parsimoniously, expressed it, he did not feel it his duty "to erect palaces for dominies!"

We may sum up the whole matter either with the grudging admission of Ernest Renan, or with the sympathetic tribute of Thomas Carlyle. Renan wrote: "Il nous est bien permis, au XIX^e siècle, d'être pour Marie Stuart contre Knox. Mais au XVI^e siècle, le Protestantisme fanatique servait mieux la cause du progrès que le Catholicisme, même relâché." Candid students of history, whatever their theological opinions, or even if they have none, will prefer the spirit of Carlyle's words: "Honour to all the brave and true! Everlasting honour to brave old Knox, one of the truest of the true, that, in the moment while he and his cause, amid civil broils, in convulsion and confusion, were still but struggling for life, he sent the schoolmaster forth to all corners, and said, 'Let the people be taught!'"

A TRAINING OF THE MIND

THAT LEADS TO THE HABIT AND SKILL OF SCIENTIFIC THINKING.

The late
Mr. W. T. Stead
said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are of once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success."

To think scientifically you must have the attentive attitude of mind, the observant eye, a well-drilled memory capable of preserving the records of what you have seen, heard, and read, and a well developed will to enable you to keep your mind to one channel of thought. You get such an all-round training in

"Great Thoughts"
says: "The booklets and lessons of the Concentro Course are admirable, marked by common sense, practical experience, wide reading in psychology, and are thoroughly scientific."

The World-Famous Course Scientific Concentration.

Scientific Concentration is recognised all over the world as the finest training in Concentration and Mind-Training in general. It is intensely practical and yet in strict accordance with scientific principles, for it is the work of a trained psychologist who has made a very special study of his subject. Hundreds of works on Psychology, Logic, Ethics, Physiology, Therapeutics and Mental Science in general have been studied and consulted so as to make Scientific Concentration the finest training of its kind in existence. This work of research and study is still going on, and students have therefore the advantage of up-to-date knowledge in Mind-Training such as cannot be obtained elsewhere.

Scientific Concentration
is a specialised training supplementary to one's ordinary education. It appeals to every one who wishes to do better and more effective work in the world, with less expenditure of nervous wear and energy. It has proved a boon to a very large number of professional men, especially those of the Church, Law and Medicine. It is equally prized by Scholastic Students and by hundreds of Business Men of every degree of standing, in all parts of the world. It is also doing excellent work among working men in every branch of human effort. A large number of ladies have found it invaluable in their special avocation and also in the quieter duties of the home and social circle.

Scientific Concentration
makes great claims, and it is able to substantiate these claims. Its students testify to the great benefits they have received, such as a great improvement in Memory, greater powers of Attention and Observation, greatly increased Will Power, Control over Thought, Steadiness of Nerves, greater Working Efficiency, success in Study and Examinations, greater efficiency in Games of Skill (such as Golf, Shooting, Chess and Whist), Advancement in Business, greater Powers of Thinking and Speaking, and a broader outlook on life. You cannot afford to neglect such a training. It will revolutionise your life, for it will stimulate you and help you to concentrate unswervingly upon the object of your ambition in life.

EVERY MAN CAN CONCENTRATE

who follows the principles and methods of the Concentro Course Scientific Concentration, and thereby gain mental strength, generate thought, acquire definite knowledge, and greatly advance his position in life.

Send To-day

For Free Booklet, and the most convincing testimony you have ever read, to The CONCENTRO Co., 46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

'NUGGET'
BOOT POLISHES

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut
Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original packets and tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute.

Regd. No. 15911.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKSRECENT EVENTS AND PRESENT*POLICIES IN CHINA. By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illus. rated. 16s. net.*THE HISTORY OF ART IN EGYPT.By M. MASPERO. With 600 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. net. (Asiatica; Series Mille Series.)THE TECHNIQUE OF PAINTING.By C. MOREAU VAUILLER. With Illustrations, including Plates in colour. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.*THE INN OF TRANQUILLITY.By JOHN GALSWORTHY. Crown 8vo. 6s.*SALVE!By GEORGE MOORE. (Uniform with AVE!) Crown 8vo. 6s. net.*A CHRISTMAS GARLAND.Written by MAX BEERBOHM. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.*PORTRAITS AND SKETCHES.By EDMUND GOSSE, C.B., I.L.D. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.*THE CHILDHOOD OF ANIMALS.By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S. With 35 Illustrations and 12 plates in colour, etc. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.*THE FLOWING ROAD.By CASPAR WHITNEY. With 55 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.*WILD LIFE AND THE CAMERA.By A. RADCLIFFE LUGMORE. Crown 4to. With Plates from special Photographs. 6s. net.*THE STEAMSHIP CONQUEST OF*THE WORLD. By F. A. TALBOT (Author of "The Railway Conquest of the World"). Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.*THE PROMISED LAND.By MARY ANTON. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.*EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND*JAPANESE ART. By E. F. FENOLLOSA. In 2 vols. With 230 Plates. Crown 4to. 38s. net.*ALL THE TALES FROM SHAKE-*SPEARE. By CHARLES and MARY LAMB and H. S. MORRIS. With 46 Colour Plates from the Great Masters. 2 vols., large 8vo., cloth gilt. 21s. net.*ÆSOP'S FABLES.Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM. With Introduction by G. K. Chesterton. Large crown 8vo. 6s. net.*WM. SHARP'S WORKS. (Completion of theSeries) In 5 vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each. Vol. V., SHORT STORIES; DRAMATIC INTERLUDES.*FRENCH ARTISTS OF OUR DAY.Monographs with 48 Plates from their work. 3s. 6d. net each. The First vols. are: (1) PUVIS DE CHAVANNES, by ANDRÉ MICHEL; (2) MANET, by LOUIS HOURTIQO; (3) COURBET, by LEONCE BENEDETTI.New 6s. Novels

KING ERRANT	Flora A. Steel.
BACK HOME	Irving S. Cobb.
THE CADUSAC MYSTERY. K. and H. Hesketh Prichard.
A DESERT ROSE	Mrs. Daskein.
THE "MIND THE PAINT" GIRL	Louis Tracy.
ADNAM'S ORCHARD	Sarah Grand.
MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR	Duncan Schwann.
LESS THAN THE DUST	Mary A. Hamilton.
THE BOOK OF WONDER	Lord Dunsany.
BETWEEN TWO THIEVES (2nd Impression)	Richard Dehan.
YONDER (2nd Impression)	E. H. Young.
THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE	C. I. Cutcliffe Hyne.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE.

This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued.

General Literature—Art—Science—Nature Study—Books of Reference and Fiction Generally.

All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy. Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. "School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INFORMATION and AGENCY BUREAU.—Established to procure INFORMATION on literary, social and other subjects, and to carry out EXECUTIVE AGENCY work. Researches at the British Museum, Somerset House and elsewhere. Reasonable charges. Apply for PROSPECTUS to THE SECRETARIAT, 26, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.

FRANCIS PARKMAN AS THE NATIONAL HISTORIAN OF CANADA.*

I.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN are bringing out a dainty pocket edition in twelve volumes, on India paper, of the complete works of Francis Parkman. With the single exception of the "Conspiracy of Pontiac" (which already appeared in Everyman's Library), the works of Francis Parkman have hitherto been issued in expensive editions inaccessible to the wide reading public. We, therefore, gladly welcome the appearance of this edition, if only as an indication that the national historian of Canada is at last going to receive that popular recognition which has been too long withheld.

II.

We hear a great deal about the growth of Imperialist feeling. It is passing strange that this feeling should be so little reflected in the literary tastes and instincts of the present generation. Already Macaulay, in the famous opening pages of the Essay on Lord Clive, deplored the scandalous ignorance of the history of India, even amongst the educated. What is true of India is true of Canada. What was true seventy-five years ago is still largely true to-day. If Parkman had devoted his magnificent powers, like Grote to the history of Greece, like Motley to the history of the Netherlands, or like Prescott to the history of Spain, he would have secured a universal popularity. But because he chose to concentrate for forty years with a singleness of purpose almost unrivalled in the history of letters to the investigation of Canadian history, he condemned himself to comparative obscurity, and he had to wait for fifty years before he came into his own. The "Conspiracy of Pontiac" appeared in 1851. Yet we find that in the standard history of American literature, by Professor Nichol (1882), which otherwise is so complete and so trustworthy, the immortal historian is not even mentioned by name.

III.

This is not the place to analyse either the literary qualities of Parkman or his qualifications as a historian. The task has been admirably done by Mr. Thomas Seccombe in his brilliant Introduction to Dent's edition of the "Conspiracy of Pontiac." But even the most superficial examination must convince the reader that Parkman must rank with the great names of historical literature. He has most of the qualities of Macaulay, without his defects. He is stately without being rhetorical. He unites movement and animation with classical restraint. He combines the gifts of the story-teller, a picturesque imagination, a delight in prowess and adventure, with the gifts of the philosopher: a capacity for generalisation, wide sympathies, and a singularly penetrating insight into the deeper significance of history.

IV.

If from the analysis of the literary qualities of Parkman we pass on to consider the intrinsic interest of the subjects and themes he has chosen, we shall wonder still more why his work should hitherto have been reserved to the happy few. Surely, there are few subjects in universal history more fascinating than the annals of Canada. Those annals, as they unfold themselves in the twelve volumes of Parkman, strike one as a magnificent epic, or rather as a dramatic trilogy. In the first part, we follow the explorations and the evangelisation of the Jesuit missionaries. In the second part, we trace the colonisation and settlement by the administrators of the French Monarchy.

* "Francis Parkman." Pocket edition, 12 vols. 6s. net. (Macmillan.)

The third and concluding part gives us a picture of the epoch-making struggle which resulted in the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon race and of Protestantism in the New World.

V.

The colonisation of Canada possesses the unique originality that religion has been its main motive and inspiration. Although Christopher Columbus was also actuated by religious zeal, yet Spanish colonisation was soon deflected from its original purpose, and soon degenerated into treasure-hunting, even as English colonisation soon degenerated into slave-trading. It is the eternal honour of the Canadian missionaries that they were imbued from the beginning with a single-hearted devotion to their Christian propaganda, and that they aspired to no other reward but the crown of martyrdom. The volume in which Parkman recounts the heroic enterprise of the Jesuit pioneers is one of the most thrilling in the whole series. "That one book, 'The Jesuits in Canada,'" says Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, "is worth a reputation in itself, and how noble is the tribute which those men of Puritan blood paid to that wonderful order." Considering the sympathy and administration of this Protestant historian for the Jesuits, it is all the more strange that, after recounting their marvellous exploits, he should come to the conclusion that Jesuit enterprise resulted in complete failure. Surely, from their point of view, they reaped an ample harvest. They did not, indeed, evangelise the Red Indians, but they achieved this durable result, that Canada has remained until this day the most Catholic country in the world.

VI.

It is the third act of the Canadian drama, and it is the concluding volumes of the history of Parkman, which, above all, must arrest our attention. Here we are confronted not only with the romance of warfare between the Red Man and the White Man—a story as thrilling as any to be found in the romances of Fenimore Cooper—but we are also confronted with another struggle of world-wide significance, and affecting the whole future destinies of the human race. After the Peace of Paris, Voltaire dismissed the final defeat of French policy with the jesting remark that, after all, France had lost only a few acres of snow in the New World! The clever Frenchman failed to realise that the real issue was whether France or England, whether liberty or despotism, were going to be supreme, on the American continent. And the magnitude of the contest was matched by the heroic quality of the combatants. All the sympathies of Parkman are with the Anglo-Saxon victors, but he does not grudge his admiration for the vanquished. To the student of French politics, in the second half of the eighteenth century, it is an unspeakable relief to turn from the scandals of Madame de Pompadour and Madame du Barry to the splendid personality of Montcalm and his companions, who were fighting in a forlorn cause for an ungrateful King. France owes it to those heroes that, although she lost a continent, she at least saved her national honour.

* * *

"THE LOST WORLD" *

In "The Lost World" Sir A. Conan Doyle has made an incursion into the domain of the pseudo-scientific novel. As a follower of Jules Verne, Sir Arthur shows to less advantage than under the flag of Gaboriau. As a writer of detective stories, he stands in a class by himself; as a writer of fictitious travel and imaginative

"The Lost World." By A. Conan Doyle. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

Macmillan's New Books.

SECOND EDITION. JUST READY.

RT. HON. JAMES BRYCE'S NEW WORK.

South America: Observations and Impressions. By the RIGHT HON. JAMES BRYCE, O.M. With Maps. 2vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Daily Mail.—"A noteworthy book, the best yet written on the South America of to-day."

The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter. By JAMES SUTHERLAND. Illustrated. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Chronicle.—"The finest record of the pursuit of big game we have had for many a long day. We shall not soon look upon its like again."

H. G. WELLS'S MOST SUCCESSFUL NOVEL.
Marriage. 10th Thousand. 6s.

JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW BOOK.
The Heroine in Bronze, or a Portrait of a Girl. A Pastoral of the City. 6s.

ALICE WILSON FOX'S NEW BOOK.
A Regular Madam. 6s.

* * * The story of a high-spirited young heroine in the days of George II, and of the war with the French in Canada.

Macmillan's Sevenpenny Series. New Vols.

The Passionate Elopement. By COMPTON MACKENZIE.

Greifenstein. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

Jimbo: a Fantasy. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD.

Not Wisely But Too Well. By RHODA BROUGHTON.

Aunt Rachel. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

* * * COMPLETE LIST ON APPLICATION.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co., Ltd., will be glad to send their LIST OF NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS, as issued, to readers interested in current literature.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Ready this week.

The Philosophy of NIETZSCHE

By Dr. G. CHATTERTON HILL

7/6 net.

JOHN OUSELEY, Ltd., 6, Fleet Lane, Farringdon-St., LONDON, E.C.

SOME FOULIS BOOKS

THE SERVILE STATE

By Hilaire Belloc.

Cr. 8vo, 234 pages, Boards, 18s. net. Library Edition in Buckram, 28s. 6d. net. A brilliant and sensational exposition of the trend of modern legislation and ideas towards an imminent state of slavery in England.

THE ENGLISH CHARACTER

By Spencer Leigh Hughes, M.P. "Sub-Rosa."

16 Illustrations in colour, depicting types of English Character, by Frederick Gardner. Extra Crown 8vo, 280 pages, Buckram, 55s. net. Mr. Hughes "talks merrily" of politicians, statesmen, official people, and of music, sport, and dress. The unique personality of the author has never been more faithfully projected in any piece of writing.

THE R. L. STEVENSON ORIGINALS

By E. B. Sampson.

Author of "R. L. Stevenson's Early Edinburgh Days," "Sir James V. Simpson." Four Illustrations in colour and twenty-six mounted illustrations in colotype. Extra Crown 8vo, 260 pages. Buckram, 65s. net.

THE DICKENS ORIGINALS

By Edwin Pugh.

With thirty mounted illustrations in colotype. Extra crown 8vo, 340 pages. Buckram, 68s. net. Traces the originals of the characters in the novels of Dickens.

POEMS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON

Illustrated in colour by Capt. G. D. Giles. Crown 8vo, 336 pages. Buckram, 55s. net. Bound in Velvet Persian, 75s. 6d. net. A fine presentation edition of the Australian poet.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS

By Hilda T. Skae.

Author of "The Life of Mary, Queen of Scots" With 16 Illustrations in colour and eight portraits in colotype. Fc. Cr. 8vo, 220 pp. Buckram, 55s. net. Velvet Persian, 75s. 6d. net. Uniform Volume, "Prince Charlie," by William Power.

THE SONGS & POEMS OF BURNS

With appreciation of the poet by The Earl of Rosebery, K.T. A new complete Presentation Edition with Fifty-five fine Illustrations in Colour by eminent Artists. Quarto, 700 pages. Printed in fine Rag paper. Buckram, 105s. 6d. net.

T. N. FOULIS, 91, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, LONDON; & AT EDINBURGH.

RIDER'S NEW FICTION

Half a dozen imaginative and arresting novels by writers of repute, illustrating the power of occult forces and the workings of the supernatural in mortal affairs.

THE GODS OF THE DEAD. By Winifred Graham, Author of "Mary," "The Star Child," "Ezra, the Mormon," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. [Ready.]

THE SORCERY CLUB. By Elliott O'Donnell, Author of "Byways of Ghostland," "Werewolves," "Haunted Houses," etc., etc. Cr. 8vo, cloth gilt, with four full-page Illustrations by Phyllis Vere Campbell, 6s. [Ready.]

THE WEIRD OF THE WANDERER. Being the Papyrus Records of Some Incidents in one of the Previous Lives of Mr. Nicholas Crabbe, here produced by Prospero and Caliban. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. [Ready.]

The writer of this book, who conceals himself under the above pseudonym, is the author of various other works showing remarkable originality and genius.

POSSESSED. By Firth Scott, Author of the "Rider of Waroona," "The Last Lemurian," "The Track of Midnight," etc., etc. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net. [Ready Nov. 19th.]

THE PRIESTESS OF ISIS. An Occult Romance of the Days of Pompeii and Herculaneum. By Édouard Schuré, Author of "The Great Initiates," etc., etc. Translated by F. Rothwell, B.A. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net. [Ready.]

THE JEWEL OF SEVEN STARS. By Bram Stoker. New Edition, uniform with "DRACULA." 320 pp. Small crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. net. [Ready Nov. 19th.]

AT ALL LIBRARIES.

MARJORIE BOWEN'S LATEST SUCCESS.

THE RAKE'S PROGRESS. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

"A brilliant romance, well worthy of its gifted author."

—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

WM. RIDER & SON, Ltd., Cathedral House, Paternoster Row, E.C.

science, he cannot escape comparison with others, which is not altogether to his advantage.

True, "The Lost World" is a highly entertaining book, and, once begun, it does not allow itself to be lightly laid aside. It is ingenious, it is circumstantial, it is amusing, it is mildly satirical, it is harmlessly exciting, and, within certain limits, it is instructive. But the satire and verisimilitude are not those of a Swift or a Defoe; the science and adventure are not those of a Verne or a Wells; the humour and inventiveness are not those of a Cyrano or an Anstey.

The Lost World to which Professor George E. Challenger conducts his extraordinary expedition is a remote region in South America, where you can herd droves of gentle, gigantic iguanodons, shoot coverts of pterodactyls, or provide a meal for a playful plesiosaurus or a dinnerless dinosaur—the pleasing creatures with which E. T. Reed has familiarised us in his Prehistoric Peeps; a land, too, inhabited by ape-men who are first-cousins of Gulliver's Yahoos. To this inviting spot, Professor Challenger, vain, choleric, unprepossessing, but withal a fearless devotee of science, makes an ideal guide; and his weird experiences along with his rival, Professor Summerlee, and Lord John Roxton, the prince of sportsmen, are admirably recounted by Mr. E. D. Maloué, the indispensable Press representative who accompanied the party.

CORRESPONDENCE

WESTWARD HO!

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I feel that Monsignor R. H. Benson's criticism of Kingsley's attitude towards the Jesuits in "Westward Ho!" in this week's issue of EVERYMAN should not pass unchallenged. In the first place, I believe that the reverend gentleman forgets that historical setting must be in line with the attitude of the Englishmen of the period towards the acts and opinions of the instigators of the counter-Reformation. Does M. Benson deny that Loyola taught his followers not to stop at crime to gain the glorious object of reinstating the Holy Catholic Church? And does he deny that the Jesuits did commit crimes in accordance with this teaching? Surely Kingsley, then, has interpreted the contemporary feelings of Englishmen aright when he depicts his Jesuit characters in, undoubtedly, their worst light. Praiseworthy though the earnestness and ultimate motives of the Jesuits were, yet such motives as were theirs could not be tolerated in this country; a fact which is conclusively proved by the failure of the Jesuits to obtain any permanent footing in England.

Lastly, I don't think M. Benson can regard "Westward Ho!" as a general attack upon the Roman Catholic Church, for Kingsley wrote his book as a novel, with full licence from the point of view of the unity of his book, and in the portrayal of rough, honest sea-dogs, and not theologians.—I am, sir, etc.,

D. HY. GRIFFITH.

Dyffryn, Goodwick, November 9th, 1912.

POPE PIUS X.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have just read, with mingled feelings, the article in your issue of November 1st by M. Houtin. It would appear, if one had to accept this article as strict truth, that the Church of Rome has progressed enormously during the last nine years in unity, and that Pius X. had really known "how to maintain and to preserve the Catholic Church."

Although, when elected, Pius X. did announce as his ambitious programme, "Instaurare omnia in Christo," yet we have to look at the facts to see if this "millennium" (for such would the realisation of these words mean) has actually come to pass.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

According to M. Houtin's article, one might think it was actually being realised. Yet how very different is the case! During the régime of this "Sovereign Pontiff" we have seen some of the most humiliating political checks and diplomatic ruptures between the Vatican and the so-called Roman Catholic countries ever witnessed. France has severed all official connection with the Papal authorities. Spain and Portugal have had quarrels with Rome, and have thrown off the Papist yoke.

We are told the Pope believes in his own infallibility. If this is true, why was the "Ne Temere" decree withdrawn in Germany, and why is it not in active force in England, since it was to be enforced in the British Isles?

Again, "the decree 'Ne Temere' is carried out even in Ireland." This fictitious statement is made in face of the words of Judge Kenny, who, in a recent test case in Dublin, said, "Although, in the eyes of the Church of Rome, the mother is degraded and the child illegitimate, the decree of the Council of Trent and the 'Ne Temere' decree against mixed marriages has no legal effect."

The terrible Putumayo atrocities took place under the very eye of the representatives of Rome, yet it was not until these devilish cruelties were brought to light by the representative of a Protestant King and nation that we heard of them.

Such, then, is the "brave" way which this "poor Sarto" has defended the "Lord's flock"!

The enemies of Rome and lovers of Christian Truth cannot wish more than that Pope Pius X. might live long to occupy the pontifical throne.—I am, sir, etc.,

WILLIAM J. PLATT.

Horwich, Bolton.

OSCAR WILDE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—There seems some doubt about the origin of the Oscar Wilde blue china story, recalled by M. Mazel and Mr. Oscar Browning.

The first time I saw the jest was in Punch, where it appeared beneath a Du Maurier drawing satirising the æsthetic craze. A young bride, very simious and very intense, is looking up rapturously into her husband's face. He has in his hand, holding it with a kind of reverence, a china teapot. The words, as far as I remember, were:—He: "Isn't it exquisite?" She: "Oh, Algernon! Let us try to live up to it."

Of course, Punch may not have originated the story. The doubt as to its origin gives added point to a witticism attributed to Whistler.

The great Impressionist was at the R.A. private view, or some similar function, and, seeing Wilde, he took him by the arm and led him up to Du Maurier. Then, gravely looking from one to the other, he inquired blandly, "Which of you two invented the other?"—I am, sir, etc.,

H. J. A.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCHES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—“Scotus Novanticus,” in EVERYMAN of November 1st, is in error in stating Mr. Campbell makes the insistence on dogmas and creeds responsible for the religious divisions amongst men. He

THE REASON WHY.

PUBLIC OPINION

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER

Has increased its circulation

by

OVER 25%
DURING OCTOBER

The reason why PUBLIC OPINION so constantly increases its circulation is because it is supremely interesting. As readers are constantly saying, it is readable from beginning to end. "It keeps a tired world alert," says Mr. J. L. Garvin.

It conveys, in the most handy form, something of life's variety, vivacity, and eternal interest. It is a weekly cinematograph of what people are Doing, Saying, and Thinking. It gives a rapid survey of the events of the week, and is an ideal paper for every home and for everyone in it.

It is interested in Social Problems, in Religion, in Politics, in Science, in Literature, in all Arts and Crafts. It is just the paper for those who "want to get into touch with men who are thinking—into the souls of their books."

PUBLIC OPINION is non-party, and seeks only reliable facts and information. It is a great acquisition to any house, as it covers so wide a field, and interests everyone, for it is interested in everything. It is a Newspaper Room, a weekly Library of New Books, and always a cheerful and well-informed companion. It goes all over the world, and makes an ideal present.

MAY WE SEND YOU A FREE SPECIMEN COPY?

PUBLIC OPINION can be had at all Newsagents at 2d. a week, or it will be sent for one year in the United Kingdom for 10/10, six months 5/5; abroad, 13/- a year, 6/6 for six months. This week's issue, 2½d. post free. Address, Manager, PUBLIC OPINION, 32 & 33, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

does not, although he might justifiably have done so.

Again, anarchy flourishes best where tyranny is strongest, and all the Protestant Churches are in a state of anarchy in relation to the Roman Catholic Church. "S. N." should then attack anarchy by seeking to remove its cause.

Because men are not prepared to accept all the Roman Catholic dogmas, it does not follow that they believe too little, and are consequently divided. The cause of religious divisions has ever been the imposition of dogma and the suppression of private judgment and individual liberty in matters spiritual.

Moreover, it is a mistake to suppose there are no divisions in the Roman Catholic Church, for they are continually recurring, and up to the Reformation movements were allowed to develop within the Church until they became dangerous sects; then they were often suppressed in blood.

In more recent years Rome has multiplied her dogmas and improved the inquisition of her government, so that, at the present time, the tests being keener and the issues clearer, heresy is more readily detected, and excommunication inflicted. Thus, the evil is nipped in the bud or compelled to conceal itself. One of the greatest divisions in the history of religion occurred when the Roman Church was shaken to its foundation at the Reformation.

"S. N." unblushingly says, "The most popular weekly, Les Annales Politiques et Littéraires, which is the representative organ of the cultured middle class, would not dare to publish an article with an anti-Catholic bias." In Britain we are accustomed to hear all sides of a case, biased or otherwise. Perhaps these facts at once explain the strength of Roman Catholicism among the readers of the above popular weekly, and its weakness among the natives of these islands.

I write with no feeling of bitterness towards the Roman Catholic faith, but with the recognition that a Church which has awakened the saintly soul of gentle Francis and attracted the brilliant intellect of Newman—to mention only two out of an innumerable host of profoundly spiritual men—a Church which has held aloft the banner of Christ all down the ages, must have strong claims upon the hearts and minds of all Christians, irrespective of creed.

May no one, indeed, ever hope for the realisation of that beautiful dream, the reunion of Christendom, under which men of independent judgment may render service to God, and thus remove at least one of the barriers to a glorious future for the Christian Church?

Does Rome block the way?—I am, sir, etc.,

Glasgow, November 2nd, 1912. CURTIS MARTIN.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Interesting all through as are the first two numbers of EVERYMAN, there will be many readers, I think, who will regard Professor Delbrück's article, "England and Germany," as the most important feature in them. It is but rarely that the average Englishman, who is not acquainted with the German language, is able to read a clear statement of German opinion in regard to the relations between the two countries, from the pen of a German. Perhaps the blame for this may be assigned to the "neglect of German" in English education.

Professor Delbrück, we shall all agree, is perfectly sincere, and Englishmen should be considerably indebted to him for his trenchant presentation of his case. At the same time, most of us will entirely dissent from some of his conclusions. The statement that Germany has increased her navy so greatly in recent years "to protect her growing trade" and "to safeguard her interests in world politics," is to British minds a little vague and unsatisfactory. Both these things could be assured without such a huge navy as Germany has thought fit to build. But the main point that I wish to emphasise is in regard to German expansion, and it is here, I think, that Professor Delbrück is misleading, and appears to share some of the common prejudices of many of his countrymen: prejudices from which we might expect a man of his culture and attainments to be free. The charge that "... ever since Germany has begun to make active efforts to obtain possessions of this kind"—i.e., colonies to relieve her of her surplus population—"it has been our experience that England again and again comes in our way," is utterly unfounded. When has England obstructed rightful German expansion?

Legitimate expansion on the part of Germany: expansion which is not detrimental to the interests of other countries, and which conforms to the principles of international justice and morality—that never has been and never will be checked or frustrated by the British nation.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. F. P.

Plymouth.

THE NEGLECT OF GERMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—What you say in your first number about the neglect of German in your country, and of English, too, is true to the very last word. Americans think, and act, differently; they are building up an admirable system of modern language schools. Young America is ahead of dear old England!

It is no business of mine to praise up my native language to Englishmen. If England can do without German, it does not matter to Germans. But I consider it my patriotic duty to do my utmost to promote the study of English in this country, so that every educated German may know what is written in both languages, may think with two souls, and work with two brains.

I am a lover of Greek, not only of Homer and Sophocles, but also of Plutarch and Heliodor. But why should that interfere with my study of English? There is no need to say, "either Greek or English"; I prefer to say, "both Greek and English."

Respectability is a fine thing. It is considered most respectable to stand up for compulsory Greek. But sometimes it is expensive to keep up respectability. Germany cannot afford it. Our people find that they want English, and French, and also Italian, and they flock to modern language lectures. In this University there are no fewer than 600-700 modern language students, and still we are not able to supply the demand of our secondary schools for such teachers. In addition to Western languages, Russian has just been introduced as a subject in the secondary schools of the eastern provinces of Prussia. I do not feel that it lowers our respectability.

England is right to increase her iron fleet, in order to keep off any possible enemy. We increase our mental fleet by calling in the brain-work of our neighbours, in order to fight our battles against ignorance and poverty.

Welcome, friendly invaders!—I am, sir, etc.,

AUGUS BRANDL, J.L.D.,

Professor of English in the University of Berlin and Founder of the German Shakespeare Society.

Berlin, October 25th, 1912.

For all Player-Pianos

SONGOLA MUSIC ROLLS

bear the words of the song opposite the accompanying chord or phrase.

Hitherto it has been difficult to accompany a singer by means of a Player-Piano. The "Songola" Rolls make it easy to do so. The words are exactly opposite the accompanying chord or phrase, so that, if you are a singer, you can play your own accompaniments. "Songola" Music Rolls are perfect in notation, phrasing, and tempo; also climate-proof and practically indestructible.

SEND FOR "SONGOLA" CATALOGUES.

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., Ltd.,
94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.
Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Agents in all Large Towns. Name and Address on application.

A REPLY TO NORMAN ANGELL'S GREAT ILLUSION.

JUST OUT.

THE STRUGGLE FOR BREAD. By "A RIFLEMAN."

"* * This book is a reply to Mr. Norman Angell's well-known work, "The Great Illusion," and also an enquiry into the present economic state of Europe. The author, examining the phenomenon of the high food-prices at present ruling in all great civilised states, proves by statistics that these are caused by a relative decline in the production of food-stuffs as compared with the increase in general commerce and the production of manufactured-articles, and that consequently there has ensued a rise in the exchange-values of manufactured-articles, which with our system of society can have no other effect than of producing high food-prices and low wages.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO ST.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogue No. 614, and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrar 8180.)

THE PROGRESS S.C.E.Y invites lonely men and women everywhere to become members and obtain wider social and intellectual interests through its various circles. There is no entrance fee. For particulars and invitation form send stamp to SECRETARY E. M., 107, Green roof Gardens, Hamstead, London.

This shows a G.W. "Elastic" Bookcase with a Desk Unit in the centre.

Globe-Wernicke "ELASTIC" BOOKCASES

"Always come to me but never finished." Built of interlocking units, which can be arranged to suit the shape and size of any room and rearranged at will. No necessity to buy more units than are actually needed at the time. Catalogue 72 B shows how splendidly this style of Bookcase lends itself to artist decoration and fully explains its manifold advantages over the "fixed-size" style bookcase.

Packing Free. Orders of 22 pounds paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,
44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.;
82, Victoria Street S.W.; 93, Bishopsgate, E.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any machine, in the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX dispenses all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON

BOOKS—SECOND-HAND OR NEW.—Sited in a University Centre we have exceptional facilities for filling your wants. Send us list of same or subject.—GALLOWAY & FORTER, University Bookellers, Cambridge.

TYPEWRITING, 10d. per 1,000 words; after 5,000, 9d.; after 10,000, 8d. Free carbon-copy. Paper free. Acme Typing Bureau, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

TYPEWRITING.—MSS., 10d. 1,000 words; carbon free.—Miss FRIE-BY, 20, Bucklersbury, E.C. Tel. Bank 82.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 61, Adams Bros., Darenty.

AUTHORS should forward MSS. (Stories, Poems, Essays, Novels, etc.) to Mr. Arthur Stockwell, Publisher, 29, Ludgate Hill, London. Advice re publication free. Typewriting unnecessary. New Authors fully and frankly helped.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience. —2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision from 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper included.—THE NATIONAL TYPE-WRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS! MSS. placed with 175 Publishers and Periodicals at HIGHEST PRICES. 16 p. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

YOUNG LADY of Studios Tastes (Matriculated preferred) wanted immediately in Publisher's Office, for Indexing and kindred work. State previous experience and salary required.—Apply X., c/o EVERYMAN.

Essentially the Foods for Brain Workers: maximum of nutriment, minimum of trouble. Full List and Sample of FRITTAMIX, the New Savoury, Post Free. Mention EVERYMAN.

MAPLETON'S,
M Garston, LIVERPOOL.

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

A HUNGARIAN PLEA FOR THE TURK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Having read the article, "Who is Responsible for the War?" in your newspaper, EVERYMAN, I have something to say about the matter, from a Hungarian point of view.

We Hungarians know better the nations which are now at war. We are partly their neighbours, and partly, in respect to Turkey, are brother-nations.

Yes, it was the fault of the Great Powers' diplomacy that the situation was aggravated, that these four small nations could provoke, and without acceptable reason, Turkey, who did nothing else in her present state of transformation, defending only her life. It is not her fault that she is the most dangerous spot in Europe. It is not her fault that she is a Mohammedan Empire. But it is the fault of the European Great Powers, that they cannot wait for the time when the state of Turkey will be settled; that every one of these Powers has something to do in Turkey.

I am always amazed reading English opinions respecting Turkey. Why does not Europe's greatest nation sympathise with this Power? This nation, who once was the greatest Power in Europe, and whom not to like should belong first to us, to Hungary, and whose sun is now going down, perhaps to rise again as brilliantly as in the olden times—this nation is worthy of our attention. Turkey has a special situation among the other European States. She has no friend around, when she should have many. In the days of transformation, when every interior power should work together, we see she has interior conflicts. And among such circumstances, how could she fulfil her work, the transformation? It is, apart from these circumstances, very difficult for Turkey, who has such a topographical situation. Among the mountains there live the greatest enemies of everything which comes from the Turkish Government—the Albanians and the Macedonians. And can you believe me that the causes from which the war arose, according to the notes of the four Balkan Powers, are true? That they—the four Powers—cannot endure the sufferings of the Albanians and Macedonians? That they cannot bear that these nations have no autonomy? We Hungarians, who know these nations, we do not believe it, simply because neither Albania nor Macedonia are as civilised as the other nations of Europe, and cannot govern themselves. They, these mountaineers, are still sons of the eternal war, are still amidst very primitive social circumstances. Behind them there must stand—and stand ever—a more mighty power.

Therefore, first, not the Great Powers, but these four small Powers, are responsible for the present Balkan war. This war is as unjust as the Italian aggression against Turkey. Not for the purpose of delivering the Albanians and Macedonians, because they can never settle these matters, only to cause confusion and to operate there, therefore they commenced the war.

But the greatest fault belongs to an unknown Power, who stands behind these small States, without whose assistance none of them would have dared this undertaking.

We Hungarians sympathise with Turkey because we see the things as they are. This nation is a very unfortunate nation, whom everybody will "repay," but for what and why we do not know. Perhaps for the misdoings of the Great Powers?—I am, sir, etc.,

Pecs, October 23rd, 1912.

J. LEWIS TGAZ.

JOHN WESLEY'S JOURNAL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your issue of November 1st Principal Whyte quotes Mr. Birrell's saying with respect to John Wesley's journeys: "He paid more turnpikes than any man who ever bestrode a beast."

It may interest some of your readers to be reminded of another famous Wesleyan, Robert Newton, who, a generation later, travelled, it is computed, in the Minutes of the Society, not less than 6,000 miles a year, when transit was comparatively slow, and in later years some 8,000 miles. The Minutes go on to declare that it is probable that he collected more money for religious objects than any other man. He was four times President and nineteen times Secretary of the Wesleyan Conference.

The following curious story is told in his life. Whilst residing in Manchester during a period of political and social unrest, Dr. Newton became a marked man for much opprobrium, and fear for his safety was felt by his friends. One night he had to return from Cheetham Hill to Manchester, then a lonely road. He refused all company, and proceeded alone, when he was almost immediately joined by a large dog, which continued to follow his footsteps closely. The story goes on to tell how two suspicious-looking characters, who had apparently purposed to molest the traveller, were arrested by the sight of his huge canine companion, and, dividing to right and left, permitted him to pass. I give the story as it stands, without any further comment. That Newton himself saw in it an act of divine intervention on his behalf goes without saying.—I am, sir, etc.,

A GREAT-GRANDSON OF ROBERT NEWTON.

Bournemouth, November 7th, 1912.

MESSAGE OF "EVERYMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have been much interested in the "message" of your first number, and take the opportunity you offer by your invitation to correspondents to express a reader's keen appreciation of your aims.

As you say in that "message," "We are living in a wonderful age, when every landmark is being swept away, when every belief is being questioned, when every established institution is on its trial, when reform is the order of the day." And you point out that, "whether all this will lead to a peaceful and orderly reconstruction of society, or whether that reconstruction shall be preceded by a revolutionary catastrophe," will largely depend upon those writers who are moulding and directing public opinion.

This raises a very definite point in connection with such a possible reconstruction of society as the result of the greater width and freedom and generosity of ideas which indisputably characterise the present day. That point is the danger attending a one-man influence in literature during a period of active evolution of thought. Rousseau is charged, I believe, with much responsibility for the ferocity of the French Revolution. Whatever his merits as a philosopher, he was unsafe as a guide or a leader. Bearing all this in mind, it is good to find that you show in your new paper a great catholicity of feeling in the choice of writers and subjects which you propose to introduce. The civilised world was never more in need of full and accurate knowledge, of intelligent, balanced criticism on all that occupies human thought and endeavour, than it is now. Still down the ever-widening corridors of Life comes resounding that first mighty cry, "Let there be light!"—I am, sir, etc., R. W. COMPTON.

ONE WEEK GONE OF THE SPECIAL OFFER

OF

100 Winter Scholarships

for Readers of EVERYMAN.

No Entrance Fee. No Specialised Knowledge Required.

Society owes a decent living to everyone willing to work, but to get adequate reward for labour one has to work with brain as well as muscles. Manual labour is so underpaid that to earn a comfortable living one must do mental work, work that is wanted, and well paid.

No field of labour is less crowded to-day than that of the new art of intelligent advertising.

Common-sense Training.

To write advertisements needs knowledge of the use of words, and technical training. Finding things out oneself is a slow and disheartening method of learning a business. With training a man can at once begin to turn his talent to practical account. No matter where he lives, he can earn money by writing advertisements, because most advertising work is done by post.

Earning While Learning.

As already announced, it has been arranged with the directors of the Practical Correspondence College to institute one hundred winter scholarships in advertisement writing for the readers of EVERYMAN upon the following remarkable and unprecedented terms:—

The one hundred candidates who send in the best answers to the test questions will receive the full course of postal tuition at half the regular fees, the remaining half to be paid only when the student has earned at least £10 by advertisement writing as the result of the tuition, within six months of completing the course.

There is no entrance fee—it costs a halfpenny stamp to write for gratis examination paper, and a penny to return it filled up. You are under no further liability whatever.

The successful students will not only earn back much more than the fees paid, and incidentally receive a first-class practical training free, but will acquire proficiency that may be worth from 15s. to £10 a week to them.

Clever and Enthusiastic.

The scholarships will enable the P.C.C. to secure one hundred of the brainiest readers of EVERYMAN—clever, enterprising, and enthusiastic men and women whom it will be a personal pleasure to teach, and who will eventually be numbered amongst the College's most successful students.

Every reader stands a chance of succeeding. Many who are not considered clever at figures, office routine, or ordinary work at which they are employed for want of better openings, are full of bright ideas which, turned to account in advertisement writing, would earn guineas.

Many P.C.C. students earn more than the amount of fees paid before completing the course.

The Fortunate Hundred.

The P.C.C. scholarships are only intended for those students who will be a credit to the College.

Every successful P.C.C. student, by his or her achievement and personal influence, becomes a valuable advertisement for the P.C.C.

The winners of the scholarships are under no liability to pay the balance of fees unless he or she earns at least £10.

NO EXAMINATION PAPERS CAN BE RECEIVED AFTER NOVEMBER 25th.

Applications will be dealt with in strict rotation, and notified immediately the scholarships have been awarded.

A Little Spare Time and Thought.

It is essential that you send the coupon at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Remember, this is a golden opportunity. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send off the coupon now before you forget it.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

The act of writing for particulars to-day may prove to be the turning point in your career.

TERMS AT A GLANCE.

Successful candidates will be entitled to receive the complete Course of Instruction in Advertisement Writing at half fees, balance payable only if the student earns

3 TIMES AMOUNT OF FEE

by Advt. Writing within six months of completion of the Course.

No entrance fee, no liability of any kind incurred by entering for preliminary test.

Read carefully and send to-day for full particulars.

SCHOLARSHIP COUPON.

The SECRETARY,
Practical Correspondence College,
77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Please send me your Scholarship Examination Form Post Free.

Signed.....

Address.....

Date.....

CORRESPONDENCE (continued)

PEACE AND WAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—When I say that I am a member of the Society of Friends, you will at once understand that I entirely sympathise with Mr. Angell's strong and able denunciation of force as being the greatest deterrent to the progress of true civilisation. You will also, I expect, understand why I am unable to endorse the conclusion he arrives at, because it seems entirely illogical from his former premise, that Force is necessary to maintain progress and civilisation; for that, it seems to me, is what he means when he says it is absolutely necessary to be armed to prevent the other man doing something he says—and Mr. Angell says—he does not want to do, and that it would do him more harm than good to do.

May I also point out that there is, in my opinion, a much better simile of the relations between Britain (not "England," by the way, please) and Germany than the one Mr. Angell is in the habit of using? He says they are like two men who are angry with each other, and stand ready to fight, armed to the teeth. Does he not think they are much more like two neighbours who are on perfectly friendly terms, visiting and doing business with each other; but—but—they both have some idle, mischievous boys, who are continually on the look-out for something to quarrel about, and to throw stones at each other; and they each have some pugnacious bulldogs, that are snarling and growling at each other, and straining at their chains to get at each other's throats? John Bull was the first to get these dogs, and Cousin Fritz, seeing how they worried other people's chickens, cats, etc., feared they would also attack his, so he got his dogs too. Now, would not the wisest thing for John to do be to spank his boys, and give them some good, honest work to do, and send his dogs—well, to the Cat and Dog Home, if you like? Fritz would soon see that it would be to his best interest to do likewise, for, by Mr. Angell's showing, John has nothing to lose from an attack by Fritz, for Fritz would hurt himself most. As I verily believe he would. Now, consider, who is it that, in either country, is trying to stir up strife? Is it not your ignorant puppy young journalists—mere boys, as I know many of them are—and your Military Leaguers and Navy Leaguers, as well as your pro-conscriptionists, and other bellicose fire-eaters? Find some way of shutting the mouths of the "Yellow Press" on these matters, and I think much will have been done to prevent irritation on either side. It is not the merchants, manufacturers, or agriculturists in either country; neither, certainly, is it the working classes. These are what, I hold, represent most truly the nations. It is not these, I contend, who want to fight. Therefore, give the others who are trying to bring it about some better occupation, or—send them to Botany Bay.—I am, sir, etc.,

R. B. M.

Johnstone, November 3rd, 1912.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Ammon, C. G. "Christ and Labour." (Jarrold, 1s.)
 Barclay, F. L. "The Wheels of Time." (Putnam's Sons, 1s.)
 Barry, Canon. "Literature—The World of Life or Death." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Benn, A. W. "History of Modern Philosophy." (Watts, 1s.)
 Bennett, Arnold. "Mental Efficiency." (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s.)
 Bennett, Arnold. "The Human Machine." (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s.)
 Bennett, Arnold. "Literary Taste." (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s.)
 Besant, Mrs. A. "Theosophy." (Jack, 6d.)
 Canton, W. "A Child's Book of Warriors." (Dent.)

- Chapman, G. T. "Political Economy." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Chapman, J. "Bishop Gore and the Catholic Claims." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Clouston, Sir T. "Morals and Brain." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Creighton, Mrs. "Missions." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Davidson, A. F. "Victor Hugo." (Eveleigh Nash.)
 De la Pasture, Mrs. H. "Erica." (Smith, Elder.)
 Doyle, A. C. "The Case of Oscar Slater." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6d.)
 Drawbridge, C. L. "Old Beliefs and New Knowledge." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Drawbridge, C. L. "Training of the Turk." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Figgis, J. N. "The Gospel and Human Needs." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Fouard, C. "The Christ." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 "Fruit." (Blackie, 1s.)
 Goodrich, E. S. "Evolution." (Jack, 6d.)
 Gore, C. "Roman Catholic Claims." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Gregory, J. W. "The Making of the Earth." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Hobson, R. A. "Some Kiddies." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Hobhouse, L. T. "The Labour Movement." (Fisher Unwin, 1s.)
 Johnstone, Hilda. "Oliver Cromwell." (Jack, 6d.)
 Johnston, Sir H. "Pioneers in India." (Jack, 6d.)
 Jones, A. J. "Eucken." (Jack, 6d.)
 Kapp, G. "Electricity." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Keith, A. "The Human Body." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Kropotkin, Prince. "Fields, Factories, and Workshops." (Nelson, 1s.)
 Laurence, H. "Little Folk in Many Lands." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Maclaren, I. "Books and Bookmen." (Nisbet and Co., 1s.)
 Macpherson, H. "Practical Astronomy." (Jack, 6d.)
 Magee, E. "Le Livre Rouge." (Blackie, 1s.)
 Meyer, Rev. F. B. "Religion and Race Regeneration." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Millar, G. "Some Fruits of Solitude." (Hamilton, 1s.)
 Mockler, G. "Our Friend Jim." (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)
 Moore, G. E. "Ethics." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Morris, A. T. "More About the Empire." (Blackie, 1s.)
 "Merry Days at the Farm." (Blackie, 6d.)
 Newman, Cardinal. "Apologia." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Pat. "Economics for Irishmen." (Mausel, 1s.)
 Robertson, W. A. "Insurance." (Jack, 6d.)
 Robinson, C. H. "Studies in the Character of Christ." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, C. H. "Human Nature." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, C. H. "Studies in the Resurrection of Christ." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, C. H. "Studies in Christian Worship." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "Some Thoughts on Inspiration." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "The Historical Character of St. John's Gospel." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "Some Thoughts on the Incarnation." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "Some Thoughts on the Athanasian Creed." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "The Advent Hope in St. Paul's Epistles." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Robinson, J. A. "The Vision of Unity." (Longmans, Green, 6d.)
 Ronald, L. "Tschäikowsky." (Jack, 1s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor will endeavour to return manuscripts only when a stamped envelope is enclosed. All manuscripts should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar, London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d. Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post irce. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

NOW INCLUDES 640 VOLUMES, being more than half the full number which the publishers hope to put at the service of English readers.

- PALL MALL GAZETTE. "Everyman looks like very soon deserving the title Every Book that Matters."
- THE SPECTATOR. "To issue the classics under such conditions is to perform a public service of the highest value."
- THE ATHENÆUM. "The books are wonderful. . . . At a moderate price the reader has an introduction; a bibliographical note; a good text (in which we notice a standard of accuracy very different from that of the ordinary cheap reprint); a decorative title-page; and a gold-lettered binding. More important, however, than cheapness and appearance, is the quality of the books issued and of the critics who introduce them."
- THE DAILY NEWS. "A really important factor in national education."

The next batch of volumes will include

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA,

to be published in 12 volumes of about 640 pages each.

There will be over 500,000 words in each volume, and the complete work will contain 6,000,000 words, exceeding that of any other Encyclopædia published at double the price.

Everyman's Library is divided into thirteen sections (each of which has a distinctive cloth binding), and it may be interesting to note the proportions in which the 640 volumes are divided:—

		VOLS.
I.	Biography	43	VIII. Reference Books	10
II.	Classical	27	IX. Romance	22
III.	Essays and Belles Lettres	75	X. Science	14
IV.	Fiction	200	XI. Theology and Philosophy	31
V.	History	68	XII. Travel and Topography	34
VI.	Oratory	8	XIII. Young People's Books	50
VII.	Poetry and Drama	52

A 64-page Brochure, giving descriptive details of most of the volumes, will be sent post free on application.

The following bindings are stocked: Cloth, 1/- net; Leather, 2/- net; Bancroft 1/6 net; Quarter Pigskin, 2/- net.

FOR XMAS GIFTS.

A selection of 33 volumes has been made for use as gifts. Each volume contains a Photogravure Frontispiece and title-page; and a new limp binding has been designed for this purpose, known as Bedford Morocco; the published price is 3/- net per vol.

BOOKS FROM OUR CURRENT GENERAL LIST.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. QUINTON. Bound with Coloured Illustrated top. Demy 4to. 21s. net.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY. By CECIL HEADLAM. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON. Imperial 8vo. Cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY. By the Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, Bishop of Exeter. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON. Imperial 8vo. Cloth, gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA. Vol. II. By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each volume. [Prospectus.]
Westminster Gazette: "An achievement."

NEW FICTION.

JOSEPH CONRAD'S "TWIXT LAND AND SEA." Crown 8vo, 6s.
Times: "A masterpiece." Morning Post: "A haunting power of imagery." Daily Telegraph: "A high and masterly artist." Pall Mall Gazette: "He has never done better."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER."

FLORENCE CONVERSE'S "THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT." Crown 8vo, 6s.
"A poetic idea and its development are beautifully idealized." Westminster Gazette. "There is no more notable landmark than this novel."—The Same.

HILLEL SAMSON'S "FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS."
Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

The Publishers will be pleased to send, upon receipt of a postcard, a full list of new books.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD ST., W.C.

DARN

Holeproof Hose

NO MORE

Stockings and Socks That Don't Want Mending.

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will Replace them absolutely FREE

You can imagine that we should not make such an offer unless we were convinced of the extraordinary good wearing qualities of our socks and stockings. No more eye-straining, tempo-tizing, unnecessary darning. You can now turn to more pleasurable and congenial occupations. With every pair you buy you get a GUARANTEE TICKET, which distinctly states that if the smallest hole appears within 2 months of purchase the hose will be replaced absolutely free. So on can see the enormous saving that is gained by purchasing our Holeproof of Hosiery. These Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well-made and comfortable, with their incomparable sense of good fitting, that is one of the many features of our Hose. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, it will have no damage done to its fabric. The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business, lads and busy housewives, in whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 2/10, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 3/10, post 2d. COLOURED HOSE for Ladies, in Black, Navy, Mole Champagne, Pearl Grey, and all in Mole at same price. SILK HOLEPROOF. Most delightful. Specially engineered into sand heels without holeproof mixture yarn. The best Champagne colour is stocked, also Empire Blue, Pearl Grey, and black. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 7/6, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 10/8, post 2d. On the guarantee that we will replace them free if a hole develops within Two Months of purchase, will you send our P.O.? State boot size. Write your name and address distinctly. Call or write: VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., Brighton.

500 HOURS' LIGHT for 1 1/2 d.

"FOOL-PROOF" LAMP.

AGENTS WANTED.

We have named this the "Fool-Proof" Lamp, because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe. That is, there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense. But one of these little "Fool-Proof" Lamps, placed in those eerie corners or dark staircase landings, will cost no more than 1 1/2d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount and are also highly dangerous, besides looking rather poverty stricken. Now, these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article. It is essentially "good" looking and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps. Burns Paraffin Oil.

It can be used as a snacker's companion, and is absolutely odorless; it burns for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Price 2/8. Postage and Packing, 2d. Agents Wanted. VAUGHAN & HEATHER, Dept. 154, The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., Brighton.

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER

Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

Agents Wanted.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm. It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to go to the theatre or have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/6 or 2/-, that is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster. Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. You knew before you were told that air improves a fire, or why do you blow it to make it go? Just fancy, only half a much coal to be bought. You must then send your postal order now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5 1/2 in. wide), 2/-; or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide) 1/6. Postage on each, 3d. Go to the Post Office NOW, and start this investment of 1/6 or 2/- earning big dividends for you at once. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years, an unheard of saving. Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGTON.

Agents Wanted.

Burning half coal, half air. Result: Great Heat with V. & H. Coal Saver

NO MORE COLD FEET

Cold feet can now be a thing of the past. The new "Slip-on" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm non-irritating woolly material. Worn next to the skin. Your sock or stocking is worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/- per pair, post. 1d. extra. State boot size. P.O.'s only. — VAUGHAN & HEATHER, (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGTON.

BEDROOM SLIPPERS. Just 6d. per pair the thing for DAINTY FEET. Post. 2d. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGTON.

Light Touch Means

- Better Work
- Quicker Work
- More Work

The light touch of the Monarch makes good work just a little easier for the operator every minute of her working day than is possible with any other machine. This means much more work in the whole day and no three o'clock fatigue.

The mechanical principle exclusively incorporated in the Monarch Light Touch Typewriter is the feature which makes it so easy to operate. A test will speedily demonstrate this fact.

Monarch Light Touch

To get more work done by the same operator; to get rush work done on time; to cut typewriting cost to lowest point, instal the Monarch, the high efficiency typewriter.

Full descriptive matter will be sent on application.
The Monarch Typewriter Co., Ltd.,
165, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C.

FOR THE GOOD OF YOUR PENMANSHIP

Be free of the ink-pot. Think of the constant dip—dip—dip breaking into the train of your thoughts. Think of the ordeal of the new nib, before it is broken in—and when it has broken up. Banish the ink-pot and the steel pen. For the good of your penmanship use

THE W.H.S. PEN

Always at your service—always certain in action. It gives you a pen with a nib that exactly suits your hand, that is always agreeable—never cross or ill-tempered. You do not need even a "filler," for the W.H.S. Pen fills itself! Choose your style of pen from the 36 patterns and ensure 2 years' perfection in pen service. The nib is of genuine 14-carat gold tipped with iridium. It cannot corrode. Ask to see the new model.

Refuse Substitutes. Insist on the pen with the W.H.S. on the barrel. Of your Stationer.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 6. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1912.

One Penny.

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

1. G. K. CHESTERTON
2. EMILE
VANDERVELDE
3. RICHARD CURLE
4. PROF. A. G. PESKETT

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	165
The Problem of Divorce—
By Hector Macpherson	166
The Collapse of Socialism—
By G. K. Chesterton	167
England and Germany; A Reply to
Sir John Brunner	168
Industrial Unrest—
By Emile Vandervelde	169
An Answer to "Moth and Rust"	170
A Chance for Student Teachers	171
G. K. Chesterton: An Appreciation	172
Portrait of G. K. Chesterton	173
The Women of Mrs. Gaskell—
By Margaret Hamilton	174
"Westward Ho!"—A Reply to Mgr.
Benson	175
The Art of Joseph Conrad—
By Richard Curle	176

The Retreat from Moscow—	PAGE
By Count de Segur	177
A Russian Cabman—A Short Story—
By A. Chekov	178
Cousin Jonathan in his own Home	179
Great Preachers of To-day—
IV. Rev. R. J. Campbell.
By E. Hermann	180
Correspondence	181
The Tribunal of Poetry—
By J. S. Phillimore	183
"Hakluyt's Voyages"—
By A. G. Peskett	184
"The Story of Santa Claus"	186
In Memoriam (Count Leo Tolstoy)—
By Lewis Wharton	187
The Poetry of John Masfield—
By Gilbert Thomas	188
The "Edwin Drood" Controversy	190
Reviews in Brief	192
List of Books Received	194

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EVENTS in the Near East are moving towards their inevitable end. The end is foreshadowed by the fall of Monastir and the surrender of 50,000 Turkish troops. The prisoners include three Pashas, one of them being Fethi Pasha, a former Turkish Minister to Servia. The Turks at first offered a desperate resistance, but were compelled to capitulate. With the fall of Monastir practically ends the campaign in Macedonia. There is little report from the Bulgarian Army. So strict is the censorship that little is known beyond rumours of heavy fighting. The Turks claim to have driven the Bulgarians back, and to have captured a number of guns. Operations at Chatalja lines, so far as the Bulgarians are concerned, seem to be checked by the strength of the fortifications and the weakening of the army by disease. The ravages of cholera among the Turkish troops are described as appalling, and suggests the thought that the conclusion of the war may be brought about by disease rather than by military methods. King Ferdinand has sent for an eminent German physician to help to combat the epidemic among the Bulgarian troops. As a preventive measure, detachments of the international fleets have been landed at Constantinople. The relations between Austria and Servia continue strained. Germany and Italy have made representations to Servia similar to those made to Austria-Hungary regarding Servia's claim to an extension of territory after the war. Count Berchtold, in a speech on Austro-Hungarian policy to the Austria Delegation at Buda-Pest, declared for an autonomous Albania. On this point, he said, the Cabinets of Rome and Vienna were agreed.

The political crisis, with its resultant disorder in the House of Commons, is ended, thanks to the intervention of the Speaker. At his suggestion, the Prime Minister found another way out of the difficulty created by the Banbury amendment to the Home Rule Financial Resolutions. On Monday night Mr. Asquith outlined his proposals. The Government, he said, still thought that the simplest and most direct way of dealing with the matter was to ask the House to rescind the decision it came to. But partly from a repugnance to the possible recurrence of disorder, but still more because they did not feel it consistent with their duty to ignore the invitation extended from the Chair, they had decided to take another course. They proposed to negative the whole Financial Resolution, and to set up again the Committee on the finance of the Bill. The proposal was unanimously agreed to.

At the close of questions Mr. Chiozza Money called attention to the Speaker's ruling, when, in consequence of the prolonged cries of "Divide," "Adjourn," etc., by members of the Opposition, he declared that "a state of grave disorder had arisen," and he accordingly adjourned the House. Mr. Money submitted that if the Speaker was right in adjourning the House, then the members in question must have been guilty of grave disorder, and could each or all of them have been suspended from the service of the House. In reply to a question by Mr. Money, the Speaker said he had reconsidered his decision, and he still thought he was perfectly right. The Speaker or the Chairman, he added, in reply to Mr. Leif Jones, must be guided by the circumstances of the case.

The opposition of the medical profession to the Insurance Act does not seem to be lessened by Mr. Lloyd George's proposals. From all parts of the country come reports which show that the doctors are still determined not to work the medical benefit under the Act.

At a meeting in London of the National Unionist Association, Lord Lansdowne made an important pronouncement. On the question of Tariff Reform he gave two undertakings. One undertaking was that they would specify the limits for taxation, and not exceed those limits without authorisation; and the other that the revenue from such taxation should be used to alleviate other burdens on the taxpayer. At the annual conference resolutions were carried condemning the Government's Home Rule policy, emphasising the need of Tariff Reform, and pledging the party to repeal the Parliament Act. Mr. Austen Chamberlain moved, and the delegates adopted, a resolution in support of the Unionist policy of State assistance for the creation of occupying ownerships of land.

An important Board of Trade Return dealing with changes in wages and hours of labour has been issued. The number of workpeople affected by changes in wages during 1911 was 916,366 (exclusive of railwaymen). Of these, 507,207 received increases amounting to £46,247 per week, and 399,362 sustained decreases amounting to £11,669 per week. The net result of all the changes was thus an increase of £34,578 per week. In 1910 changes affecting 548,938 workpeople resulted in a net increase of £14,534 per week. The changes in the hours of labour in 1911 affected 155,407 workpeople, of whom 4,351 had their aggregate working time increased, and 151,056 had it reduced, the net effect being a reduction of 715,459 hours in the weekly working time of the workpeople affected. With the exception of 1902 and 1909, the figures for 1911 were by far the highest of ten years.

On receiving from the Committee for the Disestablishment of the Church in England and Wales a resolution expressing grave concern at the rumours that the Welsh Bill would possibly be dropped, Mr. Asquith has replied that "there is no truth in the rumours."

Dr. Woodrow Wilson has lost no time in taking the American people into his confidence in regard to Tariff Reform. He intends to convene a special Congress in April to deal with the question. How far the new President will go in the direction of Free Trade is not known, but, according to the Times Washington correspondent, there has not as yet been found a single competent authority who expects that the impending Tariff Bill will be other than Protectionist, albeit less rigorously protective than the Payne Law.

The funeral of Senor Canalejas, the Spanish Prime Minister, who was shot dead by a young man as he was on his way to a meeting of the Cabinet, took place at Madrid amid general expressions of grief. King Alfonso followed the funeral car on foot from the Chamber of Deputies to the Partheon.

Count Romanones, the new Spanish Prime Minister, states that he intends to carry on without alteration the policy of Senor Canalejas.

The suffragists who travelled on foot from Edinburgh to bring a petition to the Prime Minister reached London on Saturday. After taking part in a meeting in Trafalgar Square, they went to Downing Street, where their petition was received by one of Mr. Asquith's secretaries.

It is stated from Cape Town that South African Ministers have under consideration a proposal that six small cruisers should be built, equipped, and maintained by the British Admiralty for service in South African waters at the cost of the Union Government.

THE PROBLEM OF DIVORCE

HISTORY bears abundant testimony to the fact that upon the structure of the family life mainly depends social stability and national well-being. Indeed, so important is the family that knowledge of its structure at given periods gives us the key to the evolution of civilisation. Corresponding to the various stages, from tribalism to our present advanced civilisation, family life, beginning in something like promiscuity, and passing through the successive phases of polyandry and polygyny, reaches its final form in monogamy. Sociologists agree that monogamy is the ideal form of family life, but in the present state of society in very many cases the reality falls painfully short of the ideal. In its purity, marriage means the lifelong union of husband and wife in the bonds of mutual affection. Where the mutual bond is broken, domestic conditions become intolerable. Hitherto gross unfaithfulness has been recognised as sufficient reason for breaking the legal bond; but, according to the majority who signed the Divorce Commission Report for making divorce easier, other reasons must now be added.

In addition to placing men and women on an equality before the law, the Commissioners approve of divorce for the following:—Desertion for three years; incurable insanity after five years; penal servitude for life where there has been a death sentence commuted; cruelty and habitual drunkenness. It is not surprising that a minority of the Commissioners should have grave doubts as to the effect of these reforms upon family life, which undoubtedly shows disintegrating tendencies, owing to the encroachment of the State on the domestic sphere. The supreme questions come to be this: Will increased facilities for divorce tend to the strengthening or the loosening of the family tie? In the ancient world, especially in Rome, we learn from writers like Lecky and Milman that the elasticity of the divorce laws was "the corroding plague of Roman society"; and something of a like dread is expressed in America, where the family, as a social unit, is in danger. Mr. Roosevelt declares that the loosening of the marital tie is one of the most "unpleasant and dangerous features of American life."

"It appears," says the Minority Report, "from the United States Government statistics, that whereas in 1867 there were 9,937 divorces, in 1900 there were 55,751, the rate having risen from 27 per 100,000 population to 73 (or, omitting limited divorce, 72). To realise the magnitude of this rate it should be borne in mind that the corresponding rate in England and Wales for 1900 was 2 per 100,000 population. By 1906 the number of divorces in the United States had risen to 72,062, and the rate per 100,000 to 86." This seems formidable enough, but it is open to advocates of reform to reply that increased facilities for divorce do not create domestic incompatibility; they are, rather, of the nature of a remedy for an intolerable state of matters. It is argued that where the natural bond between husband and wife is broken, nothing but havoc comes from preserving the legal bond. Herbert Spencer, in his "Principles of Sociology," puts this aspect as follows:—"As monogamy is likely to be raised in character by a public sentiment requiring that the legal bond shall not be entered into unless it represents the natural bond, so perhaps it may be that maintenance of the legal bond will come to be held improper if the natural bond ceases." Spencer's view is evidently shared by the majority of the Commissioners.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE COLLAPSE OF SOCIALISM * * * BY G. K. CHESTERTON

I.

THERE is one trick of words of which I confess myself weary, and which has turned many current controversies to mere waste: It is that of taking some word used by an opponent in its practical and useful sense, and asking whether it might not be used in a more vague (and useless) sense. Thus, suppose I say "The Christians are conquering in the Balkans." Someone is sure to say in remonstrance, "Well, I don't call it very Christian to," etc., etc. To which I reply, with even greater impatience, "My good sir, don't call them Christians then. Call them Christy Minstrels, if it amuses you. There is a detachable body of men who have been baptised, who are doing something, right or wrong, in regard to people who have not been baptised. It is of them that I am talking; and I say that they are conquering." It is just the same with the first criticism offered by "F. McL." upon my article called "The Chance of the Peasant." He begins by saying that Peasant Ownership is Individualism. I begin by saying it isn't. In neither case will the mere words help us. The verbal meaning of Christianity is being the anointed; so that all people who have oil on their hair might be Christians: which is manifestly the reverse of the fact. The verbal meaning of Individualism is something which cannot be divided: so that if we tied the whole human race together by a rope, that enormous caterpillar would be an individual. It is not so that men use words when they are talking about things. We might use the word Individualism about a Peasant State—or about a Socialist State. All three aim at the happiness of individuals, not of shapeless masses of human blood and bone.

II.

We could so use it; but we do not. We do use the word "Individualism" as describing one definite historical event; a positive theory and practice which is also called the "Manchester School." This theory maintained that men would reach the fairest consumption and the fittest employment possible to them through competition; through the liberation and acceleration of exchange, and especially through that form of exchange which we call employment: the exchange of one man's technical labour or talent for a fragment of another man's capital. By this process, as was sincerely believed, competition would ensure most men pretty cheap prices, and the division of labour would ensure most men pretty appropriate occupation. This, I say, was Individualism: and this, I say, has broken down. It is perfectly plain to-day that, so far from the thing providing proper food or fit employment, it has ended in most citizens having hardly any breakfast, and being tied to one trade and class almost as completely as if they were literally slaves. Now, whether a Peasant State would, for other reasons, be equally unhappy is what we ought to be discussing. But the Peasant State is not Individualism, or anything remotely like it, because it has never founded itself on this quite clear Individualist theory. It did not claim that particular type of success. It does not exhibit that particular type of failure.

III.

Individualism is very nearly the opposite of the Peasant State—certainly more than Individualism is the opposite of Socialism. The distinction is not simply religious or atmospheric (though it is this also). The distinction can be defined. The root idea of Individualism was that the more men exchanged goods the better, for thus they would all at last get what was good for them. The root idea of the Peasant State is that, though exchange, of course, is necessary, the less there is of it the better; the more a man makes what he likes and enjoys what he makes, the better. The root theory of Individualism was that a man should be sacked from all trades at which he was amateurish, until everyone fitted into the trade for which he was professionally as perfect as possible. The root theory of the Peasant State is the opposite: that a man should be protected (as far as possible) by some small accumulation of capital or leisure, so that he may be amateurish, and do several things at once. Last, but not least, the root instinct of Individualism was that prices ought to be cut and undercut, for the sake of the consumer. The root instinct of the Peasant State is that prices ought to be kept level by custom or co-operative rule, for the sake of everybody. Individualism and the Peasant State, in short, are utterly antagonistic. Individualism and Collectivism are much closer together: they are both the well-meaning fads of the wealthy in a solely industrial society. That is what I have to say against "F. McL.'s" first complaint touching Peasant Proprietorship. As to how it can be brought about, I may say a word later. As to whether it can be brought about, it is not, perhaps, wholly irrelevant to remark that it already exists, at this minute by the clock, over the larger part of this planet.

IV.

I will take next my critic's touching belief that all that is best in British thought now tends to Collectivism. "In support of my contention," he says, "I point to the unification of the Labour forces throughout Britain; the advent of the Parliamentary Labour Party, and to all the recent ameliorative industrial and social legislative enactments." To which I answer, with hearty cordiality, that he is quite welcome to have all the Collectivism—or all the Cannibalism—he will ever get out of such tinkering and time-serving Parliamentary snobbery. I think he must have been on a Continental trip for the last year or two. What has most publicly happened here during that period has not been "the unification of the Labour forces throughout Britain," but violent and repeated quarrels between the rank and file of Trades Unionists and their own leaders, who on every occasion sold them to the capitalists. The essential thing that has occurred has not been "the advent of the Parliamentary Labour Party," but the final decision of that party to be a Parliamentary party and to cease to be a Labour party.

V.

That there have been a great many industrial and social legislative enactments lately is very true. One of the first of them enacted that jailors may henceforth keep a beggar in prison beyond his term, without pretence of judge or jury, if he has stolen a piece of bread three times in his life. One of the last of them has enacted that anybody who cannot explain his sexual relations to the spiritual satisfaction of the nearest policeman may find himself in danger of a penalty which all humane people (about a year ago) would have classed with thumb-screws and boiling oil. These enactments are certainly social in the profoundest sense of the word. Whether they are ameliorative is a matter of opinion. But that they are not Socialist is a matter of fact. Not one of them has made the private capitalist less of a capitalist.

I now pass on to a crucial point. I will not say of my enemy, like Cromwell, that the Lord has delivered him into my hand. For that is Calvinism, and I am not a Calvinist, as Cromwell was. I am a Christian convinced of Free Will: therefore I say that he has delivered himself into my hand. He mentions miners and dockers, and then asks my permission (I can't think why) to mention factory workers.

VI.

Then he says that these have asked for higher wages lately, and that I "might have mentioned" that they have not got them. Why, of course they have not got them! There is no need for me to "mention" the chief thing I maintain. I said, and I say again, the workmen cannot get justice from their employers, and therefore Individualism is dead. But I also said, and I say again, that they cannot get justice from the State, and therefore Socialism is dead. I implore my very intelligent opponent to take off his Collectivist-smoked spectacles and look at the plain facts before his eyes. The railway men got nothing out of the Railway Strike; but this was because they got nothing out of the Railway Commission—that is, the State. It is entirely possible that a powerful paralysis in rails or coal would really have conquered the capitalists and freed the poor. It was prevented by Government intervention. That Government intervention has not granted one jot of the Labour demands, but has strictly respected the monopolies of the capitalists. The holy State has stepped in, and the poor are rather poorer, the rich (if anything) rather richer than before. It is quite true that until very lately the Railway Men's Union would probably have voted for an abstract resolution in favour of the nationalisation of railways. So should I, for that matter. Only I have been awake while "F. McL." was asleep. And the cold fact is that, for the ruck of railway men, faith in the State could no more survive the last Railway Commission than faith in the friendly soldiers could have survived the Massacre of Glencoe.

VII.

The whole explanation is very simple. There is no State. There is a despotic, or a democratic, or a patriarchal State, as the case may be. Ours is a plutocratic State, and will always intervene on the plutocratic side. The only way to make the State democratic is to make it cease to be plutocratic: till then, a politician will merely mean a plutocrat. Therefore we must get property better divided before, and not after, we give greater powers to Government. There are only two ways of doing this: one is civil war; the other is specialising everywhere in encouraging the sale of land, etc., from big men to small. My critic is quite right in saying that even then there will be a margin of mercantile and urban people; there is in all Peasant States. But wherever the peasant is the primary thing, the others tend to independence also, and organise themselves into guilds. And a guild only means a Trades Union which has gained that "recognition" which the State stamped on, when our railway men asked for it last year.

Therefore I repeat my thesis with rather increased conviction. Democracy detests both the Social Statesman and the Individual Capitalist—because they are the same man.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY

A REPLY TO SIR JOHN BRUNNER

I.

THE warlike preparations in this country, unparalleled in cost and magnitude, which Sir John Brunner so much deplores, were necessitated by the cheeseparating policy of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, who so reduced the Navy Estimates of the former Unionist administration that our naval supremacy began rapidly to disappear, and the two-power standard has already vanished. At the very time we were reducing our Estimates, those of Germany were increasing by leaps and bounds; and it was because the Government could no longer shut its eyes to these facts that, in 1909, it voted increased Estimates for the Navy. These increased Estimates are not considered nearly sufficient by many of our experts.

Sir J. Brunner states that the German navy exists mainly for the protection of her mercantile marine. If this is so, why does Germany concentrate all her forces on one naval base in the North Sea, and that the nearest to the shores of Great Britain, and why are her battleships built with so limited a coal capacity that their operations are restricted to within about one hundred miles of a coaling depôt? This concentration within a few miles of Great Britain is considered so great a menace to us that the Government has recalled the Mediterranean Fleet, and has added it to the Home Fleet. We are now compelled to retain practically the whole of our navy in home waters, a state of affairs which is in itself a sufficient answer to Sir J. Brunner's assertion that the increased demands of the Admiralty are extravagant and unnecessary.

II.

Germany, then, is building her fleet to attack Great Britain, and her reason is not far to seek. Germany has an enormous population, increasing at the rate of nearly one million per year. She at present possesses no colonies of value, and her emigrants are therefore lost to her, becoming citizens of foreign States. A suitable colony, to which she could send her surplus population, is therefore one of her greatest needs. But all colonies worth having are already in the possession of other States, and Great Britain owns the best and most valuable. Canada or Australia would be priceless treasures to Germany, and it is for this reason that she is preparing for war. She will not strike till she is perfectly ready. She knows Great Britain will not take the initiative, because at the present time we have everything to lose and little to gain by a war with her. But when she has completed her preparations, Germany will declare war.

Sir John Brunner suggests that we should enter into international treaties with the Great Powers to secure peaceful shipping and merchandise from capture or destruction during war, and that the States should thereupon reduce their expenditure upon armaments. But he should remember that treaties are observed so long only as it suits those who entered into them to comply with them. If we reduced our Navy, what guarantee have we that other States would keep their promises? It is certain that if we could not make a display of force, our protestations would be ignored.

G. F. FOULSTON.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST

BY EMILE VANDERVELDE (Leader of the Belgian Socialist Party)

I.

I DO NOT pretend to be sufficiently well versed in English affairs to enter into discussion with Wells, or with anyone else, on the subject of the labour unrest, its causes and remedies. But the crisis through which the mother of capitalist nations is now passing is a phenomenon of world-wide interest. No one can remain indifferent; and, on the other hand, it may be of interest to the English reader to learn what impression the events which are happening around him make on the outsider.

All the countries of Western Europe are at the present moment faced with the same problems. But these problems present themselves with varying degrees of clearness, acuteness, and dramatic interest in the various countries. There is always one country towards which all eyes are turned, because the others think they see enacted there what will shortly be their own history. To take an example, in religious questions it was France, at the time of Combe's ministry and the separation of Church and State. To-day, in political and social questions, it is England, whose democratisation, so speedy and yet so complete, chains some, rejoices others, and gives food for thought to all.

When the English Cabinet effected its master stroke of cleverness, the pursuing of a policy of radical reform with the most mixed majority that ever Government had, a wave of sincere enthusiasm passed over Liberal Europe. The Belgian Liberals, in particular, swore by Lloyd George. Feeling certain that they also were on the eve of coming into power and of having to govern with the help of the Parti-Ouvrier, they hailed him as a forerunner. They proposed to follow his bold initiative and his noble impulses. Already one of the Liberal members of Parliament had brought in a Bill, modelled almost exactly on the English Old Age Pension Scheme. Other schemes, due to the same inspiration, were to follow. No reform was any longer feared. A confidence was felt in English Radicalism as complete as the lack of confidence in French Radicalism. At Brussels a most sympathetic welcome was extended to the delegates of the Eighty Club, who had come to explain to the Institut Solnay the agrarian, fiscal, and social policy of the Government.

Trusting in those who recommended this policy to their Continental co-religionists, they did not confine themselves to expecting from it the very real advantages which it was obtaining for workers; they expected from it in addition, and indeed mainly, the consolidation of social peace and, by the intervention of legislation, the softening of class antagonisms.

But this early impression was modified when, one after the other, the first dockers' strike, the railway strike, and especially the great coal strike, came to dispel the illusions of an all-too-superficial optimism. The English middle classes had thought to purchase social peace at the price of a few reforms, and, lo! at the very moment these reforms were coming into force, the workers, instead of showing gratitude, embarked with alarming unity upon the strife of class with class. This was enough to turn the tide. In one brief night the enthusiasm died down. The ardour of the middle classes cooled. Their conservative instincts regained the upper hand, and there is little doubt that the lesson of the English strikes had something, perhaps a great deal, to do with the failure of the Belgian Liberals in the general election of June 2nd, 1912.

In the labouring circles, on the contrary, the course of the English strikes was followed with an even more ardent sympathy and interest.

For some ten years the militant members of the Labour syndicates in Belgium had been getting accustomed to expect very little from the federalism of the Trades Unions, and had been directing all their attention to the powerful centralisation of the German "freie Gewerkschaften." It was no longer to London but to Berlin that they looked for their models. 1911 and 1912 changed that. When, for instance, a million miners were seen holding out for weeks, and forcing the Government of the most powerful Empire in the world to reckon with them, people understood that in the struggle between capital and labour the form of the organisation is of secondary importance. What matters is the moral solidarity, the steadfast will to fight to the end, the obstinate determination to lay upon themselves the hardest sacrifices possible, for the sake of the cause; and these qualities the English proletarians possess to a degree which has been surpassed by no other proletariat in the world. This was seen at the time of the coal strike, and has been perhaps even better seen at the Port of London, during the long, painful, but heroic death-struggle of the second dockers' strike.

Nor are these events by any means new. For the last century England has been experiencing many strikes, as prolonged and almost as alarming. But these were strikes for the purpose of obtaining some particular benefit, without touching the principle of capitalist society. And that is precisely why the labour unrest fills the "beati possidentes" with such alarm. The English worker was formerly conservative, held up as an example to the turbulent workers of the Continent. To-day he is represented in the Daily Mail and the Morning Post as a revolutionary, a rebel against discipline, whose doings threaten to lead England into anarchy and ruin.

The same thing has been said in all countries, when the labouring class passed from a purely practical syndicalism, fighting for questions of wage or hours of work, to a syndicalism followed up by political action, leavened by Socialism, and banding all workers together for the attainment of a common ideal. In short, what is happening at the present moment in England, where Socialism has taken so long to penetrate to the lowest strata of the proletariat, is very similar to what happened in our own country some twenty-five years ago: the same "labour unrest," the same alarm in Conservative circles, the same suggestions for re-establishing social peace by "the union of all men of good will."

II.

I have read with interest in the Daily Mail the letters of Wells which deal with these problems. The illustrious novelist presents two alternatives to his fellow-countrymen: either the triumph of Socialism, or the realisation of a national scheme for assuring to the workers the place which is their due.

I am obliged to confess that I do not at all believe in the latter of these alternatives.

I am interested, as everyone is, in garden cities. I am willing to recognise the merits of proportional representation. I can wish for nothing better than to see the increase of conciliation boards and arbitration councils, provided, of course, that arbitration is not compulsory. I am ready to applaud the efforts of those who are trying to draw up precise formulæ for the practical realisation of Socialistic aims, and from this point of view the Fabian Society, for instance, has already rendered, and will, no doubt, continue to render, signal services to the workers. But to believe that by such means as those the labour unrest can be allayed, the social problem solved, and associated labour substituted for salaried labour, is to forget that never in all the course of history was the emancipation of any particular class brought about except by the efforts of the class itself: it was the serfs and not the nobles who freed the serfs; it was the bourgeois and not the privileged classes who freed the bourgeois, and in the same way it will be the proletariat and not the moneyed classes who will free the proletariat.

The English workers have understood this; and it is because they have so understood that the present agitation is not a passing phenomenon, but a crisis of long duration, a crisis of growth, to which they see only one possible solution—the taking over by the nation of the principal means of production. It is, indeed, a fact worthy of note that the railway strike in 1911 and the coal strike in 1912 should have been the starting-point of a proletarian movement in favour of the nationalisation of railways and of mines.

But it is not sufficient merely to formulate these demands. They must be made to triumph. And they can only be made to triumph by a gigantic effort on the part of the working classes, fighting at the same time both on Syndicalistic and political ground.

We are well aware that in England, as on the Continent, the close union of political and Syndicalistic action is not approved by everyone; there are Socialists who believe only in political action, and there are Syndicalists who will hear of nothing but "direct action." But both these types of exclusiveness are on the decline, at least in countries where the workers have already had experience of their drawbacks and their dangers.

Some years ago, in France, the revolutionary Socialists and the Reformists, the Gnesdistes and the Millerandists, so far apart in other respects, had this in common, that they relied almost solely on the State, revolutionary or reformist, for the emancipation of the workers. At that time it was a hard-and-fast belief that a Parliament could do anything short of changing a man into a woman or a woman into a man. Now, if there is a sociological truth firmly established at the present day, it is that a Parliament cannot do everything. It would be just as incapable of changing by its own unaided efforts capitalist society into Socialist society, as of changing a man into a woman or a woman into a man. And if anyone has doubts about this, we would only ask him to look at the lamentable importance in the matter of reform which is characteristic of all present-day Parliaments, without exception. It is true that in certain countries, as, for instance, France and England, the importance is attributed to the defective methods of election. If the Parliaments do nothing, the fault lies, it is said, in the system of majorities, and Jaures in France and Wells in England promise us miracles on the day when proportional representation is established.

There could be no more mistaken idea.

In Belgium we have proportional representation—which, by the way, I support—and I can safely say that complaints about the lowering of the Parliamentary level are as general and as bitter here as in the countries where the system of majorities and the uninominal election are still in force.

The truth is that if the legislative assemblies of the present day do nothing, or next to nothing, for the people, it is chiefly because the middle-class majorities which rule them are silently but firmly resolved to do as little as possible. There is only one really effective way of forcing them to act, namely, by means of external pressure. The English miners know something of that. They might have waited till the end of time before the minimum wage was established by law, if they had not fought to obtain it. And it is because Parliaments do not carry out reforms, but confine themselves to placing them in their statute book, that in all countries the working class has learned to rely more and more on itself, on direct rather than on Parliamentary or legislative action. It is the rebirth of self-help, but of self-help collective instead of individual.

Only let us take care not to rush from one extreme to the other, and, as the French revolutionary Syndicalists have done, change a blind faith in the omnipotence of legislation for a no less blind faith in the omnipotence of the workers' syndicates.

Syndicalistic action, indeed, is not, any more than Parliamentary action, sufficient in itself. The one must supplement, and not oppose the other. Because it has not understood this, the "Confédération Générale de travail" ("C. G. T.") in France finds itself at this moment in difficulties; and if better relations are tending to be established between it and the Socialist party, long years will, no doubt, have to elapse before these relations become quite normal.

The English workers, on the contrary, have had the good fortune up till now not to be divided among themselves, not to know this division of opinions between Syndicalistic and political forces.

Their Labour party is the direct representative of their trades unions. It has sprung from the very heart of the workers' organisations, and it remains as their continuation.

May this entente cordiale be maintained, and extend to all the living forces of the proletariat and of Socialism.

The day when in England a united Socialism is established, once and for all, or when, under the influence of this unity, the Labour party will have finally cut the cords which still unite certain of its members to one of the great bourgeois parties, and when, on the other hand, class conscience takes the place of class instinct in the realm of trades unions, the English proletariat, thanks to its admirable organisation, will be able, perhaps better than any other, to strike a decisive blow at the capitalist class. A few deserters from the ruling classes will doubtless help, as the deserters from the nobility once helped the French bourgeois to accomplish their Revolution. But may this aid never cause them to forget the watchword which, fifty years ago, Karl Marx gave to the workers' International: "The emancipation of the working classes will be the work of the working classes themselves."

AN ANSWER TO "MOTH AND RUST"

"THIS," said I, "must be written with smoking pen, dipped in the boiling blood of indignation!"

"If I linger over the beauty of form—the outward-seeming fairness of this most seductive mood—I shall, Ulysses-like, struggle to clasp each Syren-sentence to my heart, caring nothing for the bitterness and death that lurks beneath."

Is this crusade against the coal-scuttle merely a glorious mood or a sober outlook on life?

If it is a mood, born of some shy subjective memory—the recluse of a moss-grown brain-cell—the very beauty of it must be its excuse for emerging from its secluded hermitage into this whirling, evolving earth.

I would bind Everyman to the mast of the present, and row him speedily past the phase to the future, bidding him look and love, but heeding not his struggles to reach it, for fear of the death lying in the embrace of the Syren-thought.

If, on the other hand, it is an outlook on life, and such it seems to be in the heart of it, then Everyman had safer pity it, spurn it, or deride it, according to his nature, and pass it by.

For myself, I am sorrowful at its profitless aching for the Infinite and indignant at its misdirected strength—for beauty is strength.

"The body must be fed and washed and dressed and put to sleep."

"... It thinks itself so intelligent and so useful. . . ." "It thinks itself!"

"Thinks itself." With what thinking-machinery, pray? The selfsame thinking-machine is used to think of ideals and umbrellas.

To look with a detached vision upon this conglomeration of clothes and barrel-organs and tea-pots (to keep within the petty bounds of pettinesses railed against) should fill us with impatient longing for the future, but not with disgust and—crime of all crimes—a yearning after a return to simplicity!

"The nearer we come to bare necessities, the nearer we come to true beauty; for true beauty is serviceableness. A cottage kitchen, with its table and crockery, is a far more beautiful place than a modern drawing-room."

Is this where the iconoclasm of "Moth and Rust" leads us?

From the false gods of coal-scuttles and barrel-organs to the divine majesty of deal tables and kitchen crockery?

Who would not sooner dust a drawing-room than clean a kitchen floor?

The millennium is brought no nearer by a return to the simplicity of the past, for this would only be to imitate the schoolboy who starts his sum afresh for neatness' sake, though the solution be in sight.

We do not want neat lives.

We must kick and plunge along through a slough of tea-pots, always keeping our ultimate goal in sight; it is waste of a generation to retrace our steps and try a cleaner path.

And even should we do so, whither would this path, looking so simply clean up to the first turning, lead us?

On and on through a field of growing complexities and luxuries—back to the slough of tea-pots!

We must go through—straight through, cutting and slashing our way amidst the clinging barrel-organs and kitchen-tables; always looking ahead—never backward.

Our bodies themselves are but boats. Our souls are the skippers who should firmly grasp the steering wheels.

What matters it if the wind be tainted with the smell of food?

We are sailing ahead towards the glory of perfect evolution.

We may pass many more alluring and restful havens on the voyage than a simple cottage; but pass them we must, if we would step ashore from our barques of clay on to firm ground.

But, after all, "Moth and Rust" may only be a mood. I hope it is.

Transient moods are often beautiful things if we smile at them when they become memories.

But moods that recur become dangerous. And moods like "Moth and Rust," arrayed in a robe of beautiful words, are Sirens that sing with passion of a fretful cowardice. The title of their song is "Look Backward!" Ulysses—Everyman, beware!

WILFRID A. NATHAN.

A CHANCE FOR STUDENT TEACHERS

I.

I WAS an assistant master in an elementary school when I decided to learn German. Things foreign had always possessed a wonderful fascination for me, and the entire absence of any facilities for acquiring a strange tongue only made me the more determined to achieve the ambition I had cherished from my earliest youth.

In our small country town there were few opportunities for self-culture, and as the years passed I chafed more and more at my limitations. Then one day, when all things in my school life seemed to be conspiring to smother the last sparks of aspiration in me, I felt that the moment had arrived to make an effort to rise above this soul-killing environment.

As an elementary teacher with just the ordinary qualifications, I knew that the secondary schools would be barred to me. I had no influential friends to find me a post in another profession, so that I was compelled either to make a fresh start in the old work or to strike out in an entirely new direction. I chose the latter alternative, and as I have not succeeded so badly, I am tempted to place my experiences before the reader who, like Napoleon, finds himself compelled to the task of "making circumstances."

II.

One of my friends, a commercial traveller, had just returned from a long business trip on the Continent. In every town, large or small, into which his business took him, he affirmed that there were schools of modern languages, all of them, to the best of his knowledge, having a large number of pupils, drawn from all classes, on their books.

This conversation set me thinking. There must be a good living for English teachers in Germany, and if I can support myself by giving lessons in my native tongue, I can at the same time realise to some extent my old ambition of becoming the master of a second language.

My commercial friend undertook the kind office of negotiator, and to my immense satisfaction secured me employment in a provincial town in East Prussia, within a week of his accepting the commission. "The easiest job I have ever undertaken," he assured me.

III.

The principal of my school proved an intellectual if somewhat exigent employer. He taught me a most ingenious system, by the use of which I could teach English to pupils without ever finding it necessary to employ a word of any other than my mother tongue. My students proved remarkably apt, and at times the more advanced would shamelessly expose my ignorance touching the lesser known plays of the Bard of Avon. "I can zay fife 'oondred lines from Shak-es-beer!" some of them would boast—never were such people for detail as these Germans.

I came back to my native land more English than ever, and prouder of my country than I had ever been before. I knew now wherein her merits lay, but my eyes had also been opened to some of her deficiencies, and I had some idea at least of the direction in which a remedy was to be found.

There are upwards of 20,000 young men in the elementary schools of this country. If only five per cent. could be persuaded to step out of the rut and follow the track I have indicated, they would find these wanderjahre amongst the most profitable of their lives. Our education system is crying for the very leaven which these pioneers might bring to it.

G. K. CHESTERTON: AN APPRECIATION

I.

THERE have been few examples of a rapid rise to a high place in contemporary letters so striking as the case of Mr. G. K. Chesterton. Up till nearly the end of the year 1899 you might have searched long, even in Fleet Street, to find a man who had so much as heard of his name. In the early months of 1900 considerable curiosity was aroused in that thoroughfare as to the authorship of certain articles and reviews which had been appearing in the Speaker over the initials "G. K. C." Everyone was asking everyone else: "Who is G. K. C.?"

From Fleet Street the curiosity spread elsewhere. In the course of another month or so, the answer was forthcoming. "G. K. C." was Gilbert Keith Chesterton, and before the end of the year a person who did not know that name was almost as rare among the lettered as one who did not know the name of Rudyard Kipling or Bernard Shaw.

Yet even before that date Mr. G. K. Chesterton had had some varied and not uninteresting experiences. Born of a parentage in which English, Scottish, and French-Swiss strains were mixed, he had been educated at St. Paul's School, where he carried off the "Milton" Prize for English verse, and where he wrote voluminously for a privately conducted school magazine, and spoke vehemently at an unofficial school debating club. Thence he had passed not to the University, but to the Slade Art School, and thence into a publisher's office. He had also published a volume of poetry called "The Wild Knight," well known to all since his rise to fame, but at the time noticed only by a few discriminating critics, amongst whom was Mr. James Douglas, who was so struck by its vigour and originality that he suspected the late John Davidson of being the author. But it was not until the appearance of the Speaker articles that G. K. C. began to be a public character.

II.

What was in those articles that so startled the reading world, and so imperiously commanded and enforced attention? Looking back to those old days, that question is, perhaps, one worth asking and attempting to answer. They were vigorously and picturesquely written; but there are many vigorous and picturesque writers who go unnoticed. I think it was the personality that coloured each one of them, and still more the jolly, vigorous fighting note that they struck from the first, that made everybody want to read them. Here was a man with a point of view of his own, and one who was, moreover, prepared to defend that point of view against all comers, rejoicing in the combat, laughing at the shaking of the spears, and dealing great thwacks about him, without malice, but also without reverence or timidity, from the mere joy of having a conviction and the still greater joy of battling for it.

III.

Such was Mr. Chesterton when the world first knew him, and such he is to-day. He is older in years. He is married. He has gone to live in Buckinghamshire. He has taken to keeping a dog. He has changed or modified some of his earlier opinions. But of any weakening or even sobering of the spirit with which those opinions were maintained there is no sign. If anything, Mr. Chesterton seems to have grown a stouter, fiercer, and more irrepressible fighter with the increase of years.

To understand Mr. Chesterton one must grasp those two elements—an intense seriousness of conviction and with it an almost irresponsible gaiety in its expression. All his work is propagandist, and nine-tenths of the best of it is controversial. He would probably agree cordially with Mr. Bernard Shaw in saying that "for Art's sake he would not be at the trouble of writing a single line." He is primarily a warrior, and his power of expression is simply his weapon of war.

As to the point of view itself, on behalf of which these magnificent gladiatorial exhibitions are performed, it may be difficult to sum it up in a phrase; but, briefly, it may perhaps be described as a plea for a return to Simplicity, or—since Simplicity is associated in many minds with Nut Food and Tolstoyism and a hundred things that G. K. C. particularly detests—it would perhaps be less misleading to say a return to the Normal.

IV.

According to the Chestertonian view, there are certain things which men always have wanted, will want, and ought to want; and he continually sees these things overlaid not only by the complexities of our modern civilisation, but also by the vague theories of "Progress" that impose on the modern mind. To him it seems that both the defenders of existing things and those who are seeking to transform them are neglecting the thing Man and its requirements. Thus readers of EVERYMAN are already familiar with his views on Property and the need of redistributing it—views antagonistic alike to the existing organisation of society and to the projects of the Socialists. Here, rightly or wrongly, Mr. Chesterton is standing up for what he believes to be normal to man. The large estates of this country are, he holds, the negation of property, as a harem is the negation of marriage. Take him on politics, on religion, on morals, on war, on drink, and you will find the same doctrine running through all.

V.

In private, as in public, Mr. Chesterton is genial, and, like Danton, seems to "find no use for hate," but, in private as in public, he is ever ready for conflict. His great figure and his great laugh and his readiness to get involved in an argument on the smallest provocation and his love of taverns have led to his comparison to Dr. Johnson; and, indeed, there is some resemblance, not only between the superficial characteristics, but between the fundamental qualities of the two—save that Mr. Chesterton's Romanticism would have shocked the Doctor. But even their opinions are less at variance than might appear at first sight. Johnson was a Tory and Chesterton is a Radical. But Johnson's Toryism was full of love for, and understanding of, the common man, while Mr. Chesterton's Radicalism is full of a feeling for tradition and an admiration for the past. Both were traditionalists, and both outspoken defenders of Orthodoxy.

G. K. CHESTERTON, NATUS 1874.

THE WOMEN OF MRS. GASKELL

I.

TRAGEDY in fiction or in drama invariably suggests a certain aloofness from the common things of life. The march of events that leads up to the culminating horror seem to call for trappings of state, a panoply of colour, divorced from the steady routine of an everyday existence. Tragedy at a banquet—the skeleton at the feast—is familiar to literature; but to stage a drama in the quiet setting of the peaceful home, to marshal the forces of destruction on the domestic hearth, demands a genius rare as it is remarkable—genius, moreover, allied with the spiritual insight that can realise the anguish of a dumb-driven soul incapable of expressing its emotion.

Such a genius is Mrs. Gaskell; such a tragedy is "Sylvia's Lovers," one of the masterpieces of the English language. The heroine is simple and unlettered, with a warm, impulsive heart, a steadfast loyalty, and a passionate adherence to those she loves. Such a one you may meet to-day among the fisher-folk of the North Country, with only native simplicity and strength of character to recommend her. Nothing subtle in Sylvia, no complexity of mood or cross-current of emotion. A woman of sound instincts, healthy desires—the last type we should expect to find in tragedy.

II.

Mrs. Gaskell is never greater than when she sketches the farm-house, with its daily routine of tasks, its simple joys and quiet pleasures, the cosy kitchen, with its warm fireside, the farmer with his pipe and his glass. Here are no scenic effects, no startling backgrounds of vivid colour; tragedy sits in the ingle-nook; you feel its presence in the house, the chill of its breath strikes to your heart as you cross the threshold. Tragedy and domesticity interwoven throughout, the one inseparable from the other. The bread is baked, the butter churned, the offices of household duties steadily performed. And this insistence of well-ordered routine strikes the keynote of drama. For the essence of drama is conflict; and to the end of time one must remember the spectacle of the women darning the stockings, milking the cows, sweeping the hearth, ay, and saying their prayers, while the man of the house, husband and father, is lying in jail, waiting to be hanged. The wheels of life grind on, indifferent to death, careless of pain; but where a lesser author would have emphasised at once the household service and the lack of emotional demonstration, Mrs. Gaskell, with the very reticence of her art, paints the anguish of these simple peasant folk who did not shed a tear, but with a terrible quietness continued to do their work.

III.

Sylvia, the centre of the tragedy, still remains the same simple, lovable creature, her coquetry, innocent as a child's, her likes and dislikes, natural, unaffected. Only once does emotion break down the barriers of reticence, and passion, suddenly let loose, find eloquence. Sylvia, married to Philip, one time her admirer, discovers he was responsible for her separation from the lover of her youth. The white heat of her wrath at the treachery of the man who is now her husband burns and stings like a lash; the wrath of a simple soul who is suddenly finding expression is so much more deadly than the invective of the supple tongued.

Philip creeps from the house, and his wife only once again beholds him, when, her baby in her arms, she passes the wreck of a man—an old soldier, incredibly broken and emaciated, dying of hunger. She slips half a crown into the child's hand, and bids her give it to the poor man, and passes by, her thoughts fixed on the lover of her youth whom Philip stole from her.

IV.

The drama of the situation lies in Sylvia's simplicity of character. A quick-brained woman would have noticed and analysed the look in the soldier's eye. Sylvia, with the peasant's acceptance of things as they are, or appear to be, never saw him—and Philip did not speak.

As in tragedy, so in stories of a lighter vein. The setting is invariably simple and domestic—what the modern writer might term commonplace. "Cranford," most dainty and delightful of comedies, centres in a small village, wherein the women tattle deliciously over China tea—everyone knows and loves Miss Matty and her friends. Mrs. Gaskell has achieved a triumph unique in literature. Her heroines in tragedy or comedy are pre-eminently simple women; but—and herein lies the subtlety and the strength of her art—no novelist has a greater range in diversity of character, no novelist has done what she has succeeded in doing. Her women grip you from the first. There is no lack of colour in Sylvia, no want of interest in Molly. Mary Barton is heroic and convincing, Phyllis exquisite and appealing, each one of them drawn from the quiet domestic type—the type that feels too deeply, to find glib expression. They cannot analyse their emotions, nor easily discuss them, but they grip one with the sense of their reality by sheer fundamental force of character. They are alive, these women—though in literature we rarely meet them. The unsophisticated heroine serves the modern novelist for the most part as a lay figure appearing in a love-story just short enough to escape being sickly. No writer of the present day has mastered the art that can create a simple woman strong enough to dominate the stage.

V.

In "A Manchester Marriage," a study of middle-class life, tragedy is once more staged in such a setting. It is the story of a husband, supposed to be dead, who returns to find his wife married to another man. Not for a moment does the woman hesitate—the choice for her does not lie between the two men; she rules them both out of the decision, and herself besides. The question for her is how she can save the children of the second marriage from the stigma of illegitimacy. To that end she drives the first husband from the house, forcing him by the emergency of her will to leave her—and his home for ever. For a moment the veil falls, and she cries out in a passion of anguish. Then her face resumes its quiet control, the wheels of the household run once more in smooth, well-ordered fashion, the spectre is driven from the hearth, tragedy thrust into the darkness—and the second husband never knows.

Think of the analysis of motive, the dissection of emotion, such a situation would afford a modern novelist, and contrast the classic art of Mrs. Gaskell. Only a simple woman could have done so terrible and so right a thing—and, having done it, could forbear to talk about it! That, after all, is one of the most salient characteristics of the women of Mrs. Gaskell. They never say a word too much! That is, perhaps, why the simple woman is eternal in literature as in life.

MARGARET HAMILTON.

“WESTWARD HO!”

A REPLY TO MGR. BENSON

I.

Was Kingsley essentially unjust in the picture which he drew in “Westward Ho!” of the England of Elizabeth? Monsignor R. H. Benson thinks that he was, and goes so far as to describe the novel as a “kind of monument of injustice.” With some parts of Monsignor Benson’s article, and with the spirit in which it is written, most people will have small difficulty in agreeing. The Jesuits Persons and Campion are indeed somewhat hardly treated in the story, and less than justice is done to those emissaries of the Roman Church in England who certainly upheld their convictions with a courage which deserves the fullest recognition. So also with the sufferings of the English Catholics, though it must be remembered that the persecution, unjustifiable as it was, was less severe than that suffered by Protestants in England in the previous reign, and might fairly be called mild in comparison with the contemporary horrors in France and the Netherlands. Nor should it be forgotten that Pope Pius V. in 1570, by his Bull of excommunication and deposition, which purported to absolve Elizabeth’s subjects from their allegiance, issued what was in effect a direct political challenge to the existing English Government. A plea for toleration could hardly go alongside such action.

It is difficult to agree that Kingsley treats the Spaniards unfairly. Don Guzman, though in a sense the villain of the piece, is given full credit alike for courage and courtesy, and is made by no means a despicable character. The final scene, in which the blind Amyas has a vision of the Don and his officers in the sunken galleon, “with their swords upon the table at the wine,” shows the author’s feeling. If the bishop is shown as a coward and hypocrite, the persecuting priest is neither, and dies “with a Domine in manus tuas like a valiant man of Spain.” The old Comquistador who is met in the wilderness, despite his lurid record, is a gentle and likeable old man. There are more than “one or two moments of chivalry” among the Spaniards in “Westward Ho!” and the author is far from belittling Spanish valour and enterprise.

II.

On the English side Captain John Oxenham is by no means faultless, and Kingsley makes plain his disapproval of the blind fury of revenge in which his hero goes to meet the Armada, though, so far as the tale is concerned, the death of Frank Leigh provides explanation, if not excuse. It is also curious that Kingsley should be charged with using English prejudice against the Irish, in view of the note which he appends to Chapter V. In a letter written in 1854, the author of “Westward Ho!” writes, “My only pain is that I have been forced to sketch poor Paddy as a very worthless fellow then, while just now he is turning out a hero.” (“Life,” Vol. I., p. 435.)

It is easy for superior persons in our day to talk glibly of the “piracies” of Drake, and it is hardly worth quarrelling over the term. Yet, though the methods of sixteenth-century naval war were not those of modern days, to confound one of the greatest of English sailors and one of the founders of the British fleet and Empire with the ruffians who infested certain seas in later times is a mere abuse of words. As for the Spanish treatment of Indians, the testimony of Las Casas, even if it be in places overdrawn, is an indictment which much whitewash will fail to obliterate. There may be, from various causes, more Indians to-day in Spanish than in Anglo-Saxon America, but one may doubt if more will be found in Cuba or San Domingo (Hispaniola) than in Boston or New York.

Spaniards claimed more than “the countries they had conquered” in the New World. Spain claimed a monopoly over regions which her most valiant sons had hardly seen, and that by Papal authority. The breaking of that monopoly and the foundation of the modern civilisation of North America was the work begun by the Protestant English scamen of the reign of Elizabeth.

III.

As to the Inquisition, if its iniquities only came into play in the case of “relapse,” it would be interesting to know why the Inquisitors had control of Spanish harbours, and from what Thomas Nicholls and Thomas Seeley, Englishmen, were supposed to have relapsed when they were prisoners of the Inquisition in the years 1561 and 1563. Details will be found, with the petition of Dorothy, wife of Thomas Seeley, in Froude’s “History of England” (Vol. VIII., pp. 1-25). It is also remarkable on this theory that some 10,000 persons were burnt alive by the Inquisition during a period of eighteen years. If Rome so strongly reprobated these proceedings, how do we account for the reorganisation of the Papal Inquisition on the Spanish model in 1542? This, though not quite so effective as its prototype, yet accomplished considerable slaughter among the Waldenses of Calabria. Italy was no very secure refuge for fugitives from Spain.

The great struggle of the sixteenth century was more than a duel between England and Spain, more than a strife between Catholicism and nationalism in religion. It was a battle between that principle on which the whole fabric of the modern world is reared—the freedom of the human soul alike in the religious, political, and social spheres, and a gigantic religious and political tyranny which, had it prevailed, would inevitably have thrust men back to the dark ages. The truth of this is not affected by the fact that those who stood on the side of liberty were to a great extent unconscious of the full consequences of their principles, and in some cases only too ready to use the weapons of their adversaries. The Roman Church of the Counter Reformation chose to use the sword of this world, in the shape of the arms of Spain and the Catholic powers, to win back her shattered supremacy, and for the consequences of that choice in a St. Bartholomew’s day in Paris, or a “Spanish fury” in Antwerp, the Church of that period must bear a full share of responsibility. History may judge whether Queen Elizabeth and Sir Francis Drake or Philip II. and the Duke of Alva did most for the cause of justice and the progress of the world.

IV.

On this broad ground the substantial justice of Kingsley’s picture may well be defended. The picture, like the man who drew it, is frankly partisan and strongly Protestant; it may not have the accuracy of a photograph—what historical novel has?—yet that is not to say that the impression conveyed is essentially false. No one would go to “Westward Ho!” for strictly impartial history. The book was not written for that purpose, and a novel, be it never so historical, is not history. All who read “Westward Ho!” and everyone ought to do so, will get a wonderfully vivid picture of English life in the days of the Armada, will spend a season with high-hearted and valiant men, and will have small difficulty in correcting what may be amiss by the standard histories of the period.

ROBERT CANDLISH.

THE ART OF JOSEPH CONRAD * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

I.

To understand Mr. Conrad fully one must realise that he is, at the same moment, profoundly romantic and profoundly realistic. That is not the type of novelist produced in England; and, in fact, Mr. Conrad is no more English in his art than he is in his nationality. He is of the school of Flaubert and the Russians—a cosmopolitan. Perhaps that is why some people have a curious and uneasy sensation in reading his books—as though they were the productions of an incomprehensible mind. That deep melancholy of his, that veiled irony, that formidable exuberance, all must seem alien to many placid English intelligences.

II.

Profoundly romantic and profoundly realistic—that is the secret. They mingle at every step; in his conceptions of character, in his creation of an atmosphere, in the marvellous wealth of his descriptions. He never loses his grip on actuality; and the romance that he throws over things—throws over the mysterious forests of the Congo, for instance, or over a figure like Lord Jim—is not the false idealism of a Mid-Victorian, but a sort of intuition, extraordinarily vivid and extraordinarily exact. For Mr. Conrad is a psychologist, and has all the psychologist's horror of vagueness, but he is also a poet oppressed by the tragic futility of life—by its tragic futility and by its tragic beauty. I said above that he was melancholy, and I think this melancholy is really embedded in his sense of futility.

III.

It peers at you out of his work again and again: out of "Nostromo," where the vast riches of the San Tomé mine leave Mrs. Gould forlorn amidst the splendours of the Casa Gould; out of "Lord Jim," where death comes before forgiveness; out of "Almayer's Folly," where the lost hopes of love and wealth break Almayer's heart; out of "Under Western Eyes," where Razumov's life is wrecked by an infernal chance; out of "To-morrow," with its cry of despair; out of "Youth," with its cry of longing; out of "Freya of the Seven Islands," with its pitiful reminder that there is no certainty in human affairs. I believe, indeed, that I could take every novel and story by Mr. Conrad and give not only one, but numerous examples of what I mean. For he is, in this sense, deeply pessimistic about life, a pessimism only heightened by his respect for what is noble, for love, self-sacrifice, courage, and by his sensitiveness to external impressions and to romance.

IV.

And I said, also, that he was ironical. It is a thing, surely, which springs logically from his pessimism. He is ironical in a way that is neither so bitter as Flaubert, so suave as Anatole France, so contemptuous as Tolstoy, and which yet has a likeness to all of those. Perhaps, indeed, it is Turgenev's irony that Mr. Conrad's comes closest to. For both these writers have the common bond of a singular pensiveness, a singular intensity of resemblance, and a singular clear-headedness towards pretension. And, just as it is with all these men, so is it with Mr. Conrad's irony, which is not simply a literary device, but an actual part of himself and of his outlook upon the world. He sees the enormous folly of so much that passes around us, and it disgusts his sense of decency and proportion. His is not the Comic Spirit—it is, rather, the Spirit of the Science of Values.

V.

In the same sentence in which I said that Mr. Conrad was melancholy and ironical, I said, also, that he was exuberant. That is a statement which no one who has studied his works is likely to deny. His exuberance resembles that of his tropical forests—a teeming energy, a restless force. We see it not only in his style, which (especially in the earlier books) is exotic, but in his method of telling a story, and in his characterisation. A figure of Mr. Conrad's glows with the very intenseness in which it is imagined—it has, in short, an exuberant vitality. A person like Winnie Verloc, in "The Secret Agent," is poetical in the sense that she is pictured with such delicacy and power of conviction that the beauty of her character strikes one as absolutely true. Portraits such as hers are very moving. Thus do romance and realism go hand in hand to build up these illusions which make a novelist great.

VI.

Of course, I have only been able to mention one or two of Mr. Conrad's characteristics, one or two of the more obvious ones—it would require a dozen articles of this length to give any real analysis of him—but, in any case, it is always necessary to remember that he is most essentially original in spite of his affinities—original in a more unmistakable manner than any writer of our day. For his is an unusually marked and powerful personality. The theory that a true artist ought not to show his personality is really a contradiction in terms—how can he prevent it?—what he ought not to do is to show himself. That's why so few English writers are artists—they are always obtruding themselves; and that is why men like Flaubert and Turgenev, who had obviously pronounced personalities, are artists—because they are aloof. And Conrad is of their order—in his work, bearing so completely, so fervently the impress of his personality, he stands aloof from his creations. Such writers are the rarest and most impressive of artists.

VII.

It is a strange anomaly that a Pole like Mr. Conrad should be one of the most thrilling writers of English prose that we have ever had. And yet that is certainly the case. He has brought quite a new music into our language, a slow, golden music which is wonderfully fine. I only wish I had the space to give several instances; but, as it is, I will content myself with one, describing a tropical dawn. It is from "The Lagoon," in the volume, "Tales of Unrest."

"A murmur powerful and gentle, a murmur vast and faint; the murmur of trembling leaves, of stirring boughs, ran through the tangled depths of the forests, ran over the starry smoothness of the lagoon, and the water between the piles lapped the slimy timber once with a sudden splash. A breath of warm air touched the two men's faces and passed on with a mournful sound—a breath loud and short, like an uneasy sigh of the dreaming earth."

THE RETREAT FROM MOSCOW

By COUNT DE SEGUR

(Aide-de-Camp to Napoleon)

I.

THE spirits of the troops were still supported by the example of their leaders, by the hopes of finding all their wants supplied at Smolensk, and still more by the aspect of a yet brilliant sun, of that universal source of hope and life, which seemed to contradict and deny the spectacles of despair and death that already encompassed us.

But on November 6th the heavens declared against us. Their azure disappeared. The army marched enveloped in cold fogs. These fogs became thicker, and presently an immense cloud descended upon it in large flakes of snow. It seemed as if the sky was falling, and joining the earth and our enemies to complete our destruction. All objects changed their appearance, and became confounded, and not to be recognised again; we proceeded, without knowing where we were, without perceiving the point to which we were bound; everything was transformed into an obstacle. While the soldier was struggling with the tempest of wind and snow, the flakes, driven by the storm, lodged and accumulated in every hollow; their surfaces concealed unknown abysses, which perfidiously opened beneath our feet. There the men were engulfed, and the weakest, resigning themselves to their fate, found a grave in these snow-pits.

II.

Those who followed turned aside, but the storm drove into their faces both the snow that was descending from the sky and that which it raised from the ground: it seemed bent on opposing their progress. The Russian winter, under this new form, attacked them on all sides: it penetrated through their light garments and their torn shoes and boots. Their wet clothes froze upon their bodies; an icy envelope encased them and stiffened all their limbs. A keen and violent wind interrupted respiration: it seized their breath at the moment when they exhaled and converted it into icicles, which hung from their beards all round their mouths.

The unfortunate creatures still crawled on, shivering, till the snow, gathering like balls under their feet, or the fragment of some broken article, a branch of a tree, or the body of one of their comrades, caused them to stumble and fall. There they groaned in vain; the snow soon covered them; slight hillocks marked the spot where they lay; such was their only grave! The road was studded with these undulations like a cemetery; the most intrepid and the most indifferent were affected; they passed on quickly with averted looks.

III.

Everything, even to their very arms, still offensive at Malo-Yaroslawetz, but since then defensive only, now turned against them. These seemed to their frozen limbs insupportably heavy. In the frequent falls which they experienced they dropped from their hands and were broken or buried in the snow. If they rose again, it was without them; for they did not throw them away; hunger and cold wrested them from their grasp. The fingers of many others were frozen to the musket which they still held, which deprived them of the motion necessary for keeping up some degree of warmth and life.

We soon met with numbers of men belonging to all the corps, sometimes singly, at others in troops. They had not basely deserted their colours; it was cold and inanition which had separated them from their columns. In this general and individual struggle they had parted from one another, and there they were, disarmed, vanquished, defenceless, without leaders, obeying nothing but the urgent instinct of self-preservation.

IV.

Most of them, attracted by the sight of bypaths, dispersed themselves over the country, in hopes of finding bread and shelter for the coming night; but, on their first passage, all had been laid waste to the extent of seven or eight leagues. They met with nothing but Cossacks, and an armed population, which encompassed, wounded, and stripped them naked, and then left them, with ferocious bursts of laughter, to expire on the snow. These people, who had risen at the call of Alexander and Kutusoff, and who had not then learned, as they since have, to avenge nobly a country which they were unable to defend, hovered on both flanks of the army under favour of the woods. Those whom they did not despatch with their pikes and hatchets they brought back to the fatal and all-devouring high road.

V.

Night then came on—a night of sixteen hours! But on that snow, which covered everything, they knew not where to halt, where to sit, where to lie down, where to find some root or other to eat, and dry wood to kindle a fire! Fatigue, darkness, and repeated orders nevertheless stopped those whom their moral and physical strength and the efforts of their officers had kept together. They strove to establish themselves, but the tempest, still active, dispersed the first preparations of bivouacs. The pines, laden with frost, obstinately resisted the flames; the snow from the sky, which yet continued to fall fast, and that on the ground, which melted from the efforts of the soldiers and the effect of the first fires, extinguished those fires, as well as the strength and spirits of the men.

VI.

When at length the flames gained the ascendancy, the officers and soldiers around them prepared their wretched repast. It consisted of lean and bloody pieces of flesh, torn from the horses that were knocked up, and at most a few spoonfuls of rye-flour mixed with snow-water. Next morning, circular ranges of soldiers, extended lifeless, marked the bivouacs, and the ground about them was strewed with the bodies of several thousand horses.

From that day we began to place less reliance on one another. In that lively army, susceptible of all impressions, and taught to reason by an advanced civilisation, discouragement and neglect of discipline spread rapidly, the imagination knowing no bounds in evil as in good. Henceforward, at every bivouac, at every difficult passage, at every moment, some portion separated from the yet-organised troops, and fell into disorder. There were some, however, who withstood this wide contagion of lack of discipline and despondency. These were officers, non-commissioned officers, and steady soldiers. These were extraordinary men: they encouraged one another by repeating the name of Smolensk, which they knew they were approaching, and where they had been promised that all their wants should be supplied. In this vast wreck the army, like a great ship tossed by the most tremendous of tempests, threw, without hesitation, into the sea of ice and snow everything that could slacken or impede its progress.

A RUSSIAN CABMAN * * By A. CHEKOV

IT was the hour of dusk. The coarse, wet snow was swirling lazily around the lamps which had just been lighted, and lay in a thin, soft covering on the roofs, on the backs of horses, and on shoulders and hats. Jonah Patapoff, a St. Petersburg cabman, was entirely white, like a ghost; he had curled himself up as it is only possible for a living thing to do, sitting in the sleigh and not stirring. Had a whole snow-drift fallen upon him, even then it is doubtful whether he would have deemed it necessary to shake it off. His poor little mare likewise was quite white and motionless. With her immovable angular figure, with her stick-like legs, she closely resembled one of the gingerbread horses one buys for a farthing. In all likelihood she was plunged in thought. It would be impossible for anyone not to think who had been torn away from the plough, from the quiet and peaceful surroundings to which they had been accustomed, and cast into this whirlpool of misery, full of monstrous lights, constant noise, and scurrying people.

Jonah and his miserable little horse had not moved from the same spot for a long time; they had left the stable long before midday, and yet no one had taken them. The gloom of night had fallen upon the city, the pallid lamplight now shone brighter, and the hubbub of the streets became louder.

"Cabman, the Wiborg Side," Jonah heard someone say. "Cabman!" He shivered, and between his eyelashes, which were stuck together with the snow, he saw an officer in a long coat and cape. "To the Wiborg Side," repeated the officer. "Are you asleep, or what is it? I said Wiborg Side."

In token of assent Jonah shook the reins, and the blanket of snow fell off in a shower from the back of his little horse and from his own shoulders. The officer seated himself in the sleigh, and the cabman, giving his horse the signal to start, stretched out his neck like a swan, straightened himself up, and, more from habit than from necessity, cracked his whip. His little mare also stretched herself, bent her stick-like legs, and moved unwillingly away.

"Where are you going, you old idiot?" all of a sudden Jonah heard a voice call out from somewhere in the dark mass of moving vehicles. "Where the devil are you going? Keep to the right!"

"You don't know how to drive; go to the right," echoed the angry officer.

A coachman on a passing carriage lost his temper, and a pedestrian who was crossing the street and had knocked his shoulder against the horse's head glared angrily at Jonah and shook off the snow from his sleeve.

Jonah kept fidgeting on the seat and thrusting out his elbows in all directions, with his eyes rolling about like a maniac's, as if he did not quite understand why he was where he was.

"What scoundrels these fellows are!" said the officer sarcastically. "They all seem to be trying to have a collision or fall under the horse's nose. It looks as if it had all been pre-arranged."

Jonah turned around, looked at his passenger, and began to move his lips. Apparently he wished to say something, but nothing came from his throat but inarticulate sounds.

"What is it?" asked the officer.

Jonah, twisting his mouth into the semblance of a smile, cleared his throat and began to speak hoarsely.

"I am, sir, in—great trouble; my son died this week in the hospital."

"H'm! What did he die of?"

Jonah now turned completely around and said:

"I really don't know; who ever does know? It must have been a fever. He was in the hospital for three days and then died. It's the will of God."

"Get out of the way, you old devil!" again a voice was heard calling. "Use your eyes."

"Get on, get on," said the officer. "At this rate we will not get there until to-morrow morning. Hurry up a bit."

The cabman once again stretched his neck, straightened himself up and wearily waved the whip. From time to time he glanced at the officer, but he had closed his eyes, and apparently was not disposed to listen.

When they reached the Wiborg Side the officer got out hastily, and Jonah took his stand near a drinking shop, again bent over on his box and became motionless. Once more the wet snow covered both him and his little horse, making them quite white. An hour passed, then another.

Presently three young men came along, stamping on the pavement with their goloshes and quarrelling with one another; two of them were tall and thin, while the third was small and humpbacked.

"Cabman, to the Politsesky Bridge," the hunchback screamed out in a jarring voice. "Sixpence for the three of us."

Jonah jerked the reins and started the horse. Sixpence was not the right fare, but the price didn't matter to him now. Two shillings or a shilling, it was all the same; the only thing he cared for was a passenger.

"Well, go on," harshly shouted the hunchback, settling himself and blowing on the nape of Jonah's neck. "Whip her up. What a hat you have, my good fellow; you couldn't find a sorrier one in all Petersburg!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed Jonah; "it's all I have."

"Are you married, cabman?" asked the tall one.

"Am I? You are very jolly, gentlemen! The only wife I have now is in mother earth." Jonah laughed again. "That is to say, the grave—for my son, you know, is dead and I am still living—it's a funny world. Death must have made a blunder, for instead of taking me he took him."

And he turned around in order to tell how his son had died; but the hunchback, giving a slight sigh of relief, declared that, thank God, they had at last arrived.

Jonah, having received his sixpence, gazed for some time after the three idlers who were disappearing in the darkness. Once more he was alone in the silence. His sorrow, which could not be quieted for long, broke out afresh, and his heart was sick with longing. His eyes, full of trouble and suffering, followed the crowd which was passing along on both sides of the street. Would he not be able to find out of these thousands of people even one who would listen to him? But they passed on, paying no attention either to him or his sorrow—a really great sorrow which knew no bounds. It seemed to him as if his heart had broken, and if all his grief had flowed out of it that it would have flooded the whole world. Yet one could see nothing of it, for it was concealed by such a miserable exterior that one would not be able to find it even in broad daylight.

Presently Jonah saw a porter with a sack, and determined to talk to him.

"My friend, what is the time?" he asked.

"Ten o'clock. What are you standing here for? Drive on."

Jonah drove a few paces, bent over, and gave himself up to his grief. He felt that it was useless any longer to turn to people. Before five minutes had passed, he braced himself up, gave his head a shake as if in pain, and tugged at the reins—he had reached the end of his endurance.

"Home! We shall go home." And the poor little mare, as if knowing his thoughts, began to go at a trot.

An hour and a half later Jonah was sitting by a large dirty stove; on it, on the floor, and on benches people were snoring in a foul atmosphere of suffocating heat. He looked at the sleepers, scratched himself a little, and was sorry he had come home so early.

"And I haven't enough for oats—that's where the trouble is. The man who knows his business, and can make both himself and his horse comfortable, that man is happy and contented; but I——"

In one of the corners of the room a young cabman, who was half asleep, got up, coughed, and dragged himself over to the water-bucket.

"You want to drink, don't you?" asked Jonah.

"That's it. I want a drink."

"Well, drink to your health—as for me, I am in great trouble, my boy, for my son has just died. Have you heard? In the hospital this week. That's what is the matter."

Jonah looked to see what effect his words had produced, and saw that they had evoked absolutely nothing. The young man covered up his head and was already fast asleep. The old chap sighed and scratched his head. As the young one wanted to drink, so he wanted to talk. It would soon be a week since his son had died, and he had not yet been able to open his heart to a soul. At such a time one must speak with someone who understands; one must tell how his son fell ill, how he suffered, what he said before his death, and how he died. Then the funeral must be described, and how they returned to the hospital for his clothes. Then there was his little daughter Anisya, who lived in the country, and one would have to talk about her too. In fact, there were so many things to talk about. The listener would have to sigh, groan, and cry. Perhaps an old woman would be the best. They, it is true, haven't much sense; still, they would wail at once—at the first few words.

"Now I must look after my little mare," said Jonah to himself. "There is always time for sleep, and I can sleep later on."

He put on his long coat and went to the stable where the horse was standing. He thought of oats, hay, the weather, of anything but his son, for when alone he cannot think about him. He could speak about him with someone, but it is unbearably painful to think of him or to recall his face to his mind.

"You are eating, are you?" Jonah asked his horse, seeing her shining eyes. "Well, eat away; if we haven't oats, we must be content with hay. Ah! Yes, I suppose I am too old to be a good cabman—my son would have done it far better; but as for me—— He was a real cabman, if he had only lived."

Jonah kept silent for some time, and then continued:

"Such is life, my poor old animal. Kuzma P'onitch is no more; his time had come, and death took him by some chance. Now, let us suppose you had a foal of your own, and its time to die had come; then you would know what agony is, wouldn't you?"

The little mare munched away, listened, and licked her master's hand.

Jonah broke down completely and told her all.

COUSIN JONATHAN IN HIS OWN HOME

It is extraordinary, when one thinks of it, how little we in Britain really know of America and its people. Such impressions as we have are apt to be derived from encounters with American tourists on the Continent—impressions which are generally too bad to be true—or from Dana Gibson's drawings—impressions which are surely too good to be true. The American shares the unhappy Anglo-Saxon knack of not showing his best side when away from home—so, perhaps we should not be so slow to realise what nous autres Anglais must appear like to the European nations we condescend to visit.

All the more welcome, therefore, in view of our dangerously little knowledge of the United States and its inhabitants, is a volume like "John Jonathan and Company" (London: Chapman and Hall. 5s.), which records the observations and reflections of a Scot abroad in the land of the Stars and Stripes. The author of the book, we hasten to add, has collected no statistics. Mr. James Milne, who is literary editor of the Daily Chronicle, is a Scot of the more imaginative type, and the only figures he mentions are those of American ladies.

The book takes the form of a series of letters written from North America during the "bachelor honeymoon" of a man whose fiancée has considerably packed him off to have "a last look around" before she orders her wedding frock.

Mr. Milne has the observant eye of the journalist and the polished pen of the littérateur, and he sees and records all manner of illuminative little things which help us to conjure up the American in his own land. "When I said to an American friend, 'You people never seem to have a walking-stick,' he replied with a laugh, 'Of course not; we don't need it!' It is a small thing, the absence of the walking-stick, but it belongs to the American's motto, never, in the hustle of life, to carry unnecessary cargo."

The American, we are assured, is an ideal host, and, with his "Come right in," is more hospitable than we are in London. "Life as an organised machine is more perfect in America than with us," but "we have more individual comfort, more restfulness." Again, America beats us, "if not in her men's clothes, most emphatically in those of her women, and the elegance with which they are worn." The brain-worker, Mr. Milne declares, is the choicest product of American life: "Never is the American more delightful than when he is an author, an artist, a journalist, a composer, a doctor, a lawyer, a professor—in a word, when he is the professional man. As such he is not burdened with the hoary moss, called etiquette, which clings to his calling in an old country. He is the human man in his calling, applying it, not lost, submerged beneath it."

ANNOUNCEMENT

AMONG the notable features of next week's EVERYMAN will be an article on "The Servile State," by Hilaire Belloc. The failure of our Public Schools will be dealt with by an eminent Etonian. Mr. Cecil Chesterton contributes "The Paradox of Disraeli," and Canon Barry will deal with "The Tyranny of the Novel." A fascinating sketch of Henri Fabre, "The Insects' Homer," is written by Professor Arthur Thomson. We hope to secure from Mr. H. G. Wells an answer to M. Vandervelde's brilliant article on "Industrial Unrest."

GREAT PREACHERS OF TO-DAY * * * BY E. HERMANN IV.—REV. R. J. CAMPBELL

I.

AT a first glance the City Temple has little to say to the wistful or aspiring soul in man. The unbeautiful building, grimy-faced on the outside, painted and gilded within, suggests neither mystery nor adoration. The choir, with its foreground of ladies in gowns and mortar-boards, and its cornet player leading the singing upon a silver instrument of stirring tone, is too prominently placed, as in most Nonconformist churches, and therefore has a slight flavour of the theatrical. The great congregation is on a fairly monotonous level of middle-class respectability. There is a sprinkling of dreamy-eyed persons, whose general untidiness and small eccentricities of dress and manner mark them adherents of unpopular cults and knights of forlorn quests; but even they suggest deliberate eclecticism rather than spiritual passion. An atmosphere of eagerness and curiosity hangs over the whole: one has the sense of having strayed into a crowd of "first-nighters." The elements of earnestness and devotion are swamped in the inquisitive expectancy of those who have come to see whether the preacher agrees with them and the self-approval of those who come because they have found out that he does.

II.

Into this tense atmosphere, whose baser elements only are patent to the outsider, comes the preacher—a slight, significant figure, which adds a touch of romance to the aggressively modern picture. But it is just this touch of romance that blinds one at first sight to any hint of genuine spiritual power. One has known a saint or two in one's lifetime, some half-dozen prophets, and one true priest—a mediator of mysteries, and they have left one with an ineradicable conviction that spiritual power and virtue are not at all romantic, as the word is used in this purblind world of ours. This man may be a fairy prince within his own kingdom; is he a spiritual magician, who can make fairy princes out of beggars?

The first impression is misleading in its suggestion of pure sweetness and gentleness. Those large, deep-set eyes, now showing like black pits beneath the shadow of jutting brows, now raised and filled with a soft and pearly light, may flash at times with aspiration and vision; but are they ever steeped in a man's determination? They can woo; can they compel? His self-consciousness is a little unmasculine, too. He sits in the pulpit—a still, pensive figure, swayed by high thoughts, yet not taken out of himself. Every lift of the eyebrows, every gesture of the slender, tentative hand, is not studied or affected, but ordered, controlled by a personality that cannot lose itself entirely while at rest. His lips are set with a delicate precision. One cannot imagine them uttering hard sayings until—ah, there is the first sharp reversal of the surface impression!—until they suddenly go tense and dogged, pointed by a firm, trenchant chin, and one divines the iron hand in the velvet glove.

III.

But even this discovery of sterner elements beneath the silken surface does not carry a conviction of power. It suggests, rather, obstinacy, pugnacity, aggressiveness—the man who can give hard knocks better than he can take them. It recalls the unfortunate circumstance that this great preacher is known to thousands upon thousands, not as a healer of souls, but as the creator of a new sensation in cheap theological controversy. To decry a theology simply because it has been exploited by the sensational Press would be folly. Had there been newspapers at the time of Athanasius, his theology—which, be it remembered, was daringly "new" in his day—would have been subjected to the indignity of providing a journalistic scoop. Still, it is a pity that one whose crown does not lie in the region of theological discussion should have been swept into the arid and dusty region of ephemeral controversy and made to provide the jaded dilettante with a new sensation, when it was his genius to guide "sunk, self-weary men" to the place of the new heart. Such strange tricks does popularity play with men.

IV.

This preacher speaks to the soul, and as he speaks one realises that there are souls for him to speak to. Out of the modern, somewhat neurotic, crowd of sermon-tasters tragic figures loom up: the soul presses up to its fleshly frontier and utters its inappeasable cry. There are souls whose battle is yet to come, and who are wise and sincere enough to fear and tremble. There are souls who have been defeated, and take failure hard, and others who take the same failure cynically. There are souls who have capitulated to the flesh and made their bed with corruption, and sacrificial souls broken upon the wheel of guilt not their own. Souls from every hill and valley of the spiritual pilgrimage, souls from the wilderness and souls from hell look up at the preacher with speechful eyes, and one wonders how one could have been so blind as to miss them in the casual crowd. To have revealed his true congregation is Mr. Campbell's first triumph.

The preacher does not only speak to the soul; he speaks for the soul. He is, above all things, a spiritual clairvoyant interpreting the soul's inarticulate stammerings to itself. His penetrative and compassionate understanding of the human heart is his chief asset. It would be a dangerous asset, but for the vivid and almost substitutionary sympathy which is its root. Deep in the heart of the least sentimental, the most coarsely utilitarian of men lies the craving to be sympathetically understood. Who can compute the dead weight of loneliness that bows down the world? Terrible is the loneliness of a big city, pathetic the loneliness of forsaken, friendless women. But more afflicting than these is the inarticulate loneliness of the practical, commonplace man, surrounded by conventional companionships, and feeling his isolation like a vague aching that must be borne in dogged silence, till this preacher comes along and lends speech to his voiceless cry.

Here lies the secret of Mr. Campbell's strangely woven spell. He can read and voice the soul's intolerable ache. More than that, he can snatch the soul from the thralldom of self into the glorious freedom of its true inheritance. He has the gift of spiritual evocation. Not æsthetically fine or intellectually satisfying, but haunting, thrilling, radiant with the golden threads of vision is his utterance. His is the magic touch that makes the difference between ability and greatness.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE OMISSIONS OF MR. NORMAN ANGELL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Chesterton's article on "The Omissions of Mr. Norman Angell" is so absurdly incorrect that I can only conclude that he has never read "The Great Illusion." With regard to the present war in the Balkans, no one can be justified in drawing any conclusions. Neither Mr. Chesterton nor Mr. Angell can say what will be gained, or whether the driving the Turk into Asia will, or will not, benefit the Balkan States, or whether they will spend their energy in fighting over the spoils of victory. It has been said that war only brings more war. Mr. Angell says, I believe, that this war simply illustrates his theory of the changed conditions of Europe, and that the Eastern peoples are still living in the barbaric age, when conflict was habitual. The vivid accounts of the poor Turks pleading for a crust of bread to support life, indifferent to the result of battles going on, finely demonstrates this truth. With regard to the two examples given by Mr. Chesterton of the power of Parliament being won by battle, and the Treaty of Vienna, he has entirely missed the point of Mr. Angell's argument if he fails to see that these are good illustrations of his case. His argument does not deal with the past at all. Just as we have emerged from the stone and ice ages in our geological history, so he thinks we are gradually emerging from the age of barbarism in our national history. The Treaty of Vienna was an advance from the time when the fight for parliamentary freedom was made. The fact that a treaty could be made at all marked an advanced stage of human progress, and the dawn of the idea at least, that arbitrating is better than taking life. What would have been done had there been a Hague Tribunal then is simply a flight of imagination on the part of Mr. Chesterton, for he forgets that the people had first to be educated to the point of possessing one, which necessitated a ripper judgment, and entirely altered conditions of thought. To tell us what the Hague Tribunal might or might not have done, is like saying what the men who fought duels for "so-called honour" would have done if courts of law had settled their disputes, as they do now. You cannot put the clock back for an era and say what you yourself would have done at that period, unless you can also change your own atmosphere of thought and conditions. We think and reason along the lines of our own time. Mr. Chesterton's theory of an International Tribunal is also a purely imaginary one. All great changes are met with the same argument, what might, or may, not what will happen. If there was anything in it, it would have killed progress long ago. The day of individual conflict in this country has passed away, and on the same lines and for the same reasons the day of international conflicts will pass away also, unless civilisation and the teaching of the Christian religions should be arrested. With regard to the moral effect of war on the individual, I may quote a clergyman whom I heard say, quite recently, that he had believed in the effect of war being to bring out courage and character, until the Boer war, when he had seen so many men morally ruined by it that he changed his views entirely. I have never heard any contrary testimony to this, from any individual knowledge, and Mr. Chesterton has only to go behind the censor in the Balkans, or in Turkey, now to confirm it from his own knowledge.—I am, sir, etc.,

November 9th.

S. S.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In his otherwise excellent article, Mr. Cecil Chesterton has suffered one remarkably sad derailment. He is at the bottom of his heart a German hater, because he knows nothing whatever of Germany, and he allows himself to be carried away by his own chauvinism. He ranges himself alongside of Lord Roberts and other people who are not distinguished by much commonsense. The passage, "God send that I may live," etc., is quite as wicked as Lord Roberts' mad speech at Manchester. This kind of thing is as wicked to write as it is more wicked to print.

Personally, I think it is a pity that German ideas have not penetrated earlier and more thoroughly into England. For England would not be so rotten as it is. Vide the many writings of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, the investigations of Rowntree in York, and of Booth in London.

I would suggest to Mr. Cecil Chesterton to take a three years' residence in Germany, learn the language, study its institutions, and get to know something of the German people. And I will guarantee him that nobody will feel more ashamed of himself than he will at the end of that period if he re-reads his present article.—I am, sir, etc.,

P. DURING.

Elmira, 8, Capel Road, New Barnet.

November 10th, 1912.

A PROTESTANT PROTEST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Do not sail under false colours, because I see the cloven hoof of Roman Catholicism unmistakably. Call it a Roman weekly, and that would be honest.—I am, sir, etc.,

TRUTHSEEKER.

London, November, 1912.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC PROTEST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—You are producing an excellent paper in EVERYMAN, but you are ruining that excellent paper by your evident anti-Roman Catholic obsession. There is no reason why you should extol it, nor, indeed, why you should recognise its existence—if you can blind yourself to a thing so vast; but to traduce it in the scurrilous style of the Abbé Houtin, and in other subtle ways to defame it, is to lower the dignity of EVERYMAN, and to warn off many readers. The baiting of Catholicism is for the vigorous in hope, not for the strong in reason, whose method should be one of confuting by regular processes. The Abbé Houtin's way is the annoyance of a toy dog, not dangerous, but irritating.—I am, sir, etc.,

A. S.

Birmingham, October 28th, 1912.

[The two foregoing protests contradict and refute each other, and they only prove that EVERYMAN endeavours to be strictly fair to every side of a question.—ED.]

"WESTWARD HO!"

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It would be idle to assume what is to follow from Monsignor Benson's pen, but certainly, Part I. gives a queer impression of so fine a story. At present, the criticism resolves itself solely into a religious analysis, a weighing of the pros and cons of the Popish elements in the novel. "Westward Ho!" is a novel, not a history of the Papists of that period, which, had Kingsley written, would, I am confident, have been scrupulously just to them.

Monsignor Benson writes:—"It is all the more regrettable, therefore, that the whole underlying plan of the book should be that of a polemical religious tract. . . ." Time and circumstance, the context of the writing, one might say, do not enter into this charge. Let us see precisely what this context is—what are the circumstances amid which Kingsley writes. Is his soul concerned just now with fallacy, and abuse, and argument with the Papacy? Not in the slightest degree, nor for one moment.

In 1854 Charles Kingsley was busy with lecturing at Edinburgh, working the parish of Eversley, dealing with an Anti-Cholera Fund and statistics for a sanitary deputation, of which he was a member, and, be it noted most of all, the Crimean war had broken out. Not only so, but illnesses, with their expenses and anxieties, had made this confession from Kingsley, "To pay our way I have thought, I have written."

These circumstances may superficially appear irrelevant, but I mention them to show that, above everything else, here was not a man of leisure and self-concentration coolly sitting down to write a controversial religious tract. There is nothing more conclusive to disprove such a charge as Kingsley's letter to the Rev. F. Maurice (October 19th):—

"We think of nothing but the War. . . . It seemed so dreadful to hear of those Alma heights being taken and not be there. . . . But I can fight with my pen still (I don't mean in controversy—I am sick of that—but) in writing books which will make others fight. This one is to be called 'Westward Ho!'"

My point is this:—If Monsignor Benson intends to suggest that Kingsley's underlying object was to make his story an anti-Popish tract wherewith to poison the mind of youth, I submit that such a suggestion rests on no foundation in fact.

Again, I do not understand what Monsignor Benson's position is—what he himself honestly thinks. His comments do not agree.

In one column he writes:—"If the author of 'Westward Ho!' was really zealous to tell the truth, why did he make no mention of these things?" and "(he) deliberately omits all adequate reference to the appalling brutality used by England," etc.

In the next column we read in brighter colour: "It would be absurd to charge Charles Kingsley with deliberate falsification of history; he would have shrunk from that as the most detestable of crimes: truth, or rather that which he took to be truth, was the dearest idol he possessed."

The critic of "Westward Ho!" speaks of Kingsley's "warm-hearted, if rather vague, principles." For my part, I have never been mystified by Kingsley's vagueness; on the contrary, his plain, frank statements are never vague. But what Monsignor Benson actually does mean by his own remarks I cannot say, except this, that he seems to contradict himself.

There is a touch of humour in Monsignor Benson's endeavour to clear what he calls the "Spirituality of Rome" of certain crimes and torments. One wonders how a physical crime can be charged to the spirituality of anything. Has Rome ever been, and is it to-day, content to be spiritual? Is not its record one of incessant wandering from this track of its true destiny?

"There are two swords in the power of the Church, the ecclesiastical and the secular. The one is to be used for the Church and the other by the Church; the one by the hand of the priest, the other by the hand of kings and warriors, but at the order and permission of the priest. By the evidence of truth the spiritual power must include the secular and judge it when it is evil."

Doubtless these words are recognised by Romanists. What a different place Christendom would be had the Church of St. Peter refused to follow Peter's attitude to the sword, and adopted the attitude of Jesus Christ!

In conclusion for the present instalment, may I repeat a passage from "Westward Ho!" which, as its critic says, "blackens Catholicism"? Speaking of Eustace Leigh, in Chapter III., Kingsley says:—"Had he been saved from them (Jesuits) he might have lived and died . . . as brave and loyal a soldier as those Roman Catholics whose noble blood has stained every Crimean battlefield."—I am, sir, etc.,

S. A. OSBORNE.

88, Roman Road, Colchester, Essex.

"LARGELY EMOTIONAL."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Dr. William Barry, in his very interesting article, "Largely Emotional," says, "We speak of 'the People' as a man." Whether this is so or not, we do certainly think of "the People" as meaning the men-voters, the citizens. But to say that man, "however ill trained, has by nature some capacity for reasoning, and professes to argue the merits of his case," is rather begging the question. As Dr. Barry is so very topical in his references to the Presidential election in the United States, it may not be considered out of place to instance a very present controversy in this country. I refer to the endeavours of a certain number of women to obtain recognition for their sex as sentient members of the body politic, as citizens capable of reasoning and helping to decide, as far as mere citizens may in this age of democratic autocracy, the issues of the day.

Of course, man in the mass, and Dr. Barry, may not accept these women as pattern women. Joan of Arc, I believe, was not accepted as a pattern woman, but they may be patterns for women. They have argued the merits of their case; they have shown some capacity for reasoning. Men, it may be said, have practically accepted the logic of their case, but enter a non possumus as an answer.

"The People are naturally good," but the outbreaks of violence to women, now of almost daily occurrence, because women show a disposition to reason, to argue, and a desire to take part in affairs—affairs which now, more than ever, owing to recent legislation, affect the home—show that, although it may be said of Man, "How good he is!" it must certainly be said at times, "How bad he can be!"

The, to us, absurd and ridiculous proceedings in connection with the Presidential election are not, to any extent, to be attributed to women. It is the male democracy of the United States who organise these vulgar appeals to the heart—or can it be to the head?—of the People.

It is, I think, unjust and ungenerous to proceed on the assumption that democracy is a woman, even if "journalism always does so"—and of this I am not aware—and I consider that Dr. Barry has not proved his case, so far as it rests upon this dictum.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. LYNCH.

74, Lyndhurst Road, Bowes Park, N.,
November 12th, 1912.

HISTORICAL NOVELS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Huffington's letter on "The Refugees" is merely a defence of the Historical Novel in general. He insinuates, by quoting Sir Philip Sidney, that the Historical Novelist never lies, because he never pretends to tell the truth. I do not say that any Historical Novelist asserts in his preface that he has given an accurate picture of the events of which he is writing, but he is taken as doing so by most of his readers. Thus, apart from the propagation of hundreds of trifling and scores of serious errors, tremendous injustice is often done to the dead.

Take a hypothetical instance. Suppose, in two hundred years' time, a great Historical Novelist to arise: suppose him to write a literary masterpiece on the period of the late Boer War, in one chapter of which Queen Victoria, over her nightly second bottle of gin, sells British military secrets to a German in President Kruger's pay. To us the whole idea is repulsive. Yet Thackeray did the same kind of thing to James Edward Stuart, when he made him practically barter his kingdom for the caresses of that horrid female, Beatrix Esmond, and most people get their ideas of James from Thackeray's book. James failed, as Campion and Persons failed, so few care for their reputations: Queen Victoria succeeded; let us hope she will escape such calumny.

I know I am assuming that a knowledge of history, like a knowledge of medicine, has a value; but the subject is too long to discuss here. In the days when Princes ruled, Machiavelli prescribed history as one of their most valuable studies; in the days when the People rule, it is well that they should study history.

It is useless for Mr. Huffington to stick to his absurd defence that readers do not go to novels to learn history. Sir, they are sent there. I have on my desk a history by one of the best-known Oxford tutors, in which one of the books recommended for study is "The Refugees."—I am, sir, etc.,

WALTON WATERSIDE.

Leeds, November 10, 1912.

THE TRIBUNAL OF POETRY

"A man's actions may belie him: his words never."
—COVENTRY PATMORE

CLOSE-MINDED men may dwell beneath one roof
And each of other yet be incognisant.
Eyes, undeceiving, alter and recant
Their late avowal. Ah, but warp and woof
Of souls that seemed most inquisition-proof
Stares in their muses. Sing—and the hedge grows scant
That shields thy garden-close from termagant
Southeaster, thy sweet fount from wildhog's hoof.

Sing—and, as one contrite, in purpose clear,
Crossing at dusk the many-pillar'd floor
To find the wicket-grille, the world apart,
Penitent tongue and comprehending ear,
Relieves his conscience to the confessor—
So thou shalt light the search in thine own heart.

J. S PHILLIMORE.

"If you have a Sore Throat—cure it now; if you feel one coming on—prebent it now."

Sore Throat is so painful and inconvenient that it cannot be cured too soon. The most easy and pleasant method of doing this is to suck Formamint Tablets.

Because of their germicidal power, they will also prevent this and other throat troubles, if you take them as soon as the first symptoms of dryness and inflammation appear.

Wulfing's Formamint is equally effective in preventing dangerous infectious diseases like Influenza, Diphtheria, Consumption of the Lungs, Scarlet Fever, Measles, etc.

Such diseases are caused by inhaling germs into the mouth and throat, and Formamint Tablets may be relied upon to kill these germs before their harmful action begins.

WULFING'S Formamint THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

The Earl of Kilmorey writes:—"I am glad to give my testimony to the soothing and curative effects of your potent remedy, Formamint, with which I am so familiar. As is my constant practice, I keep one of your brown bottles on my dressing-table, and one of your little glass tubes in my breeches pocket."

The Archdeacon of Bristol writes:—"I habitually carry Wulfing's Formamint with me as a preventive of Sore Throat."

Send for a Free Sample.

If you have not tried Formamint, write to-day for a Sample Supply, which will be sent, together with an interesting Booklet.

Please mention this paper, and address A. Wulfing & Co., 12, Chenies Street, London, W.C., manufacturers of Formamint and Sanatogen.

All Chemists sell Formamint at 1s. 11d. per bottle, but be sure it is Wulfing's Formamint, as that is the only genuine kind.

“HAKLUYT’S VOYAGES” * * * * BY A. G. PESKETT (Late President of Magdalene College, Cambridge)

I.

OF the innumerable English clergymen who have rendered service to learning and letters, few are more deserving of remembrance than the Rev. Richard Hakluyt, yet it may safely be conjectured that a very small proportion of those who know of the existence of “Hakluyt’s Voyages” are aware that the compiler of this vast collection was an English parish priest. His career affords a signal instance of a definite object conceived in youth, pursued through life with undeviating purpose, and brought to a successful conclusion. A visit to his cousin and namesake, a young barrister of the Middle Temple, first kindled in the mind of the Westminster schoolboy a love of geography, and of the history of travel and discovery. As an undergraduate of Christchurch, Oxford (1570), he directed his studies to the end he had in view; to use his own words, “My exercises of dutie first performed, I fell to my intended course, and by degrees read over whatsoever printed or written discoveries and voyages I found extant in the Greeke, Latine, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, French, or English languages.” After his degree, while still residing at Oxford, he received a letter of encouragement from Sir Francis Walsingham, printed in Vol. II.* At a later date he became secretary to the English ambassador in Paris, Sir Edward Stafford, with whom he stayed five years, spending his leisure time in amassing material for his great undertaking. In 1590 he became Rector of Wetheringsett, Suffolk, and afterwards of Gedney, Lincolnshire. He was also appointed Archdeacon of Westminster. His work, “The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation,” contains as complete a record as his untiring industry could procure, of all the maritime adventure of the English people from the earliest times to the year 1600.

II.

This great work is aptly called by Mr. John Masefield “our English epic.” In a short notice one can only indicate briefly the variety and compass of the information, both instructive and amusing, to be found in its pages. It contains a wealth of original documents bearing on the history of Russia in the sixteenth century, with vivid descriptions of life in that country, especially in the narrations of the voyages made by R. Chancellor, S. Burrough, R. Johnson, and Anthony Jenkinson, such as the conjuring tricks of the Samoedes, or the account of the Palm Sunday festival when the Metropolitan, with a magnificent escort, rides in state, sitting “sidelong like a woman,” with the Emperor walking by his side, leading the horse “by the end of the rein of his bridle with one of his hands, and in the other of his hands he had a bunch of a palm.” After the ceremony, the Emperor and his nobles dine with the Metropolitan, “where of delicate fishes and good drinks there was no lacke.” There was never any lack of drink in Russia. In many towns, says Master Jenkinson, “there is a drunken tavern which the Emperour sometime letteth out to farme, and sometimes bestoweth for a yeare or two on some duke or gentleman.” The Duke, by the aid of his tavern, plunders the whole town, and when he has enriched himself, is sent to the wars with his retainers at his own expense, “so that the Emperour in his warres is little charged, but all the burden lieth upon the poore people.” We have more than one elaborate description of an Imperial banquet at which the English merchants were lavishly entertained, the meal lasting about five hours, after which the Emperor with his own hands gave each of his guests a cup of mead, “and because the Emperour would have us to be merry, he sent to our lodging the same evening these barrels of meade of sundry sortes, of the quantity in all of one hogshed.” But these merry and thirsty merchants were keen practical traders, and those who are interested in the history of commerce will find a mass of detail about the commercial relations and economic conditions of the world in Tudor times.

III.

Tales of stirring maritime adventure are, of course, numerous. Here you may read the original narratives of the voyages of Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins, Davis, Grenville, Cavendish, and many others, half pirates and half explorers, told in the simple language of men who faced perils and hardships that are almost inconceivable nowadays, without flinching and as a matter of course. Here (Vol. II.) is the contemporary account of the defeat of the Armada written by the Dutchman Emmanuel van Meteran, containing many details that are not found in ordinary English histories. Here, too, are the instructions given to his crew by Master John Hawkins in his voyage to the coast of Guinea in 1564, as described by John Sparke (Vol. VII.): “Serve God daily, love one another, preserve your victuals, beware of fire, and keepe good companie.” The same narrative introduces us to the “Pike” of Teneriffe, “which is in heighth, by their reports, twentie leagues,” and also to the crocodile—“His nature is ever when hee would have his prey, to cry and sobbe like a Christian body, to provoke them to come to him, and then he snatcheth at them, and thereupon came this proverbe that is applied unto women when they weepe, Lachrymae Crocodili, the meaning whereof is, that as the Crocodile when he crieth, goeth then about most to deceive, so doeth a woman most commonly when she weepeth.” In passages like this one might imagine that one was reading a new chapter of Herodotus.

IV.

Expressions of religious belief are not infrequent, and seem to have come naturally and spontaneously to the lips and pens of these simple-minded mariners; but of sentiment there is scarcely a trace. There appears to have been little feeling for beauty or grandeur of scenery, though in one of Sir Walter Raleigh’s narratives (Vol. VII.) I find a glowing description of the charms of a district near the Orinoco. Death in battle or from disease was always before their eyes, and was recorded with simple directness: “The 28 at 4 of the clocke in the morning our Generall Sir Francis Drake departed this life, having been extremely sicke of a fluxe, which began the night before to stop on him. He used some speeches at or a little before his death, rising and apparelling himselfe, but being brought to bed againe within one houre died.” Dysentery of this fatal kind was rife on the ill-appointed ships of those days. If they were long at sea the beer became sour, and water and food often putrid. The story of the voyage of “the
(Continued on page 186.)

* I refer to the edition in eight volumes in Everyman Library.

Be sure it's

VELMA

REG.

chocolate

—the result of years of study in blend and make. Side by side with Velma other chocolates taste flat. Velma is delicious, true chocolate, as true as it is fine, as fine as it is true—the greatest achievement in chocolate yet

☐ In the red packet with the gold corner.
3d. 6d. 1s.

SUCHARD

Sole maker. 86 years' reputation

Don't be Content with 4%

The cost of living is rising; incomes derived from investments are, in many cases, falling. What is to be done? The prudent investor is turning his attention to "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. This Company, one of the soundest concerns in the British Empire, deals with the whole problem of Annuity Insurance on progressive and comprehensive lines. Their attractive forms of Annuities appeal to everyone who has money invested or to invest, or who can spare a small amount out of income to provide for the evening of their lives.

BUY AN ANNUITY

You can buy an Annuity out and out; or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it out of your income—so much per year until the Annuity is due. You can buy joint Annuities for yourself and your wife; you can buy educational Annuities for your children; you can buy Annuities with the return of your Capital guaranteed. And these are but a few of the various forms of Annuities purchasable. Investigate! Your enquiry may mean, probably will mean, the doubling or quadrupling of your present income. You will gain in every way by taking out a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity. Your income will be fixed and regular, independent of labour troubles and international complications. It will be a larger income and more amply secured. If you happen to be in indifferent health when the arrangement is made, you will have still better terms offered you.

The Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada has assets of over £9,000,000 invested under the strict supervision of the Canadian Government. Send for full particulars to Mr. J. F. Junkin, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, 94, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, stating your age and kind of Annuity required.

"Did you
NUGGET
your boots this morning?"

The Seal Pen is the Safe Pen.

It is the newest idea in non-leak Fountain Pens. You can carry it upside down or flat in your pocket, it will not leak. When you bring it into use it writes with a smooth, even flow—never doubtful, never jibbing—for the nib is in the ink when the pen is sealed. You should get acquainted.

The Seal Pen fills without taking apart. It is made in three sizes: Long Seal, Middle Seal, Short Seal. In each size there are twelve nibs to choose from. The nib is of genuine 14-carat gold, tipped with iridium. Whatever your style of writing you can be suited with a Seal.

GUARANTEED for TWO YEARS.
For service and safety buy the Seal.

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Son, Wholesale and Manufacturing Stationers,
Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

"The most remarkable Single Volume ever published."

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

Containing over

400,000 DEFINED WORDS AND PHRASES.
2,700 PAGES. 6,000 ILLUSTRATIONS.

§ A NEW ACHIEVEMENT IN DICTIONARY MAKING. Upwards of 400,000 words and phrases are defined in the "New International" (a greater number than in any other Dictionary). 6,000 specially executed Illustrations are also included.

§ A FEATURE OF SPECIAL INTEREST is the new Divided Page. By the use of this ingenious device it has been made possible to include twice the information contained in the old "International" without materially increasing the size of the volume.

§ NEW DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS in science, mechanics, and machinery are fully treated. No dictionary treats with such explicitness the turbine engine, aeroplane, wireless telegraphy, and a myriad of other new discoveries as does the "New International."

§ LITERARY QUOTATIONS. The illustrative literary quotations in which even the old International led all other similar books, have in the new edition been increased in number. No other dictionary approaches the New International on this ground.

§ SYNONYMS. Special attention has been paid to the treatment of synonyms in the "New International"; and in this respect "Webster" is now more than unrivalled by any English work of reference.

§ THE "NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY" is undoubtedly the clearest, most complete, and most authoritative dictionary in existence. This sweeping statement can readily be tested by any conscientious searcher who will devote even a few minutes to the examination of the new book.

A FREE BOOK.

On receipt of this Coupon, or a postcard mentioning "Everyman," Messrs. BELL will send, gratis and post free, a copy of the Illustrated Booklet, with Specimen Pages, describing the "New International Dictionary."

Name

Address

London: C. BELL & SONS, Ltd., Dept. P, Portugal St., W.C.

worshipful Master Thomas Cavendish, Esquire," to the Philippines and the coast of China in 1591 (Vol. VIII.) illustrates the terrible sufferings that so often awaited these hardy adventurers, sufferings with which the medical and surgical science of the day, supposing there was a surgeon on board, was quite unable to cope.

V.

In the present age of growing sentimentalism and slackening effort, which to some observers seem to point to national decadence, it is refreshing to turn to these plain records of the bold adventure and patient endurance that helped to build the British Empire; and a large debt of gratitude is due to the laborious diligence of Richard Hakluyt for his wonderful collection of documents. And it must be remembered that he worked under great difficulties. To quote his own words in his preface to the Reader: "For the bringing of which into this homely and rough-hewn shape, which here thou seest; what restless nights, what painfull days, what heat, what cold I have indured; how many long and chargeable journeys I have traveled; how many famous libraries I have searched into; what varietie of ancient and moderne writers I have perused; what a number of old records, patents, privileges, letters, etc., I have redeemed from obscuritie and perishing; into how manifold acquaintance I have entered; what expenses I have not spared; and yet what faire opportunities of private gaine, preferment, and ease I have neglected; albeit thy selfe canst hardly imagine, yet I by daily experience do finde and feele, and some of my entier friends can sufficiently testifie." At his death he left a great mass of unpublished papers, which were worked up and added to by another clergyman, Samuel Purchas; but Purchas is said to have mutilated and garbled his material, and therefore "The Pilgrim" cannot be considered a trustworthy book. Hakluyt's supremacy remains unquestioned. If I mistake not, the city of Bristol, with which he was connected, has recently honoured his memory by some kind of monument, and the well-known Hakluyt Society continues his work and perpetuates his name.

"THE STORY OF SANTA CLAUS"*

WHEN Dickens died, a little ragged girl in Drury Lane exclaimed in dismay, "Dickens dead! Then will Father Christmas die too?"—a remark which inspired a fine sonnet of Mr. Watts-Dunton. Happily for mankind, Father Christmas is of those who do not die, as Mr. S. R. Littlewood clearly proves in a dainty little volume, "The Story of Santa Claus," with illustrations by Sidney Filmore and Gerald Leake.

It is a beautiful story, that of Santa Claus, for old and young alike, and Mr. Littlewood tells it in just the proper style and spirit. He traces the history of Santa Claus back through the ages, and discovers him in many lands, under many guises. Reverently he narrates how Santa Claus knew of Christ's birth, and in the form of Melchior, the oldest of the Wise Men, brought his offerings from afar to the Babe of Bethlehem. He tells of Nicholas, the Saint, Bishop of Myra, in Asia Minor, the unfailing friend of children, sailors, and the poor. Then he shows us Santa Claus, the Pagan, Santa Claus of the Wintry North, Santa Claus of the Yule-log and the mistletoe-bough, riding like Odin by night o'er tree and chimney-tops, Santa

* "The Story of Santa Claus." By S. R. Littlewood. (Herbert and Daniel.)

Claus heralding Nature's reawakening, as the Wise Man of the East hailed the Coming of a New Era for the world. And, finally, Mr. Littlewood introduces us to the "Santa Claus of the For-Ever," the Santa Claus we all know and love so well.

It seems strange at first that we English-speaking people of the Old World should owe our Santa Claus to our cousins in the New World. But so it is; and when one comes to think of it, it is not unfitting. Appearing in each country in a different guise, he is most human in our own England. To the city arab crouching for shelter on a bitter night he appears as a kind of glorified "roast chestnut man." He bears with him a tray loaded with good cheer, the beef and the plum pudding that the street urchin longs for. After so many centuries, so many wanderings, so many transformations, it was in America, Mr. Littlewood reminds us, that Santa Claus "grew at last to be himself. For America was big enough and young enough to understand him. From each country of Europe, north and south, the early colonists took with them to America a different Santa Claus, and out of them all the Santa Claus of to-day was, as it were, gathered and created anew. The Dutch Colonists gave him the name of their own Sinter Klaas. From Norway and Sweden came the white horses and flying sledge that carry him over the house-tops, to drop his gifts down the chimney-stack. From Germany came the Christmas-tree, with its spangles and its gleaming fruit, of which he was to become high-priest. But it was the little Southerners, from Spain and France and Italy, who, forgetting all about St. Nicholas and his own day three weeks before, made Santa Claus part of the Christmas Feast itself, and led him by the Wise Men's Star to the Cradle-side at Bethlehem. Thus, only a few generations ago, Santa Claus came back again across the Atlantic, with all that he had learnt in the lonely snow-bound homesteads of the West."

IN MEMORIAM

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY (obit November 20th, 1910)

BUT little do you need that man should sing
 The hopes and sorrows of your hard-fought life:
 How, scorning all the joys that wealth can bring,
 Unceasing toil you chose and endless strife.
 All this the friends of progress needs must know,
 And ever grieve that Death has laid thee low.

For years you fought against both Church and State,
 For years you sought to spread pure Reason's light;
 The victim of class prejudice and hate,
 Yet caring not for calumny or spite.
 All this and more dauntless your soul withstood,
 Striving for one great end—the People's good.

Injustice reigned—no truce your anger gave,
 War to the knife where superstition swayed!
 Now that your voice is silenced by the grave,
 Freedom still mourns her strongest son—dismayed.
 Rest well, brave heart, man's struggles needs must cease;
 'All toil must have an end and lead to—Peace.

LEWIS WHARTON.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER.

Dr. Alexander Whyte's Bible Characters.

Bible Characters, First Series.
ADAM TO ACHAN

Bible Characters, Second Series.

GIDEON TO ABSALOM

Bible Characters, Third Series.

ANITHOPHEL TO NEHEMIAH

Price 2/6 each net; postage 4d.

The set of six volumes, 15/- net; postage 9d. Also in half-morocco binding, 5/- each net; postage 4d.; or 30/- net for the set; postage 9d.

The British Weekly says: "By far and away the most complete exposition of Bible characters ever published."

THE APOSTLE PAUL

By Dr. ALEXANDER WHYTE.

Price 2/6 net; postage 4d.

Bible Characters, Fourth Series.

JOSEPH and MARY TO JAMES THE LORD'S BROTHER

Bible Characters, Fifth Series.

STEPHEN TO TIMOTHY

Bible Characters, Sixth Series.

OUR LORD'S CHARACTERS

Dr. ALEXANDER WHYTE'S Life of Christ.

THE WALK-CONVERSION AND CHARACTER OF JESUS CHRIST OUR LORD

Price 3/6 net; postage 4d.

Dr. Alexander Whyte's Bunyan Characters.

Bunyan Characters, First Series.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

Bunyan Characters, Third Series.

THE HOLY WAR.

Price 1/6 each net; postage 3d.

The British Weekly says: "This completes the most beautiful and suggestive commentary on the 'Pilgrim's Progress' ever written."

Dr. Alexander Whyte's Appreciations.

NEWMAN: An Appreciation. With the Choicest Passages of his Writings, Selected and Arranged. The Appendix contains Letters not hitherto published.

"A more judicious, a more gracious, or attractive introduction to the personality and the works of the great Cardinal could not be desired."—Bookman.

Price 2/6 net; postage 4d.

THOMAS SHEPARD.

Pilgrim Father and Founder of Harvard. His Spiritual Experience and Experimental Preaching.

Price 1/6 net; postage 3d.

FATHER JOHN OF THE CREEK CHURCH

An Appreciation. Price 1/6 net; postage 3d.

Bunyan Characters, Second Series.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

Bunyan Characters, Fourth Series.

BUNYAN HIMSELF AS SEEN IN HIS "CRAGE ABUNDING."

BISHOP BUTLER:

An Appreciation. With the Best Passages of his Writings, Selected and Arranged. Price 2/6 net; postage 4d.

SAMUEL RUTHERFORD

and Some of his Correspondents.

"May this powerful and vividly written little volume be as highly appreciated and as widely circulated as it deserves."—Dr. HAY FLEMING in British Weekly.

Price 1/6 net; postage 3d.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE:

An Appreciation. With some of the Best Passages of the Physician's Writings.

Price 1/6 net; postage 3d.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

JACOB BENMEN: An Appreciation.

The British Weekly says: "Dr. Whyte has written an admirable appreciation of Jacob Behmen. It is perhaps the best thing he has yet published."

SANTA TERESA: An Appreciation.

With some of the Best Passages of the Saint's Writings Selected, Adapted, and Arranged.

"Dr. Whyte has the catholic quality that can recognise the good, reverence the holy, conceive the true, outside the limits of his own community. The book is one of a very remarkable series, expressing in a high degree what we have termed catholicity of mind."—Nation.

Price 1/- each net; postage 2d. Velvet Leather Presentation Editions, price 3/6 each net; postage 4d.

A complete Prospectus of Dr. Whyte's Works will be sent post free on application.

JOHN KNOX AND HIS HOUSE.

By CHARLES JOHN GUTHRIE, K.C.

With ninety illustrations. Price 2/-; paper boards, 1/- net; postage 3d.

"Mr. Guthrie's volume, with its ninety illustrations, forms an excellent companion to Dr. Hume Brown's Life of the Reformer."—The Athenaeum.

100 Princes Street, Edinburgh;
 21 Paternoster Square, London.

THE POETRY OF JOHN MASEFIELD * * BY GILBERT THOMAS

I.

ONE of the literary events of the last twelve months has certainly been the publication of three long poems by Mr. John Masefield. When, just a year ago, Mr. Masefield issued the first of these poems—"The Everlasting Mercy"—it was greeted with a storm of controversy, which was renewed when, some few months afterwards, "The Widow in the Bye Street" appeared. It is a significant fact, however, that the recent publication of the third poem—"Dauber"—in the pages of a contemporary has not been made the occasion for any further advance of hostilities. It is a significant fact, because it indicates that the critics who attempted, as it were, to stem the tide of the first two poems, because they did not conform to their well-established conceptions of art, have at length learnt the lesson that poetry is verily as the wind that bloweth where it listeth, and that, in whatever new form it may come, its onrush is irresistible.

And this is a lesson that very badly needed to be learnt. That poetry, more than other of the arts, cannot be cabined within the bars of convention or tradition is a fact that has often been repeated, but insufficiently realised. Throughout the life of Tennyson the danger was to keep the independent spirit of poetry cramped within well-defined limits and to guard it against contact with the market-place. England still lay under the shadow of Puritanism; and the poets of the period were essentially Puritanical towards their art. They may or may not have realised that there were gems to be gathered in the market-place. But, at all events, they were determined that they should lose those gems rather than face the dangers which the market-place must inevitably afford.

II.

With the death of Tennyson, however, came a movement of revolt. The country was beginning to fret against the cage of Puritanism; and poetry, which always has its finger upon the national pulse, began instantaneously to reflect the broadening of ideals. Mr. Kipling's was, perhaps, the first voice to sound the new note; and of this movement towards expansion, heralded by Mr. Kipling, Mr. Masefield is the supreme product. "That which the fountain sends forth returns again to the fountain"; and Mr. Masefield, nurtured in the new movement, now comes, as a loyal son, to bring that movement into its own. And he succeeds in bringing it into its own completely, so that the literary historian of the future will recognise in him the poet who shattered, once and for all, the fallacy of Art for Art's sake, and brought poetry out of the narrow creeks of exclusiveness into the broad main channel of life.

More than one critic, in discussing Mr. Masefield's work, has spoken of the loss of vision which it manifests. But the essential fact which Mr. Masefield's work illustrates is that poetry is increasing her vision. Hitherto poetry has been very timorous, and easily frightened by appearances. In her quest after beauty, she has spurned everything outwardly ugly; but Mr. Masefield has a vision that penetrates beneath the surface and sees the kernel of beauty within the coarsest shell.

Turn, for instance, to "The Everlasting Mercy." Here we have the story of the conversion of a village blackguard. This is a story that the Victorian poets would have deemed impossible of poetic treatment.

What, they would ask, has poetry to do with anything so crude and so repulsive to the cultured mind as the life of the coarsest drunkard and brawler? Even had they admitted that poaching and prize fighting could possibly come within the pale of Art, they would certainly have shrunk from the correspondingly coarse and almost brutally realistic passages in which Mr. Masefield describes them, and in which he does not even leave the man's oaths and curses to the reader's imagination.

III.

Now, no one would call these passages, in themselves, good poetry. Least of all would Mr. Masefield himself call them such. But instead of vaguely describing a drunken man, as it were, from the outside, they certainly suggest with marvellous subtlety the very inner self of the man. And, surely, no one who reads the poem in its entirety, as it is essential that such a poem should be read, could deny that these passages lend a double power to the exquisite pages in which, towards the end of the poem, Mr. Masefield catches, not the outward aspect, but, again, the very soul of the drunkard reformed.

Finer lyrical poetry than is to be found in the latter part of "The Everlasting Mercy" it would be hard to recall; and, coming as it does in sharp contrast to the earlier portion of the poem, it simply sweeps all before it. It sweeps all before it because it shows us the inside, and not the outside. Outwardly, the coarse man will still remain coarse after his conversion; but within his awakened soul there will ring the divine music of regeneration. It is this divinest of all music that Mr. Masefield catches; and he catches it as it was never caught before, because he knows that, in its first and finest ecstasy, that music rises from the ignominy and horror of the gutter, and he is not ashamed, as the poets have been ashamed, to seek it in the gutter.

The supreme miracle which life is able to work is to transform the gutter into the hill-top; and surely there can be no higher function for Art than to interpret the supreme miracle of life. And it would have been impossible for Mr. Masefield to achieve his effect by any other method than that which he has adopted.

If he had not shown us the raw material, he could still have shown us the fine fabric of spirituality into which the raw material can be woven. But, if he had not shown us the raw material, he could not have shown us the miracle by which it comes thus to be woven. And it is the miracle that counts.

IV.

"The future of poetry is immense," said Matthew Arnold. And, after years of sterility, it is in Mr. Masefield's work that we find the first signs of the fulfilment of that prophecy. The future of poetry is immense, because poetry will no longer be confined, like a nun, to the cloister; she will go forth into the highways and byways of the world, and where apparently the soil is most stony she will reap some of her richest grain. Hitherto, to change the metaphor, she has been all too content to gather her roses from the rose tree; more and more she will come to realise that it is her purpose to make the very desert blossom with the rose.

Cloth,
6d. net.

A FURTHER ISSUE OF THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS

Cloth,
6d. net.

A Library of New Books by Writers of distinction, bringing within the reach of all the results of modern knowledge.

THE FOURTH DOZEN VOLUMES NOW READY.

- | | |
|--|---|
| 7. THE STRUCTURE OF THE EARTH.
By Professor T. G. Bonney, Sc.D., F.R.S. | 72. THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
By Rev. Canon Masterman. |
| 17. WEATHER SCIENCE. By R. G. K. Lempfert, M.A. | 74. HOPE AND MISSION OF THE FREE CHURCHES.
By Rev. Edward Shiillio, M.A. |
| 18. HYPNOTISM AND SELF-EDUCATION.
By A. M. Hutchison, M.D. | 82. CO-OPERATION.
By Joseph Clayton. |
| 19. THE BABY: A Mother's Book by a Mother.
By a University Woman. | 85. A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.
By A. Compton-Rickett, M.A., LL.D. |
| 21. MARRIAGE AND MOTHERHOOD: A Wife's Handbook.
By H. S. Davidson, M.B., F.R.C.S.E. | 92. THE TRAINING OF THE CHILD: A Parents' Manual.
By G. Spiller. |
| 64. NAVIGATION.
By William Hall, R.N., B.A. | 93. TENNYSON.
By Aaron Watson. |

"The undertaking bids fair to prove of real value as an educative influence. . . . The information that they give, far from being scrappy, is wonderfully complete and clearly presented."—The Times.

Just Published.

A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH NATION.

By A. D. INNES, Sometime Scholar of Oriel College, Oxford. Author of "England Under the Tudors," etc.

AN EXTRAORDINARY VOLUME.

1,000 Large Pages (Size 9 by 6½), 400 Illustrations and Maps, For 3/6 net.

Equal in extent to four ordinary volumes costing 30/-

The Collection of Illustrations from authentic sources is absolutely unique.

BOUND IN CLOTH.

No dry-as-dust chronicle this, but a brightly written narrative of the growth of the British Nation from the earliest to the present time. The characters of the makers of Britain stand out from its pages; the customs and social development of the people are described as well as the dramatic events which thrill the blood.

"The book is fairly comparable with Mr. J. R. Green's 'Short History of the English People,' and perhaps avoids some of the weaknesses of that great work."—The Contemporary Review.

"This is a most encouraging book. When we remember the sort of work that did duty for a popular history of England thirty, and even twenty, years ago, the progress achieved gives every cause for satisfaction."—The Athenæum.

PLEASE SEND FOR OUR COLOUR LIST OF CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67, Long Acre, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

And all Booksellers.

NIETZSCHE

NIETZSCHE'S WORKS COMPLETED.

17 Volumes published. Index ready in January. Price of Complete Set £3 15s. net. Single copies supplied.

ECCE HOMO

The Confessions of Nietzsche. 6s. net.

Translated by A. M. LUDOVICI.

"This book is a marvel of wisdom, of clearness, of serenity, of nobility."—Professor Lichtenberger in EVERYMAN.

THE GOSPEL OF SUPERMAN

By PROFESSOR LICHTENBERGER.

Translated from the 14th French edition by J. M. KENNEDY. 5s. net.

"We have no English book on Nietzsche yet which could compare with Professor Lichtenberger's."—NATION.

T. N. FOULIS, Publisher, LONDON and EDINBURGH.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE.

This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued.

General Literature—Art—Science—Nature Study—Books of Reference and Fiction Generally.

All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy. Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

We have perfected the Art of Teaching

FOREIGN LANGUAGES BY CORRESPONDENCE

REFORM METHODS. ELASTIC SYSTEM OF TUITION. QUALIFIED TUTORS.

Modern Languages, Latin and Greek. Courses for General and Examination Purposes. State exact wants to DIRECTOR (who is a Medallist and double University Honourman), EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE.

ARTISTIC. ORIGINAL. SPECIALLY DESIGNED.

Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17.6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.

HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

PLAYWRIGHTS! Send your work to us and feel confident that it will be CAREFULLY READ, and given every chance of SUCCESS. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, W.C.

TRANSLATIONS into English from French and German.—Mr. W. P. M. RUSSELL, M.A. Oxon., 103, Park Street, London, W.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS."

All Subjects. Never known to fail.

Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift.

Musicians, Actors, Architects, Engineers, Artists, Speakers, and all who need memory should write—

GEO. H. COX, Music Master, Tettenhall College, Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

B. T. BATSFORD'S LIST.

The following are a few titles selected from Mr. Batsford's List of New and Forthcoming Books. Written by acknowledged authorities, lavishly illustrated, and finely produced, they appeal to the cultured layman as well as to the professional, and form exceptionally handsome presents.

 * Every "Batsford" book is sold with the guarantee that it will not be "re-mainered," or offered at a reduced price.*

Dedicated by special permission to His Majesty the King.

THE OLD COLLEGES OF OXFORD

Their Architectural History illustrated and described by AYMER VALIANCE, M.A., Oriel College, F.S.A. Illustrated by 50 beautiful Plates, finely reproduced in Collotype from specially taken Photographs, and from original Paintings and Engravings. With 232 further Illustrations in the text from Photographs, old Engravings, and Drawings, of decorative detail, demolished buildings, ground plans, etc. Small folio, handsomely bound in buckram, gilt. £4 4s. net.

A SHORT CRITICAL HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE

By H. H. STATHAM, F.R.I.B.A., late Editor of The Builder. Author of "Modern Architecture," etc. For the use of General Readers, Students, Architects, and Travellers. Containing 570 pages, and 700 Illustrations of the chief buildings of all Countries and Periods, reproduced from Photographs and Drawings, with Comparative Chronological Charts, and a comprehensive Glossary of Terms. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt. 10s. net.

It is realised that the time has come when every person of Culture is desiring to have the same acquaintance with Architecture that is possessed on such other subjects of intellectual interest as History, Painting, or Music, and Mr. Statham's book has been specially written to impart or increase such knowledge.

THE CATHEDRALS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

A Concise Account of their Architectural History. By FRANCIS BOND, M.A., Author of "Gothic Architecture in England," etc. (Being a Fourth Edition of "English Cathedrals Illustrated.") Containing 450 pages of Text, with 200 new Illustrations, including a series of specially drawn Ground Plans. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt. 7s. 6d. net.

A light, handy edition, printed on thin paper for the use of travellers, is issued at the same price.

THE ENGLISH FIREPLACE

A History of the Development of the Chimney, Chimney Piece, and Firegrate with their Accessories, from the earliest times to the beginning of the NINETEENTH Century. By L. A. SHUFFREY. Illustrated by 130 full-page Plates, reproduced in Collotype from choice Photographs, with 200 further Illustrations in the Text from Sketches, Measured Drawings, and Photographs. Crown 4to, art linen, gilt. £2 2s. net.

THE ART AND CRAFT OF GARDEN MAKING

By THOMAS H. MAWSON, Garden Architect. Fourth Edition, revised, re-arranged, and greatly enlarged. Containing upwards of 430 Illustrations (reproduced in Colour, Half-tone, and Line) of perspective views, plans, and details. Crown folio, buckram, gilt. £2 10s. net.

NEW VOLUME IN THE "OLD COTTAGE" SERIES.

OLD HOUSES AND VILLAGE BUILDINGS IN EAST ANGLIA

By BASIL OLIVER, Architect, A.R.I.B.A. Illustrated by 127 examples, finely printed in Collotype from specially taken Photographs. With Historical and Descriptive Text. 4to, canvas, gilt. Price 21s. net.

Former volumes in the series (uniform in size, style, and price) comprise:—(1) Kent and Sussex. (2) Shropshire, Herefordshire, and Cheshire. (3) The Cotswold District. (4) Surrey.

JAPAN AND ITS ART

By MARCUS B. HUISSH, LL.B. Second edition, revised and greatly enlarged. With 230 Illustrations, including several in Colour. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt. 12s. net.

* * Illustrated Prospectuses of each volume will be sent post free on application, together with a full Catalogue of Artistic Books suitable for Christmas Presents.

B. T. BATSFORD, 94, High Holborn, London, W.C.

THE "EDWIN DROOD" CONTROVERSY

I.

MANY, if not most, great novelists have left unfinished works behind them when they died; but few, if any, save Dickens, have been snatched untimely from their readers with their last work not only half-written, but part-published. Even had it been a poor story—and that it is not—Dickens's final novel would have had a pathetic interest all its own. It was the work of a dying man, a man dying bravely with his harness on. "If the said Charles Dickens shall die during the composition of the said work of the 'Mystery of Edwin Drood,' . . .": so began an ominous proviso in Dickens's contract with his publishers—a proviso which had appeared in no previous agreement between him and Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

"Edwin Drood" was written painfully, by one who had overtaxed his strength. The servant of the public was determined, at whatever cost to himself, to swell the reserve fund he had been accumulating for his large family, and to give his vast audience one more entertainment. In April, 1870, appeared the first monthly part of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." Other two parts followed, and then, on June 8th, Dickens's great, kindly heart was stilled for aye. After his death three additional parts were issued by his friend and biographer, John Forster, but the remaining six were never forthcoming—only half the book had been written when Dickens laid down his weary pen.

II.

Dickens's last tale was a tale of mystery. Broken off in the middle as the story was, the mystery has been greatly intensified. Round its solution has been waged a controversy in which literary critics of high order have hastened to engage. And now Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, in a delightful volume entitled "The Problem of Edwin Drood" (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.), has summarised the results of this long battle of the bookmen, and made valuable contributions of his own towards a satisfactory conclusion. Weighty as most of Sir W. Robertson Nicoll's arguments are, it would, however, be premature to hail his book as the "last word" on a subject which has already a bibliography with a hundred entries. Indeed, it would be almost a pity were so fascinating a problem ever finally unravelled.

III.

Before we consider the offered solutions of the Dickens scholars, it would be well, perhaps, to recall in bare outline what Dickens has himself told us in the fragment which he left. Edwin Drood, the novel informs us, is betrothed to Rosa Bud, not because they love one another, but because their dead fathers wished it so. Edwin's uncle, John Jasper, choir-master of Cloisterham Cathedral, does love Rosa, secretly, desperately. Jasper professes the utmost affection for his nephew, and is universally respected. Neville and Helena Landless, twins, come to Cloisterham, and hot-blooded Neville, who falls under Rosa's spell, quarrels violently with Edwin, who is attracted by Helena. Jasper invites the young men to dine with him on Christmas Eve, ostensibly to effect a reconciliation. Edwin sees Neville home late that night—a terrible night of thunder, lightning and tempest—and disappears. Jasper, who has been long preparing to make away with Edwin and destroy the body in quick-lime, practically accuses Neville of murdering his nephew. Edwin's watch, chain and tie-pin are found in a weir, but the evidence is insufficient to incriminate Neville. Jasper vows not to rest till he has brought the murderer to justice; but when the book stops abruptly, he himself is under keen observation by at least three people who entertain no love for him and have their suspicions. These are Deputy, an impish boy who has suffered for his interruption of one of Jasper's strange nocturnal visits to the Cathedral; an old woman in whose house in London Jasper smokes opium and lets fall dark hints in his terrible dreams; and Datchery, a character in disguise, who quarters himself near Jasper's house and the Cathedral, after Edwin's disappearance.

IV.

Everyone who reads the novel must see that Jasper murders, or believes he has murdered, Edwin. The problem—a multiplex one—is: How does Jasper effect his design; does he actually succeed in it; how is he eventually unmasked; who is Datchery; who is the opium woman; and how was the novel to end? Here we need only concern ourselves with the main question—Was Edwin really killed?

Some believe that Dickens had not made up his mind on this point when he died. When he began "Edwin Drood," had he any definite plot? Or did he write his novel as an English school-boy generally writes an essay, starting off without first mapping out what the French boy calls his "plan"? Had Dickens been a scientific storyteller, as absorbed in the form of his novel as in its characters, he would probably have left us a complete scheme or framework of his last novel, but no finished chapters. As it was, the monthly-part system of publication led him into a hand-to-mouth habit of issuing one number of a story before the whole work, or (at times) even the succeeding instalment, was completed. Nevertheless, we cannot imagine that, till the end, Dickens was undecided whether or not to kill Edwin.

V.

Others, again, hold that Edwin had a miraculous escape from death, and was to reappear and confront his would-be assassin. Then they point to Dickens's non-committal title for the novel, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," and the tentative titles—"The Flight of Edwin Drood" and "Edwin Drood in Hiding"—which Dickens noted down, inter alia, on August 20th, 1869. They point, further, to the original wrapper of "Edwin Drood" (designed under Dickens's own directions by his son-in-law, Charles A. Collins), whereon, among other vignettes, is a representation of Edwin lit up by a lamp held in Jasper's hand—a figure too substantial, they claim, to be intended as a ghost or the figment of an opium dream. And they emphasise the heading of Chapter XIV.: "When Shall These Three Meet Again?"—which introduces Neville, Edwin, and Jasper just before Jasper's fatal dinner-party.

VI.

Sir W. Robertson Nicoll has no difficulty in answering these and other arguments of the kind, and from a scholarly study of Dickens's MSS. and Dickens's methods as a novelist, he is able to reinforce by new evidence the already powerful case of those who maintain that Drood was undoubtedly done to death by his uncle. No sane reader could conscientiously plead for the insignificant Edwin's resurrection. If he came back to life he would find no proper place for himself in the novel. Dead, he dominates the whole story, like Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar."

LIDDELL GEDDIE.

The Art that Pays To-day

By J. HERBERT ARMSTRONG.

Ten persons out of every hundred have a natural taste for drawing. On an average, only one out of ten cultivates their talent. They lack self-confidence.

Given ambition and a taste for drawing, nothing can stand in the way of your success. Without ambition—the desire to live well and to do well—you are like a man who has a beautiful carriage, but no horse—you cannot go far.

The man or woman who knows how to design the kind of art work for which there is a real need—not just easel pictures that few can buy—is in an enviable position to-day.

Ordinary art schools teach how to paint pictures more or less indifferently well, but the average picture is a drug upon the market. The picture-painter can scarcely make a living.

Prosperous Times for the Artist.

Now, for each person who can afford to buy original pictures there are a thousand who can buy a reproduction of a clever sketch, either as a print for framing, or an attractive magazine cover.

There are countless advertisers who are only too anxious to buy designs of the kind they need. Owing to the perfection of printing processes, and the profitability of modern advertising, never were there such prosperous times for the artist who is willing and able to do the kind of work that's wanted.

The "Art for Art's Sake" Theory

Hundreds of artists who starved on the "art for art's sake" theory are now prospering because they have been taught by London experts how to adapt their art to commerce, and how and where to sell it to the best advantage.

Those who practise the profession can live or travel wherever they choose within reach of the postal service, for most designs are bought and sold by post.

The Practical Correspondence College (the all-British School of Art with the world-wide reputation) offers an individual training (by post) in commercial art, and absolutely guarantees your success.

It has two courses of instruction—one in designing posters, showcards, covers, and colour work generally; and one in black-and-white advertisement illustrations, etc. Both courses are personally conducted by Mr. Chas. E. Dawson, one of the most brilliant exponents and teachers of pictorial publicity in the world.

Each student receives special individual lessons and personal criticisms.

Time and Trouble-saving Expedients.

The lessons are beautifully illustrated by hundreds of reproductions, many of them in colours, and the exclusive information, short cuts, and trouble-saving expedients that are embodied in the course have never before been published, and are unobtainable in any other way.

The scientific methods underlying Mr. Dawson's personal success are all fully explained in this course, which took him seven years to prepare and perfect.

He has taught hundreds of men and women in all parts of the world how to earn a living by art, and the unasked-for testimonials received daily from students pay ample tribute to the value of his personal help, instruction, and encouragement.

If you care to send a small specimen of your work—with a stamped and directed envelope—it will be returned to you within a few days, with Mr. Dawson's personal criticism and his candid opinion as to your chances of success in this new and well-paid field of art. We will also send you, free, a copy of our illustrated book, "Art, Fame, and Fortune," which explains the whole theory and practice of learning and selling art work by post.

Write, in the first instance, to the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

"IN A GERMAN PENSION"

"IN A GERMAN PENSION" is the somewhat deceptive title of a somewhat irritating book by Katherine Mansfield (London: Stephen Swift and Co.). The volume contains about a dozen short sketches, only half of which have anything to do with a Pension, and of these the scene might just as well be laid in a hotel. Katherine Mansfield in this work shows herself a realist with an acrid sense of humour and a turn for risqué sayings and situations. She sees, all too plainly, what Meredith called the "dirty drab" of life, and some of her storyettes—"The Child-who-was-tired," for instance—are excellent efforts of their kind. But our appreciation of their cleverness is apt to be spoiled by this misleading title; it is not what we had a right to expect when we opened the book.

As for the Pension scenes, they, too, are credibly realistic, and often amusing; but even though the sketches of "Germans at Meat," in "The Luft Bad," etc., depict the truth, and nothing but the truth, they certainly do not show the whole truth. No redeeming feature in German manners, habits, and character is portrayed, with the result that the book, besides giving reasonable ground for offence to Germans themselves, must annoy English-speaking people who know Germany, and prejudice those who don't.

GIFT BOOKS

The Uffizi Gallery. With Fifty Reproductions in Colour. By P. G. Konody. 21s. net. (T. C. and E. C. Jack.)

This is a companion volume to the same publishers' "National Gallery" and "Louvre," and is in every respect worthy of its predecessors, and worthy of its subject. The Uffizi Gallery is, with the Vatican, the most important picture gallery of Italy, and, so far as Italian art is concerned, of the whole world. The volume contains fifty reproductions in colour of representative masterpieces, mainly Italian (forty-four), and these reproductions are a great improvement on earlier attempts. The text, by Mr. Konody, is an appropriate commentary on the illustrations, and is characterised by brevity and precision. Altogether the volume will be most welcome to booklovers in general, and to the student of Italian art in particular.

Traditions of Edinburgh. By Robert Chambers. Illustrated by James Riddel, R.S.W. 21s. net. (W. and R. Chambers.)

The "Traditions of Edinburgh," by Robert Chambers, one of the most distinguished of a famous line of publishers, appeared in 1825, at the conclusion of what may be called the golden age of Edinburgh, when the genius of Burns and Scott had made the Scottish capital one of the literary centres of Europe. After the lapse of eighty-seven years, Chambers' book still holds it own, and it has now become one of the historic documents of an historic city. But the present volume is not a mere reproduction of a classic. The striking drawings and paintings—excellently reproduced in colour—by Mr. James Riddel, make it virtually a new book. The artist, one of the most brilliant and most original of the younger Scottish school of painting, has admirably caught the spirit of Edinburgh, and has worthily maintained his reputation.

Parsifal, Retold from Ancient Sources. By T. W. Rolleston. Illustrated by Willy Pogany. 15s. net. (Harrap.)

Parsifal, quite apart from the epic of Wolfram and from the music of Wagner, will always remain one of the most beautiful legends of the Middle Ages. Mr. T. W. Rolleston gives us in this volume a new poetic version of the legend. Even those who would still prefer the spiritual symbolism of the old story must recognise the merits of Mr. Rolleston's rendering. Mr. Pogany's illustrations are in perfect harmony with the text, and the fantastic nature of the poem gives free play to his exuberant imagination. The book forms a notable addition to an already abundant Parsifal literature.

Edinburgh. By R. L. Stevenson. With 24 Illustrations in Colour by James Heron. 12s. 6d. net. (Seeley, Service and Co.)

The name of R. L. Stevenson is indissolubly associated with Edinburgh. None of her children have loved her more tenderly, and have made her more beloved and more honoured amongst men. The heroic invalid, whom the implacable east winds of the Scottish capital ultimately drove to the South Sea Islands, continued to the end of his days to yearn for the city whose climate had been so cruel to him in his youth. It is this passionate longing of the exile which lends additional interest and pathos to a book which for other reasons would still be one of Stevenson's most characteristic productions. The volume has appeared in many a garb, and has had many editions, but none more attractive than the present one, and none where the illustrations are so happily and so completely in unison with the style of the writer.

The Cottages and the Village Life of Rural England. By P. H. Ditchfield. With Coloured and Line Illustrations by A. R. Quinton. 21s. net. (J. M. Dent and Sons.)

This is an ideal Christmas presentation book. Its production has been to its authors a labour of love. Few men are better qualified than the Rector of Barkham to write on the rural life of England. Since he published, in 1890, "Our English Villages," he has issued many a volume on his favourite subject, but in "The Cottages and the Village Life of Rural England" he has given us his chef-d'œuvre. With tender and delicate minuteness he surveys every aspect of country life; he describes every detail of cottage structure; he reads a human and spiritual meaning into every external fact. And the reader closes the book in hearty agreement with the author that "there is no more beautiful thing on God's earth than the unspoilt English village." The pity and the pathos of it is that this picture of village life should be only like a vision of a lost paradise to the teeming millions of our cities.

No praise could be too high for the material production of the book, for the illustrations of Mr. Quinton, for the exquisite line drawings and the quiet and mellow colouring. The craft of the printer, the brush of the artist, and the style of the writer are so harmoniously blended that it is impossible to say whether Mr. Ditchfield wrote to interpret the exquisite pictures of Mr. Quinton, or whether Mr. Quinton drew his pictures to illustrate the mature wisdom of Mr. Ditchfield.

The Story of My Heart. My Autobiography. By Richard Jefferies. 7s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

"The Story of My Heart" is one of the most original autobiographies in the English language, and although it is in many ways a sad and even a depressing book, no other work of Richard Jefferies has passed through so many editions. This "édition de luxe" is sure to make a wide appeal. One may wonder why the publisher should have chosen this particular volume for illustration, and think that a spiritual autobiography hardly lends itself to pictorial representation; yet in illustrating "The Story of My Heart" the publishers are in no need of justification. Jefferies lived so entirely in communion with nature, and was so constantly influenced by nature's moods, that a representation of her external aspects, and of the scenes and surroundings amongst which he lived, cannot fail to give the key to his deeper emotions and to his most intimate thoughts. And Mr. E. W. Wayte has aptly chosen those aspects and those scenes which best interpret the author—although the coloured reproductions do not always do justice either to the artist or to the poet.

Through Shen-kan. By R. S. Clark and A. de C. Sowerby. 25s. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

This is an account of an American expedition organised by Mr. Robert Sterling Clark to the provinces of Shansi and Kansu. The book is a valuable addition to our knowledge of that little explored part of China. The photographs and illustrations are excellent. The letterpress is inadequate. Seventy-eight pages are hardly sufficient for a comprehensive survey of so considerable a part of the Chinese Empire.

(Continued on page 194.)

WEAK SIGHT CURED IN ONE MONTH.

EYE SPECIALIST'S NEW TREATMENT MAKES GLASSES, MEDICINES, AND OPERATIONS UNNECESSARY.

The remarkable new treatment for weak sight discovered by Dr. Gilbert Percival, the eminent eye specialist, has cured many thousands of sufferers. One month effects a complete cure in most cases, even among aged patients of many years' duration. Spectacles can be thrown away entirely, all medicines and operations are unnecessary.

The principles of this new home treatment are approved by the whole medical profession. A wonderfully simple and painless means of massaging the weakened eye muscles (the main cause of poor sight) absolutely assures a speedy cure in all cases of astigmatism, near sight, far sight, and aching or strained eyes. Since this treatment was first announced, thousands have written saying that they were able to discard their spectacles entirely after one month. Further reports proved complete and permanent cures in every case.

Glasses Discarded in Two Weeks.

Read the remarkable testimony of Miss May Gilson, 18, Broad Street, East Road, Cambridge, who writes, June 16th, 1912:—

"I am very pleased with the Neu Vita Sight Restorer; it is surprising the good it has done. I began to use it on May 3rd. I am very glad to say that I have not had glasses on for five weeks, and I can see to write, needlework, and everything much better than I have ever done before. I have received very great benefit."

Mr. H. O. Webber, 261, Foxhall Road, Ipswich, September 30th, 1912:—

"I am very glad to say that AFTER THREE WEEKS' use of your Sight Restorer I have dispensed with glasses, which I have worn for three years. I spent a great deal of money with an oculist, who failed to give any benefit. I consider your Treatment a very valuable invention."

Mr. Wm. Simpson, 33, Dyehouse Fold, Apperley Bridge, Bradford, October 18th, 1912:—

"I feel it my duty to tell you of the great benefit I have received from your treatment. I began to use it a month ago for weak sight, and now the defect has left me altogether."

Dr. Percival's Standard Work, "The Eyes," Offered Free.

Everyone who is now disfigured by unsightly spectacles should write at once for a copy of Dr. Percival's standard work (1s. edition) on the Eyes, which he has arranged to distribute FREE of charge. It is filled with priceless advice and information; every form of eye defect is described at length with the proper method of treatment. Further complete details of Dr. Percival's wonderfully simple and pleasant cure are given, so that everyone now suffering from weak sight can quickly cure himself and discard spectacles for ever. The above cases are only three out of hundreds that are being accomplished every week. If your sight is not as perfect as you wish, no matter how long you may have suffered, Dr. Percival's treatment will cure you. It is absolutely harmless; by overcoming the actual cause of weak sight, permanent restoration is assured.

Dr. Percival's invaluable book is quite free. Write your name and full address on the coupon, and post it at once to E. N. Percival, Neu Vita Health Association, 95-106, Exchange Buildings, Southwark, London. This remarkable free book to cure your weak sight will be sent by return.

FILL UP AND POST AT ONCE.

COUPON

E. N. Percival, Neu Vita Health Assoc.,
95-106, Exchange Buildings, Southwark, London.
Please send me your book on "The Eyes" as offered in Everyman, for which I enclose 2d. in stamps (4d. if abroad) for postage.

NAME

ADDRESS

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY offers lonely people everywhere many facilities for obtaining wider social and intellectual interests. Among its chief features are—Correspondence Club, Social Circles, Companionship Bureau, Holiday Tours, Advice Bureau, The Progress Journal, etc. There is no membership fee. For particulars and free copy of Journal, with invitation form, write, sending stamp, to Secretary, E. M., 107, GREENCROFT GARDENS, HAMPSHIRE, LONDON

AUTHORS! MSS. placed with 175 Publishers and Periodicals at HIGHEST PRICES. 16 p. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision from 8d. per 1,000 words. Paper included.—THE NATIONAL TYPE-WRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

SWISS WINTER SPORTS—9 days, £7 7s. Few free tickets offered to Ladies and Gentlemen helping to form party.—Prof. Hertig's Tours, Sandown, I.O.W.

BOOKS—SECOND-HAND OR NEW.—Situating in a University Centre we have exceptional facilities for filling your wants. Send us list of same or subject.—GALLOWAY & PORTER, University Booksellers, Cambridge.

THE INFORMATION and AGENCY BUREAU.—Established to procure INFORMATION on literary, social and other subjects, and to carry out EXECUTIVE AGENCY work. Researches at the British Museum, Somerset House and elsewhere. Reasonable charges. Apply for PROSPECTUS to THE SECRETARIAT, 26, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.

Monarch Light Touch

means all-day speed—no mid-afternoon fatigue. It means more work from a given amount of energy—increased output—decreased cost of typewriting to the employer. Let us give you a demonstration of this and other Monarch advantages.

The Monarch Typewriter Co., Ltd., 165, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN

EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY. 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	1/3 Page	1/4 Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3 1/2 inches wide), 21s. Depth of Page, 10 1/2 inches.

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS, 1s. per line (Minimum 3s.)
ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

The Chequer Board. By Sybil Grant. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

This is a volume of short stories by Lord Rosebery's daughter. The writer has neat gifts of style, observation, and wit, and her dramatic instinct is sure. Some of the tales are simply sketches of certain phases of modern life, but they are done with a strong, one had almost said a masculine, touch. Of the stories proper, "The Three-Cornered Secret" is easily the best. This is a tragic little story, in which the note of pathos is struck with fine feeling and restraint. The writer is successful also in her descriptions of the country, whether in Italy or "caravanning" in England, and the final sketch is an extremely witty piece of extravaganza. This book is the work of a shrewd, sympathetic, and witty observer of life. We shall hear more of Lady Sybil Grant.

Out of the Wreck I Rise. By Beatrice Harraden. 2s. (T. Nelson and Sons.)

In this novel Miss Harraden gives us a story of one of those men, common enough in fiction, who are thoroughly unscrupulous, but who seem to exercise an extraordinary influence over women—and good enough women at that. The tale runs the ordinary course—the women try to save the villain from the penalty of his misdeeds. The character of Adrian Steele is drawn with skill; but Tamar, one of the self-sacrificing women, is the most convincing person in the book.

The Bandbox. By Louis Joseph Vance. 6s. (Grant Richards.)

An exciting story of an adventure over a necklace, which its owner hid in a bandbox in order to smuggle it into America. The plot is ingenious, and the characters are well conceived.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Anonymous. "Home Rule in the Making." (King, 1s.)
 Amelung, W. "The Museums and Ruins of Rome." Two vols. (Duckworth, 5s.)
 Addams, Jane. "A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil." (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.)
 Bellows. German Dictionary. (Longmans, Green, 6s.)
 Brooks, Sydney. "Aspects of the Irish Question." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
 Beckley, F. "Marie Antoinette." (T. N. Foulis, 5s.)
 Barclay, Florence. "The Upas Tree." (Putnam, 3s.)
 "Business Positions—£300 a Year." (Newnes, 1s.)
 Browning, Oscar. "Memories of Sixty Years." (John Lane.)
 "Robert. "The King and the Book." (Oxford University Press, 1s. 6d. and 2s.)
 Bebel, August. "My Life." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Blackwood, Algernon. "Jimbo." (Macmillan, 7d.)
 Broughton, Rhoda. "Not Wisely, But Too Well." (Macmillan, 7d.)
 Chesterton, Cecil. "Nell Gwyn." (T. N. Foulis, 5s.)
 Coleridge, E. H. "Poems of Samuel T. Coleridge." (Oxford University Press, 2s.)
 Clark, R. S., and A. de C. Sowerby. "Through Shen-Kan." (Fisher Unwin, 25s.)
 Chalmers, Patrick R. "Green Days and Blue Days." (Maunsel, 3s. 6d.)
 Cran, Gerhard. "Jean Jacques Rousseau." (Blackwood, 12s. 6d.)
 Crawford, Marion. "Greifenstein." (Macmillan, 7d.)
 Dyson, F. W. "Astronomy." (Dent.)
 Daudet, Alphonse. "Lettres de Mon Moulin." Edited by H. C. Bradby and E. V. Rieu. (Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.)
 Dubois, L. Paul. "Contemporary Ireland." (Maunsel.)
 Ellis, T. E. "Children of Don." (Arnold, 2s.)
 "Eight Men Who Have Done It.—5s. a Week to £500 a Year." (Newnes, 1s.)
 Findlater, Jane H. "Seven Scots Stories." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)
 Foerster, F. W. "Marriage and the Sex Problem." (Wells, Gardner, Darton and Co., 5s.)
 Godard, André. "Christian Positivism." (W. Walker.)
 Gordon, Allan Lindsay. "Poems." (Oxford University Press, 2s. and 1s. 6d.)
 "G. S. "English Literature and the Classics." (Clarendon Press, 6s.)
 Harrison, Compton; D. F. Dickie. "Germany." (Black, 20s.)
 Hügel, F. Von. "Eternal Life." (T. and T. Clark, 8s.)
 Hughes, Spencer Leigh ("Sub Rosa"). "The English Character." (T. N. Foulis, 5s.)
 Jefferies, Richard. "The Story of My Heart." (Duckworth, 7s. 6d.)
 Johnson, R. Brimley. "Towards Religion." (Lindsay Press, 1s. and 1s. 6d.)
 Kirtlan, Rev. Ernest J. B. "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight." (Kelly.)

- Ker, W. P. "Collected Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association." Vol. III. (Clarendon Press, 5s.)
 Legge, Edward. "King Edward in His True Colours." (Eveleigh Nash, 16s.)
 Lorenzo de Medici. "Poesie Volgari." Two vols. (Dent.)
 Lewis, Arthur D. "Syndicalism and the General Strike." (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.)
 Lowell, James Russell. Poems. (Oxford University Press, 1s. 6d. and 2s.)
 Lucy, Sir Henry. "Sixty Years in the Wilderness." (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d.)
 Miles, C. A. "Christmas in Ritual and Tradition." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
 Maud, Constance. "No Surrender." (Duckworth, 2s.)
 Murray, D. L. "Pragmatism." (Constable, 1s.)
 Millard, Benjamin A. "Congregationalism." (Constable, 1s.)
 Meikle, Henry W. "Scotland and the French Revolution." (Maclehose, 10s.)
 Moorhouse, E. Hallam. "Lady Hamilton." (T. N. Foulis, 5s.)
 Monkhouse, Allan. "Dying Fires." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 Mackenzie, Compton. "The Passionate Elopement." (Macmillan, 7d.)
 Murray, D. Christie. "Aunt Rachel." (Macmillan, 7d.)
 Newbigging, Thomas. "The Canadian Boat Song." (Sherratt and Hughes, 3s. 6d.)
 O'Brien, Mrs. William. "Unseen Friends." (Longmans, 6s. 6d.)
 Paget-Walpurga, Lady. "Scenes and Memories." (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.)
 Parker, Eric. "The Scenes of Arden." (Smith, Elder.)
 Pawlowska, Yoi. "Those That Dream." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 Palmer, William Scott. "Winter and Spring." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
 Pugh, Edwin. "The Dickens Originals." (T. N. Foulis, 6s.)
 Quiller-Couch, Sir A. T. ("Q."). "Hocken and Hunken." (Blackwood, 6s.)
 Rose, J. H. "The Personality of Napoleon." (G. Bell, 5s.)
 Robertson, Hon. J. M. "Rationalism." (Constable, 1s.)
 Rose, Henry. "Maeterlinck's Symbolism" ("The Blue Bird," etc.). (Fifield, 2s.)
 Rousseau, J. J. "Lettres Ecrites de la Montagne." (Dent, 1s.)
 Synge, M. B. "A Book of Discovery." (Jack, 7s. 6d.)
 Storr-Best, Lloyd. "M. T. Varro on Farming." (Bell.)
 Skae, H. T. "Mary Queen of Scots." (T. N. Foulis, 5s.)
 Sinclair, Hugh. "Voices of To-day." (Clarke, 3s. 6d.)
 Stanley, H. Autobiography. (Sampson, Low, 6s.)
 Shorter, Dora Sigerson. New Poems. (Maunsel, 1s.)
 Stein, Dr. Ludwig. "England and Germany." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Torey, Duncan C. "The Letters of Thomas Gray." Three vols. (Bell.)
 Tarrant, W. G. "Unitarianism." (Constable, 1s.)
 Tayler, J. Lionel. "The Nature of Woman." (Fifield, 3s. 6d.)
 Underhill, Evelyn. "Immanence: A Book of Verses." (Dent, 4s. 6d.)
 Vallings, Harold. "Chess for a Stake." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)
 Wright, C. H. Conrad. "A History of French Literature." (Oxford University Press.)
 Wolfe, Frida. "Roundabout Ways." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor will endeavour to return manuscripts only when a stamped envelope is enclosed. All manuscripts should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY and WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Send a POSTCARD for ILLUSTRATED GENERAL CATALOGUE

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY. 10/6 net.

By CECIL HEADLAM. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.

COMPANION WORK.

CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY. 10/6 net.

By the Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, Bishop of Truro.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND. 21/- net.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. QUINTON.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. 5/- net each volume.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY.

By PROF. JAMES SETH, M.A.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY.

By PROF. W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A.

[Prospectus.]

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA. In 3 Vols.

7/6 net each volume.

Vol. II. By PROF. VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. [Prospectus.]

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: HISTORICAL — PICTORIAL — COLONIAL. 10/6 net.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. [Prospectus.]

STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS: A VOLUME OF ESSAYS. 5/- net.

By DARRELL FIGGIS. [Prospectus.]

NEW FICTION.

SECOND LARGE EDITION.

JOSEPH CONRAD. 'TWIXT LAND AND SEA. 6/-

By the Author of "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER."

FLORENCE CONVERSE. THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT. 6/-

MOST SUITABLE FOR PRESENTATION.

3/- THE CONISTON CLASSICS. 3/- net.

33 volumes chosen from EVERYMAN LIBRARY in a new style of binding known as Bedford Morocco.

[Prospectus.]

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA,

Edited by ANDREW BOYLE,

to be published in 12 volumes of about 640 pages each.

1/- NET, CLOTH.

There will be over 500,000 words in each volume, and the complete work will contain 6,000,000 words, and more articles than any similar work.

1/- NET, CLOTH. [Prospectus.]

Messrs. Dent & Sons' Children's Books are a Special Feature of the Season's New Productions. Please send a postcard for Full List.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD ST., W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation. There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

CUT THIS CORNER - POST TO US - GET THE BOOK

POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name

Address

POST IT NOW

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 7. Vol. 1.

[REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1912.

One Penny.

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

HILAIRE BELLOC

PROF. J. ARTHUR
THOMSON

REV. PERCY DEARMER

CHARLES SAROLEA

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	197
The Case Against the Eugenist	198
Constantinople for Christendom—
By the Rev. Percy Dearmer	199
"Westward Ho!" Again—
A Rejoinder by Mgr. Benson	200
The Master of the Hobby Horse—
Laurence Sterne—By W. R. T.	201
The Servile State—By Hilaire Belloc	202
The Commons in Duress	203
"Twelfth Night" at the Savoy Theatre—
By C. B. Purdom	204
Portrait of Miss Lillah McCarthy as
Viola in "Twelfth Night"	205

The French Renaissance—	PAGE
By Dr. Charles Sarolea	207
Correspondence	208
The Stars—A Short Story—
By Alphonse Daudet	211
The Insects' Homer—Henri Fabre—
By Prof. J. Arthur Thomson	213
What's Wrong with the Churches?—
Part I.—By W. Forbes Gray	214
Jane Austen—By Augustus Ralli	218
Scotland's Debt to Protestantism—
By Hector Macpherson	220
Books of the Week	222
Reviews in Brief	226
List of Books Received	226

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

HOPES of an early peace which were entertained a week ago were swiftly dashed by the rejection by Turkey of the terms laid down by Bulgaria. Negotiations have been reopened, and the feeling prevails that a satisfactory settlement will be reached. Meetings of the Bulgarian and Turkish plenipotentiaries are being held. Meanwhile arrangements for an armistice are in progress. For the moment public attention is concentrated upon the Austro-Servian difficulty. Servian aspirations are distasteful to Austria, as may be seen from a statement made by the Servian Premier. It is absolutely essential, he says, that Servia should have about thirty miles of coast-line on the Adriatic, from Alessio to Durazzo. Inland, he demands a considerable part of Albania and Northern Macedonia, as well as Old Servia, so that quite half of the country inhabited by the Albanians in Turkey would be taken possession of by Servia and Montenegro. As Russia is supposed to favour Servia, it is easy to understand the critical nature of the situation. It is not known what military preparations are being made by the two Powers, though it is admitted that the Austrian warships in the East, with two exceptions, have been ordered to return to home waters.

From an Austrian source it is announced that the railway service in Russian Poland, near the Austrian frontier, has been diminished. Meanwhile Germany is said to recommend to Austria a policy of moderation. From German sources, however, comes a denial of the war rumours. It is stated that the Powers are bending their energies to find a solution of the problems which confront them. Meanwhile suspicion has been aroused by the establishment of a Press censorship on all military matters in Austria-Hungary. Reports have been received of Turkish successes, but, though there has been fighting at Chatalja, it has not been on an extensive scale. At Adrianople the garrison has made another sortie, only to meet with repulse. The besiegers are said to be within a mile of the town. Terrible accounts are published of the ravages of cholera and the sufferings of the Turks at the Chatalja lines. According to a Sofia telegram, very extensive preventive measures against cholera have been taken. European specialists have been summoned, and a severe sanitary inspection has been established everywhere, especially at Chatalja.

At a meeting of the General Confederation of Labour in Paris against the war in the Balkans a resolution was adopted in favour of the principle of a general strike of twenty-four hours with the object of measuring the strength of the Confederation. The date of the strike will be fixed later.

At a meeting at Nottingham the Prime Minister, referring to the disorderly scenes in the House of Commons, said such scenes were fatal to the first principles of Parliamentary and Constitutional government. The Government, he announced, was engaged upon a scheme for the reconstitution of the House of Lords. It was their intention to carry out the programme they had laid down.

At the concluding meeting of the Council of the National Liberal Federation resolutions were passed expressing confidence in the Government and in favour of closer relations with Germany.

Large estates are being broken up in consequence, it is said, of recent taxation. This is the reason given by Viscount Hythe for selling part of his estate. The burden of recent taxation, he explains, made it impossible for anyone who derived an income from land to live in the ancestral home.

Mr. Carnegie has extended his philanthropic efforts to the ex-Presidents of the United States. He has offered to provide a pension of £5,000 for ex-Presidents and their widows, so long as they remain unmarried.

According to Mr. John Burns, President of the Local Government Board, Ireland in the ten years 1901-11 had emigrated 336,000 people, or 131 per cent. of its natural increase, which was 263,000. From 1851 to 1911 4,218,000 Irish people had left Ireland, or 81 per cent. of its average population. With regard to Scotland, according to figures they had been able to secure, that country, for the first time, he thought, for a hundred years, was showing this year an emigration considerably beyond its natural increase.

It was stated in the Speech from the Throne, at the opening of the Canadian Parliament, with reference to the official deliberations on naval defence which took place in London, that conditions had been disclosed which rendered it imperative that the effective naval forces of the Empire should be strengthened without delay. A Bill would be introduced to afford reasonable and necessary aid for that purpose.

Mr. Taylor, the Liberal candidate, has been returned for Bolton by a majority of 1,176. He polled 10,011 votes, against 8,835 by Mr. Brooks, Unionist.

The death is announced of Mr. Monypenny, the biographer of Disraeli. The second volume of the work appeared quite recently.

Parts of Jamaica have been swept by a disastrous storm. A tidal wave is reported to have practically destroyed the towns of Savanna-la-Mar and Lucea. In a hurricane forty-two people were killed.

The Czar has sent a message to his mother, the Empress Marie of Russia, stating that his son and heir has completely recovered from his illness, and that no fear of a relapse is entertained.

There are forty-six American labour leaders on trial in Indianapolis, charged with instigating dynamite outrages. Great importance is attached to the evidence of the witness McManigal, who turned State's evidence in the trial of the brothers McNamara in Los Angeles.

A blue-book has been issued, giving statistics of compensations and of proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act and Employers' Liability Act during 1911. In the seven great industries dealt with the total sum paid in compensation was £3,058,404, compared with £2,700,325 in 1910.

An important discussion took place in the House of Commons on Monday night on Home Rule finance, over the Government's proposal to amend the financial provisions of the Bill so as to prevent the Irish Parliament from reducing Customs duties. An amendment to leave out of Clause 15 the power to vary in any way any Imperial tax so far as respected the levy of that tax in Ireland was rejected by a majority of 117.

It is stated that nearly 400 of the Young Turk party have been arrested in Constantinople and in various towns of the Empire and have been exiled to Koniah. Among those arrested are three generals.

THE CASE AGAINST THE EUGENIST

AT different stages of our political history different ideas have been entertained with regard to social progress. At one time, notably during the revolutionary epoch, social progress, as understood by writers like Rousseau and Paine, was only possible by substituting for the rule of monarchs, aristocrats, and priests the sovereignty of the people. As the result of the reaction caused by the French Revolution, Bentham and the Philosophic Radicals thought the sovereignty of the People, and consequently social progress, could best be secured by means of an extended franchise. J. S. Mill saw that behind the political factor was another more powerful, the economic. He saw that in the hands of the people political power would be used to secure their economic emancipation. This, which may be termed the Socialistic method, has now to contend with what may be called the Biological method. Taking their stand on Darwinism, representatives of this method tell us that social progress can only be reached through the survival of the fittest.

Thus do Calvinism with its doctrine of Supernatural Selection, and Darwinism with its theory of Natural Selection, join hands. Following on the same lines, the new science of Eugenics would stop Nature's waste by the propagation of the fit; if need be, by legislative methods according to the gospel of heredity. Evidence exists to show that environment exercises a more potent influence than Eugenists are disposed to allow. In many instances physical defectiveness is traceable to a wretched environment in childhood, and, with the removal of the child to healthier surroundings, the physical balance is restored. A Scottish Poor Law inspector has given it as his opinion that, provided you take the children of dissolute parents early enough away from their slum surroundings, they cannot be said to suffer at all from their birth environment. He supports his view by figures, which go to show that, out of some 630 children sent by him to the country, and kept under close observation for years, only twenty-three turned out bad. Important testimony was given before the Interdepartmental Committee on Physical Deterioration by Dr. Eicholz, one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools. He says: "There is little, if anything, to justify the conclusion that neglect, poverty, and parental ignorance, serious as their results are, possess any marked hereditary effect, or that heredity plays any significant part in establishing the physical degeneration of the poorer population."

It is a remarkable fact that those engaged in rescue work in the slums are more hopeful of what are called the degenerate masses than those who are devoted to scientific study of the problem. Dr. Chappin, of the children's department of the Graduates' Hospital, New York, investigated 600 cases of children admitted to that institution. He says: "They are a sorry lot, gathered together from the slums of New York, and suffering from maimed, dwarfed, and depleted bodies, but when their history is carefully traced out it was found that only twenty-two of the 600 were badly born." A great scientific authority, Mr. Archdall Reid, who has made a special study of heredity, comes to the conclusion that if we could abolish the slums a good improvement would take place in the human breed. By means of what has been called Social heredity, men's natures are moulded less and less by ancestral qualities, and more and more by social influence.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

CONSTANTINOPLE FOR CHRISTENDOM

BY REV. PERCY DEARMER

I.

It was very curious to notice how, at the outbreak of the war, the Press of Europe (excluding that of Russia and the Allied States) used the word "sentiment." The annual massacre of thousands of Macedonian Christians, the patriotic aspirations of the four States, the fact that they had become highly civilised and progressive nations since their emancipation from Turkish oppression, the racial ambitions of the Hellenes and Slavs, the wonderful religious constancy of the Orthodox during five centuries of ceaseless persecution, the resulting aspirations of the Orthodox peoples—all these were "sentimental" factors, not to be allowed for by such serious business men as the diplomatists and financiers of Europe. So too with the responsibility of England, because she at the Berlin Congress had put the peoples of Macedonia back under the Ottoman yoke for another thirty-four years of massacre. This bitter moral truth was also "sentiment," and the English Press has been strangely silent about it—because of diplomatic considerations, no doubt. Still more "sentimental" were the august historical facts that lie behind the welter of the Ottoman invasion, which for a thousand years has marred the glory of Christendom and ruined the prosperity of the Mediterranean peoples. One hardly dared to allude to such ultra-sentimental considerations as that the chief church of Christendom, St. Sofia, compared with which St. Peter's and St. Paul's are mushrooms, the most beautiful church in the world, the place to which Russians and Greeks alike look as their mother, is a mosque, and as the result of Turkish neglect is beginning to fall down.

Yet these "sentimental" considerations include all that makes life worth living, most that men really care about, and almost all that differentiates us from the animals. Surely the materialistic and immoral traditions of diplomacy need revising in the light of the fact that twentieth-century man declines to be a "hog of the epicurean herd," and continues to be human and humane, and a spiritual being. If Europe had forgotten it, the Balkan States have reminded Europe that history and idealism, poetry and the half-forgotten dreams of a glorious art exist; that the brotherhood of races, the community of religions are not obsolete factors; that it is still possible for nations to burn with righteous indignation for the wrongs done to brethren under an alien rule, and to remember the lash under which their forefathers writhed.

II.

Europe shuddered when King Ferdinand proclaimed this war as a war between the Cross and the Crescent. It hastened to rebuke him, as it had rebuked the States when they began the war. The idea of a revival of chivalry and of the crusading spirit was horrible to our diplomats, who are used to regarding war as an affair between the financiers. But the King was right. It is a war between the Cross and the Crescent. It is not a war between one race and another. We all like the Turk. What is wrong with him is his religion—its cruelty, its intolerance, its obscurantism, and its fatalism. There are other peoples in Europe who are of the same stock as the Ottoman and come from the same part of Asia, and they are amongst the most cultivated peoples in the world; but they have had many centuries of Christian training. Our Mohammedan fellow-subjects in India and Egypt know perfectly the significance of that "sentimental" fact that the Crescent surmounts the dome of St. Sofia. They know how vastly Islam has profited from the possession of Constantinople; and they know that the doom of the Pan-Islam movement is being pronounced by the Balkan guns. Some shortsighted politicians have imagined that ill will come to the British Empire by the Moslem discomfiture. Would that all our politicians read their history books! Nothing would have jeopardised our rule in India and Egypt so much as a defeat of the Balkan States, or—if it had been conceivable—a recovery of Christian territory by the Turk.

III.

But the recovery of Europe for the Europeans is not yet complete. The fate of Constantinople, the crown of all, is yet undecided. It is still the correct thing to hope that the city founded by the first Christian Emperor, the city which preserved Christian civilisation through the dark ages, the city through which Christianity has spread from Kieff to Vladivostok, shall remain the capital of the Mohammedan world, and that the finest city in Europe should continue Asiatic.

I venture to think that this is bad diplomacy, both for sentimental reasons and for the less practical reasons of what we call "practical politics." For instance, Europe now has a chance of settling the Turkish Question once for all and without further bloodshed. If Constantinople remains under its present masters, that question will not be settled. Eastern Europe has long suffered from a malignant disease. The Powers tried to plaster it. Now the severe mercy of the surgeon's knife is applied. But let us remember that if we close up the wound, leaving this root of the ancient malady still embedded among the tissues, the disease will break out again. There will be need again of the surgeon's knife, and another war.

Will Turkey indeed be able to rule Constantinople? What did she make of the task even in the days of her power, either under Hamidianism or under Young Turkism? Just before the war broke out, an eminent English architect wrote to the papers with the news that the walls of St. Sofia were beginning to crack, and that, unless something were done, Justinian's noble church would perish. Perhaps it is sentimental to care about the loss of one of the world's most beautiful possessions; but at least the fact is significant. The finest church in the world is a Turkish mosque, and yet all the intelligent books about it are by European Christians, and an English architect appeals to the West to prevent it crumbling away in the incompetent hands of those who took it from Europe.

IV.

Things have been thus for generations, and are so still. At this moment the warships of the Powers have steamed into the Bosphorus because the present owners of Constantinople could not be relied upon to keep order in their own capital—because its Moslem population, accustomed for generations to regard the massacre of Christians as a natural and meritorious act, would break loose again unless Europe came in to prevent their savagery. If there are any who can cheerfully tolerate the prospect of Constantinople remaining in Turkish hands, they should at least reflect upon the fact that those hands are less able than ever to-day to give it even the semblance of government which it has possessed in the past.

Yet Constantinople has not been even in the past a Moslem city: out of a population of 873,505, according to recent estimates, the Moslems only numbered 384,910; and in the future their number, whatever happens, must be still less. The city has only to be put under democratic rule, and the Ottoman domination will ipso facto cease. Will this be a bad thing even for the Turk? He has proved himself a good servant, but an incomparably bad master—most horribly cruel and yet incapable of maintaining order, dealing out misery to Christians and yet failing to secure prosperity for his own people. The Mohammedans of India have a finer history and a more advanced civilisation than the Turkish race, which has never produced a great man or woman, apart from the barbarian chiefs of old time; yet our Indian Moslems are not a ruling race. As long ago as 1876, Professor Lorimer wrote a paper, showing the wisdom of treating Constantinople as a free international city, and he said:—

"I would make of the Turk all that a civilised man can ever make of a barbarian—namely a pupil. I would treat the dear fellow—dear to us in so many senses—with considerate kindness; but I would give up the farce of pretending that he was sui juris, when, if not in his dotage, he was plainly in his minority, and send him to school."

The time is ripe indeed for Europe to come by her own again—Europe, Christendom, civilisation. And not Europe only: the ancient magnificent civilisation which was built up round the Mediterranean Sea in the ages before Christ, and has been a ruin since the Moslem hordes overran it, will surely be recovered. Not Constantinople only and Thessalonica, but still older glories can be revived, and we may live to see in Africa a new Carthage and a new Cyrene, in Asia a new Troy, a new Ephesus, Rhodes, Tarsus, Antioch, Tyre, Damascus, and (if it be not too sentimental) a new Jerusalem.

"WESTWARD HO!" AGAIN

A REJOINDER BY MGR. BENSON

It would be an impossible task—from mere want of space—to answer point by point all the various criticisms that have been made upon my recent article on "Westward Ho!" They have ranged from the old exploded charge against the Jesuits that they "do evil that good may come"—a charge answered continually and completely again and again in tracts of the Catholic Truth Society—down to historical statements about the Inquisition. I can only refer my courteous critics, who, I am sure, only desire to know the facts, to those same excellent little publications. A note to that Society, in Southwark Bridge Road, London, with a shilling or two enclosed, will bring back an astonishing amount of literature, with chapter and verse given for the assertions there made.

It appears then more profitable that I should answer the general rather than the particular criticisms that have been made; and Mr. Candlish's recent article, entitled "A Reply to Mgr. Benson," seems to sum them up very adequately.

Now Mr. Candlish really gives himself away entirely in his bald statement that the struggle in the sixteenth century was a "battle between that principle on which the whole fabric of the modern world is reared—the freedom of the human soul . . . and a gigantic religious and political tyranny which, had it prevailed, would inevitably have thrust men back to the dark ages." No one expects, as Mr. Candlish says, the "accuracy of a photograph" from an historical novel: no one would object to minor mistakes or omissions, if the novel is, in the main, a just sketch of the period and of the principles involved. But it was precisely this assumption that I challenged; and I showed that, in order to justify this frightful caricature of the truth, Kingsley was compelled, perhaps unconsciously, to manipulate verifiable facts. For instance, how could "liberty of conscience" be all on one side, and "tyranny" on the other, if Elizabeth, the defender of Private Judgment, racked and disembowelled men whose only crime was that their Private Judgment in matters of religion differed from her own? Therefore Kingsley omitted to mention that those things were done. How can it be made reasonable that Campion, the gentle Christian orator, should be on the side of "darkness," and Topcliffe, the inhuman torturer, on the side of light? Very simply, says Mr. Kingsley; make Campion a sneaking fool, and omit all mention of Topcliffe. So, too, with politics. It is desired to show that England is the home of liberty and Spain of slavery. Therefore Mr. Kingsley makes his Englishmen bold and bright champions of truth and freedom, and his Spaniards gloomy and sinister figures, with a few sparkles on them, as of light on dark and blood-stained armour.

My own point is that there was some real good on both sides, and that that appallingly sweeping judgment of Mr. Kingsley (and of Mr. Candlish) is both prejudiced and untrue. I entirely agree that there were horrors done by Catholic persons in the name of Catholicism; I only drew attention to the fact that other horrors done by Protestants in the name of Protestantism were either omitted altogether in "Westward Ho!" or slurred over, or actually justified; and that Kingsley could only support his thesis by playing fast and loose with facts.

It is, then, on Mr. Candlish's "broad ground" that I join issue with him. I do not hope to convert him from his view that the present age, with its Pharisaism, its irreligion, its child-murder, its lamentable social conditions—things traceable directly to Protestantism—is the age of light and liberty; and that the middle ages, with their faith, their charity, their zeal for God, are the ages of darkness. This is his thesis, and this is Mr. Kingsley's. And it was in order to show that this thesis is the underlying objective of "Westward Ho!" that I wrote my article. I am glad that Mr. Candlish agrees with me.

THE SEA

QUIVERING in deep shadow far away,
In mystic vastness to an unknown goal,
Wild as youth's visions in its endless roll,
Yet lapsing in a scintillating play,
Its waves, ere dashing in a heedless fray,
Its loneliness is like a desolate soul—
Grand and bewildering, yet without control,
That lives to mock and spurn our little day.

O heaving billows of a mighty world!
Your clasp is death; your teeth, that scorns the wind,
Shall pierce and devastate an unknown snare,
'And yet your radiance, like a hope unfurled,
Shall lull the restless shadows of the mind,
'And flash its glory on imprisoned care!

—ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

THE MASTER OF THE HOBBY HORSE—LAURENCE STERNE

ONCE more we have Sterne set before us—this time by the deft hand of Mr. Walter Sichel, and in a study so subtle and sympathetic as to make us all his debtors. Sterne is the Immortal Casual of our literature. Subject him to police supervision, and he can be made to appear as the veriest wastrel of the street. At the gruff bidding of the Puritan he is being perpetually "moved on." But see in him the tramp of genius, battered somewhat, no doubt, and shaky on his spindle shanks, yet, even as he twirls a brimless hat, watching you with a certain shrewd, pathetic mockery out of the corner of a moist eye, and your hand goes at once into your pocket. You feel that you cannot send this arch and fascinating pilgrim to the Charity Organisation Society. You can't even suggest the hospital, for his cough has a chuckle hidden somewhere in the very bosom of its huskiness. This is the tramp of tramps, embarked on life's sentimental journey.

Mr. Sichel is not a learned biographer—though he has learned enough and to spare. He does not seek to take Sterne into custody. Rather, he earns our gratitude by going on tramp with him. "The moles have been busy with the firefly, but the dancing, gleaming thing eludes their patience." Mr. Sichel follows the will-o'-the-wisp, knowing that capture is impossible. What we have, then, is an impressionist study of a "romantic impressionist." Mr. Sichel has some interesting pages on impressionism. "Music and the Bible," he tells us, "founded impressionism." And he puts on record Sterne's daily reading of the one and his passion for the other. We believe this to be sound criticism. Romance and Impressionism are closely allied. For the spirit of Romance, for which the boundaries of life do not exist, which feels itself everywhere in touch with the things that warm and move, and thrill and awe, which is sensitive to the supernatural environment that lies so near to the heart of life even while giving hints of worlds and worlds beyond, must choose the impressionist method for its expression. Impressionism cannot give us abstractions or propositions, but it can give us the laughter and colour and sadness of life. It is not to be wondered at that a classicist like Johnson did not appreciate Sterne. For Sterne was opening a new chapter in our literature. To Johnson, "Tristram Shandy" was only an "odd" thing. "Nothing odd," he said, "will do long." Well, it was an odd thing in a world still under the Pope régime. But it certainly was not an odd thing in the sense of being freakish or slipshod or haphazard.

As a matter of fact, Sterne had a very definite ideal of literary method. He speaks of "the insensible more or less," which "determines the precise line of beauty in the sentence, as well as in the statue." "How," he goes on, "do the slight touches of the chisel, the pencil, the pen, the fiddlestick, et cætera, give the true swell, which gives the true pleasure! O my countrymen, be nice, be cautious of your language, and never, O never let it be forgotten upon what small particles your eloquence and your fame depend." Here, not without the characteristic whimsicality, Sterne gives us something of the secret of his art. No writer knew better the value of the "insensible more or less," the magical power of the touch that gives the final impression of humour or pathos.

Sterne presents two challenges to us. He challenges the moral faculty and the literary, inviting us either to pronounce judgment or to experience delight. He is the wiser man who pays attention chiefly to the latter, and who will decline either to be Sterne's apologist or to put him in the pillory.

For why should we put Sterne in the pillory? He had, as we say, rather a poor chance in life. Home meant nothing to him in the years when it means most. At eighteen he lost his father, and a mother's gracious influence had no part in his life. Then he was phthisical. "Poor, sick-headed, sick-hearted Yorick . . . worn down to a shadow . . . going to waste on a restless bed, where he will turn from side to side a thousand times." He knew what it was to awake and find his bed deluged with blood. Further, he knew what it was to find fame, for the first time, at forty-six. And, last of all, he was Sterne—Sterne living in the very heart of the eighteenth century. It is not a problem in ethics that Sterne presents to us so much as a study in temperament. God made him, and he had his place in this boundlessly hospitable world. "His character was,—he loved a jest in his heart—and as he saw himself in the true point of ridicule, he would say he could not be angry with others for seeing him in a light in which he strongly saw himself." "You may estimate your capacity for comic perception," writes Meredith, "by being able to detect the ridicule of those you love, without loving them less: and more by being able to see yourself somewhat ridiculous in dear eyes, and accepting the correction their image of you proposes." Surely Sterne met this test proposed by the subtle student of the Comic Spirit. His humour had love in it, and so never became mockery. Therefore he must be forgiven much. He has been convicted of many things. He was, for example, a great plagiarist. Yes, we suppose he was. In the library of Crazy Castle, his friend Hall Stevenson's mansion, he devoured much literature, and gave it forth again. But what he touched he adorned. If Sterne did his borrowing in Crazy Castle, he made his repayments in the House of Sanity, where, after all, all good literature is produced. The man who once read in a book, "To a shorn sheep God gives wind by measure," and then wrote down, "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," was no common pickpocket. The coppers he took became gold in his hand. But Sterne was Sterne, and, in his own words, "he stands accountable to a Judge of whom he will have no cause to complain."

Sterne, Mr. Sichel tells us, "presents at least three literary faces." The one "is turned towards his hobby-horses . . . the second, alas! towards the Crazy Brotherhood. . . . But the third, and greatest, towards human nature." This is true, but may it not be added that Sterne's philosophy of the Hobby Horse is part of his kindly, whimsical treatment of human nature? "So long as a man rides his hobby-horse peaceably and quietly along the king's highway, and neither compels you or me to get up behind him—pray, sir, what have either you or I to do with it?" Sterne had to admit that sometimes he took a longer journey on his hobby-horse than "what a wise man would altogether think right." "But the truth is," he added, "I am not a wise man." Yet, as he rode, he saw life in his own way, and left pictures that will endure. He has placed on the great stage, so gloriously crowded with the creations of genius, some characters who have a place of their own, and whom we would not miss. They are not great characters; yet nevertheless we seek them out. We never fail to know them, and they never disappoint us. And Sterne loved them. Be it put to his credit that he went on his knees to My Uncle Toby. There we have Sterne at his best, and it is a good best. W. R. T.

THE SERVILE STATE

HILAIRE BELLOC

BY

THE Editor of EVERYMAN has asked me to put very briefly before his readers the idea which I have attempted to put forward at greater length in my book, "The Servile State," which Messrs. Foulis and Co. have just published at a shilling, and of which a notice has already appeared in his columns. I am very happy to do so, and I think the idea is both of sufficient interest and capable of sufficient defence to make it worthy of attention.

What I have tried to show in that book is that the kind of legislation to which we are growing accustomed in this country under the name of "Social Reform" is making for the re-establishment of compulsory labour to be imposed upon the large majority now in receipt of wages for the benefit of the minority now in possession of land and capital.

A society in which any considerable body of men can thus be compelled to labour by positive law to the advantage of others is a servile society—that is, it is a society containing within itself the institution of slavery; and once you have a society so constructed the production of wealth in that society, and the ideas and laws controlling it, will all turn upon the admitted presence (under whatever name) of slaves. The slavery of the majority contrasted with the freedom of the minority will be the special note of such a condition of affairs; and that is why I have spoken of the State in which that contrast may appear as "The Servile State."

When one puts it baldly thus in a few words the forecast is so novel (and, to most people, so shocking) that it seems to bear very little relation to the world as we now know it. Certainly no one is consciously working for an end of that kind; no one wants to re-establish slavery, nor do I imagine for a moment that when slavery is as a fact re-established it will be called by its old title. My point is that in spite of the immediate intentions of those who propose and carry through these reforms, slavery will come about indirectly as the result of the changes they effect.

In order to see this we must first consider the state of society in which we live, and why all thoughtful men are desirous of changing it.

We live in a state of society in which the means of production (that is, capital and land) belong to a fraction of the free citizens composing that society. The great majority possess no land nor the instruments whereby things necessary to their livelihood can be produced; or at least they do not possess such instruments in any useful amount. Now, such a state of affairs has never been known before in the history of the world, and of its nature it cannot possibly last. It cannot last, because it suffers from two mortal defects:—

First: it leaves a great number of the free citizens in insufficiency, i.e., insufficiently provided with the mere necessities of life; and though this number is a minority, and a minority upon the size of which people will differ according to their definition of "necessaries," yet it is a very large minority—one which has rapidly increased in modern times, and one which threatens to increase further. Secondly: this restriction among free men of the control of the means of production within the hands of a fraction of them leaves the rest suffering from a perpetual insecurity.

They are not sure of their daily bread, and they suffer from a more or less constant anxiety for their future.

It is important to note that these two prime evils of insufficiency and insecurity do not proceed from the single fact that land and capital are owned by a few. That in itself does not necessarily produce insufficiency and insecurity. They proceed from the fact that this possession by a few is combined with the political liberty of all. Those who control the stores of food are free to distribute those stores as they will, in exchange for the labour of those who have no food. The same is true of clothing; and the same is true of housing. At the same time, the dispossessed who need these necessities, and have them not, are free to make any terms they like for obtaining them in exchange for their labour, so they jostle and oust and starve one another in the fight for "employment." It is this condition of freedom in combination with ownership by a few which produces the whole difficulty, and neither the one condition nor the other by itself, but only both together in combination, gave rise to that difficulty.

Now, to put an end to this intolerable strain (which has lasted but a very short time as the life of a nation goes), the chief proposal which has been put forward by theorists is that proposal called Socialism, which means the control of the means of production by the political officers of the community, or, to put it in ordinary language, the politicians. According to this solution, we should all be set to work at producing things necessary to our lives, and those who would set us to work in this fashion would be local or national officials, in whose hands capital and land would be put, to be held in trust for the community. Democratic Socialists would add that these officials should be elected by the people whom they ordered about, and many still seem to hope, in spite of experience, that election would secure some sort of efficient control over such officials by the people!

The theoretical advantages or disadvantages of such a system are of little importance, because, as a matter of fact, there is not the faintest indication of any such arrangement coming into being, and that for the following reason:—

It is evident that before you could get Socialism at work you would have to take away the land and the capital of England from those who now own them. But that is exactly what no one is attempting to do or dreaming of doing. And the reason that no one is attempting to do it or dreaming of doing it is twofold. First: when it comes to a practical experiment men instinctively shrink from the injustice of confiscation. Secondly: it is a great deal harder to destroy a possessing class than it is to regulate the way in which that possessing class shall behave. When the Socialist is put in a position to make a new law or to suggest the drafting of a new regulation to those in power, he never attempts confiscation, because he dare not and cannot. The only thing he does attempt (and that successfully) is to regulate the relations between the possessor—whom he leaves in possession—and the dispossessed—whom he leaves dispossessed.

The Social Reformer is concerned to get rid of insecurity and insufficiency. He could, of course, get rid of them by the catastrophic method of confiscation coupled with public ownership, but as there is another, and far easier, way, he invariably follows the line of least resistance and takes that easier way. That easier way consists in a multitude of small betterments, each tending to reduce the elements of insecurity. But all these small betterments, taken in the lump, converge to re-establish compulsory labour. Thus the Socialistic Reformer, unable to confiscate, thinks it a fine thing to establish a minimum wage. But when that is done, those who are economically unable to earn the minimum wage, and are yet not allowed to compete in the labour market, must be kept alive somehow; hence the "labour colony" and the Minority Report.

The same reformer will prevent industrial disorganisation by making arbitration compulsory; but a verdict rendered after a compulsory arbitration is a verdict imposing compulsory labour.

He will arrange that proletarian insecurity due to sickness shall be cancelled by a system of insurance; but that system he will connect with a poll-tax on the workers, and he will put into the hands of the capitalist class the collection of the poll-tax; and he will make registration compulsory on the poor.

He will maintain a poor man during unemployment, but only under condition that he shall compulsorily accept—under penalty of a fine or worse—"employment" (that is, work to the advantage of the capitalist class) when it is offered to him.

It is impossible within the very short space of such an article as this to do more than sketch in the briefest manner the line of argument I have developed in my book; nor is it even possible in such a short space to put even that bare outline in simple terms and in logical sequence. In general, let me say, my thesis is that there are but three solutions for the present unstable and manifestly moribund organisation of industry. Those three solutions are:—

(1) A return to well divided ownership (which has nothing whatever to do with the idea of petty industry, peasant proprietorship, the small workshop, or any other form of disassociated capital). That is what we used to have and might have again—most men owning capital and land.

(2) The putting of the means of production into the hands of public officials, who shall distribute the produce so that all are secure and maintained. That is Socialism. Or

(3) The re-establishment of compulsory labour, which shall leave the possessors in the enjoyment of rent and interest and profit, and shall leave the dispossessed as dispossessed as ever, but shall have the effect of obtaining a regular and sufficient supply of necessaries for the dispossessed. That is the Servile State.

I may add that a great part of my thesis in my book, "The Servile State," is given up to the historical side of the subject. Slavery was the accepted basis of industry for countless generations among men of our race. It disappeared but very slowly and, as it were, unconsciously, in a process lasting nearly a thousand years. It disappeared under the influence of the Christian Church. It would seem to me to be a fair probability (though, of course, not a logical conclusion) that with the recession of the Christian Church the institution of slavery should return.

Finally, I show in this book that the most powerful instrument working in favour of that return of slavery is the idea the modern British industrial proletariat now have that it would be better off under a system of compulsory but regularised labour than it is under the present conditions of freedom without food.

THE COMMONS IN DURESS

THE High Court of Parliament lies under duress. Laden with an unwonted burden of legislation, and flouted in these latter days by an ungovernable Opposition, it cries out for relief. The tyranny of party-spirit has bereft it of nearly every opportunity of independent decision, and has laid the heavy shackles of obedience to the party Whips, on both sides, upon all but the most resolute of private members; and recent events have revealed the impotence of the House of Commons to suppress organised disorder, and the still more astonishing impotence to correct a mistaken decision. We are not for the moment concerned with the political merits of the question at issue; but we are concerned with the prestige of the House of Commons, which is the vital question obscured by the dust and heat of the struggle.

From the scandalous incident of November 7th two salient points emerge. First, there is no machinery in the rules of the House by which any decision can be reversed in any one session. The plain man will say at once: "If there isn't, there ought to be; and the sooner the House provides itself with something of the kind the better for all concerned." The plain man is right, and to those who plead that the present procedure is the accumulated wisdom of British Parliamentarians from early times till now, we must reply, "The procedure was made for the House, not the House for the procedure; and when old ways lead to trouble, better ways must be found. Parliament must not be ruled by the 'dead hand.'" Second, under present rules the House is powerless against organised disorder. The Speaker can, indeed, suspend individual members who resort to riot; but when a group or, a fortiori, a whole party creates a kind of orderly pandemonium by chanting the refrain of "Adjourn! Divide! Adjourn! Divide!", loud enough to drown a speaker's voice, it is, strange to say, acting within the rules of order. In these circumstances the only course open to the Speaker is to adjourn the House; and, provided the disorderly group is prepared to pursue the same tactics day in, day out, there is no remedy, and the House is destroyed. Such methods call for drastic measures to safeguard the dignity, nay, the very existence, of Parliament.

Party spirit and the rigidity of the party system have created another evil, insidious and growing, which is undermining the prestige of the House of Commons. The source of the trouble is the otherwise happy interdependence of the executive and legislative powers of the constitution. The executive government holds office by consent of the majority in Parliament; but there has grown in recent years a vicious habit in governments of making all questions that arise in the House tests of party loyalty, till by the sheer force of unchallenged precedent a vote for some minor change in a Bill has become a vote for the downfall of the Government. This brings serious results in its train; it makes the process of legislating farcical; it silences the private members, and it fosters arrogance in the King's Ministers. - Thus the need of the House is freedom from party pressure; and if the life of the executive were made independent of minor defeats of its policy in the legislature, that freedom would be obtained. To obtain it is the first duty of the modern parliamentarian, for it would restore Parliament to its high place in the respect of the nation by proving the old but forgotten truth that the House of Commons is greater than the greatest Government.

THE GARDEN OF OLIVIA'S HOUSE.

“TWELFTH NIGHT” AT THE SAVOY THEATRE *

To find Shakespeare played on the stage with some respect for its literary quality, with some touch of imagination in its interpretation, and with a freedom from eighteenth-century stage traditions, is to find almost a new thing. Apart from the work of Mr. F. R. Benson and his company, and the courageous labours of Mr. William Poel, we have been without anything more than a mutilated and actor-managed poet, whose name has been borrowed to cover all manner of extravagances, which have done bad service both to poetry and the theatre itself. It is, therefore, with a delight that is nearly without measure that one comes to write about Mr. Barker's fine production of “Twelfth Night” at the Savoy Theatre. That production is, one is impelled to say, almost everything that a Shakespearean production should be. It is faithful to the text—a great and rare virtue; it has all that atmosphere of high romance which belongs so unmistakably to all his works, and to this play in particular; its playing is true to character, and in its colour, speech and movement it is replete with beauty. I have never seen a production which so admirably endorses the conviction that Shakespeare's rightful place is the stage. The play must appeal to all who have a taste for the theatre, because it is so excellent a piece of proper theatrical art, and it must inevitably draw to it the many lovers of Shakespeare who look for his works to be interpreted with vision. Mr. Granville Barker has done much valuable work, especially in connection with the modern drama; he did a great thing in his “Winter's Tale,” but he has done a greater thing in his latest production, which, one feels confident, will, among other things, be a popular success.

“Twelfth Night” is, indeed, among the most popular of plays, and Hazlitt lit upon the reason when he objected that it was too good-natured for comedy. It is this very good-nature that makes it so much to the liking of the majority of men. We can all appreciate, in varying measure, the wonder of the verse, as sweet and musical as any words man ever wrote; but where is he to whom its large-hearted gaiety and robust humour is not irresistible? There are no limits to the overflowing joy of the play. It puts us in good conceit with ourselves and our fellows; and it does that not merely because of the cakes and ale of delightful, brave, and drunken Sir Toby, but because it finds an echo in ourselves to the cry of the imprisoned Malvolio, “I think nobly of the soul.” That is the feeling with which we leave the play; not empty after our laughter, not unhappy on account of Malvolio, not disgusted because of its drunken rogues, but with a sense of the nobility which belongs to men, and a new respect for our kind.

In Mr. Barker's production the play loses nothing of its humanity. It is put before us clothed in beauty, the beauty that belongs to the theatre being added to

(Continued on page 206.)

* Recognising the immense possibilities foreshadowed for the theatre by this unique presentation, we wish to associate ourselves with this enthusiastic appreciation.

W. H. GARDNER

"him I love...
More than I love these eyes,
more than my life."

MISS LILLAH McCARTHY AS VIOLA IN "TWELFTH NIGHT"

the beauty that is its own, but no part of the homely wit is neglected. Mr. Barker makes the play live again on his stage; the actors speak with conviction, and there is a vigour and go in the thing that gives new energy to the mind. The value and vitality of the performance owe not a little to the sympathetic acting of Miss Lillah McCarthy. Her Viola brought out the full romance of the part, and made of the character an exquisite and lyrical creation. But the acting of the whole play is done with that excellence we have learned to expect of Mr. Barker's work. Somehow or other he manages to make the most unlikely material fit in with the rest, and he has brought his company to work so well together that we invariably find the right thing done in the right way.

The placing of the people in the scene is done with such skill that we get not merely a series of pictures, but a continuous movement, which is at all times fine to look upon. Every moment is pleasing to the eye, but there are some moments that stand out with peculiar vividness. Orsino and his court listening to the clown's song is one of them; Viola speaking of the Duke's love to Olivia is another; and, above all, the last scene before the great gates, when all the persons of the play meet, and the riot of colour and the rapid movement make a great and worthy close to the piece.

In securing the co-operation of Mr. Norman Wilkinson, Mr. Barker brings to his stage a man who has genuine gifts for the theatre. Not a little of the success of the production is due to the costumes; the daring colour scheme of which only Mr. Wilkinson would have ventured upon, and only so fine an artist as he could have carried out. Mr. Wilkinson's costumes, in design as well as in colour, are so well conceived and so excellently executed that alone they would make this "Twelfth Night" memorable. The late Renaissance effect of the dresses for Orsino and his court was most happily combined with the Elizabethan dress of Sir Toby and the unmistakable English characters. The stage decoration employed in place of scenery was not, one is inclined to think, quite so well done as in the case of "The Winter's Tale." The costumes were more satisfactory than Mr. Albert Rothenstein's for the earlier play, but Mr. Wilkinson's decoration has failed somewhat. The main scene, with its white, pink, gold and green, was confusing rather than beautiful, and one found a difficulty in working it out in relation to the play. Mr. Barker calls it, indifferently, the garden, and some part of Olivia's house; but what part of the house or garden it would be hard to say. The flat white of the scene is by no means an aid to the imagination; it is, in fact, rather dull. There are one or two completely good scenes, such as the one in Act II., when Sir Toby and Sir Andrew sit up until "'tis too late to go to bed," and the scenes in the Duke's palace; but these scenes had, so it seems to me, nothing in common in their treatment with the rest of the decoration. The truth of the matter is, as no doubt Mr. Barker and Mr. Wilkinson will tell us, we want a new theatre. The existing theatre, with its audience partly below the level of the stage, partly at the side of it, and partly right over it, is unsuitable for this new art; it is, indeed, unsuitable for the conventional stage, with its picture-frame proscenium, but for the purposes of the stage decoration Mr. Barker is introducing it is hopelessly bad. We must remember this in criticising these productions, for the difficulties with which the artists have to contend are innumerable. To the extent that Mr. Barker has got away from the flat painted scenes and the imitation of what is superficial in nature, we have reason to thank him; but one wonders whether his two wooden trees which occupy so much of the stage are not as much devoid of that mystery which belongs to the theatre as real trees or realistic painting.

But let us have done with criticism. I had rather praise the production for all I am worth than utter a word of criticism which would make one reader think that what is faulty in this "Twelfth Night" is not better than the best things any other man has done. The men who have been at work on it are so full of ideas that everything they do is interesting. Their boldness, their sincerity, and their fine equipment for their work are resulting in the re-creation of the theatre, so that once again we shall see it take a high place among the arts. The theatre has been too long a possession of the mediocre and the unimaginative; it has been too long a means of exploiting the bad taste of the public; it is for us to encourage the men now at work who will bring it into honour by bringing it back to simplicity, to truth, and to beauty. The poetic drama is the means by which this will be done, and the greatest of the poets will lead the way.

C. B. PURDOM.

STROPHE

GRAF ADOLF FRIEDRICH VON SCHACK (1815-1894)

(Translated from the German by Count Alfred von Bothmer)

WENN du hinweggegangen,
Glaub' ich dich noch zu sehn;
Um die Schläfe und um die Wangen
Deinen Atem fühl' ich mir wehn.

Wenn on deinen Reden
Längst der Ton dem Ohre verklang,
Hört die entzückte Seele jeden
Laut, den du gesprochen, noch lang.

In der Stille der Nächte,
Wenn voll Bengen das Herz mir schlägt,
Fühl' ich, wie leise sich deine rechte
Auf die Stirne, die Brust mir legt.

Arme, die mich weich umranken,
Wiegen mich ein, ich atme kaum;
Deine Worte, deine Gedanken,
Klingen und duften in meinen Traum.

[TRANSLATION.]

WHEN thou art long gone away,
Thou seemst to be still in my sight;
Round my temples and cheeks the play
Of thy breath I feel in the night.

Though the sound of thy voice
Faded long ago in mine ears,
My soul never ceases to rejoice
And the words thou spakest, still hears.

In the silence of the night,
When my heart with fear is opprest,
I feel how thou gently placest thy right
Hand on my forehead and my breast.

In thine arms thou enfoldest me,
Lullst me to rest; almost I seem
To breathe no more: thoughts thou toldest me,
Are the all-present in my dream.

THE FRENCH RENASCENCE * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

NOT many years ago, it was a fashion with superficial journalists and political philistines to speak of the decadence of the French people. Those were the days when our attention was perpetually being called to Sedan and Fashoda, to the crushing defeats and humiliations suffered in war and diplomacy, to the prevalence of religious strife and internal dissensions, to the Panama and Dreyfus scandals, to the decrease of the birth-rate and the increase of crime. It was a foregone conclusion that the doom of the foremost of the Latin races was sealed, and that the immediate future belonged to the Teuton.

I.

As a matter of fact, the immediate future gave the lie to those prophecies. The prophets were entirely misreading the phenomena of French life. They failed to see that it is a good sign, and not a bad sign, when a whole nation is convulsed when there is one miscarriage of justice, as in the case of the Dreyfus affair. They failed to see that it is a good sign, and not a bad sign, when a nation is so truthful that she must always lay bare her evils for all the world to see—as in the case of the Panama scandal. They failed to see that it is a good symptom, and not a bad symptom, when a nation is so passionately interested in religious truth as to be ever ready to fight for it. They failed to see that even civil strife is not necessarily a symptom of disease, but may, on the contrary, be a symptom of health. Only those nations know nothing of civil strife who always submit in passive and servile obedience to despotism.

And therefore what the prophets mistook for French decadence was nothing but a crisis of growth, antecedent to a rejuvenescence and a renaissance of the French people. That crisis of growth might indeed produce a temporary weakening, as every such crisis does, but the French people did emerge from that weakening with that marvellous recuperative power and with that mercurial temperament which has characterised them through history. And, the crisis past, they once more appeared in the van of civilisation, they once more astonished the world by the exuberance of their vitality.

II.

Considering first the material prosperity of contemporary France, even those realists who take wealth as the chief criterion of national greatness must admit that in the abundance of her national resources France is at least the equal of any other Continental nation. There is no other nation which possesses so much accumulated capital. There is little pauperism in the big cities, and outside those cities there is little poverty. Amongst no other Continental people is wealth more evenly distributed than among that nation of peasant proprietors. Paris remains one of the two or three money markets of the world. Most of the great enterprises of modern times, from the Suez and Panama Canals to the Trans-Siberian Railway, have been launched with the assistance of French loans. Even Germany has again and again been compelled to appeal to France to finance her Imperial schemes.

III.

If we pass from the consideration of the material prosperity of France to that of her political power, we find that here also she has been restored to a front place in the councils of Europe. After 1870, France knew a few years of international isolation and of diplomatic impotence. To-day France stands conscious of her strength, and opposes a united front to her enemies. But her patriotism has ceased to be aggressive; it is restrained and dignified. She still remains, even as all the world actually does remain, under the magic spell of Napoleon's personality, but she has ceased to glorify the pomp and circumstance of war. And her political power to-day is asserted as it never was before, in the cause of peaceful progress. England has understood the true significance of French power, and it is because she has understood it that she has entered into an "Entente Cordiale" with her neighbour. English statesmanship realises that France is the key-stone of Continental Europe, that she holds the balance of power, that any serious blow aimed at France would be indirectly aimed at England and at European civilisation, and that if it ever came to a European conflict, the decisive battles of England would have to be fought, not against France, as in the past, but in alliance with France and on French battlefields.

IV.

It has often been found that material prosperity and political power deaden, for the time being, the spiritual activities of a people. This cannot be said of contemporary France, and her spiritual activities reveal no less the vitality of the race than her economic activities.

There are still to be found a few bigots who are fond of repeating that the French are essentially a non-religious people, a frivolous, light-hearted people, a sceptical people. Fifty years ago, Elizabeth Browning gave an answer to that calumny in an inspired passage of "Aurora Leigh":—

"And so I am strong to love this noble France,
This poet of the nations, who dreams on,

. . . . Heroic dreams!
Sublime, to dream so: natural, to wake:
Wake:

. . . .
May God save France."

In those noble lines, Mrs. Browning perceived the deeper truth, and read the French character with the intuition of poetic genius. If religion means essentially a belief in a Divine Purpose of humanity, if it means a belief in lofty ideals, if it means the fervid enthusiasm which sacrifices everything on the altar of those ideals, then there are no more religious people than the French. They are incurable idealists. From the days of Joan of Arc to those of Rousseau, the French have always been a nation of apostles and of propagandists, and they have often shown the intolerance and fanaticism of the true apostle. Most French wars have been wars of religion; they have been crusades for the triumph of a principle. Some of the most decisive political and spiritual revolutions in modern history have their source in French soil. And what is true of the past is true of the present. At least three great contemporary constructive movements are French in origin: that splendid struggle for spiritual freedom within the Roman Catholic Church which goes under the misleading name of "Modernism"; that far-reaching attempt at reconciling science land religion which is miscalled Pragmatism; and that portentous political philosophy of Syndicalism which is rapidly spreading all over Europe. Loisy, the father of "Modernism," Bergson, the father of Pragmatism, Georges Sorel, the father of Syndicalism, are all Frenchmen, and around those pioneers are gathered a host of seekers after the Truth.

V.

Even the most severe critics of French culture have always admitted the supreme quality of the French intellect—its lucidity, its versatility, its ingenuity, and, above all, its intellectual honesty and integrity. It was therefore to be expected that a French revival which revealed itself so strikingly in the province of politics and religion, in an outburst of patriotic fervour and spiritual idealism, should equally assert itself in science, art, and literature.

In theoretical science the French have always retained their prominence. In mathematics, the purest of all the sciences, they can still boast of their traditional supremacy. I need only refer to such names as Poincaré. In the applied sciences, where they have often lagged behind the English, they have been the pioneers in the two new developments which are transforming contemporary life: the motor car and the aeroplane. Both have been from the first pre-eminently French industries. And in this connection we may apply to the French people in a modified form a famous epigram of the poet Heine: whereas the English may claim the supremacy of the sea, whereas the Germans may claim the supremacy of the land—to the French belongs the conquest of the air.

VI.

But it is especially in the province of literature and fine art that the French Renaissance has achieved its most signal triumphs. The French school of painting continues to draw its disciples from all parts of the world. In sculpture, Rodin is a giant towering above his contemporaries in splendid isolation. In literature there may be greater names than those of Anatole France and Maeterlinck, than Romain Rolland and Rostand; but certainly there are no names which are more universal.

VII.

I have just mentioned the poet of "Chantecler." Some critics have wondered at the extraordinary popularity of Rostand's drama. But the reason is an obvious one. "Chantecler" has struck the European imagination because it is the significant symbol of the Gallic genius. "Chantecler" is the bird whose clear song ("le Chant clair") heralds the light of day and the joy of life. Such has been for centuries the mission of France: to herald the dawn, to dispel darkness and reaction, to announce the message of a fuller life, a life more joyous, more bountiful, more beautiful.

And there also lies the real explanation of the universality of the French language. I have travelled in every country of Europe, of Northern Africa, and of the Near East. Everywhere I have found French spoken and read in preference to any other language, and often in preference to the mother-tongue. And the French language is everywhere read and spoken, not because she is more beautiful than other languages. Indeed, I believe that English and German are at least as beautiful as, and they are often much more expressive and much more impressive than, the French language. The French language is universal because the French ideals which the French language proclaims are themselves universal, because they appeal to the whole of civilised humanity, because they partake of the eternal verities.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE POETRY OF JOHN MASEFIELD."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—No one who values poetry will regret the appreciation of John Masefield in your issue of November 23rd, but surely Mr. Gilbert Thomas has allowed his enthusiasm to run away with his memory! Has he forgotten a poem by Tennyson called the "Northern Cobbler," which deals with the conversion of the village drunkard?—for though it may spare us the curses, it does not leave to the imagination many details of his misdeeds. He may also remember two poems by Browning called "Ned Brath" and "Halbert and Hob," which are in the same truly realistic vein, and may well have been voted as "disagreeable" by Mr. Thomas's Victorian Puritans.

Even if the "Cobbler" is somewhat of an exception among the poems of Tennyson, it is enough to show that his art was not a mere drawing-room amusement from which the "dangers of the market-place" were carefully excluded. But the poet who introduced realism into poetry is Robert Browning, and Mr. Thomas will probably remember that the kernel of the "Ring and the Book" is an old, forgotten murder-story, which is treated realistically, if ever there was realism. Nevertheless, the genius of the poet, his sympathy, his tenderness, even for guilt, because it is so often the result of circumstances—all these raise the grim tale into a triumph-song for all mankind.

It is therefore placing John Masefield in a wrong focus when Mr. Thomas belittles Victorian poetry for the purpose of glorifying the subject of his article. And I do not think that Kipling, who, by-the-by, owes much to another, whom, perhaps, Mr. Thomas might class as a Victorian Puritan, namely, Swinburne, would really claim to have discovered the real in art. And yet Swinburne of "Atalanta" and "Tristram" was not a Puritan either. The true facts are that to the earlier poets of the Romantic movement, to Wordsworth, Keats, and Shelley, the market-place was the haunt of all most to be hated in this world. That incidentally they "discovered" the beauty of hills, woodland, and meadow, is, however, worth remembering, Puritans though they may have been. But it is with Browning, and no later, that the world of men and women, the world of the street, the shop, and the market-place found its interpreter.—I am, sir, etc.,

T. M. CHALMERS.

4, Godstone Road, Whyteleafe, Surrey.

"THE OMISSIONS OF NORMAN ANGELL"

(continued)

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It seems to me that Mr. Cecil Chesterton, in his attempt to bring into relief the "omissions" of Mr. Norman Angell, has unconsciously and unwittingly emphasised the line of thought for which the original article served as a venter. Most men—and women too—are agreed that the quarrels of childhood are usually the outcome of the little ones' exaggerated sense of their own importance, and a notion that by a right—seemingly divine—they are entitled to certain playthings which the eye covets, though the hand has never received. Fortunately for their future well-being, the correcting and guiding influence of their parents is exercised, and they have to submit to that superior force, however distasteful the process of doing so may seem at the time. Nations are like children up to a certain point, but the democracies all over the world are beginning to realise that something capable of exercising more restraint than inflated and nationally individualistic armaments is necessary to preserve the peace of the world, and make life the comfortable existence which is, after all, all that the average man in the street may reasonably expect. In a word, common-sense must prevail, and a constitutionally arranged Court of Arbitration must supplant war. I agree with Mr. Cecil Chesterton that if arbitration is to take the place of war, it must be backed by an array of force corresponding to that which makes "a thing called the State" possible. But instead of answering the question—"Are we prepared to arm any International Tribunal with such powers?"—I would submit that the forces which could make arbitration compulsory and possible already exist. All that is needed is organisation and common sense. If right is to be right, as distinct from might—and the democracy may be left to see to that—then arbitration and not the sword is the only logical and sensible form of argument.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. T. NICHOLLS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I sincerely trust that the evident intention of EVERYMAN to present us with both sides of the shield may continue, and even enlarge. Upon the walls of the Rathhaus, in Frankfort, about the middle of the eighteenth century, so Goethe tells us, there could be read the following inscription:—

"Eines Mannes Rede ist keines Mannes Rede: man soll sie billig hören Beede," which may thus be rendered—

"One man's say is no man's say: it behoves we hear both yea and nay."

The need for this wise counsel could nowhere find better exemplification than in the case of the yea and nay of Mr. Norman Angell and Mr. Cecil Chesterton. Let us consider the divergence of opinion which these writers express, and try to discover its reason. Probing the matter with this object in view, shall we not find that the divergence depends upon the kind of warfare waged? Has not Mr. Norman Angell in view the war of aggression, the selfish war, and against this could any better argument be adduced than that which he brings forward: "Ye do an idle thing, seeing that from every material point of view it must work out ruinously for all concerned"? Is not that his thesis; must it not appeal to the selfish man?

But supposing the case to be one of a war of ideas, of principles, such, I take it, as Mr. Chesterton has in view; such, for instance, as the wars of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity of the young French Republic, or the war of emancipation of the German nation from the thralldom of Napoleon. Did the economic appeal in these instances carry weight, or would it, or should it? Can a nation do anything more unselfish, therefore more noble, than stake its material welfare, nay, its very existence, in such a cause? The Swedish nation did this very thing in the wars of Gustavus Adolphus, as in the wars of that wrong-headed, yet heroic king, Charles XII., who, with all his faults, had noble aims and gave his life as freely as he spent the lives of others. Sweden has paid heavily in things material, but the world will always be her debtor for the spiritual force of such examples of devotion.

One word more; surely it was a slip of the pen which, on page 140 in the biographical sketch, wrote: "The heroic wars of the days of chivalry are gone, and gone for ever." We need have no fear on this score; the heroism daily exhibited on aeroplane and submarine tells another tale. All that is needed is a righteous cause, and the flame of heroism will burn as brightly as ever it did in the old days of which we are so justly proud; nay, is it not burning now with undiminished brightness in the Balkans?—I am, sir, etc.,

H. S.

November 17th, 1912.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Angell believes in peace, and loves it, thinks it the only condition under which mankind can progress. I also love peace, but I recognise that war has in the past put nations on a higher road than they were traversing, and will do so again in the future.

Mr. Angell often begs the question at issue. Thus he assumes that a state of war and a state of peace are correctly described by calling them "International Anarchy" and "International Order." These terms are only applicable when there is an authority which can compel obedience. The power need not be wholly material, for mankind is progressing, and conscience is not an empty word; but until all consciences are trustworthy, a Hague Tribunal is a mere advisory committee.

"War can only be justified," writes Mr. Angell, "on the assumption that nations are rival entities with conflicting interests." Now, that is precisely what they are, and what they ought to be—for the sake of mankind in general. Conflicting interests, which lead to competition, are the weapon of providence for the improvement of mankind. Man is an animal, and more than an animal. As an animal, he must strive for command over nature; as more than animal, for command over himself. The latter postulates an absolute altruism, but this is impossible, and would not be advantageous, till the command over nature is complete. A premature assumption of perfect altruism would check man's progress towards the command of nature. Material progress and moral progress are inextricably conjoined, for the following reason.

A nation finds itself in contact with another. Although in some particulars it may be compelled to admire its neighbour, it has naturally a final opinion that its own type of civilisation, its own way of looking at human progress, its own view as to what will produce human happiness, are superior to the type, way, and view of its neighbour. Shall we, then, having this belief, not be traitors to the cause of humanity, if we supinely and flabbily allow the domination in the world of that which we hold to be an inferior type? The tenets of the Sermon on the Mount will not, alone and crudely, lift a community to the top of the communities, for the nation would be wiped out first in the material sphere. Man was an animal first, and the first thing is to be a good animal. And he can quite well be a good animal, as well as being a follower of the Great Preacher.

Lest, even now, I should appear to lay too much stress upon the material side, let me close by suggesting the character of the type that will be eventually predominant. The type cannot be one whose superiority lies solely, or almost solely, in a capacity for material subjugation, for there is no finality, no salutary peace, no satisfying happiness, where there remains an abiding sense of injustice. The presiding type must have in it three great capacities—the capacity of remaining a good animal, however much the intellectual and moral powers may approach perfection; the capacity of an infinite development of the scientific brain; the capacity of a balanced conjunction of justice and mercy, which is what the philosopher-apostle calls "charity."

Mr. Angell again seems to be inconsistent when he allows that a nation attacked must fight, but affirms that peace preparation for war is as prejudicial to human progress as war itself. Lack of preparation it is that brings war and defeat; half an army, or half a navy, is as bad as having none at all. Lack of the military spirit produces nations like the Bengalis of India and the fellaheen of Egypt—essential slaves who can add nothing to the real progress of humanity.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. N. JOHNSTONE,

Lecturer on Military Subjects, University of Edinburgh.

THE WORLD'S DEFENCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The World has still to prove that enfranchised women will neglect those functions of binding, soothing, and the rest it mentions in its Defence. Let it look a little closer—it will find among those women who have such matters most closely at heart the most fervent supporters of the woman's movement. But these fail to see why they should tread an unnecessary long road when there is a short cut—marked "Private," however—which leads to the same goal. That the vote is of value to workers would, I think, be readily acknowledged were it proposed to disenfranchise all working men. The simple claim I make in my poem is that those women who are compelled by force of circumstance to work should have such protection as the vote affords. I do not think this exorbitant.

But I agree that violence, in a cause so essentially based on reason and common sense, is out of place. But the World should not be frightened by a little noise. Let it rather listen to the thousands of quiet voices everywhere which are stating their case with admirable fairness and moderation. I for one will not believe it is so afflicted by such a degree of deafness that its attention can only be attracted by shouting. It has ample opportunity of proving that such is not the case—I am, sir, etc.,

MARGARET SACKVILLE.

Duddingston, Midlothian, November 19th, 1912.

"WESTWARD HO!"

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—A correspondent asks me whether I "deny that Loyola taught his followers not to stop at crime to gain the glorious object of reinstating the Holy Catholic Church." Yes, I entirely and emphatically deny it. Can Mr. Griffith produce any evidence whatever to the contrary? Further, he asks me whether I "deny that the Jesuits did commit crimes in accordance with this teaching." Yes, I entirely and emphatically deny it (1) because there is no such teaching; (2) because the question further implies that Jesuits as Jesuits do evil that good may come. And this is flatly in contradiction with defined Catholic (and, therefore, Jesuit) principles. Can Mr. Griffith produce any evidence to the contrary?—I am, sir, etc.,

ROBERT HUGH BENSON.

Edinburgh, November 19th.

FEMINISM IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with amazement Dr. William Barry's "Appeal to the Woman's Movement."

His wholesale condemnation of women writers is both unwarranted and unjustified. Let him first try to purify the literary Augean stables of the sex to which he has the honour of belonging. He quotes Lord Northcliffe's statement that "more than fifty per cent. of the journalists of to-day are women." Can he name one magazine or paper edited by or for women which makes a feature week by week of stories or articles savouring of impropriety, or obscenity, or blasphemy?

It would not be a difficult matter to name more than one paper or magazine edited by and read almost exclusively by men answering to this description—papers which can be bought at any bookstall. I have NEVER come across a woman's paper or magazine which attempted to condone either immorality or irreligion, or which encouraged what Dr. Barry calls "Free Love," or which has contained even a veiled suggestion of impropriety.

So much for papers and magazines. No doubt there are indecent and immoral novels to be obtained at bookstalls, but they (the majority, at any rate) are neither written nor read by women.—I am, sir, etc.,

D. G. FOSTER.

"MOTH AND RUST."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Nathan hopes that the desire to free the soul from attachment to the "things that are seen" is a "transient mood." It is, on the contrary, as old as Christianity, and as permanent; it is to be found in the lives and writings of saints of all ages.

To look for the things eternal and to be detached from things temporal, is to go forward, not backward; while "sailing ahead to the glory of perfect evolution" sounds spirited, but somewhat vague.

Mr. Nathan may, at any rate, remember the summing-up of the Wise Man who had tasted all earthly knowledge, all luxury, all refinement, "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity."—I am, sir, etc.,

DORA OWEN.

November 23rd.

ON "EVERYMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The two letters of protest in last week's issue give me an excellent opportunity of thanking you for EVERYMAN, and I feel sure I am voicing the feelings of all but those who mistake avoidance of controversy for impartiality.

We all know those dreary, frigid debating societies which set out to discuss "everything but Politics and Religion"—whose proceedings tire us and chill all the warmth we enter with; because outside Religion and Politics in their full meaning there is nothing worth discussion. Such societies represent very well the attitude of the self-styled "broad-minded." They know, subconsciously, that the "narrow" mind of the partisan is the thin end of the wedge of reality, which, once it is allowed in, will split their impartiality to atoms.

That fear is represented in the correct tone of polite conversation, and of many high-class literary journals and reviews.

I am deeply thankful to find in EVERYMAN a platform whereon every kind of speaker is allowed perfect freedom of expression. For this is an age for hitting out straight from the shoulder, not for the stroking down of the realities of Life and Death by the velvet paw of a dangerous and artful reticence.—I am, sir, etc.,

ALBERT H. EYRE.

THE STARS. THE STORY OF A PROVENÇAL SHEPHERD

BY ALPHONSE DAUDET

IN the time when I used to mind sheep on the Luberon I remained for weeks together without seeing a single soul, alone in the pastures with my dog Labri and my flock. From time to time the hermit of Mont-de-l'Ure used to pass by to look for herbs and simples, or I might see the blackened face of some charcoal-burner from Piémont; but they were simple people, silent through continual solitude. They had lost their inclination for talk, and knew nothing of what was being discussed in the towns and villages below. So, every fortnight, when I heard on the climbing road the bells of our farm mule which was bringing my fortnightly victuals, and when I saw appearing, little by little above the slope, the lively, eager face of the little farm-boy, or the scarlet head-dress of old Aunt Norade, I was really very happy.

I made them tell me the news of the country down yonder in the valley, about the christenings and weddings; but what interested me above all else was to know what was happening to my master's daughter, our little lady Stéphanette, the prettiest girl for ten leagues around. Without appearing to take too much interest, I made them tell me if she went to many merrymakings or meetings at night, if new lovers were continually coming to her. To those who ask how all these things could concern me—me, a poor mountain shepherd—I shall reply that I was twenty, and that Stéphanette was the prettiest creature I had ever seen in my life.

Now, one Sunday, when I was waiting for my fortnight's victuals, it happened that they did not come till very late.

In the morning I said to myself, "It is because of High Mass." Then, towards noon, a great storm broke, and it occurred to me that the mule had not been able to set out because of the bad state of the roads. At last, when it was past three o'clock, the sky cleared, the raindrops on the mountains glistened in the sunshine, and, above the dripping from the leaves and the overflowing of the swollen streams, I heard the bells of the mule, as gay and as blithe as a great peal on Easter Day! But it was not the little farm-boy who rode her, nor old Aunt Norade. It was—guess who!—our mistress, comrades, our little lady Stéphanette, seated between the wicker panniers, and flushed with the mountain air and the freshness which had followed the storm.

The boy was ill; Aunt Norade on holiday with her little ones. Beautiful Stéphanette told me all this as she got down from her mule, also that she had arrived late because she had lost her way; but, judging by her fine clothes, her flowered ribbons, her gay skirt, and her laces, she had more the appearance of being late for some dance than of having lost her way in the thicket. Oh, the dainty creature! My eyes would never cease looking at her. You see I had never seen her so near to me.

Sometimes in winter, when the flocks had gone down into the plain and I returned to the farm for supper in the evenings, she used to cross the room quickly, hardly speaking to the servants, always dressed prettily, and always a little proud. . . . And now there she was before me, come here for my sake alone; was it not enough to make me lose my head?

When she had taken the food out of the basket, Stéphanette began to look inquisitively around her.

Lifting up a little her beautiful Sunday skirt, which might have been soiled, she went into the hut, and wanted to see the corner where I slept, the straw pallet with the sheepskin, my large cloak hung up on the wall, my crook and my flint-lock. All this amused her greatly.

"Then you live here, poor shepherd? How tired you must be always living alone! What do you do? What do you think about?"

I should dearly have liked to reply, "About you, mistress," and I should have told no lie; but my embarrassment was so great that I could not find a word to say. I quite believe she saw it, and that the mischievous creature took pleasure in making me more uncomfortable with her jests.

"Your fair friend, shepherd, does she ever climb up to see you? She must surely be the Golden Goat, or that fairy Estérelle who runs to the peaks of the mountains. . . ."

And she herself, as she spoke to me, had quite the appearance of fairy Estérelle, with her merry laugh and her head thrown back, as she hurried to set out again, and make her visit seem like a fleeting vision.

"Adieu, shepherd."

"Good-bye, mistress."

There she was, going away and carrying her empty baskets.

When she had disappeared down the slope it seemed to me that the pebbles rolling under the feet of her mule were falling on my heart, one by one. I heard them for a long, long time, and till sunset I remained as though asleep, never daring to stir for fear of sending away my dream.

Towards night, when the depths of the valleys began to grow blue, and when the sheep huddled together, bleating to go back to the fold, I heard someone calling me from below, and I saw our lady coming—no longer laughing, as she was a short time ago, but trembling with fear and cold, and shivering in her wet garments.

It appeared that at the foot of the hill she had found the Sorgne swollen by the storm, and, wishing to get across by any means whatever, she had almost been drowned. The terrible thing was that at this time of night it was impossible to return to the farm; our little lady would not be able to find the way by herself at the cross-roads, and I could not leave my flock.

This idea of passing the night on the mountain troubled her greatly, chiefly because her friends would be anxious. As for me, I reassured her as well as I could.

"In July the nights are short, mistress. It is only unpleasant for a short time."

And I quickly lit a large fire to dry her feet and her dress, which were soaked with the water of the Sorgne. Then I put before her some milk and small cheeses; but the poor girl did not care either to warm herself or to eat anything, and when I saw great tears in her eyes, I, too, could have wept in pity for her.

Meanwhile the night had quite fallen. On the crest of the mountains only a glimmer of daylight remained, and there was a faint sunlit haze in the west. I asked our little lady if she would go to sleep in the hut. Having stretched over the fresh straw a fine new sheep; skin, I wished her good-night and went to sit down outside the door. God is my witness that, in spite of the fire of love which was burning within me, not a single wicked thought came to me; nothing but the great pride of knowing that in a corner of the hut, quite near the inquisitive sheep which were gazing at her as she slept, lay my master's daughter—like a sheep whiter and more precious than all the others, there she was sleeping, confided to my care. The heavens had never seemed so profound and beautiful to me, nor the stars so brilliant. . . .

All at once the lattice opened and the beautiful Stéphanette appeared. She could not sleep. The sheep rustled the straw as they moved about, or bleated in their dreams. She preferred to draw near to the fire. Seeing this, I threw my goatskin over her shoulders, made the fire burn up brightly, and we remained seated near each other without speaking.

If you have ever passed the night in the open air, under the beautiful stars, you will know that when we are sleeping a mysterious world wakes up in the solitude and the silence. It is then that the streams sing their clearest and the ponds are lit up like tiny flames. All the spirits of the mountain come and go freely; and in the air there are rustlings, imperceptible sounds, as if one might hear the branches growing and the grasses pushing their way through the soil. In the daytime beings live; but the night—that is the lifetime of things. When one is not used to it, it terrifies. Therefore our little lady was shivering and huddled against me at the least sound. Once, a long, melancholy cry rose, trembling towards us from the pond which was gleaming down below. At the same time a beautiful shooting-star flashed above our heads in the same direction, as if this cry we had just heard was carrying a light with it.

"What is that?" whispered Stéphanette.

"A soul going into Paradise, mistress," and I made the sign of the cross.

She did the same, and remained looking upwards, with her head thrown back. She was thinking deeply. Then she said to me:

"Is it true, then, that you are wizards, you others?"

"Oh, no, little lady. But here we live very near the stars, and we know what happens there better than those who live in the plains."

She was looking above her all the time, with her head leaning on her hand, covered with the sheepskin, like a little shepherdess of the heavens.

"What numbers there are of them! How beautiful it is! I have never seen so many before. Do you know their names, shepherd?"

"Oh, yes, mistress. See! Just above us is the Road of St. James (the Milky Way). It stretches from France and right over Spain. St. James of Galicia traced it to show the way to the brave Charlemagne when he was making war upon the Saracens. Yonder you can see the Chariot of Souls (the Great Bear), with its four bright axles. The three stars which go before are the Three Oxen, and that tiny one against the third is the Charioteer. Do you see that rain of stars falling around us? Those are the souls which the good God will not have with Him.

"A little lower down is the Rake or the Three Kings (Orion). We use that for our clock—we others. I have only to glance at it, and I know at once that it is past midnight. A little lower still, towards the south, flames John of Milan, that great firebrand (Sirius). Shepherds have a tale about that star.

"It appears that one night, John of Milan, with the Three Kings and the Little Chicken-herd (Pleiades), were invited to the wedding of one of their star-friends. The Little Chicken-herd, in a great hurry, they say, was the first to set out, and she took the high road. The Three Kings ran across and overtook her; but that lazy fellow, John of Milan, who had slept too late, remained quite behind, and he was in such a great rage that he threw his club at them to stop them. That is why the Three Kings are also called 'John of Milan's Club.' But the most beautiful of all the stars, mistress, belongs to us. It is the Star of the Shepherds, which lights up for us when dawn comes and we go out with the flocks, and also in the evening when we bring them back again. We call it Maguelonne, the beautiful Maguelonne, who ran after Peter of Provence (Saturn), and has been married to him throughout these seven years."

"What! shepherd, are there star weddings?"

"Oh, yes, mistress!"

And as I was trying to explain to her what these weddings were, I felt something sweet and delicate resting lightly on my shoulder. It was her head, grown heavy with sleep, which was leaning against me with a delightful rustling of ribbons and fine curling hair.

She remained thus, without moving, till the moment when the stars paled in the sky, effaced by the coming day. I looked at her as she slept, a little troubled in my heart of hearts, but sacredly protected by his clear night, which had given me none but beautiful thoughts. Around us the stars continued their silent journey, gentle as a large flock; and at times I imagined to myself that one of these stars, the finest, the most brilliant, having lost its way, had come to rest on my shoulder and slumbered there.

—Translated by P. Humphry.

THE BEST OF BALZAC

WOMEN, cold, fragile, hard and thin—such women, whose throat shows a form of collar-bone suggestive of the feline race—have souls as colourless as their pale grey or green eyes; to melt them, to vitrify these flints, a thunderbolt is needed.—Béatrix.

In Spring Love flutters his wings under the open sky; in Autumn we dream of those who are no more.—The Lily of the Valley.

The common sense of the masses never deserts them until demagogues stir them up to gain ends of their own; that common sense is based on the verities of social order, and the social order is the same everywhere, in Moscow as in London, in Geneva as in Calcutta.—The Thirteen (The Duchesse de Langeais).

God preserve you from the enervating life without battles, in which the eagle's wings have no room to spread themselves. I envy you; for if you suffer, at least you live.—Lost Illusions.

It suddenly struck him that the possession of power, no matter how enormous, did not bring with it the knowledge how to use it. The sceptre is a plaything for a child, an axe for a Richelieu, and for a Napoleon a lever by which to move the world. Power leaves us just as it finds us; only great natures grow greater by its means.—The Wild Ass's Skin.

It needs as much tact to know when to be silent as when to speak.—Letters of Two Brides.

THE INSECTS' HOMER — HENRI FABRE

BY PROF. J. ARTHUR THOMSON

It is more than fifty years since Darwin quoted Fabre in his "Origin of Species," calling him "that inimitable observer," and the veteran of ninety is with us still, the revered doyen of entomologists. A picturesque and, indeed, unique figure his, commanding our homage—a hermit naturalist to whom the world has not been kind, who has known extreme poverty at both ends of life, who has yet enriched science and literature with great gifts.

I.

The ten volumes of J. H. Fabre's "Souvenirs Entomologiques" lie before us, and we do not know which most to admire, his observations or his style. As regards observations, among entomologists he is second only to Réaumur; as regards style, he is unrivalled. Surely he has deserved better of his age—this naturalist, scholar, and poet—for his life has been all too hard, and it has been with a great price that he has kept his freedom. But we may be quite sure that the veteran, built of the stuff of heroes, would be as contemptuous of our commiseration now as he has been careless of money and reward all his life. And who shall say that he has served God for naught, when he has had more red-letter days in a year than most of us in a lifetime? Who shall say that Fabre has not made a great success of life?

II.

More than four-score years ago we see the little peasant-boy in sabots, shepherding at the poor farm of Rouergue, and cultivating that power of intimate observation which became his genius. The flair must have been born in him—the real entomologist cannot be made—but it developed with the using into an almost uncanny power of vision, not of observation alone, but of interpretative insight. For that is what marks Fabre, his combination of accuracy and sympathy. In his sense of the dignity of facts, in his high standard of precision, in his appreciation of the trivial, he comes, in spite of himself, into fellowship with Darwin. "I scrutinise life," he says; "precise facts alone are worthy of science"; "Voyez d'abord, vous argumenterez après." After every chapter of the "Souvenirs," we exclaim, "What eyes!" We have not yet been able to read Maeterlinck's eulogy of Fabre, but we hear that the naturalist-poet calls the poet-naturalist "the insects' Homer." We should like to add, in all seriousness, that he is also the insects' Sherlock Holmes! But there is another side to it, that, partly as a gift from the gods (through the vehicle of inheritance), and partly as the reward of "la patience suivie," Fabre has got intellectually nearer to insects than anyone else. It is easy enough to read the man into the beast, but that is not comparative psychology; to catch the insect's point of view is the triumph. As M. Marquet well says, in a fine article, Fabre's work shows "instinct pursuing instinct," which Bergson has shown us to be the way into the citadel of life.

III.

Settling down on a little desert corner near Orange, in the lower Rhone, Fabre gave himself up to the precise study of insect behaviour. The "Souvenirs" form the record of the revelations which the seer has had in his Patmos. In the main, they deal with the higher physiology and comparative psychology of insects and spiders and other small deer. Of course, there is plenty of anatomy too, for Fabre is not one of those easy-going observers whose animals have sawdust stuffing instead of genuine insides, but he studies structure simply as a means to an end. He has named his new species like the rest of us, for every naturalist enjoys his turn of Edenic nomenclatorial experience; he has made discoveries in embryology, see his extraordinary story of the development of oil-beetles; and he has not been afraid in his day to tackle physiological problems like those of digestive juices and poisonous viruses in insects, but he is to be thought of as pre-eminently the student of animal behaviour. In that dry wilderness at Orange he has been watching all these years an inexhaustible well of wonder, of what we may call dramatic wonder. For when Fabre takes us into his open-air laboratory, and shows us the vie intime of creatures that creep about in waste places—which he loves with more than a passing love—disclosing their every-day tasks, their arts and crafts, their shifts for a living, their triumphs and defeats in the struggle for existence, their courtships and marriages, their domestic and social economy, we feel what is meant by the drama of animal life, and we congratulate ourselves that the drama has found its dramatist. And as we study with Fabre, the impression grows upon us, all the more convincingly that he does not argue about it, that there is more than machinery in life. For, of course, Fabre is a vitalist, affirming that mechanical and physico-chemical formulæ do not suffice for the biological description of the animate world. They apply, but they do not interpret, notably because living creatures are, somehow or other, genuine agents, historic beings trading with Time. In the insect world which he has studied all his life, Fabre sees Instinct looming as a big, underivable fact, which must be taken as given, which cannot be explained in terms of electricity or anything else. What shall we say of the ringed Calicurgus wasp, which first stings its captured spider near the mouth, thereby paralysing the poison-fangs, and then, safe from being bitten, drives in its poisoned needle with perfect precision at the thinnest part of the spider's cuticle between the fourth pair of legs? Or, looking in another direction, what can we say of the mother of the Halictus bee family, who becomes in her old age the portress of the establishment, shutting the door with her bald head when intrusive strangers arrive, opening it, by drawing aside, when any member of the household appears on the scene?

IV.

Another of the big impressions that we get from Fabre's work is one with which Bergson has in recent years made us familiar, that intelligence and instinct are different in kind rather than in degree. In Sir Ray Lankester's concrete way of putting it, though he will have no dealings with Bergson, the little-brain type of ant and bee is on a quite different evolutionary tack from the big-brain type of dog and man. The little-brain is rich in inborn capacities, ready-made tricks which require no learning, but with a relatively small admixture of intelligence; the big-brain is relatively poor in instincts—a chick reared in an incubator does not distinguish its unseen mother's cluck from any other sound—but is eminently educable. As M. Marquet puts it, the insect's achievements are due to "inborn inspirations"; but the dog puts two and two together, and makes at least perceptual inferences.

The solitary digger wasp, Ammophila, will drag home a caterpillar to the living larder which it accumulates for its young. Its victim must be made inert, and yet not killed. The Ammophila quickly stings the larva in the three nerve-centres of the thorax; it does the same less hurriedly for the abdomen; it then squeezes in the head, producing a paralysis which cannot be recovered from! This ghastly but wonderful manifestation of instinct requires no noviciate, it is perfect from the first, it expresses an irresistible inborn impulsion, at once uninstructed and unteachable. It looks like intelligence, but disturb the routine and the difference becomes at once apparent. To instinct everything within the routine is easy, but the least step outside is difficult. The mason-bee makes a mortar-nest with a lid, through which, at the proper time, the grub cuts its way. Put on a little paper cap in actual contact with the lid, and the grub has no difficulty in cutting through the extra layer. But if the covering cap be fixed on a little way above the natural lid, not in contact with it, the grub emerging into the closed interval between the lid it has cut through and the artificial covering cap, can no more, and dies! It could cut its way through with the greatest of ease, but it cannot. For when it emerges through the first lid it has done all its cutting, and it cannot repeat it. So, the routine having been disturbed, it dies in its paper prison, for lack of the least glimmer of intelligence. Similarly, when Fabre wickedly joined the front end of a file of procession caterpillars to the hind end, they went on circling round and round the stone curb of a big vase in the garden day after day for a week, covering I forget how many futile metres. As Fabre said: "Ils ne savent rien de rien."

V.

Only in one respect does this Nestor among naturalists disappoint us: he holds Darwinism at arm's length. He does not believe that we can account for the world of life around us by any theory of Nature's sifting of those experiments in creative self-expression which we call variations. "The facts that I observe," he says, "are of such a kind that they force me to dissent from Darwin's theories." His dissent may have its uses in pointing to defects in Darwinism, and, doubtless, Fabre sometimes touches a weak spot, showing how we do Procrustean violence to facts in our desire to make them fit our theory, but we confess that the veteran seems to us to treat Darwinism with prejudice, and without recognising that it is a developing body of doctrine. And he is not merely anti-Darwinian, he is anti-transformist. Variations occur, he admits, but they are quantitative and superficial; they never affect essentials. The vert de gris of ages alters the gloss of the medals, but it does not substitute anything for the original designs—a doctrine that takes us back to Linnæus. We cannot help feeling that the deplorable loss of an adherent like Fabre is the fault of a too mechanical evolutionism, which has not made enough of the organismal factor. For Fabre is really akin in spirit to evolutionists like Lamarck, Goethe, Treviranus, Robert Chambers, and Samuel Butler, who never lost sight of the living organism as a creative agent, a striving will, a changeful Proteus. Perhaps his recoil is primarily from the mechanistic, and only secondarily from the evolutionist way of looking at animate nature. In any case, there are many thoroughgoing evolutionists who would agree with Fabre when he says: "The more I observe, the more this Intelligence shines out behind the mystery of things—a sovereign order controlling matter." We salute our venerable dean with the profoundest respect.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE CHURCHES?

By W. FORBES GRAY.

PART I.

I.

IN this article I propose to discuss as calmly and dispassionately as I can the main causes of the alienation of large masses of the British people from all forms of religious communion. Non-church-going is certainly no new problem, though many people argue about it as if it were. The neglect of public worship has been a thorn in the flesh of those concerned in the religious welfare of our country for many years; but I am convinced from close and lengthened observation of the situation in large centres of population that the problem has become acute, and that the churches, if they are to be true to their high vocation, must, without delay, grapple with it in a manner which will leave no doubt as to the result.

And yet the optimist will tell us that the neglect of sacred ordinances is greatly exaggerated, and that, looking to the growth of the population, non-church-going is no worse than it used to be. Why, even the Rev. R. J. Campbell, who knows the religious conditions of England as few know them, is constrained to admit that "Nearly seventy-five per cent. of the adult population remains permanently out of touch with organised religion. Broadly speaking, it is true that only a section of the middle class ever attends church at all: the workers, as a body, absent themselves; the professional and upper classes do the same."—"Christianity and the Social Order," p. 1.

This is a grave indictment, but its substantial accuracy will not be impugned by those who have closely and honestly inquired into the conditions as they actually present themselves in thickly populated areas, and have tried, without ecclesiastical bias, to arrive at definite conclusions regarding them. But if further testimony were needed to show that the people are forsaking the churches, I would call attention to the remarkable fact that nearly every denomination in the country is lamenting the shrinkage of its membership. Differences of opinion may exist as to the causes, but there is general agreement as to the fact.

II.

But while maintaining that non-church-going has of late years assumed formidable proportions, I am far from saying that the people have become hostile to religion. It is true as ever that, as Burke said, "Man is by his constitution a religious animal." But it must be borne in mind that church-going is not necessarily symptomatic of the growth of religious feeling. I should say that on the whole there is more respect for Christianity among all classes than there was two generations ago. That attitude of unrelenting antagonism to the religion of Christ which Bradlaugh and others did so much to popularise in mid-Victorian days has largely, if not wholly, disappeared. The normal attitude of the non-church-goer of to-day is not one of hostility, but of benevolent neutrality.

Among the upper class there are many reasons for the widespread indifference to public worship; but, unquestionably, important contributory causes are the thousand and one distractions of modern life, the growth of the materialistic spirit, and intellectual difficulties.

I shall deal with the last point first. It cannot be denied that many men of cultivated intelligence—men who are imbued with the scientific and philosophic

(Continued on page 216.)

WRITTEN IN A LIBRARY.

"No furniture is so charming as books."

—Sydney Smith.

A GREAT REVIEW.

I hope that a good number of the readers of these pages are familiar with "The English Review." When it was half-a-crown a month I thought it a fine magazine, but now that it is a shilling I think it wonderful. Mr. Austin Harrison said there would be no reduction in the quantity—only in price—and he has kept his word, though I know that some people can hardly believe their senses. They think that coming down in price must mean coming down in quality. As a rule it does, no doubt; but there are few rules without exceptions, and this is one of the exceptions. The high literary tone is well maintained. There is always at least one contribution which is alone worth a shilling to read. Last month Mr. John Masefield had in it a poem of more than fifty pages—the third long poem from his pen in the same place of late. Two of them have since appeared in book form at several shillings each. Now those who have them in the magazine have real first editions for a shilling each. I shall take mine out of the covers of the magazine, have them bound together, and if they won't look quite as nice as the separate volumes, they will do very well for me. This month there are poems by Richard Middleton (of whom an excellent portrait was given in the June 'Review'), T. Sturge Moore, Geoffery Cookson and Ernest Rhys. Arthur Symonds, Lascelles Abercrombie and other of our greatest poets have been seen at their best in recent issues. Mr. Henry Newbolt has been writing illuminating essays on English poetry, and the current number has the first of a series of Mons. Fabre's remarkable insect stories. Mr. P. P. Howe ingeniously applies the Malthus theory to the publishing trade, arguing that no more books ought to be born than the country can support. "Every year there are published ten thousand books, mostly ordinary," he says, "fifteen hundred being novels, whereas three hundred would be ample." But we can never get rid of the superfluous book until we get rid of the superfluous author, and Mr. Howe does not tell us how to do it. He merely says what ought to be, and hopes that the publishers will recognise the position.

The Bristol Times,

16th November, 1912.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

ONE SHILLING.

Annual Subscription 12/6, post free to all parts of the World.

Send a postcard for a most interesting Prospectus.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW, 17-21, Tavistock Street,
Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE TYPEWRITER FOR THE HOME AND THE TRAVELLER

A WEEK'S FREE TRIAL AT YOUR OWN HOME.

TRY to think of a bright, strong, and compact little machine weighing but 5 lbs., and you may be able to form an idea of the new and wonderful aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter, which is carried in its handsome leather case, with compartments for stationery, by many when travelling, and found in the boudoir or library of thousands of homes.

When one considers that the ordinary Typewriter weighs about 30 lbs., one marvels at the lightness, compactness, and durability of the 'Blick,' which, for clear, rapid, visible, and perfect writing, stands without a rival, even when classed with other Typewriters that cost twice or thrice as much.

But the convenience of its portability is one of its strongest points; and that is why war correspondents, journalists, military men, commercial travellers, and many others have so readily adopted the 'Blick.' Then, in the boudoir or library the 'Blick,' which is always bright and ready for use, is to many indispensable.

You can write on the 'Blick' in any language, including Hindustani, Hebrew, etc., and in any style or size of type. Moreover, you can use any of the various types on the same machine, changing in an instant from one to the other.

The mastery of the 'Blick' can be accomplished in an hour. Only a little practice, and you will be able to write with the speed of an expert.

For a week's free trial at your home write to the address given below, and a new aluminium 'Blick' will be sent by return.

If you do not care to keep the machine after the free seven days' trial, you can return it, and you will be under no obligation whatever. The company undertakes to pay cost of carriage both ways to any part of the U.K., accepting all risk of damage in transit.

AS A CHRISTMAS PRESENT THE ALUMINIUM 'BLICK' IS AN IDEAL GIFT.

An illustrated booklet (No. 10) will be sent post free on application to the 'Blick' Co., Ltd., 9 & 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or to the West-end Branch, 369, Oxford Street, London.

temper of the age—find much of the preaching of the present day unsatisfying. The disciplined intellect is in open revolt against the dogmas of traditional theology. The man of culture asks that Christianity be interpreted in the light of advancing knowledge, that it be related to the movements of modern thought, to the ideas which are dominating and controlling the lives of the educated classes to-day. Accordingly, the preacher of the twentieth century who would harness the forces of progress and enlightenment in the interests of religion must grapple with the intellectual aspects of belief. It cannot be urged too strongly that the problem of non-church-going as regards laymen who take the trouble to think is, to a considerable extent, bound up with the question of pulpit efficiency. They are ready, and, in many cases, anxious, to listen to sermons, but they must be good sermons. Frankly, there are sermons being delivered every Sunday from Anglican and Nonconformist pulpits which in point of matter and style would not pass muster in a young men's debating society—crude, vapid productions providing stimulus neither for the soul nor for the mind.

III.

Manifestly, if the Christian pulpit is to retain its influence with a large number of educated laymen, it must be occupied by men who are not only endowed with spiritual gifts, but who are conversant with the intellectual currents of the age. And a higher standard of pulpit attainment can only be brought about by broadening and deepening the teaching of the theological colleges. At present, the curriculum obtaining in most seminaries is conceived on lines much too narrow. Evangelical religion in the future must flow in broader and deeper channels. It must be endowed with more vision, more variety, more intelligence, more virility; it must take cognisance of something more than the expansive energies of the soul. With a higher standard of intellectual efficiency and honesty in the pulpit, one important cause of non-church-going among the cultured class would be materially lessened.

But it would be a mistake to suppose that the educated and well-to-do classes are being estranged from the Churches solely on the ground that the average modern preacher takes so little pains to allay their doubts. There is a far more potent cause of non-church-going. It is indisputable that materialism is doing more to keep the upper class apart from organised religion than anything else. Luxury, indolence, an inordinate love of engrossing pursuits and pleasures have, to a large extent, robbed such people of spiritual understanding. Consequently, they have developed a positive aversion for worship, both public and private. How to rouse the wealthy and leisured man from his religious apathy is one of the hardest problems confronting the churches. The task of Christianising the West End presents far more formidable obstacles than that of Christianising the East End.

IV.

Thus far, I have dealt with non-church-going as it affects the upper class. It is when we come to consider the situation among the industrial population that the far-reaching significance of this problem is fully realised. Not that the working classes are worse offenders than those higher in the social scale. On the contrary, I believe that in the matter of church attendance, their record, proportionately, is decidedly better. But the mere fact that they constitute, roughly speaking, three-quarters of the population, serves to give greater prominence to the problem in relation to them.

No one who has intimate knowledge of the religious conditions of our large cities can doubt that the bulk of the working classes is permanently alienated from organised Christianity. The surging tide of democracy is flowing past the churches. In every working-class district there are thousands of families who never attend a place of worship. They may be allured at long intervals into a mission hall, but they never dream of entering a church. Everyone who has inquired closely into this problem, and has honestly faced the actual facts of the situation, is compelled to admit that between the average working man and the churches there is a great gulf fixed. The worker does not go to church for the simple reason that he finds nothing there to interest him. Who is to blame for this? What are the causes of the desertion of the churches by the industrial class?

In the first place, the allegation that working men as a class are irreligious, that the majority have fallen a prey to the seductions of secular Socialism, must be repudiated. Though the workers do not attend church to any considerable extent, it must not be hastily assumed that they are opposed to the teaching of Christ. They are anti-clerical and anti-ecclesiastical, but not anti-Christian.

They differentiate between the Church and the religion of Christ. While evincing deep reverence for the Founder of Christianity, and capable of being stirred by the truths which He taught, they yet refuse to countenance the Church. Stated in its most obvious form, the worker is not opposed to the Christian faith as embodied in the Sermon on the Mount, but to the way in which it is exemplified by the Churches. That the average working man is not anti-Christian is conclusively proved by the remarkable growth of two movements—the Adults' Schools and the P.S.A. Brotherhood. The former, which now comprise fully 100,000 members, are composed entirely of working men, who find the ordinary church service distasteful, but are, nevertheless, mindful of the necessity for cultivating the spiritual side of their natures. The Adult Schools, which have their strongest hold in the Midland counties of England, meet on Sunday mornings between the hours of seven and ten o'clock in premises attached to a day or Sunday school. These institutions are conducted on religious lines, but in a way which appeals directly to the worker.

But an even more remarkable testimony to the fact that the democracy is attempting to develop its religious life, apart from ecclesiastical influences, is the rapid progress of the P.S.A. Brotherhood. Like the Adult Schools, the Brotherhoods are composed for the most part of working men, who, whilst adopting no creed, proclaim their belief in "the Universal Brotherhood of Man, based on the idea of the common Fatherhood of God, with all that it involves," and who are bent on making the principles of the Sermon on the Mount operative in every department of human life.

NO. 8 OF "EVERYMAN."

AMONG the important contributions to next week's issue are a brilliant article by Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, in answer to Mr. G. K. Chesterton on "The Collapse of Socialism." Mgr. Benson deals with Eton Education, and Dr. Charles Sarolea writes on "The Ethical Foundations of Patriotism." Mr. H. G. Wells' reply to M. Vandervelde will appear in a forthcoming number, as will Canon Barry's criticism of the modern novel. The interesting discussion as to "What's Wrong with the Churches" will be continued by Mr. W. Forbes Gray.

Select One of These

—you can't be wrong.

You may give a "Swan" to all your friends with the confidence that it will be appreciated and prove itself well worthy of your choice. The "Swan's" artistic beauty, its usefulness, its reliability, and its lasting qualities appeal to everyone — young or old.

FOR A GIFT.—More thought should be given to the pattern of the holder than the point. The salesman is able to select a suitable nib from a sample steel pen or a specimen of the handwriting. Or, select almost any point, say a medium for business men, a broad or J for ladies, fine for book-keepers or shorthand writers —then, if the recipient desires it, the nib will be exchanged either at a personal call, or through the post. This facility of exchange makes a "Swan" Pen a safe gift always.

May we send our Xmas Booklet?

MABIE, TODD & CO.,
79 & 80, High Holborn,
LONDON, W. C.

38, Cheapside, E. C.; 95a, Regent
Street, W.; 3, Exchange Street,
Manchester; 10, Rue Neuve,
Brussels; Brentano's, 37, Ave.
de l'Opera, Paris; and at New York, Chicago, Toronto, and Sydney.

PRICES:

- Safety Pattern - - from 12/6
- Standard Pattern - from 10/6

SOLD BY . . .
STATIONERS AND JEWELLERS. . .

All that a pen
should be!

All that a gift
should be!

"MY HAT!

WHAT A SHINE!"

"NUGGET" is also waterproof and preserves all leathers.

Avoid Substitutes.

PLAYER'S Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.

White Label 4¹/₂ ^{D.} per oz.

50 SCHOLARSHIPS IN FREE LANCE JOURNALISM

For readers of "Everyman."

The Advertisement Writing Scholarships which have been arranged in connection with the Practical Correspondence College for readers of "Everyman" proved so popular that the College has decided to offer a similar Scholarship in connection with their Course of Instruction in Free Lance Journalism Short Story Writing, etc. As with the previous Scholarship no entrance fee is required and readers of "Everyman" are advised to send for full particulars as early as possible.

THANET HOUSE,
STRAND, W.C.

TERMS AT A GLANCE.

Successful candidates will receive the full Course at half the usual fee—the balance to be paid only when student has earned £20 by the disposal of MSS.

The author of "Confessio Medici"—a delightful book full of quiet humour and kindly shrewdness—observes that "there comes a time, even to people who might otherwise be nice, when they find pleasure in writing. They have lived inside their own hearts till they know every stick of the furniture; they desire now, before it is too late, to leave that narrow lodging, to say what they think, and to proclaim what they have learned." It is a feeling which most of us have experienced; we get an attack of cacoethes scribendi, we feel the need of a larger expression than everyday intercourse affords.

DO NOT HESITATE.

But too many of us hesitate; we conjure up visions of bitter struggling against disappointment and discouragement.

"Our doubts are traitors
And make us lose the good we oft might win
By fearing to attempt."

Yet there is ample opportunity for the man or woman who has the knack of seeing the interesting side of everyday events. There is immense scope for free-lance journalism—whether taken up as a spare-time occupation or as the sole means of earning a livelihood.

JOURNALISM CAN BE LEARNT.

Journalism can be learnt as easily as any trade or profession—more easily, in fact, than most. There are two ways of acquiring knowledge: one is the tedious and usually disheartening school of experience, and the other by specialised training under the guidance of an expert who "knows the ropes." Roger Ascham, the famous Elizabethan scholar and educationist, admirably expressed the point when he wrote: "By experience we find a short way by a long wandering. Learning teacheth more in one year than experience in twenty."

The question naturally arises—How is one to learn? Who undertakes to teach the literary craftsmanship which will enable us to "mount Olympus' hill"? The question is answered in the most practical fashion by the well-known institution, the Practical Correspondence College.

The Journalism Course is under the very able direction of a teacher whose reputation as a successful author and journalist is sufficient guarantee of the efficient and practical nature of the instruction. The College has a fine record of success, and many of its students earn more than the amount of the fees before completing the Course.

THE FORTUNATE FIFTY.

The aim of the Scholarship offer is to secure as students 50 of the most promising readers of EVERYMAN. Full particulars of Scholarship will be furnished on application to the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

JANE AUSTEN

By AUGUSTUS RALLI

I.

THE source of Jane Austen's strength was her happiness. She lived remote from the literary world, happy in the life-companionship of her sister and the society of her immediate kinsfolk. She was friendly, but not intimate, with neighbours, and her letters contain scarcely an allusion to contemporary events. The French Revolution, the ascendancy of Napoleon, the Peninsular War touched her not.

From her firmly established pedestal she looked down impartially upon the world. For this she has been compared to some of the greatest names in literature—to those dwelling on the slopes of that valley in the depth of which men like Cowper and Rousseau have their habitations and expend their strength in craving for what is denied them. She is interested in life rather than herself; and as Shakespeare portrays fools and jesters because of his interest in the pageant of humanity, so she may choose characters of narrow intellect with no wish to see them make sport for the Philistines. There is Lady Bertram, who hears that Fanny Price is to be transferred from her own home to Mansfield Park, and exclaims: "I hope she will not tease my poor pug; I have but just got Julia to leave it alone." There is Mr. Woodhouse, who suggests an alternative to his daughter's match-making plans for Mr. Elton: "If you want to show him any attention, my dear, ask him to come and dine with us some day. That will be a much better thing." There is Harriet Smith, whose sole "mental provision for the evening of life" is "collecting and transcribing all the riddles of every sort that she could meet with."

II.

Although Jane Austen had a philosophy, it is never obtrusive, and so there remains a radical difference between her and all but one of the greater English novelists. The novelist who delineates a character places it in one scale and himself in another. With Dickens, it is the caricaturist who depresses the author's scale; with Thackeray, the satirist; with George Eliot, the philosopher; with Charlotte Brontë, the lyric poet. Only with Scott, and Jane Austen in her later works, is there the perfect balance that existed with Shakespeare. This supreme dramatic faculty may have been fostered by the well-known absence of literary ambition in all three. Jane Austen's enjoyment of life would not have been heightened by the applause of a larger world, and the long-deferred publication of her early books caused her no distress.

III.

The absence of preconceptions made her art a whiter art than that of her fellow-craftsmen, yet there is a message as insistent as Thackeray's to be gleaned from her works. It is that the true character of man is only revealed in his home. And one of the rare allusions to public events in her letters is this: "I am sorry to find that Sir John Moore has a mother living; but though a very heroic son, he might not be a very necessary one to her happiness."

Of all her works, therefore, the most characteristic is "Mansfield Park." "Pride and Prejudice" has the salient merits of the first work of a writer of genius, but its characters are developed too exclusively along the lines of their peculiarities. "Sense and Sensibility," recast from an earlier tale, redeems itself by the excellence of some of its minor characters, such as Lady Middleton and Lucy Steele. In "Northanger Abbey" we have Catherine Morland, "marvellously laid open"—as Lamb said of Othello—in her weakness and unconscious strength. Opposed to her is the disagreeable John Thorpe, to whose character nothing is more damning than the weariness which oppresses Catherine after an hour of his society. "Emma" is unluckily placed to the systematic student of Jane Austen. He approaches it with a lingering homesickness for "Mansfield Park," and its cumulative delights fade before the autumnal beauty of "Persuasion." We read that one of Jane Austen's admirers lacked nothing but the subtle power of touching her heart; and thus it is with "Emma." Did none of the marriages at its close take place, the lot of the principals would not be materially affected.

IV.

"Mansfield Park" embodies the philosophy which Jane Austen had tested by experience. She discriminates her characters according as they are good citizens of the republic of home. Lady Bertram, who thinks nothing can be fatiguing to anyone but herself—her son, who condones his extravagance because he is less in doubt than his friends—succumb to this test; while Edmund is acquitted of priggishness because the standards of the world are not those of the family. But it is Fanny Price who, like a highly sensitised instrument, registers the smallest disturbance in the domestic calm. Nothing in Jane Austen is more finely conceived than Fanny's visit to her own home, where the new characters teach us better to understand the old. And the summit of her art is the beautiful episode of the silver knife which had belonged to the dead child and proved a source of discord between two of the survivors. When Thackeray attempts such scenes as in Amelia's quarrels with her mother, we wish them unwritten, and the reader turns from the book as though he played the eavesdropper.

V.

"Persuasion" was the work of its author's decline, of which now and then a more serious touch reminds us, such as the permanent shock to Louisa Musgrove's nerves from her fall on the cob. There is a thinning of the walls that guard the home, and a glimpse of immeasurable distances beyond. Its unique charm is in the unfolding of the character of Anne Elliot; and while there are many heroines whom the masculine reader falls in love with, he would wish to marry none more than her. To test the progress of Jane Austen's art, let us compare Anne Elliot and Elizabeth Bennet. An unworthy parent is their common heritage; but while it detracts from the charm of Elizabeth, so that she has to win our sympathy in spite of it, we love Anne the more for her "conceited, silly father." Besides direct portraiture, there is the effect of her presence on others. Her sister had married Charles Musgrove, and Louisa Musgrove observes: "We do so wish Charles had married Anne instead— We should all have liked her better." It recalls Shakespeare's device for heightening Juliet's beauty by the speech of Friar Laurence:

"Here comes the lady: O! so light a foot
Will ne'er wear out the everlasting flint."

How far Jane Austen's self was reflected in Anne Elliot is a question it may be pertinent to ask. In her, for the first time, there is a tendency to push the point of the analysis into layers of thought beyond the story. The search for the inner self of a creative writer is ever beset with pitfalls; yet, as in looking-glass land, the critic, sworn to abjure it, detects himself again and again reverting to the attempt.

LETCWORTH SCHOOL.

A co-educational school in the bracing air of the Chilterns, aiming at a thorough, broad-based, and systematic education of pupils, from 6 years upwards, so as to develop to the highest point their powers of usefulness as men and women. Special stress is laid on maintaining healthy conditions as to housing, diet, exercise and sleep; and also to fostering a high standard of personal character and responsibility.

The School is entirely unsectarian.

Extract from Report by the Professor of Education, Sheffield University.

"Boarders and day pupils alike are obviously happy in their work and in their play. The relations between pupils and teachers is intimate and friendly in the highest degree, and the presence of boys and girls in the same classes undoubtedly contributed greatly to the naturalness of the conditions in which they were being educated. . . . An atmosphere of mutual consideration, of common service, reigned everywhere. The admirable way in which small responsibilities were distributed amongst the pupils impressed me most favourably. The school is beautifully situated and well housed, in the midst of grounds admirably adapted for school games. . . . I was impressed by the soundness of the progress made, and above all by the intelligent interest the pupils took in their work."

For prospectus and references, etc., apply to the Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxford),
Letchworth School, Herts. (G.N.R., 1 hour from London.)
N.B.—Entire charge taken of pupils from abroad.

WILLIAM BLAKE

(MYSTIC),

By A. M. BUTTERWORTH,

together with

YOUNG'S NIGHT THOUGHTS

I. and II.

WITH 24 FACSIMILE ILLUSTRATIONS

By WILLIAM BLAKE.

15s. net; post free, 15s. 6d.

Times:—Lovers of Blake may be glad of the reprints of Young, with Blake designs, in a handsome-looking volume.

THE LIVERPOOL BOOKSELLERS CO., LTD., 70, Lord St., LIVERPOOL.

THE LITERARY MONTHLY

A REVIEW OF LIFE AND LETTERS.

From all Newsagents, 2d. (By post, 3d.)

DECEMBER ISSUE NOW READY, containing Causerie and Short Story Writing.

£20 OFFERED FOR SHORT STORIES.

THE LITERARY MONTHLY, 17, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE.

This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued.

General Literature—Art—Science—Nature Study—Books of Reference and Fiction Generally.

All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy.
Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

SECOND-HAND BOOKS

in all branches of literature, many in new condition. Catalogue No. 8 now ready, post free. Any book not in stock sought for and reported free of charge.

BOOKS BOUND to order in any style at low prices.

BOOKS BOUGHT.

HAROLD BROWN, Bookseller, 79a, Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

SCOTLAND'S DEBT TO PROTESTANTISM

AMONG a certain class of writers the view is popular that the results to Scotland of the Reformation have been vastly exaggerated. In their opinion the effect of the Reformation was simply to substitute one form of despotism for another, the despotism of Protestantism for that of Romanism. These writers, moreover, contend that in regard to all that goes by the name of culture, Protestantism tore up by the roots a form of civilisation which under Romanism gave great promise. It is overlooked that the culture of the Reformation period was solely a hothouse product, and had no living roots in the life of the people. The first thing Scotland needed if she was to develop on healthy lines was to become a nation, and this she could not do while she was under the rule of the Roman Catholic Church.

To Protestantism Scotland owes her existence as a nation. Until the Reformation Scotland had no real national existence. She was solely a preserve of the Roman Catholic Church. She was constantly being used in the dynastic and ecclesiastical interest of England and France. When Queen Mary came to Scotland the nobles of the day were engaged in purely political negotiations and intrigues. They were playing England and France against each other; at one time they favoured Protestantism, and at another time Catholicism. Mary aspired to the English throne, and it was felt to be bad diplomacy to estrange the Catholics of England and France. Here we have the explanation of the willingness of the nobles to allow Mary to have Mass performed at Holyrood. Knox, brushing aside dynastic considerations, took his stand on Protestantism, in the interest of which he denounced the performing of the Mass at Holyrood. He saw, what the short-sighted nobles failed to see, that to allow Mass at Holyrood was to side with France against England in favour of Mary's claim to the English throne. Knox, in the interest of patriotism, opposed the papacy, and he was equally ready to oppose Scottish patriotism, so-called, when it involved the toleration of Queen Mary's religion at Holyrood—a toleration which he saw was playing into the hands of France. In his endeavour to make Scotland a Protestant nation, he got little help from the nobles. He appealed to the common people, and in doing so laid the foundation of democracy in Scotland. In the words of Froude: "The Protestantism of Scotland was the creation of the Commons, as in turn the Commons may be said to have been created by Protestantism. There were many young, high-spirited men, belonging to the noblest families in the country, who were amongst the earliest to rally round the reforming preachers; but authority, both in Church and State, set the other way. The congregations who gathered in the fields around Wishart and John Knox were, for the most part, farmers, labourers, artisans, tradesmen, or the smaller gentry, and thus for the first time in Scotland there was created an organisation of men—detached from the lords and from the Church—brave, noble, resolute, daring people, bound together by a sacred cause, unrecognised by the leaders whom they had followed hitherto with undoubted allegiance. That spirit which grew in time to be the ruling power of Scotland—that which formed eventually its laws and its creed, and determined its after fortunes as a nation—had its first germ in these half-formed, wandering congregations. In this it was that the Reformation in Scotland differed from the Reformation in any part of Europe. Elsewhere it found a middle class existing, created already by trade or by other causes. It aroused and elevated them, but it did not materially affect their political condition. In Scotland, the Commons, as an organised body, were simply created by religion. They might love their country; they might be proud of anything which would add lustre to its crown; but if it was to bring back the Pope and popery they would have nothing to do with it, nor would they allow it to be done."

On the political side the Reformation represents the conflict between the absolutism of Rome, and the constitutionalism of Protestantism. Those who confine their attention solely to the religious side of Protestantism overlook the important fact that it was not enough for the Reformers to protest against what they deemed the religious errors of the Roman Church. It was necessary to destroy the idea that Scotland was a preserve of Rome, and should be governed despotically. The only effective way to destroy the Papal claim to rule Scotland was by making the constitution as well as the religion Protestant. In the famous interview of Knox with Mary the absolutism of the Papacy and the constitutionalism of Protestantism came into direct conflict, and in that epoch-making interview Knox proved himself to be not only a religious reformer but a statesman. In Scotland the Reformation was thorough. It meant the creation of a Protestant nation in which Ultramontanism and Erastianism had no part.

Not that Scotland was free from danger at the Reformation. Rome never ceased to intrigue from foreign shores against reformed Scotland to suit his selfish aims. James alternately used Ultramontanism and Erastianism; indeed, not till he ascended the throne of England did he cease angling for Popish influence in his contest with his people in Scotland.

Consideration of space forbids detailed mention of the prolonged conflict of Protestantism in the days of Melville and the Covenanters with the Papacy which, with a perseverance worthy of a nobler cause, sought to bring Scotland back to the ancient faith. With the accession of James VII. began the last great conflict between Protestantism and Romanism, and everyone knows how it ended. With his flight and the accession of William of Orange, Protestantism in Scotland gained a lasting triumph. The Revolution of 1688 definitely transferred Scotland and England to the side of Protestantism, and guaranteed in a sense the liberties of Europe. What Scotland owes to Protestantism is well described in the words of Macaulay: "It cannot be doubted that since the sixteenth century the Protestant nations have made decidedly greater progress than their neighbours. . . . Compare Edinburgh with Florence. Edinburgh has owed less to climate, to soil, and to the fostering care of rulers than any capital, Protestant or Catholic. In all these respects Florence has been singularly happy. Yet whoever knew what Florence and Edinburgh were in a generation preceding the Reformation and what they are now (1840) will acknowledge that some great cause has during the last three centuries operated to raise one part of the European family and to depress the other." A wide view of history confirms the view of Adam Smith: "The Constitution of the Church of Rome may be considered the most formidable combination that was ever formed against the authority and security of civil government, as well as against the liberty, the reason, and happiness of mankind."

Politically, socially, and intellectually, as well as religiously, it is impossible to over-estimate the debt which Scotland owes to Protestantism.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

NEW FOULIS BOOKS

THE RIVER OF LONDON.

By Hilaire Belloc. With 16 Illustrations in colour by John Muirhead, R.B.A., R.S.W. In "The River of London" the author loses none of his distinctive charm of expression, and withal provides the reader with a lightly written history of the Thames, its characteristics, its traditions, and its romance. Cr. 8vo, 204 pp. Buckram, 5s. net.

THE R. L. STEVENSON ORIGINALS

By E. B. Simpson,

With four Illustrations in colour and twenty-six in colotype. Ex. cr. 8vo, 263 pages. Buckram, 6s. net.

THE DICKENS ORIGINALS

By Edwin Fugh.

With thirty mounted Illustrations in colotype. Extra crown 8vo, 340 pages. Buckram, 6s. net. Traces the originals of the characters in the novels of Dickens.

THE ENGLISH CHARACTER

By Spencer Leigh Hushes, M.P. ("Sub-Rosa").

16 Illustrations in colour by Frederick Gardner. Extra crown 8vo, 280 pages. Buckram, 5s. net.

THE SERVILE STATE

By Hilaire Belloc.

Cr. 8vo, 234 pages, Boards, 1s. net. Library Edition in Buckram, 2s. 6d. net. A brilliant and sensational exposition of the trend of modern legislation and ideas towards an imminent state of slavery in England.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS

By Hilda T. Skae.

Author of "The Life of Mary, Queen of Scots." With 16 Illustrations in colour and eight portraits in colotype. Ex. cr. 8vo, 220 pp. Buckram, 5s. net. Velvet Persian, 7s. 6d. net. Uniform Volume, "Prince Charlie," by William Power.

THE SONGS & POEMS OF BURNS

With appreciation of the poet by The Earl of Rosebery, K.T. A new complete Presentation Edition, with fifty-five fine Illustrations in colour. 4to, 700 pages. Buckram, 10s. 6d. net.

POEMS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON

Illustrated in colour by Capt. G. D. Giles. Crown 8vo, 336 pages. Buckram, 5s. net. Velvet Persian, 7s. 6d. net.

T. N. FOULIS, 91, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, LONDON; & AT EDINBURGH.

"PAMPHLETS FOR THE MILLION."

Wonderfully Cheap Productions.

1. WHY I LEFT THE CHURCH. By JOSEPH McCABE. 48 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
2. WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? By Colonel R. G. INGERSOLL. 24 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 3d.
3. CHRISTIANITY'S DEBT TO EARLIER RELIGIONS. By P. VIVIAN. 64 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
4. HOW TO REFORM MANKIND. By Colonel R. G. INGERSOLL. 24 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 3d.
5. MYTH OR HISTORY IN THE OLD TESTAMENT? By SAMUEL LAING. 48 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
6. LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD. By Colonel R. G. INGERSOLL. 48 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
7. THE AGE OF REASON. By THOMAS PAINE. 124 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 2d.
8. LAST WORDS ON EVOLUTION. By Professor HAECKEL. 64 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
9. SCIENCE AND THE PURPOSE OF LIFE. By FRIOTJOF NANSEN (the Famous Explorer). 16 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 3d.
10. THE GHOSTS. By Colonel R. G. INGERSOLL. 32 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 1d.
11. THE PASSING OF HISTORICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. R. ROBERTS. 16 pp. and coloured cover, with Portrait; 3d.

The whole of the above set of Pamphlets (with complete catalogue and copy of "Literary Guide," 16 large pages), post free 1s. 3d.

London: WATTS & CO., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C.

LABOUR LIFE AND LITERATURE

The Memories of Sixty Years.

BY

FREDERICK ROGERS.

These Reminiscences of one who has played a considerable part in the Labour Movements of yesterday and to-day are of absorbing interest. They appear serially in

THE TREASURY

A Magazine for all Sorts and Conditions of Men, beginning with the

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER

Price 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.

SOLD AT ALL BOOKSTALLS.

LONDON:

G. J. PALMER & SONS, 7, PORTUGAL STREET, W.C.

THE THINKERS' LIBRARY

Edited by W. W. LEISENRING, B.A.

Published To-day.

No. 1.—PROTEAN MAN.

IN PREPARATION.—Consciousness and Matter; The Ring of the Return and Birth and Death, by the Editor of The Path. Also The Christian Hinterland, by Dr. K. C. Anderson; and Early Civilisations, by Percy Lund.

These pamphlets are published in order to present in convenient form a condensed statement of the mystic's position with regard to man's evolution and our present life and thought.

Price 3d. net; by post 3½d.

THE PATH PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Can be obtained of Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., and all Newsagents and Booksellers.

We have perfected the Art of Teaching

FOREIGN LANGUAGES BY CORRESPONDENCE

REFORM METHODS. ELASTIC SYSTEM OF TUITION. QUALIFIED TUTORS

Modern Languages, Latin and Greek. Courses for General and Examination Purposes. State exact wants to DIRECTOR (who is a Medallist and double University Honourman), EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN THE STUDY OF ASTROLOGY. By ALAN LEO. Full particulars of these unique lessons on application to Secretary, Lessons Department, "Modern Astrology" Office, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London.

AUTHORS! Accurate typewriting is an essential to your success. My work is reliable and the price low. Write for prices.—Mrs. Armstrong, 43, The Broadway, Stratford, London, E.

NOVELS, Short Stories, Articles, Poems, placed with 176 Publishers and Periodicals, at highest prices. 16-pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

DON'T BUY BOOKS

or anything else on Mental Training until you have read the Free Booklet of the Concentro Co., 46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Concentro Co. will give you expert and exceptional advice such as you can get nowhere else, for they specialise in General Psychology, Experimental Psychology, Physiological Psychology, Abnormal Psychology, and Mental Science in general.

WRITE TO-DAY.

FREE.

A specimen copy of the "ENGLISHWOMAN," a Shilling Monthly Magazine, devoted to furthering the Enfranchisement of Women, will be sent gratis and post free to all applicants during December.

A GIFT

of an Annual Subscription (12/- post free) will make a handsome CHRISTMAS OR :: :: NEW YEAR PRESENT.

Write to
SIDGWICK & JACKSON, Ltd.,
3, Adam Street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MISS AUSTEN, one remembers, adopted the device of interesting readers in her heroines by setting the other characters gossiping about them. In "Those That Dream" (Duckworth and Co., 6s.) the author, Yoi Pawlowska, employs the same strategy, and in the opening chapter we find two women travelling from Rome to Vienna and dissecting the character of one Winsona Marshall, who has left her husband, not because he was unfaithful—"that she could have forgiven"—but because he is small and mean. "Her ideas of morals are appallingly new, but her ideas of honour are decidedly old-fashioned." We are at once interested, and read on to find that Winsona is distinctly original. Her character had in it "a mixture of the Greek joy in living and an Oriental fatalism; she had also much of the Oriental's interest in discussing things of the spirit." Following her breach with her husband come many months of self-analysis, keen but never morbid, in which she discovers her soul, its power and—its limitations. She has left her husband because she has detected him in a mean offence—and in a meaner excuse. The future holds no place for him in her life, but, alas! bound as she is to him, her own future is crossed and overshadowed. A clever and forceful study of a woman, the creation of Winsona is a triumph of contemporary fiction, at whose hands the sex has suffered much. The book closes on the note that "it is good to be loved, it is better to love; but, best of all, it is to stand alone with the wind in your face, the endless plain in front of you, the burning sun over your head, and nothing in your heart but these things—and in your soul a hope that you have kept faith with yourself." A brave picture, and yet one cannot help thinking that the woman who looks down with a smile on the upturned face of her child does not hope or trouble about her soul. For one thing, she has something else to think about. For another, it may be that she realises instinctively that he who would gain his soul must first lose it. Spiritual robustness is not to be won by hypochondriacs, however interesting.

• • •

The spoilt son of a charming widow, and the hero of "A Makeshift Marriage," by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), Oliver Brendon is engaged to Vivien Faulkner, a feather-brained but fair-haired young lady, who, of course, jilts him for an American millionaire. Brendon, in a fit of pique, marries his typist, Astrid Carey. Astrid is genuinely in love with her late employer, and, when she discovers that he has married her from pride and not affection, she decides to leave him and commence life anew. There is something very spirited and pathetic in Mrs. Baillie Reynolds' presentment of the outraged feelings of the girl when the truth is revealed to her. "I trusted him as if he had been God," she says. "In my ignorance I thought there could be but one reason for his asking me to be his wife. I have no money, I have not much in the way of looks—I could not see any reason for his request, other than the one mighty, overpowering one, that he loved me. I did not hold back much. I hardly knew where I was, or what I was doing; I was caught up into heaven, as it were, and all I knew was that if he wanted me he must have me." Oliver's mother, the first shock over, tries to patch up a peace, but in vain. How the dowdy and slighted Astrid develops and becomes a beautiful and blooming, even a clever, woman; how the frivolous rival in her husband's affections, now married to a newspaper proprietor, causes further trouble, is all told to us, interspersed with the narrative of how Astrid

FREE LESSONS IN LATIN, GREEK AND LOGIC

To master the intricacies of Latin, Greek or Logic is to obtain a firmer hold of an essential part of Life. It broadens your outlook, adds to your acumen, strengthens your character. You can take fresh peeps into the ancient classics and refresh your mind. You can learn to speak, to think, and to act.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

If you would master Latin, Greek or Logic we can provide you with a new and perfect simplified system for either. Send at once for Four Lesson Papers Free of either the Latin Simplified, Greek Simplified or Logic Simplified. You will be astonished at the ease of learning.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

becomes secretary to a wholly delightful author who camps out at the seaside. Oliver meanwhile loses his position on the Penman by the sale of that paper to Vivien's husband, and, broken in health and pocket, he is saved by the love and compassion of the woman he has wronged, but whom he learns to worship. If the story is a little obvious, it is crisply written, and the characterisation is excellent.

"While grass grows and water runs"—to quote the young lady in "G. B. S.'s" play—boys will never tire of the romances of R. M. Ballantyne, whose story, "The Lighthouse" (Blackie and Sons, 1s.), has all the qualities that we associate with the author. It is brightly written, packed with incidents, and, best of all, healthy—with the health of boyhood that still delights in stories of smugglers, fights with Excisemen, and of battles at sea being decided by cutlass work. Here is a specimen:

"While he was speaking, the little vessel lay over on her new course, and Ruby steered again past the north side of the rock. He shaved it so close that the Frenchman shouted 'Prenez garde,' and put a pistol to Ruby's ear.

"Do you think I wish to die?' asked Ruby, with a quiet smile. 'Now, captain, I want to point out the course, so as to make you sure of it. Bid one of your men take the wheel, and step up on the bulwarks with me, and I will show you.'

"This was such a natural remark in the circumstances, and, moreover, so naturally expressed, that the Frenchman at once agreed. He ordered a seaman to take the wheel, and then stepped with Ruby upon the bulwarks of the stern of the vessel.

"Now, you see the position of the lighthouse,' said Ruby, 'well, you must steer your course due east after passing it. If you steer to the northward of that, you'll run on the Scotch coast; if you bear away to the southward of it, you'll run a chance, in this state of the tide, of getting wrecked among the Farne Islands; so keep her head due east.'

"Ruby said this very impressively; so much so that the Frenchman looked at him in surprise.

"Why you so particular?' he enquired, with a look of suspicion.

"Because I am going to leave you,' said Ruby, pointing to the Bell Rock, which at that moment was not much more than a hundred yards to leeward. Indeed, it was scarcely so much, for the outlying rock at the northern end, named Johnny Gray, lay close under their lee as the vessel passed. Just then a great wave burst upon it, and, roaring in wild foam over the ledges, poured into the channels and pools on the other side. For one instant Ruby's courage wavered, as he gazed at the flood of boiling foam.

"What you say?' exclaimed the Frenchman, laying his hand on the collar of Ruby's jacket.

"The young sailor started, struck the Frenchman a back-handed blow on the chest, which hurled him violently against the man at the wheel, and, bending down, sprang with a wild shout into the sea."

To read this is to feel a boy again!

Interesting as is the study of a rich Jew, exiled from Russia, that Mr. Paul B. Neuman gives us in "Simon Brandin" (John Murray, 6s.), it would need even more than the author's cleverness to make the story credible. Simon's father and mother were "murdered by the Russian Government for no crime, for no fault, except that they were Jews. The Jew suffers, but he does not forget. We have, both of us, a debt to pay. We may have to wait a long time, but, sooner or later, God's pay day is sure to come." Thus Simon in the days of his prosperity to his adopted daughter when, having made a fortune, he is intent upon revenging the wrongs of his race on the Russian Government. One recalls a little sadly the fact that, leaving revenge

A WORD WITH THE AMBITIOUS.

How a Master-mind will put you on the Royal Road to Success, Power and Influence.

It is the ambitious man that we want to talk to in this announcement. It is this type of man particularly who will be more interested in what we have to say. Now to this type of man we put these questions, "Are you ready now to satisfy your ambition, if we show you the way?" "Are you anxious to grasp your opportunities with both hands, and make the most of them?" "Are you willing to train your mind, personality and influence, along the true and scientific lines?"

What are your answers? YES! to every one of them! This is what we expect of you.

You want to succeed? You want to better your position in this world? You want to earn more money?

Then it is obvious you need the FRANK HARTLEY COURSE OF MENTI-CULTURE.

It is only the man who can use his brain, who can act promptly, who by reason of his superior mental culture naturally dominates, and reaches the top rung of the Ladder of Success.

In whatever sphere of life you may be, it is the man with the magnetic personality, with the powerful grip of essential details—which can only be obtained by a well ordered and systematic mind—who will win.

Ask yourself how the various great schemes—political, commercial, naval, military and social—have been carried out. In each case the man or men with the powerful brain, with the indomitable courage—with the sure grasp of their proposition, forgetting nothing, who have brought these great schemes to a successful issue.

Now, why don't you succeed? You want to, of course. Why not, then, take up the FRANK HARTLEY COURSE? Its cost is little; its results are guaranteed, you are put to no risk, and personally you have the privilege of corresponding with Mr. Frank Hartley himself, and before you have finished the course you will have well appreciated this fact.

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF AMBITIOUS READERS OF "EVERYMAN."

Mr. FRANK HARTLEY.

To every reader of EVERYMAN who sends for his book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," enclosing two penny stamps to cover postage, Mr. Frank Hartley promises to send one Free Lesson.

Furthermore, in order to secure one hundred readers of EVERYMAN as enthusiastic supporters of the Hartley movement, Mr. Hartley has decided to offer to enrol the first 100 readers who apply as students at HALF THE USUAL LOW FEE.

This is a very extraordinary offer, and is a proof of Mr. Hartley's confidence in his ability to do justice to every one of his students.

THE FRANK HARTLEY COURSE.

What is the Frank Hartley Course of Menti-Culture? It is the most Scientific and systematic course of mind training in the world. It develops your mind, rouses the latent powers of your brain, and makes it give forth its great and wonderful fruits, and, in consequence, gives you a strong and magnetic personality. In these respects alone the Frank Hartley Course is unique.

The Hartley Course will instil into you the knowledge, desire, and ability to succeed, power of concentration and a powerful memory, and that personal magnetism, which makes you a thorough and complete success in social, political and commercial life.

A Powerful Mind Means Powerful Pay.

Continuity of thought and ability to express those thoughts in coherent and well-chosen language is only the gift of a man whose mind is well, ordered, trained and spontaneous.

To be logical, to be consistent to set thoughts and ideas in chronological order, is to be successful, and the Frank Hartley Course teaches you how to be successful.

By a series of lessons each student is, almost unconsciously, scientifically and systematically taught to think for himself, to develop his power of observation, to have confidence in himself—in his ideas, his opinions, his word—to attract, to fascinate, and to conquer.

Another Extraordinary Offer to Readers of "Everyman."

But Mr. Frank Hartley makes still another offer. He says, "If any student after taking the course has not improved himself, he or she is at liberty to return his instruction papers, and his or her money will be returned in full."

Do you know what this means? It means that Mr. Hartley is perfectly confident of the training he imparts.

Think this over. Ask yourself if your mind wants scientific training, and we are sure you will not delay in writing for Mr. Frank Hartley's Free Book and his Free Lesson, which will prove a forerunner of success.

Coupon which entitles "EVERYMAN" READERS TO THE THREE ABOVE MENTIONED SPECIAL OFFERS.
FRANK HARTLEY, Room 8, London Institute of Menti-Culture,
35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

Dear Sir.—Please send me, without any obligation to enrol, your Free Book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," and your Free Lesson, I enclose 2d. for postage, etc.

Name.....
Address.....

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any noise, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatinous, graphic, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.

A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 68, Goswell Road, LONDON.

THE PATH

FOR MYSTICS AND THINKERS.

DECEMBER NUMBER.

Extra pages, and half-tone supplement of a Painting by a Russian Artist.

Articles by Dr. Franz Hartmann, Dr. K. C. Anderson, and others on The Tarot, The Zodiac, Prehistoric Peru, Mysticism, Education, etc.

PRICE 6d. By post 7½d.

READY DECEMBER 1st.

Dept. E.2, "THE PATH" PUBLISHING COMPANY,
OAKLEY HOUSE, BLOOMSBURY STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE "IDEAL" DIVISIBLE MS. BOOK. All work can be done in one book and rearranged in any manner. Absolutely simple. No rings, posts, or staples. From 1s. 6d. Rapidly becoming universal at all Universities. Send for specimen.—W.M. HUNT, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL WORKER wanted for University Settlement, Glasgow. Salary, £120.—Applications to the Warden, 10, Possil Road, Glasgow.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 6d.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

EVERYMAN AND EVERYWOMAN interested in good books is invited to send for a specimen copy of the December issue of "M.A.B." (Mainly About Books), an illustrated magazine for book-lovers, sent free on request.—Address the Manager, "M.A.B.," 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY invites lonely men and women everywhere to become members and obtain social and intellectual interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet and invitation form send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, GREENCROFT GARDENS, HAMPSTEAD, LONDON.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.—We do not work at 8d. per 1,000 words, but we give a higher degree of accuracy in any subject or language than elsewhere. Unnumbered testimonials, copies free.—HUNT'S OXFORD COPYING OFFICE, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogue No. 614, and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

Essentially the Foods for Brain Workers: maximum of nutriment, minimum of trouble. Full List and Sample of FRITTAMIX, the New Savoury, Post Free. Mention EVERYMAN.

MAPLETON'S,
Garston, LIVERPOOL.

altogether out of the question, no country stands in such constant need of money as Russia. The omnipotent Jewish financier has but to lift a finger to stop pogroms in Russia—and the finger is still unlifted! Simon, however, is the exception. His soul is aflame with indignation at the horrors inflicted upon his people by the Government of the Czar, and he plots and plans and conspires and intrigues for that Government's undoing. The story of how he corrupts a young English aristocrat is most convincingly done, but the subsequent release of the hated Count Loboff, the oppressor of his people, whom he has kidnapped, for no other reason than that the Count looks sad when he speaks of his child, is—well, it is not worthy of Mr. Neuman or of his creation. The novel is powerfully written, and the interest well sustained.

• • •

"It's brutal to keep you out o' bed," says Mr. Richard Peel, the hero of "Dying Fires," by Allan Monkhouse (Duckworth and Co., 6s.), speaking to his friend, Mr. James Morice, who keeps "journalists' hours" and lives in a suburb near Manchester. We, too, keep those hours, but we are in no danger of staying up late to read Mr. Monkhouse's latest effort in fiction. Indeed, we are not even tempted to give a stir to the dying embers on our hearth as we turn the pages. For, although Mr. Monkhouse writes with undeniable distinction and a certain indescribable graphic force, his characters take themselves with a seriousness we cannot simulate. People who are always analysing themselves, their feelings and beliefs, have not much to analyse, as a rule, and, frankly, a man whose "deepest regret is that he has no grandchildren" bores us. Let Mr. Monkhouse try the experiment of writing of the common people. They have real tragedies in their lives, and they are not every minute wondering what their emotions mean. We are confident that he could do them, and himself, justice.

• • •

Mr. Charles Garvice is not perhaps quite convincing with his "Two Maids and a Man" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), whom we find located in an altogether impossible mining camp, called, with quaint originality, "Eldorado," and speaking a patois that seems reminiscent of Whitechapel. "The Man" comes into The Saloon "with the lithe swing and the light, firm step of a wild animal of the woods; and no one would have guessed from the freedom of his movements, the erect poise of his red head, that he had been toiling all day in the sun, and had come straight from the back-aching, muscle-straining labour which had turned many a man's claim into a grave." Perhaps we should explain that he is a miner. It is but fair to add also that one at least of the ladies, with whom his future is intertwined, is distinctly less wild and woodlike than the object of their affections, while the subsequent adventures of the three, what time they are transposed to polite society, makes interesting reading for those whose sense of humour is not too keen. The narrative is redeemed, in part, by a certain boldness of the imagination that makes one forget its inherent improbabilities.

• • •

There is no lover of literature who will not welcome "Shakespeare's Stories of the English Kings," retold by Thomas Carter (George C. Harrap and Co., 5s.), and beautifully illustrated by Gertrude Demain Hammond, R.I. This is a book whose pages we can picture children will turn with delight, and which, in after years, they will remember with positive affection.

The fact that "A Romance of Billy Goat Hill" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is from the pen of Alice Hegan Rice, whose "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" won her a vast audience on both sides of the herring-pond, will ensure this volume a warm welcome. If the story is so slight that it need not be recalled, it is told with a freshness and verve that carries one on from page to page, and some of the minor characters, obviously sketched from life, stand out from the canvas. Mrs. Rice is at her best in writing of the poor, whose simple, unaffected heroism and perpetual good spirits few can present with such convincing charm.

• • •

"Erica," by Mrs. Henry de la Pasture (Lady Clifford) (Smith, Elder, 6s.), is a young lady of decided character, whose engagement is broken off because, so she tells her mother next day in the train en route to Paddington, "Christopher overheard something that he was not intended to hear"—the something being her own declaration that she loved another man, and that her fiancé bored her to extinction. Christopher on this releases her, and she arranges things with the other man, Tom Garry, by telegram, securing his attendance at Paddington, with a special licence, to meet herself and her mother on their arrival. The reader will gather that a lady capable of this promptness and resolution will well repay acquaintance, and they will not be disappointed if they follow her fortunes in the brightly written pages of her creator, who has given us a woman, not lovable, perhaps not even admirable, but real, every inch of her.

• • •

Miss Beth Ellis inscribes her new book, "The King's Blue Riband" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), to "All Lusty Bachelors who defy the Fates." We are introduced to one of these straight off in the person of Sir Anthony Claverton, of the Gamecock Club, a near relative, as one suspects, of Charles Surface, but whose society is, none the less, sufficiently engaging to make the book readable. When we meet him, Sir Anthony has suffered much at the hands of fate. "In the winter his house in Somersetshire had been burnt to the ground. In the spring"—when, as we know, a young man's fancy turns elsewhere—"small-pox had ravaged his estate, carrying off his best tenants, and leaving, in place of a flourishing little township, a ruined and deserted hamlet." But Sir Anthony refuses to repair his fortunes by way of matrimony, which, in those days, before the Married Woman's Property Act, seems to have been popular. "For every man," he says, "there lives somewhere in the world a woman who can give him happiness. Some day he will meet her and know the truth." Till then Sir Anthony decides he will remain a bachelor—and ruined. In these days of disillusion, when it is the fashion to scoff at sentiment and laugh at love, it is pleasant to meet a hero who still believes in romance and the quest of the open road. Much reading of problem novels wearies the flesh and sickens the soul. It is good to find a man in fiction not ashamed of his beliefs, firm in the assurance that somewhere or other he will find the woman of whom he dreams. There is no analysis of motive, no dissection of emotion; the plain, unvarnished fact remains, Sir Anthony prefers to remain poor rather than sell his belief in love. Miss Ellis is to be congratulated on her characterisation in this particular. There is room and to spare in the novels of to-day for a hero of romance who waits for the one woman. How he meets that one woman, and how he wins her, the author tells so vividly that the eighteenth century lives again for us.

FARROW'S BANK LIMITED

Authorised Capital - £500,000
 Shares Issued - - 500,000
 Reserve Liability - £236,757

Chairman and Managing Director:
Mr. THOMAS FARROW.

EVERY DESCRIPTION OF JOINT-STOCK BANKING TRANSACTED.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS.

Accounts are opened and interest allowed where credit balances are maintained for six months.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest from 3 per cent. to 4 per cent. according to notice of withdrawal.

STOCKS AND SHARES BOUGHT AND SOLD.

An artistically compiled publication, descriptive of the history, objects, and work, has been published. It consists of 40 pages, contains upwards of 70 illustrations and an interesting summary of the Bank's numerous departments, the whole forming an extremely useful work of reference. A copy of the booklet will be sent, post free, on receipt of the Coupon below.

HEAD OFFICE:

1, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

The MANAGER,
 Farrow's Bank, Ltd.,
 1, Cheapside, London, E.C.

Please send me a 40-page Illustrated Booklet.

Name

Address

Date..... E.M.

REVIEWS IN BRIEF

The New Book of Golf. Edited by Horace G. Hutchinson. Illustrated by photographs. 6s. net. (Longmans, Green and Co.)

Not all of us can hope to rise to the level of that brilliant artist who defined life as a series of interruptions from golf, but the game attracts an ever-increasing number of devotees, and to those who have not already a favourite body of doctrine which they swear by this new book of golf will be great gain. It will be especially useful to those who golf without being exactly golfers. Mr. Bernard Darwin gives most of the instruction, Mr. Sherlock writes from the professional's point of view, Mr. C. K. Hutchinson discusses men of genius, and Mrs. Ross (née Miss May Hezlet) gives advice to lady players. Nor must we omit the pedagogical expert, Mr. A. C. M. Croome, who tells us all "how to learn," which is indeed the rub. The book is well planned and effectively written. No one who reads it can say that he does not know how to play.

The Upas Tree. Through the Postern Gate. By Florence L. Barclay. (Putnam.)

With her book, "The Rosary," Mrs. Barclay leapt into prodigious popularity, but it is difficult to discover the secret of her success in the two novels which she has published subsequently. Both, however, are well written, clean, and sufficiently interesting, though the dramatic expedients are a trifle hackneyed. They will appeal to lady readers of the old school, for they are a pleasant change from modern erotic fiction.

No Surrender. By Constance E. Maud. (Duckworth and Co.)

This is a "suffragette" novel, but, though written with a purpose, it is not in the least dull. Miss Maud writes with power and insight, but, naturally, her book will appeal most to the friends of the suffrage movement.

Elizabeth, Betsy and Bess. By Lily Schofield. (Duckworth.)

A schoolgirl's story, somewhat loosely put together.

At Agincourt. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie and Son, Ltd.)

This is a new edition of one of Henty's matchless historical tales for boys. We can imagine no better gift book for a lad than this stirring tale of the feud between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy.

The Street of the Flute-Player. By H. de Vere Stacpoole. (John Murray.)

A romance of the days of Aristophanes, but the difficulty of reproducing effectively the ancient Greek spirit in the garb of an English novel is not overcome by the author, despite his literary skill.

The Triuniverse. By the author of "Space and Spirit." (Charles Knight and Co., Ltd.)

This is a scientific romance, but is so full of technical terms and scientific jargon that it will be intelligible only to scientific minds. As the book deals with events on and after the year 1950, it were unsafe to criticise the author's theories.

The Rhodesia Annual. 1912-13. 2s. 6d. (The South African Publishing Company. London. Selling Agents: Messrs. Hazell, Watson and Viney, Ltd., 52, Long Acre, W.C.)

As a product of a country only twenty-two years old, the publishers are to be congratulated on the general character of the work. With one exception, and excluding the Supplement, the contents have been especially contributed by Rhodesians. The work is lavishly illustrated. To those interested in Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa the "Annual" would doubtless be of great value and interest.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Armstrong, R. C. "Just Before Dawn." (Macmillan, 6s. 6d.)
 Bailey, Arthur. "Verses." (Herbert and Daniel.)
 Batz, Baron de. "Vers L'Echafaud." (Calmann and Levy, Paris, 3fr. 50.)
 "Butler, Samuel, The Note-Book of." (Fifield, 6s.)
 Boulger, G. S. "Plant Geography." (Dent, 1s.)
 Ditchfield, P. H. "The Cottage and the Village Life of Rural England." (Dent.)
 Dickinson, G. Lowes. "Religion—a Criticism and a Forecast." (Dent, 1s.)
 Dickinson, G. Lowes. "Letters from John Chinaman." (Dent, 1s.)
 Delzons, Louis. "Le Maître des Foulés." (Calmann and Lévy, Paris, 3fr. 50.)
 Ellis, H. "The Problem of Race-Regeneration." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Fox, Henry James. "The Note-book on Architecture." (Dent, 1s.)
 Gascoyne-Cecil, Lord William. "Changing China." (Nisbet, 3s. 6d.)
 George, W. L. "Woman and To-morrow." (Jenkins, 2s. 6d.)
 Hamon, Augustin. "Le Molière du XX. Siècle Bernard Shaw." (Eugene Figuière, Paris, 3fr. 50.)
 Headlam, Cecil. "Oxford and its History." (Dent, 10s. 6d.)
 Horton, The Rev. R. F. "National Ideals and Race-Regeneration." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Haslette, John. "The Mesh." (Sampson Low, 6s.)
 Maud, Constance. "Angelique (Le p'tit Chou)." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 Murray, John. "Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley." (Edgecombe, 10s. 6d.)
 Newsholme, A. "The Declining Birth-rate." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Rolleston, T. W. "Parsifal." (Harrap, 15s.)
 Rowntree, B. Seebohm. "Land and Labour Lessons from Belgium." (Macmillan, 5s.)
 Stubbs, C. W., D.D. "Cambridge and its Story." (Dent, 10s. 6d.)
 Saleeby, C. W. "The Methods of Race-Regeneration." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Scharlieb, Mary. "Womanhood and Race-Regeneration." (Cassell, 6d.)
 Sherrin, Wilkinson. "Windfrint Virgin." (Hain-Smith, 6s.)
 Szasz, Elsa de. "The Temple on the Hill." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d.)
 Turner, Denis. "Fatuus Fables." (Fifield, 2s. 6d.)
 The Men's League. "Handbook on Women Suffrage." (6d.)
 Thomson, John. "Frances Thomson, the Preston-born Poet." (Alfred Hazlewood, 2s. 6d.)
 Tomlinson, H. M. "The Sea and the Jungle." (Duckworth, 7s. 6d.)
 Treves, Sir Frederick. "The Land that is Desolate." (Smith, Elder, 9s.)
 Treherne, Philip. "Louis XVII. and other Papers." (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)
 Wace, Henry. "Some Questions of the Day." (Nisbet, 6s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

The Editor will endeavour to return manuscripts only when a stamped envelope is enclosed. All manuscripts should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2452 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.

ATTRACTIVE XMAS GIFT BOOKS.

Send a Postcard for Illustrated Catalogue

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.
OXFORD AND ITS STORY. 10/6 net.

By CECIL HEADLAM. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.

OUTLOOK.—"The story of Oxford touches the history of England."

COMPANION WORK.
CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY. 10/6 net.

By the Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, Bishop of Truro.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND. 21/- net.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. QUINTON.

3/- THE CONISTON CLASSICS. 3/- net.

33 volumes chosen from EVERYMAN LIBRARY in a new style of binding known as Bedford Morocco. [Prospectus.]

7/6 net. BEE: The Princess and the Dwarfs 7/6 net.

Text: ANATOLE FRANCE. Translation: PETER WRIGHT. Pictures: C. ROBINSON. DAILY GRAPHIC.—"Cannot fail to attract children."

5/- net. A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS. 5/- net.

Text: WILLIAM CANTON. Pictures: HERBERT COLE. MORNING POST.—"Stories which are not to be found in ordinary books."

2/6 net. THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN. 2/6 net.

Pictures: MARGARET TARRANT.

5/- net. JOLLY CALLE, and other Swedish Fairy Tales. 5/- net.

Text: HELENA NYBLOM. Pictures: CHARLES FOLKARD.

3/6 net. THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN. 3/6 net.

Text: Mrs. R. STAVELL. Pictures: F. C. PAPE.

NEW FICTION. SECOND LARGE EDITION.

JOSEPH CONRAD. "Twixt Land and Sea." 6/-

TIMES: "A masterpiece." PALL MALL GAZETTE: "He has never done better."

By the Author of "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER."

FLORENCE CONVERSE. "The Children of Light." 6/-

THE MORNING POST: "Really beautiful and arresting. The first part, which deals with the childhood of the three personages of the story, is by far the best. Here Miss Converse is on her own ground, and she treats the idealism and inspiration of receptive children with rare delicacy and intuition."

EDINBURGH EVENING NEWS: "A living book."

HILLEL SAMSON'S

FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 4/6 net.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA,

1/- Edited by ANDREW BOYLE, 1/-
 Send a postcard for Special Prospectus of this Production. NET, CLOTH.

137a, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

OETZMANN & CO LTD.

Nr. Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

Telegrams: "OETZMANN, LONDON."
Stations: Met. Rly.—EUSTON SQUARE.

Telephone: Mayfair 101.
Tube—WARREN STREET.

GREAT SALE NOW PROCEEDING.

SPECIAL OFFER OF £75,000 WORTH OF GOODS

IN CONSEQUENCE OF CONTEMPLATED EXTENSIVE ALTERATIONS.

SALE CATALOGUE (PHOTOGRAPHICALLY ILLUSTRATED) POST FREE.

20 only. "Frome" luxurious Wing Divan Easy Chairs with cushion seat, upholstered in fine quality tapestry, to be cleared at £2 9 6

SPECIAL OFFER.

250 EASY CHAIRS, SETTEES, ROLL-TOP DESKS, CARPETS, &c.

Greatly reduced in price, after only four weeks' use in the lounges, &c., at the Motor Show, Olympia, and other exhibitions.

Very comfortable Chesterfield Settee, with spring edge seat and back, covered good quality tapestry, 5 ft. 6 in. long; both ends are adjustable. £2 18 6

28 only. Fumigated Oak Roll-top Desks, 4 ft. wide, fitted with numerous drawers and pigeon-holes. £4 18 6

The quantity of these Desks is strictly limited. Some are fitted with high roll-tops, as shown, and others with low roll-tops.

Usually sold at £6 15 0

DELIVERY BY MOTOR
50 MILES RADIUS.

Included in the Sale is a large stock of SOLID SILVER and ELECTRO-SILVER PLATE at about HALF PRICES. Purchased from Messrs. SUTHERLAND & RHODEN, of London and Sheffield, upon their dissolution of partnership. ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET POST FREE.

The Talk of the
GRAMOPHONE
World.

'PARSONS' SEMITONE'

Improves the Sound, Avoids Scratching of the Needle. Old Records made New. Sold by Spiers and Pond, Whiteley's, Civil Service Stores, and all high-class dealers.

Sample Semitone sent post free for

—❧— 1/6 —❧—

Parsons' TRIPLE CRYSTAL NEEDLE will play 60 tunes. Increases sound. Stands alone for Quality. Boxes of six for 6d.

PARSONS' SEMITONE COMPANY,

37 & 39, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Ask Anyone

who has bought The WHS Pen (and there are hundreds of thousands of them) what they think of it. You will learn that it is as good a pen as you could wish for. It writes instantly, always—no uncertainty—no jibbing. It writes with the pleasant touch that only a good pen can give.

THE WHS PEN

fills itself in five seconds without unscrewing, without a "filler," without soiling the hands. Clean, reliable, convenient. The non-corrosive nib is of 14-carat gold tipped with iridium. There are 36 patterns to choose from. Every pen is guaranteed for two years and costs 3/9. See new model.

3/9 BUY ONE TO-DAY
Of Your Stationer
Refuse Substitutes
Insist on the Pen with the W.H.S. on the barrel

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 8. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1912.

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	229
The Nationalisation of the Railways—
By Hector Macpherson	230
The Alleged Collapse of Socialism—
Part I.—By Bernard Shaw	231
Civil Servants as Slaves of the State—
By P. C. Moore	232
Epistle to the Twentieth Century—
By Prof. Saintsbury	233
The Paradox of Disraeli	234
The Picture of Sir Thomas More	236
Portrait of Sir Thomas More	237
Meredith and Carlyle—
By W. R. Thomson	238
Edward FitzGerald and His Times—
By Augustus Ralli	239

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

BERNARD SHAW

PROF. SAINTSBURY

RICHARD CURLE

W. R. THOMSON

Under the Great Dome	PAGE
Hard-and-Sharp: A Somerset Sketch—
By H. Hay Wilson	241
Kinship—By Thomas Moulton	242
What's Wrong with the Churches?—
Part II.—By W. Forbes Gray	242
The Ethical Foundations of Patriotism
—By Charles Sarolea	244
Silhouettes	245
Correspondence	246
Reviews—
Our Relations with Germany	252
The Personality of Napoleon	255
The Wisdom of G. B. S.	256
Books of the Week	256
List of Books Received	258

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE war cloud has lifted in the Near East. The outlook is brighter. Thanks to the moderation of the Bulgarians, the attitude of Turkey is less unyielding, with the result that an armistice is practically agreed upon. It is expected that the peace negotiations will be conducted in the Bulgarian capital. Great Britain, Russia, and Germany have impressed upon Turkey the necessity of making peace. Negotiations, however, are somewhat hampered by the feeling of Greece. The Balkans, with an eye to possible European complications, are anxious to finish the war, and are prepared to let Turkey off lightly. Greece, however, has nothing to gain by a speedy settlement, and feels that her ancient enemy should be more heavily pressed, and that more extreme terms should be enforced on her.

An important pronouncement comes from Germany. In the Reichstag on Monday the Imperial Chancellor, after expressing hope that events in the Balkans would make for peace, declared that, in the event of unfavourable developments, Germany would be found on the side of her Allies. If, contrary to expectation, they were attacked from a third side, then, continued the Chancellor, we would fight by the side of our Allies, to defend our own position in Europe and protect the security of our own country. "I am now convinced," said the Chancellor, "that in such a policy we should have the whole people at our back." Meanwhile good is expected to result from Sir Edward Grey's proposal for a conference of the Ambassadors. The proposal is said to be favourably entertained by the Powers.

Variety has been given to political affairs by two speeches delivered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—one at Aberdeen and the other at Kirkcaldy. At Aberdeen he dealt with the land question as it affects Scotland, and deplored the fact that the robust youth of the rural districts were stricken with the pestilence of land famine. In his opinion, a complete change in our land system was the first essential condition of social reform. Referring to the Insurance Act, Mr. Lloyd George remarked that its benefits would soon be felt. At Kirkcaldy he dwelt upon the necessity of devolution. He also alluded to the significance of the recent by-elections, and in connection with the prosperity of the country he dealt with Tariff Reform.

In the course of the debate in the House of Commons on the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, Mr. Bonar Law declared that the Prime Minister had broken his pledge regarding the introduction of first-class treasures under the Parliament Act. Mr. Asquith met this with an indignant denial. At present, Mr. Asquith said, a committee of the Cabinet was considering the question of the reform of the House of Lords.

The controversy started by Lord Roberts with reference to conscription shows no signs of abating. At the Eighty Club dinner to Mr. Winston Churchill, Lord Haldane, who presided, said the command of the sea was a fundamental strategic policy, and any different policy was the policy of an amateur, not of a strategist. The adoption of compulsory military service, he said, would add ten or fifteen millions to the Army Estimates. In opening a drill hall at Bathgate, Lord Rosebery made pointed reference to the controversy. Without expressing any opinion on conscription, which he admitted to be a drastic remedy, he expresses the view that if the alleged facts about our military deficiency were true, no expeditions should be made outside the island until we were quite sure that the Territorial Army had secured sufficient training to defend it. Lord Curzon, dealing with the subject at Plymouth, gave it as his opinion that the voluntary system was breaking down before our eyes.

The militant suffragists are pursuing with reckless determination their anarchical campaign. The latest development takes the form of inserting bottles of dark fluid into the Post Office and pillar collecting boxes. Thousands of letters have been rendered useless, with great inconvenience to the general public. The Postmaster-General invites the co-operation of the public in the matter, and offers a reward to anyone who secures the arrest of an offender.

Three thousand miners employed in the Garw Valley, South Wales, are on strike in consequence of 250 non-unionists declining to join their federation.

Mr. Balfour presided this week at the Royal Scottish Corporation St. Andrew's Day festival, and in the course of his remarks dwelt upon the value of Scottish nationality. He claimed that Scotland had set the example of how to reconcile naturally and completely two things which at first sight were not easily reconciled—"the intense and ardent patriotism for a part which yet only reinforces and strengthens the larger patriotism of the whole."

Speaking at the anniversary of the Royal Society, Prince Lichnowsky, the German Ambassador, said never were the relations between England and Germany more intimate than at present.

Mr. Runciman has dealt a severe blow at the single-tax section of the Liberal party. Speaking the other day at Newton Abbot, he condemned "harum-scarum" schemes of taxation, which would bear unjustly on the land, and allow those engaged in other callings to escape their fair share of taxation.

The Scottish members of Parliament have had sent to them a memorandum from the Business Committee of the General Council of the University of Edinburgh, protesting against the action of the Treasury with regard to inclusive fees at all the Scottish Universities. They condemn the extension of bureaucratic government as the first step towards a system which in time would destroy the spirit of University education in Scotland.

The intercession service at evensong, which took place on Tuesday evening, in the presence of the Bulgarian Minister and of many well-known Philhellenes, at St. Peter's, Piccadilly, was in several respects remarkable. The ordinary church office appropriate to the hour, 6 p.m., lent itself, with well-chosen lesson and hymns, to the special purpose with a minimum of difficulty. The statement had been made that a "Te Deum" would be given, but this must have been due to a misapprehension, the object of the function being to make intercession for the Christian peoples of the Near East, by no means yet, as a body, free from the despotism of Islam. A sermon of striking eloquence and fervour was delivered by the Right Hon. George Russell, once a colleague of Mr. Gladstone, and still fired with the enthusiasms of one who has been called the last of the Crusaders. The Church of St. Peter's, hidden behind the "Trocadero," has been beautifully restored under the enlightened surrogate and vicar, the Rev. G. Golding-Bird, whose good work in the terribly poor district lying in the very shadow of the richest streets of the West End deserves more attention than it has yet received.

THE NATIONALISATION OF THE RAILWAYS

THIS country has long been recognised as a pioneer in civilisation. A check is given to our patriotic exuberance when, laying aside our insular preconceptions, we compare ourselves with our Continental neighbours. Take, for instance, our railway system. With our doctrinaire dislike of State interference in the industrial sphere, we tolerate a railway system that is quite out of touch with the requirements of modern times. In the interests of the public, great stress was placed upon competition in the early days of railways. Competition has now given place to combination, and, therefore, from the public point of view, continuance of the present system has no longer justification. In a pamphlet published by the Railway Nationalisation Society, facts and figures are given which show clearly the wastefulness of our railway system, and demonstrate the necessity of this country following the example of the Continent and the Colonies in substituting State for company ownership. On the purely financial side the gain would be enormous. By reduction of the expenses of management and the economies which would be secured by the simplification of the system under State management, it is calculated that a saving of £20,000,000 per annum would be effected—a sum which would reduce the exorbitant goods rates which operate as a tariff on our inland trade. Passenger fares would also be reduced, and an improvement would be made in the conditions of labour, thereby lessening the unrest among railway workers.

State-owned railways, moreover, would greatly increase the convenience and comfort of the travelling public. At present it is mainly on the great main lines that attention is paid to the requirements of the public. Outlying towns and villages are left to shift for themselves. Travellers, grumble and groan as they may, are helpless under a system despotic, antiquated, and intolerable. Contrast the British system with that of Germany, as described in H.M. Consul-General's Report. In Prussia, we are told, the State receives a considerable surplus from the working of the railways, by which the general burden of taxation is relieved. The report goes on to say that, as far as the comfort of the public, the punctuality of the working, and the consideration of wishes expressed in connection with traffic arrangements are concerned, the State railway system has in Germany gradually met with entire approval, and the desire for a return to private ownership is never expressed by the public. No less an authority than Sir George S. Gibb has recorded his belief in the case of railways in the advantages of well regulated monopoly, even although it should come in the guise of State ownership. Lord Brassey puts the whole subject in a nutshell by his remark that railways should be managed with a single eye to the service of the public, not for the benefit of the shareholders. The subject is one which lies outside of party politics. It concerns the economics rather than the politics of the State. It is now being recognised by economists that with the use of syndicates and combinations new functions have been imposed upon the State. Industries of a routine nature and which tend to become monopolies, such as gas, water, tramway, telegraph and telephone services, are best controlled in the public interest by public officials. To this category railways belong.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE ALLEGED COLLAPSE OF SOCIALISM

BY BERNARD SHAW PART I.

I REALLY cannot, as a humane person, look on inactive at Mr. Chesterton performing the feats of a Japanese wrestler at the expense of my unfortunate Socialist friends. It is a pretty exhibition of a noble art; and it serves the Socialists right for not knowing their own case better, and for trying to argue with an opponent who could argue their heads off, to the infinite amusement of the spectators, even if he were in the unpopular position of being in the right, and who is utterly irresistible now that he is in the wrong.

Just let me have a turn. Like Polonius, I will use no art, because we are both so clever at it that there would be nothing in that either way. Let us go plumb to the bottom of the controversy.

I.

Mr. Chesterton says he wants the Peasant State. Well, he has got it; and he is louder in his denunciation of it, bitterer in his loathing of it, than any Socialist; for the Socialists admit that the founders of the Peasant State had honest intentions—Mr. Chesterton's intentions, in fact—and that nothing but experience could have taught them the horrors that were incipient in that State from the moment when the first peasant put a row of stones about a bit of land and said, "This is mine." Mr. Chesterton himself says quite truly that "as to how it [the Peasant State] can be brought about, it is not, perhaps, irrelevant to remark that it already exists, at this minute by the clock, over the larger part of this planet." Of course it does, more's the pity! You can see it in its beginnings in the island of Achill. But if you would see it in excelsis you must study it in Chicago, in Glasgow, in Manchester, or in London. These are the pustules in which the disease of Peasant Property culminates on the fair green skin of the earth. Mr. Chesterton allows that the Peasant State cannot consist wholly of peasants. There will, he says, be a margin of mercantile and urban people. That is, there will be the exchanger, the distributor, and the specialist, beginning with the village shopkeeper, the blacksmith, the midwife, the surgeon, and the farrier. Well, one may ask, what does that matter provided they are all peasants? If they marry peasants' sons and daughters, if their fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters and sons and daughters are peasants, and if they live the same lives and have about the same incomes as peasants, the Peasant State will still be a State of Peasants.

II.

But here we come to the practical difficulty. The Peasant State, at this Arcadian point, will not stay put. Make Mr. Chesterton the Head Man, and he will presently find himself like Alice in Wonderland when she attempted to play croquet, and found that the balls were hedgehogs and the mallets live flamingoes. He may feel happy as he whistles Schumann's Merry Peasant, and imagines that hero inviting him (not very often) to look in and see his home, his wife, his sheep, his wool, his distaff, his spinning wheel, his loom, and his homespun clothes. "This homespun," says the Chestertonian M.P., "is mine; and nobody can take it from me except by giving me something in exchange that I want more, not even if there were a child perishing of cold in the lane outside for want of it." And before Mr. Chesterton has done congratulating him the farmhouse multiplies into a thousand tenements, the sky darkens, the peasant and the woman wither, the air stinks, and Mr. Chesterton is in the middle of Manchester. From this horrible spot he might fly to Ireland, which he has just mocked (with the best intentions) as the nearest refuge of the peasant phase of the Peasant State. There he will find the peasant again; but he will find also a person whom he will invidiously call Ikey Mo (knowing all the time that his name is just as likely to be Tim Malone), the gombeen man, occupied in the distribution and exchange of that prime commodity and cherished idol of the peasant, money. And before he can spit in the face of the supposed Jew he will find himself in St. Mary Axe or Lombard Street or Capel Court, in the office of Sir Isidor Montmorency, who will attend to him (for Sir Isaac loves men of letters and artists, bless him!) when he has given a few orders to the Governments of Europe.

III.

At no step in the process of these miracles will Mr. Chesterton have any excuse for interfering. The maddest things will happen under his eyes. He will offer a man a free farm and garden, complete with vine and fig-tree, and none to make him afraid; and three or four idlers will offer to the same man a few square yards of barren land on condition that he keeps them in morbid luxury with their servants and families and motor-cars and what not; and the man will accept their offer and spurn Mr. Chesterton's. And when Mr. Chesterton says, "Are you mad to do this thing, or is it a joke of Shaw's?" the man will reply, "Not at all; but, as a matter of simple fact, I can make more out of their offer than out of yours." And Mr. Chesterton will say, "That is impossible; for two and two still make four." And the man will say, "Two and two make four according to Cocker, Mr. Chesterton; but, according to Ricardo, two and two sometimes make a million and sometimes make minus nothing. For further particulars you must refer to the lucid demonstration of the economic basis of Socialism in Fabian Essays, and to an excellent tract on the Impossibility of Anarchism by your talented friend, Mr. Bernard Shaw."

(To be continued.)

WIT AND WISDOM OF G. B. S.

IN all the arts there is a distinction between the mere physical artistic faculty, consisting of a very fine sense of colour, form, tone, rhythmic movement, and so on, and that supreme sense of humanity which alone can raise the art work created by the physical artistic faculties into a convincing presentment of life.—The Saturday Review, June 6th, 1896.

Humanity is neither a commercial nor a political speculation, but a condition of noble life.—The Humane Review, January, 1901.

The English are extremely particular in selecting their butlers, whilst they do not select their barons at all, taking them as the accident of birth sends them. The consequences include much ironic comedy.—The Irrational Knot.

CIVIL SERVANTS AS SLAVES OF THE STATE * * * BY P. C. MOORE

I.

OF the Super-Civil-Servant, Permanent Under-Secretaries, and Heads of great Departments, beings only a little lower than the angels, we cannot speak. They write weighty books, and mould the destinies of millions. We feel them as benevolent Influences working in the Unseen. We hear of them in the presence of kings and behind the scenes of Empire. But we cannot know them; nobody truly knows them. We speak of the man in the subordinate ranks, the dweller in the suburbs, whose income may be anything from eighty to three hundred pounds a year, and whom we may even meet in the intimate relation of brother, friend, or clubmate.

You will see him every morning in the neighbourhood of his office close upon the hour of ten. You will see him as surely as you will see your morning paper; for his deepest virtue is a reverence for Time. The attendance book is the vital fact of the Service. Other crimes are noticed and forgotten, but unpunctuality is fatal. A man may do nothing when he is in his office, but he will strive to the uttermost to get there in time. "Better never than late" is his favourite motto. The erring brother who has been late thrice in the month makes no paltry excuses about delayed trains or bicycle accidents when he sees that the clock will inevitably beat him once again. He stops at home, and sends a polite letter to the chief clerk explaining that he has caught a severe cold, and hopes to be able to resume work as usual on Monday.

II.

His exactness in the matter of time tends to make him a precisian in other things also. He knows very accurately the state of life into which it has pleased the Civil Service Commission to call him, and the precise nature of the work suited to it; and he will resent any attempt to alter either. Now and again a Second Division man has been known to undertake the duties of an Abstractor when the case was urgent; just as, on an occasion of sudden sickness in the house, Mr. Whiffers, the Bath footman, so far forgot himself as to carry a coal-scuttle up to the second floor; but it is always done without prejudice to his rights, and must not be construed into a precedent. For the Government clerk takes precedents very seriously. What has been done once may lawfully be done again, and in old-established offices every possible event has its appropriate tradition attached to it for help and guidance of those that come after. It is by means of this that the machinery of the nation is kept working smoothly. Time and thought are saved. You have only to look up "what the Department did in '82" to find out what it will do in 1912. Life would be much simpler if our Law were as inevitable or our Theology as certain.

To the man in conflict with a Government Department this attitude has, however, a perverse aspect. He naturally thinks his own case is exceptional, and ought to be treated on its merits. He feels emphatically that he is the Archibald J. Robinson who has suffered an unheard-of injustice. To the clerk filing documents, he is only No. 7863/12—a man who wants something done against the rules. It might, in any given instance, be an excellent thing to break the rules, but it would also be risky. You would incur responsibility; you might be wrong; and then bells would ring in the Secretary's room, and minutes would be written in red ink on the margin of documents, and you would be severely reprimanded, before the business of State could resume its normal course. Why should anyone run these risks for a total stranger, when salaries are paid just the same for doing the easy thing? The soporific effect of a regular salary is the true canker of the Service. It destroys initiative and paralyses thought; and, indeed, it only serves to produce in the Government official a curious detachment from the affairs of the world that is not without a certain charm. Wars rage, dynasties are overthrown, the millionaire of yesterday is to-night crouching homeless through rain-swept streets, but somehow or other, in some miraculous way that we cannot understand, at the end of the month the small cheque will inevitably be found lying on our desk. Allah-il-Allah! It is Kismet. Why worry?

III.

Sometimes, in the natural course of mortality, a coveted post falls vacant, and then you will see the office rouse itself from its daily lethargy. Things happen. Rumour, painted full of tongues, flies headlong from room to room, gathering strength and detail in its flight. Everyone applies for the position. Everyone is indignant at the impudence of everyone else in applying for it. Everyone tells his friends (in confidence) that if any regard is paid to humble merit, proved qualifications, or even mere length of service, his claim cannot be overlooked. Every time a door is suddenly opened, a small knot of men breaks up from in front of the fire, and looks askance at the newcomer, to infer from his face how much he has overheard. The Secretary lives in a state of siege. One man lies in wait in the lobby, another blockades the staircase, two more hang about the steps in the hope of catching him as he goes to his lunch. Then the announcement is made, and the disappointed candidates hold a meeting to point out the iniquity of the appointment. They embody their grievance in a petition extending into innumerable typed pages; they forward it to those that sit in authority; it is filed away to gather dust in some remote pigeon-hole; and affairs resume their original complexion.

But this is only an occasional outburst. For the most part, the Civil Servant is a quietist, doing a reasonable day's work for a not unreasonable day's pay; in his office, good-humoured, friendly, honest; in his home, affectionate, sleepy, and addicted to gardening. If he is not a genius, neither is he a fool. If he has been known to put a shilling on a horse, he is not a gambler. If he lacks something of the quality that makes saints and martyrs, he is frequently a gentleman, and rarely a cad. And what more can you expect? It is excellent value at the price.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF No. 9.

IN our next issue Mr. G. Bernard Shaw will complete his reply to Mr. G. K. Chesterton on the "Alleged Collapse of Socialism." An article of great literary interest will be contributed on H. G. Wells by Richard Curle. Professor Lichtenberger will give us his views on "The Alsatian Problem"; and a vivid historical presentation of "The Trial of the Knights Templar" will appear from the pen of M. Henri Mazel, of the Mercur de France.

EPISTLE TO THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

BY PROF. SAINTSBURY

MY DEAR NUMBER TWENTY,—You were hailed, neither morosely nor priggishly, under that name some years before your birth by a man of genius, who ought to be alive now, but whom, unfortunately, you never saw in the flesh; and I hope there is nothing offensive in the term, which has other pleasant associations. Well, you are "getting a big boy now," and have almost reached one of the conventional stages of your life; so one may, without impudence, take a little stock of you.

Pray don't imagine that I am going to begin with reproving you for the habit (which you have undoubtedly shown already) of disparaging your immediate predecessors, and of assuming an almost preternatural air of modern wisdom for yourself. There is nothing less modern than this; and I have scarcely ever heard of a century which, when it put its dear little tootsies first forward, did not tread previous ages, as vigorously as it could, under the said members. Nothing new in that, my dear Twenty; and you'll get over it all in good time, just as the others did.

I am not sure, however, that from this same range of view—that of comparing you with parallel periods of other ages—the Pisgah sight is quite so cheerful, when we come to the next point. "Teens are not advanced periods of life, but centuries have certain legitimate advantages in that respect over men; and it has been at least not uncommon to find their opening years rather brilliant, as regards things actually done. Are you brilliant, Twenty?"

I observe that, though want of self-confidence would not seem to be one of your most obvious defects, you do not appear to be quite sure of this brilliance. There is an ingenuous tendency in you to assert that things in general are vastly better than they used to be, but to admit that perhaps, in some ways, things and persons in particular have not so very much to boast of. The general well-being ("Give me a lantern that I may see it," as wicked men of old have said) will doubtless react on the particular well-doing. That is the kind of statement you like, and we will hope it may come true. But excuse me if I ask whether you are not in some things a little silly. For instance, we excuse in children a love for picture-books; but shall we altogether excuse in men a love for picture-palaces ("dromes," as I was edified the other day by seeing it put up in London)? Is not the pleasure of the palaces a little passive, a little rudimentary? Is there much sense of art in it, much exercise of the imagination, much of anything above the level of gum-chewing?

Then there is another point about you which perhaps is not quite satisfactory. Complaints that you won't read serious books are, indeed, silly enough themselves. No age ever did read serious books much, except when there were few or no others to read, or when they were connected with burning questions of the time. But you seem, whether from some congenital defect or (which I rather suspect) from the character of your bringing up, to be unable to attend to anything. Even your novels must not be long; and as to books that provide anything like an argument, you want them closed and kangarooed till there is nothing left but one of those ingenious little treatises where you can "specialise," for the small sum of sixpence, on anything knowable in about twenty minutes, but which have the rather unfortunate defect of being necessarily unable to supply the atmosphere and circumference of other knowledge, without which nothing can be known at all.

As for manners, costumes, and the like, I say little or nothing. You don't pretend to have any manners. That is a subject which you do not "take up," so it would clearly be improper to examine you on it. As for costume, I own myself an eclectic. I am quite prepared to set even the hats which young ladies have been wearing for the last year or two against the turbans which old ladies used to wear in the forties and fifties, and divide the palm (or shall I say the crown?) of hideousness. But your costume as distinguished from your costumes and your manners, I must own, do in some cases seem a little curious, if not a little disgusting. Why, O Twenty! are you in such a mortal hurry about everything? You have plenty of time before you; you never seem very particularly to enjoy anything that you are doing; and (excuse me) it really doesn't seem as a rule to be much good when it is done. You have made the streets of London, which used to be one of the pleasantest places in the world, really almost disagreeable, sometimes positively so, by this insane passion for scuttle and hurry. You huddle your Acts of Parliament through so that nobody knows what they mean, and how they will work; and, like the true Epimetheus you are, you only attend to these things "afterwards." You have telescoped up well your dinners, so that, instead of eating and drinking and smoking following each other in a graceful, leisurely trilogy, they are all muddled up together—that is, when you get one of the three at all.

Perhaps this, like the fancy for "Picture-dromes," is also an effect of childishness, for children are always in a hurry; and we may charitably group with these the also puerile habit of getting tired of things, in a hurry almost as great. As picture-dromes have almost killed skating rinks, so motoring appears to be almost killing (I do not mean literally, though there is a certain amount of that, too) cycling. Already you do not rush very much to see an aeroplane (which, to be sure, sometimes makes itself a very unpleasant neighbour), and I am wondering whether, before I get my other foot in the grave, you will have got tired of motoring itself. Whatever your merits, dear Twenty, you certainly have not acquired that fixity of which, according to Mr. Arnold, for I do not myself read the Buddhist languages, Buddha thought so highly. And, perhaps, this also accounts for your again curious toleration of the intolerable in persons and things.

But there is one point in you, Twenty, which I wish specially to notice, and in which I think you have the pre-eminence over any century or any beginning, middle, or end of any century that I have ever heard of; and that point is Cant. It is, of course, supposed to be a specially British Vice. We have, I grant, always, since evidence has been procurable in the matter, canted freely. The seventeenth century canted about religion; and that cant has never ceased since, though latterly a good part of it has been the cant of irreligion. The eighteenth century canted about Liberty, Property, and the British Constitution:

and that cant has gone on, too, though at the present moment it is subject to the slight difficulty that there is no British Constitution to cant about, and that Liberty and Property are having a remarkably bad time of it. The nineteenth century, I own again most freely, canted about all manner of things besides the old ones—about emancipation of slaves and others; about Italy; about Free Trade; about Bulgarian Horrors; about, I say, all manner of things. But these cants were more or less partial—there were always more than seven or seventy thousand persons who bowed the knee to never a Baal of them all. You, my dear Twenty, cant about everything, and in your special and favourite cant almost everybody joins. You cant (this is nothing new) about education; you cant about “broadmindedness” (which generally means wits too narrow to take in really important things); you cant about temperance, speed, personal dignity, sleeping with the window open, Heaven and the other place alone know what! But your cant of cants, and the one referred to just now as your cant universal, is that which is indicated by such words as “Social Unrest,” “Struggles to Win a Higher Life,” “Rights of Labour,” etc., etc.

Now, even if you thought you had an effectual belief in all this, it would still be cant, I fear; but you haven't. Among your minor and subsidiary cants (there is a very little honesty in this, but the honesty of cant is nearly always the nature of effrontery) is one against “charity.” Your benighted ancestors, no doubt, indulged in a great deal of this detestable thing. They founded almshouses and hospitals; they gave doles and feasts; they filled up offertory bags and subscription lists at their own expense and of their own accord. You know a thing or two worth a dozen of this, my dear Twenty. Your charity is akin to, but improved upon, the celebrated practice of Mr. Tupman, who was unwearied in referring the destitute to his friends. You put it on the rates or the taxes, which are borne by a comparatively small part of you, and (most comforting of thoughts to the individual) always by other people. If you had been the good Samaritan, you would have done nothing so impulsive or so extravagant as to pour your own oil and wine into the traveller's wounds; and you would have been afraid of hurting his self-respect by taking him into your motor and paying his hotel bill. You might possibly have brought a measure into Parliament for a super-tax on the Duke of Transjordan and the wine merchants of Jerusalem, in order to establish sanatoria for travellers found wounded on the high road. Now you may outgrow this combination of sympathy out of your own lips, and succour out of other people's pockets; and I hope to goodness you will, for it is not a nice phenomenon in a young gentleman. Perhaps it, and other things like it, are only a new form of social and political measles. Let us hope so.

But “Jobations” should never be too long; and so I leave you with a little motto—caution taken from a lively Frenchman in the days when men and Frenchmen were lively. He was addressing his countrymen, the Philosophes, who were in many ways (absit omen!) like some of your own pundits. He was prepared to allow them some things that they claimed—to acknowledge the blaze of “modern” light that they were spreading—and he only asked them one or two little favours in return:

Mais, pour Dieu, soyez bonnes gens,
Et, si vous pouvez, plus modestes.

Also, Si vous pouvez, get rid of this most loathsome form of cant last mentioned, which does not come from any real sympathy, convention, or belief, but simply from lost relish for other cants, from desire to curry favour for your seat in Parliament, your church, your sect, your fad, with the working (or non-working) man; and lastly, I fear, in a very large number of cases, from the fact that you are mortally afraid of him, and that you are playing the fine old game (the result whereof is well known in history) of “buying off the Danes.”—Pray believe me, my dear Twenty, yours in all sincerity, S.

THE PARADOX OF DISRAELI*

I.

THE second volume of Mr. Monypenny's “Life of Disraeli” is in one sense more, and in another sense less, interesting than the volume that preceded it. There is inevitably less new and curious information; but assuredly there is no period of Disraeli's life more important, more formative, or more necessary to be understood, if we are to form a just appreciation of the man as he eventually emerged, than the nine years covered by this volume—the nine years which intervened between Disraeli's election to Parliament and his successful assault upon the authority of Peel. At the beginning of that period we find him a fantastic youth, whose talents amused many, but whose affectations disgusted many more; whom a few liked, but whom hardly anyone respected or trusted; who was thought at best a clever mountebank, and at worst an utterly unprincipled adventurer. At its end he is already a power in the House of Commons, with the virtual leadership of a great party full in view. Incidentally, the same period covers that marriage which was so important and fortunate an event in his public as in his private life, and the writing of his best and most permanently significant novels, “Coningsby,” and “Sybil.”

II.

It would be very easy to draw, as Mr. T. P. O'Connor once did with great picturesqueness and ingenuity, a picture of this epoch in Disraeli's life which should make him unmitigatedly black. We see a young adventurer, who has already professed almost every shade of political opinion, entering Parliament by means of servile court paid to men who were as much his inferiors in intellect as they were his superiors in rank and wealth. We see him fawning upon the leader of his party when that party is in opposition and is expecting soon to be in power. We see him impudently asking for a place when the Tory Government is being formed, and as impudently denying that he has done so only four years afterwards. We find him, when the place is refused him, turning savagely upon the leader he had flattered, and pursuing him with invective and slander. Finally, we find him raising himself to high political position by pretending to share the opinions and passions of men whose prejudices he despised and whose hopes he was to betray.

III.

With such a picture of Disraeli, the story of his marriage, judged in the same superficial fashion, perfectly harmonises. He attaches himself to a wealthy man who assists him to get into Parliament, ingratiate himself with that man's wife, when the man dies marries her—a woman about ten years older than himself—for her money; and so establishes a securer financial basis for his political career, which was endangered by the stupendous claims of the money-lenders who had assisted him to gamble on his success. In the same fashion it would be possible to represent his novels as the work of a smart, vulgarian upstart, anxious to show off his acquaintanceship with the great.

* “Life of Benjamin Disraeli.” By W. F. Monypenny. Vol. II., 1837-1846. 12s. net. (Murray.)

All that picture is false—utterly and completely false.

I do not say that the above statements are false; on the contrary, most of them are true, at any rate in part. But the picture is all wrong. Disraeli was quite a different kind of man.

With every one of the points made against him above can be contrasted something markedly to his credit. Thus it is true that he first asked for office, and later lied about it. But it is not true that his revolt against Peel was merely the anger of a disappointed place-hunter. He really hated the things for which Peel stood—the repudiation by the Tory party of the old Tory principles, its acquiescence in the Benthamite and Cobdenite theories of the State, its refusal to appeal to history and to the imagination. No one who reads “Coningsby” or “Sybil” can doubt for a moment that Disraeli was interested in his political theories as well as in his political fortunes. He had expressed those theories, in fact, long before he had the smallest reason to desire a quarrel with Peel—nay, when he had every possible interest to stand well with that politician.

IV.

So also with his marriage. Perhaps the most interesting new matter contained in the present volume consists of the love-letters written by Disraeli to Mrs. Wyndham Lewis after her widowhood. Mr. Monypenny is of opinion that in publishing these epistles he has demonstrated that his hero was sincerely in love with this lady. Personally, I have never read any love-letters that seem to me so completely to demonstrate the contrary. They are throughout wretchedly artificial. It may no doubt be contended that a man who has accustomed himself to write continually in a style at once florid and stilted, as Disraeli always did when he wanted to appear as a man of high sensibility, finds it very difficult to rid himself of the habit, and, even when moved by genuine emotion, writes in a rather tawdry fashion. It would be easier to accept this view of Disraeli's love-letters if Mr. Monypenny had not also published Disraeli's letters to his sister, to whom his devotion was real and unselfish.

V.

I will give two examples, and allow readers of EVERYMAN to judge for themselves. This is how Disraeli wrote to the woman he wished to marry:—

“I cannot reconcile Love and separation. My ideas of Love are the perpetual enjoyment of the society of the sweet being to whom I am devoted, the sharing of every thought, and even every fancy, of every charm and every care. Perhaps I sigh for a state which never can be mine. But there is nothing in my own heart that convinces me that it is impossible, and if it be an illusion, it is an illusion worthy of the gods.”

And this is how he wrote to his sister:—

“Dearest,—Here I am again, having been only five days out of Parliament. We had a sharp contest, but never for a moment doubtful. They did against me, and said against me, and wrote against me all that they could find or invent; but I licked them, and the result is that we now know the worst; and I really think that their assaults in the long run did me good, and will do me good. . . . Are there any strawberries left, or will there be in a week? We mean to run down by rail to see you. Thousand loves, D.”

VI.

Again, here is an interesting contrast between Disraeli's mode of expression and that of the woman who became his wife. They had quarrelled, and Disraeli writes as follows:—

“Farewell. I will not affect to wish you happiness, for it is not in your nature to obtain it. For a few years you may flutter in some frivolous circle. But the time will come when you will sigh for any heart which would be fond, and despair of one which would be faithful. Then will be the penal hour of retribution. Then you will think of me with remorse, admiration, and despair; then you will recall to your memory the passionate heart you have forfeited and the genius you have betrayed.”

And here is her answer:—

“For God's sake come to me. I am ill and almost distracted. I will answer all you wish. I never desired you to leave the house, or implied or thought a word about money.”

And so on.

I do not think that anyone reading these two quotations can doubt which is the real thing and which is not.

Disraeli married for money. He wanted money to further his political ambitions; and he had no more scruple about taking it from this middle-aged woman, whom he had fascinated, than he had about begging a place from Peel and lying when twitted with it. That is the low side of the man. But here, as in the political case, comes the quite startling contrast of his worse and his better self. Having married the woman, having accepted her money, he gave her in return a splendid devotion and loyalty, such as very few love-matches can boast. No word ever escaped him that could suggest that he ever regretted his choice, nor would he allow in his presence any hint that it might be thought a strange one. Every glory that awaited him he insisted on her sharing to the full. He exhibited her with pride to the whole world as a wife worthy of a prince, and he placed her before himself, in the roll of the nobility which he had subdued to his purposes, as a peeress in her own right, while he remained still a commoner.

VII.

That element of strong loyalty to old and accepted ties was the fine side of Disraeli. It comes out in his treatment of the woman whom he had made his wife. It comes out in his correspondence with his sister, which from boyhood to middle-age reveals a very genuine and very beautiful comradeship. But perhaps it comes out most of all in one little episode of his political career which always seems to me the final answer to such a view as Mr. O'Connor's.

Peel had fallen, and in falling had separated himself for ever from the mass of the Tory party. Bentinck had just resigned their leadership. After so many years of unscrupulous intrigue and savage fighting, the ball was at last at Disraeli's feet. Then the Jewish Question was raised. Disraeli knew very well that the men he thought to lead hated and despised his race. To obtrude it on them at such a moment was to risk everything. He risked everything. He got up in the House of Commons and said that you could not absorb the Jews, since “it was impossible that an inferior race should absorb a superior.”

When all the circumstances are considered, I think this was one of the most heroic things ever said by mortal man. And it was said by the same man who fawned on Chandos and rancorously revenged his own humiliation on Peel.

THE PICTURE OF SIR THOMAS MORE

I.

GRAVITY, drollery; wit, irony, tenderness; "amiable joyousness," to take Erasmus's word—these dispositions or their shadows are to be seen flitting over More's likeness. Although most of us relate him now only to his "Utopia," he is not in his lineaments at all a visionary. Holbein knew him well, loved him as a man, and a kind host, and a fine subject; and so painted him in that other "little Utopia of his own," to which Father Bridgett alludes—his own household. Unluckily, this group, the original painting, was sent to Erasmus, and has never been found, although we may still nurse a hope that in some old cupboard or dusty attic it may lie hidden, yet to reappear.

Erasmus, however, repainted More with his pen, sketched him with the colour that lurks in ink for those who have the secret. Neither tall nor short, More had the grace of limb which gives dignity of line and an effect of stature to a man. His face was white of skin, fair rather than pale, with a pink flush to suggest warm blood; and dark brown or brown-black hair, and grey-blue eyes, with some spots on them, which were held to mean rare gifts (like the "lucky spots possibly on people's nails"), serve to complete the sketch. But the expression in such a countenance was like a subtler colour. It told of the mother-wit, the amiable joyousness, the laughter ready to break out, that struck Erasmus. "To speak candidly," he said, "it was a face better adapted for gladness than for gravity." Then there was the scholar's unevenness of shoulder—one carried a little higher than the other. The hands he thought not particularly good ones—"the least refined part of him." As M. Bremond points out, it is significant that Holbein buried More's hands in wide sleeves, in the first sketch (now in the Museum at Basle).

II.

The one thing a painted portrait cannot give is a man's voice. More's was clear and penetrating; not loud or soft, or for that matter very resonant. He was extremely fond of music, but had no vocal art. Father Bridgett reminds us, in correcting Erasmus on this point, that Sir Thomas, or the Blessed Thomas More as he is now, used to sing with the choir in church; but then Erasmus spoke from first hand experience. His real care for these things is shown in the trouble he took to have his second wife taught the harp, the lute, the monochord, the flute. Among other personalia his friend gives, we have an account too of his innocence at table. He liked water better than wine—a fact which suggests the retort a young Irish poet made to an English divine, who said the Irish were too fond of whiskey: "Whiskey!" he said; "Irish folk don't need to drink whiskey; they can intoxicate themselves with talking!" Sir Thomas More's wit was quick enough to do without wine; but he gaily disguised his temperance. He drank a special kind of small ale, water thin, out of a pewter vessel to deceive his guests; and if he had to pledge them in wine, he merely touched the rim with his lips. As for food, milk, eggs, fruits, coarse brown bread, much leavened, and a little corned beef; these were enough. He carried the same simplicity into his clothes, and only wore fine garments when obliged to don them for occasions of state. And we know how, to mortify his flesh, he wore a hair-shirt next his skin.

III.

If these be austerities, he made them joyous, even jolly. He went to the scaffold, though he had feared it as a high-strung spirit may such a deathly ordeal, joking with Sir Thomas Pope.

"More," said M. Bremond, "had nothing of the soldier's temperament, in which a certain initial strength confirmed by training lessens the natural cowardice of the nerves and horror of the imagination of all physical suffering." We may even agree that he had something of the timid sensitiveness of Erasmus, and so it was he was not ashamed to confess his terror, and tried to keep himself from dwelling on that side of the ordeal. Then for the prison, if he was able religiously to make the best of its immersements and privations, we gather from the "Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation" that he brought both his wit and his religion to eke out the uncertain strength of his own temperament. "I belief, Megg," he said to his daughter, "that they that have put me here ween they have done me a high displeasure, but I assure thee on my faith, mine own good daughter, if it had not been for my wife and ye that be my children . . . I would not have failed long ere this to have closed myself in as strait a room, and straiter too. But since I am come hither without mine own desert, I trust that God of His goodness will discharge me of my care, and with His gracious help supply my lack among you. I find no cause, I thank God, Megg, to reckon myself in worse case here than in mine own house, for me thinketh God maketh me a wanton, and setteth me on His lap and dandleth me."

The temper of mind that he showed in this confidence to his daughter had been seen earlier in his interview with the Duke of Norfolk. This was when his relations with the King had wrenched to the point of fracture. "By the Mass, Mr. More," said the Duke, "it is perilous striving with princes; therefore I would wish you somewhat to incline to the King's pleasure, for, by God's body! Mr. More, indignatio principis mors est." "Is that all, my lord? Then in good faith the difference between your grace and me is but this, that I shall die to-day, and you to-morrow."

IV.

The account that William Roper, Margaret More's husband, gives of the last scene of all may be added to the chronicle. "So was he brought, by Mr. Lieutenant, out of the Tower, and from thence led towards the place of execution, where going up the scaffold, which was so weak that it was ready to fall, he said to Mr. Lieutenant, 'I pray you, I pray you, Mr. Lieutenant, see me safe up; and for my coming down let me shift for myself.' Then desired he all the people thereabouts to pray for him, and to bear witness with him, that he should then suffer death in and for the faith of the holy Catholic Church, which done he kneeled down, and after his prayers said, he turned to the executioner, and with a cheerful countenance spake unto him, 'Pluck up thy spirits, man, and be not afraid to do thine office, my neck is very short. Take heed, therefore, thou shoot not awry for saving thine honesty.'"

If we want any further evidence of More's courage in the days of trouble we ought to turn to the pages of his inimitable prison book, the "Dialogue of Comfort against Tribulation." The "Dialogue of Comfort" is the one book which is the natural commentary upon More's portrait. It is his confession of himself, the man, to his other self, the saint, whom he was spiritually too modest to foresee. And the "Dialogue" makes his "Utopia" seem more real, and, by its personal illumination, more ideal, too. E. R.

SIR THOMAS MORE, NATUS 1480, OBIT. 1535

MEREDITH AND CARLYLE * * * BY W. R. THOMSON

ONE of the charms of Meredith's letters is that they are not essays. They were written for his friends, not for posterity. And posterity will show its gratitude by counting them among its treasures. Some men need their friends; others merely use them. Meredith belonged to the former class. His circle was not large, but within it he gave and took royally. No one can read the letters to Hardman or Cotter Morison, to Leslie Stephen or Lord Morley, without feeling that he is being permitted to share intimacies that belong to life's best, and that make one think more highly of human nature. This characteristic of the letters—that they are personal and intimate, chatty, playful, or tender, as occasion calls—gives a special interest, by way of contrast, to certain pages on Carlyle, where Meredith speaks as critic. The pages are few in number, some half-dozen at the most, yet it may be said that in the whole library of Carlyle criticism there is nothing more wise and searching. Of Meredith's relations with Carlyle there is, unfortunately, but a hint in the letters. "He commended the study of Goethe to me constantly" seems to imply fairly frequent meetings. From another letter we learn that Mrs. Carlyle "did me the honour to read my books, and make him listen to extracts, and he was good enough to repeat that 'the writer thereof was no fool.'" "High praise from him," adds Meredith. One wonders if it was a certain passage in "Beauchamp's Career" that inspired the Carlylean comment.

It was to his lifelong friend Captain (afterwards Admiral) Maxse that Meredith first wrote of Carlyle, in 1865. Maxse seems to have been in a state of mind not uncommon at the time in regard to the author of the Latter-Day Pamphlets. He was both fascinated and repelled. He had, therefore, to be reminded that Carlyle is a humorist, and that even his "offensive insolence"—the phrase seems to have been the Captain's—was "part of his humour." "Swim in his pages, take his poetry and fine grisly laughter, his manliness, together with some splendid teaching. It is a good set-off to the doctrines of what is called the 'Empirical school.'" This advice is rounded off by the observation, "I don't agree with Carlyle a bit, but I do enjoy him." There is more than enjoyment, however, in the next reference, in a letter four years later. Carlyle is here compared with Tennyson. Tennyson has "many spiritual indications," but no philosophy, and "philosophy is the palace of truth." Carlyle, on the other hand, touches "the very soul and springs of the universe." "He is the nearest to being an inspired writer of any man in our times; he does proclaim the inviolable law; he speaks from the deep springs of life." Sharp touches of censure, no doubt, accompany these high estimates. Carlyle's vehemence of language, "his hideous, blustering impatience," offended Meredith. His ineffectiveness in face of practical problems was also noted. "When he descends to our common pavement he is no more sagacious than a flash of lightning in a grocer's shop." But Meredith knew that it was lightning. "Spiritual light he has to illuminate a nation."

The best commentary on these letters is the well-known passage on Carlyle in "Beauchamp's Career." As readers of Meredith know, Maxse was the original of Beauchamp. It was part of Rosamund Culling's anxiety concerning the young hero, that the books he read were not boys' books.

"His favourite author was one writing of Heroes, in a style resembling either early architecture or utter dilapidation, so loose and rough it seemed; a wind in the orchard style, that tumbled down here and there an appreciable fruit with uncouth bluster; sentences without commencements running to abrupt endings and smoke, like waves against a sea wall; learned dictionary words giving a hand to street slang, and accents falling on them haphazard, like slant rays from driving clouds; all the pages in a breeze, the whole book producing a kind of electrical agitation in the mind and the joints."

Beauchamp had picked up the book in Malta, and had gone at it again and again, "getting nibbles of golden meaning by instalments." He hugged the book, though he could not quite comprehend it. To Mrs. Culling the Incomprehensible was the Abominable, but to the youthful hero it was a challenge, "a bone in the mouth." He did not rest until he had made the lady promise to present him with a complete set of the "beloved Incomprehensible's" works. It was under the inspiration of Carlyle that Beauchamp entered politics as a "political mystic," fighting on the Radical side. Meredith canvassed for Maxse in the Southampton (Bevisham) election of 1867. Radicalism, however, inspired by romantic Toryism, failed to win the day.

For Meredith's finest word on Carlyle we must turn to the letter of May, 1882, to M. Raffalovich, a Russian correspondent.

"Between him and his wife the case is quite simple. She was a woman of peculiar conversational sprightliness, and such a woman longs for society. To him, bearing that fire of sincerity, society was unendurable. All coming near him, except those who could bear the trial, were scorched, and he was as much hurt as they by the action rousing the flames in him. Moreover, like all truthful souls, he was an artist in his work. The effort after verification of matters of fact, and to present things distinctly in language, were incessant; they cost him his health, swallowed up his leisure. Such a man could hardly be an agreeable husband for a woman of the liveliest vivacity. . . . They snapped at one another, and yet the basis of affection was mutually firm. She admired, he respected, and each knew the other to be honest."

These words, be it remembered, come to us from the heart of a labour hardly less splendid and exacting than Carlyle's own. They are no less final on the personal side of the Carlyle question than are these on the whole significance of Carlyle for our literature. "He was the greatest of the Britons of his time; Titanic, not Olympian; a heaver of rocks, not a shaper. But if he did no perfect work, he had lightning's power to strike out marvellous pictures, and reach to the inmost of men with a phrase."

The sonnet on Carlyle which Meredith copied out for Mr. John Dennis as they sat together "in the early hours of the morning," in the Garrick Club, crowns the younger man's tributes to his great contemporary:—

"Two generations view thee as a fire
Whence they have drawn what burns in them most bright;
For thou hast bared the roots of life with sight
Piercing; in language stronger than the lyre;
And thou hast shown the way must man aspire
Is through the old sweat and anguish Adamite
As at the first."

EDWARD FITZGERALD AND HIS TIMES

BY AUGUSTUS RALLI

I.

FITZGERALD was a poet born in an age of prose. A few hundred lines of inspired verse and four volumes of correspondence possessing a distinctive charm are what remain of his passage through the world. The causes of this small production and of the progressive loneliness of one who had a genius for friendship are to be sought in the characteristics of the times. It is not needful for a man to play a leading part among his fellows to reflect the spirit of the age. As Carlyle says, "The great world revolutions send in their disturbing billows to the remotest creek."

The changes which had begun to transform England in the middle of the eighteenth century were operating upon the heart of man, and the evils of industrialism and commercialism were destroying his primitive nature. Increase of population brought increase in the severity of the struggle for existence. In the life of towns the feeling of the mystery of life grows weak; and the poetic, like the religious, soul faints for want of solitude and communion with nature. In former centuries, when England was still a "sylvan wilderness," when villages lived their lives untouched by the world beyond, when the few who travelled did so by stage-coach, the soul of man still had glimpses of the immortal sea. Stevenson tells how the settlers on the empty plains of Nebraska are afflicted by "a sickness of vision." They are "tortured by the distance," and their eyes "quail before so vast an outlook." A reverse process takes place in the town-dweller of to-day. His interests are crowded into the foreground, and the eye, glancing from each to each, is raised no more to a far horizon.

II.

The characteristic of the Victorian age was the rise to power of the commercial classes, in whom the faults of the century find their completest expression. Persons engaged in commerce, which has no end but the acquisition of money, suffer a loss of the moral sense. They have the defects of men of principle without the principles; and their honesty, like the much-vaunted Spartan valour, is a quality imposed from without. They come to believe neither in love nor friendship, nor in anything that has not a financial basis. Theirs is what Ruskin called vulgarity in its most fatal form—"the inability to feel or conceive noble character or emotion." Houston Chamberlain reminds us that "those who do not inherit definite ideals with their blood are neither moral nor immoral, but simply without morals." The failure of the man of commerce to teach right principles to his children is the cause of the growth of an un-moral race. And the reason why commerce is despised is not that it is more dishonest than other professions, but because of the type of character which it produces.

III.

The determining factor in FitzGerald's seclusion from the world and his friends was his unlucky though short-lived marriage. From the shock to his poetical temperament of contact with one that was positive and masterful, his recovery was but partial; yet there are previous signs of the ebb of his self-confidence. In 1844 he wrote that "a great city is a deadly plague"; and he is surprised that "worth and noble feeling persist in the country, since railroads have mixed us up with metropolitan civilisation." He laments the decline of the "English gentry," "the distinguishing mark and glory of England, as the Arts of Greece and War of Rome." Some of his happiest hours were spent in his sailing-boat, and perhaps he loved the sea because it set a term to the ravages of man.

For the last third of his life FitzGerald only communicated with his friends by letter. He has the diffidence of a man, unlearned in the lore of the world, with those who have pushed their fortunes with success. He wrote, "I never do invite any of my oldest friends to come and see me; am almost distressed at their proposing to do so." And, "I feel more nervous at the prospect of meeting with an old friend after these years than of any indifferent acquaintance. I feel that I have all to ask and nothing to tell; and one doesn't like to make a pump of a friend." Yet he is wistfully anxious to preserve perfect images of them in his heart. "I like to think over my old friends. There they are, lingering as ineffaceable portraits—done in the prime of life—in my memory." And having heard that Thackeray was spoilt by success, and had "a foible for great folks," he "wonders if this was really so."

IV.

FitzGerald was not akin to Wordsworth in his love of wild country, and elected to live "in a small house just outside a pleasant English town." "I am afraid to leave the poor town with its little bustle!" he wrote. "As one grows older, lonelier, and sadder, is not the little town best?" What he feared was the portentous growth of the town which followed the industrial revolution. He feared the suspicion sown in the human heart, the sordid ideas and brutal manners of the commercial classes, and the evils of democratic institutions. And above all, the alteration in the scale of values engendered by increased pressure on the means of subsistence: faith in the unseen—the former stay of character—displaced by knowledge of the psychology of associated men.

To resist such tendencies would seem to FitzGerald as futile as the efforts of the good woman to stem with a mop the advance of the Atlantic. He was not to be won by the specious pleadings for return to nature of Rousseau and his fellow-sentimentalists. But minds like his are not dejected by the thought that an end will come of man's activity on earth. To him and some others, stories of the mounds of Babylon and of mighty cities which have arisen and flourished, and of which no traces remain, do not come amiss. He must have shuddered at the ceaseless expansion of the town, as the cultured Roman of the Empire shuddered at the thought of the barbarian hordes lurking in the German forests. He turned from a world from which beauty had departed, and where the human spirit had been tethered to the material plane; but, unlike Scott, he could not forget the hideous present in the romantic past. He conserved the memory of what he had seen, and the result was the freezing of his creative springs. Yet that the materials of his happiness did exist upon this earth may be inferred from his backward glance at it, amid speculations in ideal regions. It is this spirit which informs the most wistful stanza of the "Omar":

"Ah Love! could you and I with Him conspire
To grasp this sorry Scheme of things entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then
Remould it nearer to the Heart's Desire!"

UNDER THE GREAT DOME

ITS span covers the busiest workshop in the world—the busiest and quite the most fascinating, whose myriad volumes are ransacked daily by armies of eager students; by the flotsam and jetsam of journalism, hunting ideas that may bring guineas; by great savants and scholars, intent on the completion of works of European reputation; and last, but most interesting, by novelists and dramatists who, having achieved “the insult of popularity,” take their works with amazing seriousness, and come here, to the Reading Room of the British Museum, to give them “historical verisimilitude.”

As you enter the room you are struck with a sense of its vastness—a sense that never wholly leaves you, though it is rapidly succeeded by other impressions as you note the silent, swift intensity with which most of the readers are attacking the work they have in hand, searching out from the huge catalogue the book they want, tracking down from reference to reference the material they require. Some few “slackers” there are, men who have dropped in to hear the latest literary gossip or to get a few words with a friend. But their listlessness only throws into bolder relief the strained attention of most of the readers, as they sit at the long rows of silent desks radiating from out the “centre,” where kindly officials are enthroned ready to help the new reader, who is sadly befogged by the intricacies of the catalogue, or to show the “old hand” where he has gone astray.

The readers comprise all sorts and conditions of men. That shabby, pathetic figure—half tramp, half mendicant he appears—is an Egyptologist of no mean reputation. The sleek, well-groomed person, who looks for all the world like a prosperous restaurateur, is a flourishing bibliographer, who is supposed to know the library rather better than the librarians, and who is always ready, with rare good nature, to let you draw on his store of information. That “handsome, ugly American,” who looks as if he had been in the prize ring, which is indeed the case, is one of the most popular descriptive writers of the day; and the giant to whom he is talking, and who bursts every now and then into Homeric laughter that startles the staid students round about, needs no introduction to the readers of EVERYMAN. There are “ghosts” and there are “devils” (of whom more anon) on every hand, but it is the angels who predominate, for at least two out of every three readers are women.

Women, indeed, are the great outstanding feature of the Reading Room. You find them everywhere, and everywhere find them busy. In the old days they were less ubiquitous, and kept largely to one part of the room: indeed, they still tell a story at the Museum of the embarrassment one of their number caused a bygone Superintendent. He had just welcomed a very distinguished foreign visitor to the Library, whom he had then left to his own devices. The foreigner, in his innocence, sat down at a desk reserved for ladies, and the Superintendent was horrified to receive the following note:—“A man has just sat down at our desk. Please have the creature removed.” That exclusiveness, however, has long since disappeared, and a more genial spirit pervades the “sweet girl graduates.” Has not G. B. S. solemnly asserted that all his profound knowledge of the sex is based on an observation of the advanced women of the Reading Room, what time he used to read there, alternating the score of Wagner with the text of Karl Marx?

Bernard Shaw is only one of the great men who in the past have been regular frequenters of the room. The old stagers will delight to tell you of others. There was Mr. Gladstone, who, however, was vouchsafed a private room. Lord Morley, who is one of the trustees, would not accept a similar boon, and used to stand waiting his turn to surrender his book, thinking the while perhaps of the days when, like the young men in front of him, he, too, was but a struggling journalist, to whom the Cabinet must have seemed a little remote. One other figure I can recall visiting the Reading Room—I mean the late Sir William Vernon Venables Harcourt, who entered with magnificent presence and reverberating voice. We all felt tremendously impressed by the great Plantagenet, and never shall I forget the obsequious haste with which the attendants ran to do the bidding of the great man, or the calm magnificence with which he brushed aside the rules and regulations of the establishment. His visit, in fact, was the most perfect commentary on democracy that I have ever experienced.

Like everything else in this imperfect world, the Reading Room has its more sombre side. Literature exacts an arduous life of her votaries, sometimes also a precarious one. You can find among the readers plenty of the tragedies of letters. Men who in their time have played many parts, occupied notable positions, but now are hard put to it to win a living, their ambition gone, their hopes buried, to them the Reading Room is a city of refuge, where they may toil all day long while strength remains, often for a bare pittance, without any hope of future recognition. Some of them are engaged on research work, devilling for well-known authors and publicists. Others still contrive to fight on as free lances from year to year. Others, often brilliant but erratic men, become the ghost of a successful author, whose style they can imitate to a nicety, taking the great man's work off his shoulders when he is too busy to himself discharge it, content—or should I say resigned?—to see another win the praise of their achievement: surely the most pathetic fate in human experience.

But we are not all of us poor people in the Reading Room. There is the young man of literary tastes and a small income, who came here ten years ago to write a masterpiece, and who has not commenced it yet. He is very good-natured, very dilatory, and very happy, and he dozes over Herbert Spencer, or somebody else, nearly every afternoon. For the Reading Room is a place of dangerous charm. The mighty dead seem to call to you to neglect your daily task and taste again of their wisdom. You feel you must look at your favourite poet instead of finishing your copy and mastering half a dozen dull books to get the facts. That way destruction lies. Rapidity is as essential in literature as in war. Witness the case of the old gentleman, fortunately well endowed with the goods of this world, who for years has been engaged on a monumental work on the world's shoes. But he can never get it to press. No sooner does he complete it than he finds that he has omitted another shoe!

HARD-AND-SHARP: A SOMERSET SKETCH

BY H. HAY WILSON

I.

THE name properly belonged to the field—all the fields in the parish had names—but it had been transferred to the proprietor because it fitted him so well, so that Hard-and-Sharp was the name by which the old baker was generally known. His real name was Redman, and by a series of coincidences—or perhaps it was something more—he lived on the Red Hill at the Red Farm, and in his youth he had had a red head, but now the few hairs that remained to him were of a somewhat dingy yellow. He was not very old, but had the air of having buffeted his way through life, toughening during the process, and having reached the place he now occupied at the expense of other people less hard than himself. In figure he was lean and corrugated, and looked as if he would rebound on coming into collision with anything else sufficiently hard. His only remarkable point was his nose—the leading feature amongst an otherwise insignificant collection—which stood far out at an aggressive angle right in the middle of his face.

II.

Hard-and-Sharp's nephew George was the young baker. He baked, so to speak, on sufferance, because he was a poor relation. That is to say, he was Hard-and-Sharp's only brother's only child, but as an orphan without capital he was considered a unit of no social value by Hard-and-Sharp, who had made his pile and held on to it very tight. Hard-and-Sharp sat on his nephew George, rather from habit than conviction. George bore it as best he could, for he had married on the strength of the bakery, and wanted to make his place too. Village life gives room to the instinct for permanence. In towns you gather together and take away; in the country you gather and stay, and build up the social order. The process is slow, and has a bad side as well as a good one.

Hard-and-Sharp lived at the bakery, in a beautiful old house, red roofed and many gabled. The field where the bakehouse stood was his own, his namesake too, but he rented the house from another such proprietor, who, like his tenant, had a more careful eye to his own gains than to those of his successor. The house was let at a low rent because it was in bad repair. It was big and roomy, but Hard-and-Sharp only chose to keep in repair so much roof-space as sufficed to cover his own head from the weather, and let the rain come through the rest. George, until he married, had lived with his uncle rent free, but the old man refused to have two for nothing, so George paid for his accommodation, and it was soon after this that Mrs. George started the project of a second house.

III.

Mrs. George was gentle and young, with soft brown eyes that saw further into the future than did those of her industrious male belongings. Hard-and-Sharp loved his new niece in his peculiar fashion, and when the second-house theory was started he showed a crabbed interest by putting every imaginable obstacle into the way of it. The plan was to rent a house belonging to Hard-and-Sharp some distance from the bakehouse. To reach it you went down the hill and up again, and round an orchard, and found the house hidden, a field's length from the road. It also was in bad repair: doors and windows decrepit from neglect rather than wear. Hard-and-Sharp had been born there, but had risen in life when he married the last baker's widow—since deceased—and had never gone back. He said he could not afford to repair the house, but George might have it at a low rent and do what he could. Mrs. George, with an eye on the future, urged her spouse to close the bargain, abetted by Hard-and-Sharp, who, seeing a conclusion imminent, immediately raised the rent.

That was how George started to become a factor in the equations of village life. It proved hard work—probably no one but Mrs. George ever knew how hard; for the wage-earner earns money, but it is the wife who manages that he shall do more than live by it. George paid his weekly 2s. 9d. and saved out of his 20s. wage at the bakehouse. Between orchard and garden the household was more than half supplied. George and his wife spent amazingly little on themselves. One lives frugally at these times; in prospect of independence a pinch is endurable, and a wife who contrives and pinches and papers walls and mends holes and suffers headaches with resignation and seldom goes beyond her own four walls makes a scanty provision go far. George saved, and would gladly have borrowed to pay for his house, since mortgages may decrease, but rent does not. But uncle was green and crabbed, and would not sell.

IV.

When, like George, a man has given hostages to fortune, it is necessary to have some security against her faithlessness. So long as George was his uncle's man, things were uncertain. He added to his savings with every available penny, for there was no knowing what Hard-and-Sharp might do next, and a sense of independence is a mighty safeguard. What he actually did was to die, earlier than, in the natural course of things, was to be looked for. But as even then his death was the most straightforward action of his life, it came as a surprise to all concerned. He left his money where money was—to a sister, that is to say, in the town, a prosperous person who appeared to need it much less than George. He left his nephew, the house in which they lived, and the field, his namesake, "Hard-and-Sharp," a mile away from it, near the bakehouse. So he died and is out of the story.

V.

The house and field came as a windfall to poor George, grown thin and livid already with care for a weakly child and a wife yet hardly comforted for her first-born, dead at two days old. Now at last he had something of his own, and some measure of security among the hazards of life. But property had its embarrassments. The house and the bakehouse were nearly a mile apart. George was now the baker. His savings had enabled him to take over the business. But, even if the Red Farm had been habitable, which it was not, or to let, which it was not either, how should he and his wife leave their other homestead, which they had made, were still making, bit by bit, to be a possession, hammering, digging, boarding and building, adding and improving, gathering their small stock, a pig, a poultry-yard, ducks by the brook, a few calves fattening for the market? Neither could they as yet manage to transfer the bakehouse. So George's wife, now his helper in the baking, undertook the fresh burden without question, and toiled between the two houses day after day, coming home often late at night through the fields, almost asleep as she walked.

VI.

That was some six years ago. Now the bakchouse is at home, and Hard-and-Sharp pastures cows and a mare with her foal alternately with another field beside the orchard, and between years provides George with a crop of hay. Mrs. George's face is livid, though she is still young. She makes no fuss about her past worries; somehow, she says, they got through it. People are still bad at paying, and, though money is scarce, prices have risen; but she supposes they will manage somehow. The children go to school beyond the Red Farm, and Mrs. George is grieved that boots for which she pays 10s. do not keep out the water on such roads; but the small chests are delicate, and she has to be careful of them. She herself has left her home once only, on a three-days' visit to a sister, during the ten years that she and George have been making for themselves and the children the fixed stock that has taken so much getting.

Two points present themselves for consideration: The first is the effect on character—and on constitution—of the hard-and-sharp conditions of poverty; the second is the courage of the working man's wife, who (generally speaking), when a position is in the making, is the one who makes most of it. Mrs. George says she would like to travel, "because it do widen anybody's mind." But if they should go to the Colonies she is afraid that George, who is not over-robust, might have to work too hard. The ordinary observer would have thought it barely possible that either she or George could have worked harder than they have. But she does not seem to count that for much.

The instinct for permanence lies at the roots of civic virtue. And in the country the space, the slow movement, the relationships of village life give it room. To win an abiding-place out of "hard-and-sharp" needs character. It also makes it. The problem is how to avoid developing civic virtues at the expense of physique.

KINSHIP

THE sunset creeps around my heart:

I am a cloud,
And in the dusk become a part
Of daylight's shroud.

Dawn glimmers through the world's great dome
Faintly and far.
My soul takes wing, and I become
A paling star.

I hear Pan's music pipe, and soar,
And I have flown
Through Time and Space, and kneel before
A pagan throne.

A lonely sparrow hopping through
My garden gate
Pecked on and on, and never knew
He had a mate.

I saw a wretch in prison pace
His little cell,
And all the sin that marked his face
Sent me to hell.

Last night a woman's ghastly eyes
Told me a dole
Would buy her body, and her vice
Has smeared my soul.

THOMAS MOULT.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE CHURCHES?

By W. FORBES GRAY.

PART II.

How comes it that a large and reputable body of working men must satisfy their religious cravings outside the churches? I believe that the churches are largely, though not wholly, to blame. This will be best discovered by setting forth the main causes which militate against church attendance in the case of working men.

I.

Nothing, perhaps, has contributed more to the alienation of the working man from religious communions of every kind than the notion that the church is apathetic, if not actually opposed, to the ideals of Labour. Deeply rooted in the mind of the worker is the conviction that churches are middle and upper class institutions bent on maintaining the established order of things, and with no message for the man who has to rear a large family on a small and, as it often happens, an uncertain wage. The religion of the churches he conceives as being remote from the concerns of his everyday life. In the opinion of the worker, the religion of the churches is a mere caricature of what Christ taught. Religion with him is not something inward and abstract, but an essentially practical affair. He pleads for a bold application of the principles enunciated in the Sermon on the Mount to the problems that are affecting the individual and collective welfare of men in this present life. Christianity, he maintains, has a social as well as an individual meaning.

Working men are fully justified in asking that the churches shall bear their part in the social and industrial improvement of the race, not by espousing the cause of either employer or employee, but by insisting, in season and out of season, that the teaching of New Testament Christianity shall be applied to the working out of every scheme for improving the material condition of humanity. That the forces of industrialism are so largely outside the churches to-day is the inevitable outcome of the remissness of the pulpit in not showing how utterly un-Christian is the present industrial system.

II.

This brings me to the second count in the workers' indictment of the churches. He believes that they are honeycombed by commercialism. The church is an undertaking run in the interests of well-to-do people who still wish to retain a bowing acquaintance with religion, and the parson is the manager, whose main business is to see that the tabernacle over which he presides is a "going concern." This can only be done by a studious regard for the requirements of its wealthy patrons. I believe the workers' view of the church is a caricature, but, like all caricatures, it is not without an element of truth. Churches are, in too many cases, the social expression of the ideals of those highest in the social scale. There is, it has been truly said, no great denomination to-day which does not make ten, perhaps one hundred, attempts to appeal to the upper and middle classes for one which it makes definitely to the workers. Equally true is it that ecclesiasticism too often is associated with class and caste. Even so impartial a witness as Dr. Joseph Parker was once heard to declare that "the pulpit is the paid slave of respectable society."

The worker has also become a non-churchgoer because of the low standard of Christian attainment of many of those who do go. Having more than a dim apprehension of what Christ taught, he looks for a distinctive superiority of character among His professed followers, but frequently finds none. And so he has come to the conclusion that there is a note of unreality about the churches. They do not "mean business." Cant and hypocrisy invade both pulpit and pew with scrupulous impartiality. Parsons denounce social wrongs and industrial tyrannies, but deal gently with those who are responsible for them if they happen to be members of their churches. The insincerity of the man in the pew is quite as apparent. He is a person who professes on Sundays what he repudiates on the six working days, who gives generously to religious and philanthropic objects, but is callously indifferent to the welfare of his workpeople. He prays on his knees on Sundays; he preys on his neighbours the rest of the week. While it is impossible to accept this as a fair representation of the average type of well-to-do churchgoer, justice demands us to acknowledge that men of this sort are to be found in all the churches, and, unfortunately for the cause of truth, the worker has a bad habit of judging Christianity by its failures.

III.

Another cause of non-churchgoing among the industrial class is the archaic type of service and of pulpit utterance which obtains in many churches. Christ spoke in homely parables which the common people could understand, but the message of the preacher of the twentieth century does not accurately reflect the thought and speech of the time. As Professor Peabody has said somewhere, "The talk of the churches is, for the most part, as unintelligible as Hebrew to the modern hand-worker." Then there is the archaic type of service for which the Church of England is mainly responsible. To a person endowed with the historic sense nothing can be more appropriate, more beautiful, more uplifting, than the Anglican Church service, but what consolation can it bring to the untutored mind of the worker familiar only with the language and the ideas of the factory and the market-place?

Then there are the divisions of the churches. The worker cannot understand how communions professing allegiance to the same religion should remain apart and, in some cases, should go the length of excommunicating each other. "How," the worker is wont to say, derisively, "these Christians love one another! If they all proclaim the same religion, why don't they join forces and present a united front to the common enemy?" But, alas! the worker is not the only person to deplore the divisive courses of the churches. All classes are convinced that sectarian rivalry and strife are a severe check on the progress of Christianity. At the same time, I am inclined to think that too much stress is laid on this argument by the habitual non-churchgoer. A single comprehensive Church, if such there could be, would not necessarily be an unmixed gain. Christian unity and ecclesiastical unity are totally different things. Professing Christians must ever strive after the former; the latter is a mere matter of expediency. Let the non-churchgoer who is continually upbraiding organised Christianity because of its schismatic temper remember that the most absolute unity may co-exist with and underlie all denominational differences.

IV.

But I shall very properly be asked: "Are all the faults on the side of the churches? Is there no defection among the workers themselves?" Unquestionably there is. While a very large proportion of working men are actuated by quite conscientious motives in their opposition to the churches, there is a section of the industrial population—I should be afraid to say how large—which, while neither sceptical nor Socialistic, is frankly indifferent about religious matters. Those who belong to this class do not go to church simply because they do not want to. With them the religious instinct appears to be dormant. There is no attraction for them; nothing to rouse their spiritual inertia, to awaken the instinct of combat, to quicken the moral sense or inspire the imagination. They are the victims of a deadly materialism, the devastating effects of which are not by any means confined to one particular class.

V.

There is a strong feeling in certain ecclesiastical circles that scepticism is largely accountable for the alarming growth of non-churchgoing. My own view is that the danger to be apprehended from this quarter is over-estimated. I do not believe that scepticism is spreading to anything like the extent that many people within the churches imagine. The average man of the twentieth century is not troubled about the credibility of Christianity. If he were, there might be some hope for a religious standpoint, for it would argue a state of mind groping for the light; but, alas! the "anxious inquirer" is conspicuous, if not by his absence, at all events by his numerical insignificance.

Non-churchgoers, it seems to me, may be roughly divided into two great classes. There are those who are alienated, not because they are anti-Christian, but because they believe the churches are not Christian enough, and there are those who are suffering from a spiritual atrophy which makes them contemptuous not only of the churches, but of religion itself. How are these two classes to be brought into direct relations with the Church?

VI.

As a preliminary, the churches, unitedly if possible, should lose no time in undertaking an exhaustive investigation of the causes of their comparative failure. Let them thoroughly master the facts of the situation, and then summon all the moral, intellectual, and spiritual forces at their command, with a view to dealing drastically with this momentous problem. It seems equally manifest that a determined effort should be made to lessen, for they can never be wholly eradicated, those repellent features of ecclesiastical life which estrange such large numbers of well-disposed people. This means that the note of conviction must be sounded within the churches as it has not been sounded for many a day, that character must be deepened and enriched, that pietistic abstraction must give place to sane Christian activity.

Then the churches must show more adaptability and receptivity in regard to the needs of the twentieth century. Organised Christianity must of necessity be conservative in the spirit which animates it, but it ought to be radical in its machinery and methods. It is not sufficiently recognised that the church, like society, is a living organism, and that what may be necessary at one stage of its development may be unnecessary or may need to be applied in a different way at a later stage. Empty churches may not become a thing of the past, but certainly they will be fewer, far fewer, when the gospel proclaimed says more about the relations of the individual Christian to the general order of human society, more about the realisation of the kingdom of God in every sphere of human activity.

THE ETHICAL FOUNDATIONS OF PATRIOTISM* ❦ ❦ BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THE ultimate moral reason for the existence and maintenance of those political units which we call nationalities, lies not in the exclusive superiority of any one nation, but, on the contrary, in the limitations of every nation. We believe in nationality, not because any one nation has monopolised all the virtues, but because no nationality has monopolised or can monopolise all the virtues; because each nation has only received certain specific gifts, and because other nations and other conditions are required to develop other gifts which may be equally important. We believe in nationality not in order that all nations shall be made similar, but in order that they may remain different. We believe in nationality not in order that there may be established one abode of political perfection, one ideal commonwealth, but because in God's universe there must be many mansions.

And we prefer the diversity of nationalities rather than the uniformity of empire, for the same reasons which make us prefer the varied landscape of coast and mountain rather than the uniform level of one vast plain, however rich and fertile. We prefer a diversity of nationalities for exactly the same reasons which make us prefer individuality and personality rather than the uniformity of an abstract type. As no climate or country can produce all the fruits of the earth, so no single nation can produce all the fruits of culture.

II.

Ours is a "pluralistic" universe, to use the expression of William James, a universe of free activities; and this pluralistic principle applies to the political world as much as to the moral and spiritual world. All nations are complementary.

No national civilisation is complete, and its incompleteness is the necessary result of a natural law: whether we call it the law of compensation or the law of limitation, or the law of division of labour, or of differentiation, or the law of variation, whether we call it, in philosophical language, the Principium Individuationis, or whether, with the theologian, we attribute it to the taint of original sin, and the imperfections of human nature.

Separate nations, therefore, can only develop in some few directions, and all superiority in one direction must be paid for by inferiority in another. A few chosen individuals—a Leonardo da Vinci, a Michael Angelo, a Goethe—may escape from this fatality. Whole nations, millions of individuals, can never escape from it. And for that reason we find that some nations are great in the arts of peace and others in the art of war. Some are supreme in commerce, others in philosophy. Some are supreme in theology, others in science. And for the same reason it is in the greatest nations that we find the most startling shortcomings and deficiencies. England has not produced one single supreme musician or sculptor, Scotland has not produced one single mystic thinker, Spain has not produced one single supreme scientist.

III.

Each nation, then, by virtue of its economic conditions, agricultural or industrial, by virtue of its geographical position, insular or continental, mountainous or level, by virtue of its historic traditions, military or peaceful, Catholic or Protestant, develops a culture of its own, strictly limited, necessarily imperfect; and it is precisely because of those limitations and imperfections, and in order to insure the diversity and complexity of humanity, that as many nations as possible should be allowed to retain and develop their artistic, religious, intellectual, and political individuality. To subject Europe to the influence or to the political control of a single great power would be to transform Europe into a Chinese Empire. Even assuming Germany, England or France to be vastly superior to its neighbours, the supremacy of any one nation would be a catastrophe for civilisation. It would damage both the victor and the vanquished, and it would damage the victor more than the vanquished. The vanquished might develop certain qualities under suffering and persecution, the victor would be demoralised by the use of brutal force, and his superiority would disappear.

* The arguments in the above article are based upon those advanced in "The Anglo-German Problem," by Dr. Charles Sarolea, published by Messrs. Nelson and Sons, 2s. net.

IV.

The invariable verdict of universal history is against any monopoly or supremacy, against any form of aggressive Imperialism, political or religious, imposing its rule in the name of a higher civilisation. The Roman Empire was destroyed by the very weapons which were used to subject inferior races. The Romans were the victims of the very tyranny which they used against others, and Roman decadence was only arrested because the policy of aggressive imperialism was reversed, because the spiritual forces of religion, law, education, and commercial intercourse were eventually substituted for temporal supremacy, and because even the barbarians were granted the same political rights as the citizens of Imperial Rome. But even thus the revival of the Roman Empire was only temporary, and a time came when the unity and uniformity of Rome were replaced by the bewildering but creative diversity of the Middle Ages.

Even at its best Imperialism is not a human ideal. Civilisation is not based on unity, but on diversity and personality, on individuality and originality. And if there is one lesson which history preaches more emphatically than another, it is this: that small nations have, in proportion, contributed infinitely more than great empires to the spiritual inheritance of our race. Little Greece counts for more than Imperial Rome. Weimar counts for more than Berlin. Bruges and Antwerp and Venice count for more than the worldwide monarchy of Spain, and the dust of the Campo Santo of Florence or Pisa is more sacred than a thousand square miles of the black soil of the Russian Empire.

No doubt there must be unity in the economic and religious fundamentals of human civilisation. As the infinitely varied phenomena of life suppose common chemical and physiological processes of combustion, of respiration, and circulation, even so the infinite complexity of social life supposes a common foundation of economics and religion. But beyond those common foundations full scope must be given to the diversity of human nature and human personality.

V.

Our political philosophy in general, and our philosophy of patriotism in particular, require complete revision. True patriotism is at the opposite pole from jingoism. The ideal of nationality is not born of pride, but of humility. Nationality does not justify the supremacy of the strong. It imposes and presupposes a scrupulous regard for the equal rights of the weak, who may be superior in moral culture, in proportion as they are inferior in military power.

The modern empire has nothing in common with the empires of the past. The modern empire may be based on identity of language, although the British Empire includes French-speaking and Dutch-speaking people, and although the Austro-Hungarian Empire is a very Babel of nations. The modern empire generally assumes community of political ideals. It is essentially a federation of self-governing communities, presided over by an older, wiser, and more experienced people, the first amongst equals, which establishes its rule, not on brute force, but on the force of suasion, example, and sacrifice.

VI.

If those principles are correct, if each nationality must be conceived as one of many specialised organs of universal culture, if the theory of nationality is the application, to the science of politics, of the principles of compensation, concentration, and division of labour, then it must necessarily follow that nationality can be neither final nor exclusive, neither absolute nor universal.

National ideals, as such, cannot be final. Nationality is the means and condition of human advance; humanity is the goal. By its very definition nationality is deficient and limited. We must submit to and work within those limitations. We must not glorify those limitations into perfections. We must lay upon our souls the humblest tasks of citizenship. We must not claim for this humble service the august significance and the unlimited scope of the Service of Man. As we stated before, the highest activities of mankind, Art, Science, and Religion, have all ceased to be national. They have all become international.

And the national ideal cannot be exclusive. We must see to it that humanity shall not suffer from exclusive absorption in national aims. In order to be good Englishmen and good Germans we must, first of all, be good Europeans. There exists a solidarity of Europe and America against Asia and Africa. An offensive alliance of one European nation with an Asiatic people against another European nation—as, for instance, the alliance of England and Japan against Russia, or the alliance of Germany with Turkey, or the old diabolical compacts of the English and the French with the Red Indians—is a crime against civilisation.

And, therefore, the popular catch-word, "My country, right or wrong," is a perversion of patriotism. Wrong does not cease to be wrong, and injustice and persecution do not cease to be injustice and persecution simply because, instead of being inflicted upon individuals, they are inflicted upon millions of sufferers. We know that in the world of crime there exist admirable examples of devotion, that even a burglar may be loyal to another burglar unto death. But a citizen owes no loyalty to national crime. I shall not stand by my country if she is morally wrong, and the highest service I can render her is to prove that she is wrong, and to prevent her from persisting in the wrong; and if I cannot persuade her, all I can do is to wish and pray that she may be defeated. For a defeat on the battlefield may be a great blessing—the only means to bring a nation back to sanity, and to see the evil of her ways; whilst victory obtained in a wrong cause may be the most awful calamity that can befall a nation, and one that may deflect the whole course of national history.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascope and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of past scenes and emotions—a silhouette.

THE tram rolled down the long length of the Camberwell New Road. The little old man on the front seat waved his stick excitedly towards a grey, stone-fronted building on the left. His bright eyes blinked at the tall pile. His face, seamed and gnarled with the stress of seventy years, lit up with a gleam of passionate rebellion.

"That there is the County Court," said he, "where they takes yer bits of things!"

A horsy-looking individual on the seat behind leaned forward leisurely.

"I'm sure," said he with definite encouragement.

"Where they takes yer bits of things," repeated the veteran.

"Six-and-thirty years I paid my rent, eight shillings a week—and furnished the 'ome 'andsome . . . six-and-thirty years . . . where did I live?" He turned fiercely on the horsy man. "Camberwell," said he. "Me and my missus and the kids. The gal died; the missus fell sick. I lost my job, and the 'ome went. Where did it go to?" He gazed round angrily. "The County Court—where they takes yer bits of things."

Someone at the back insisted that if people didn't pay their rent what could the landlord do?

The veteran was contemptuous.

"E 'ad my money," was the answer, "six-and-thirty years."

Someone once more endeavoured to explain the philosophy of the matter. "The County Court," he urged, "was for the poor as well as the rich."

The horsy individual murmured, "I'm sure," and spat reflectively. It seemed there had been three rooms to the home, three rooms furnished, slowly and by degrees, by dint of the reduction of tobacco, sundry pints of beer, and marvellous feats of charing on the part of the missus. There had been a long struggle to keep it together after the old man had lost his job. And then, as he repeated with pathetic iteration, the gal died, the missus was sick, her cleaning job fell through, and they took his bits of things.

Someone appeared to resent the fact that the missus had never been the same after the home went, and asked bitterly why they had not tried to get another.

"For the landlord?" asked the old man, and no one had an answer.

The missus had died, as she had lived, in harness. The boys, it seemed, without a home, had drifted, and were getting a living somehow, and the old man was on the tramp, desperately looking for work.

Someone remarked that it was a long time ago. The old man's face began to quiver. "She was my missus," he said passionately, and one realised for the first time how old and frail he was, and how hard life had hit him.

The tram rolled with a noisy clatter round to Camberwell Green. The old man laboriously hitched himself up from his seat and made his way down the steps.

"It is astonishing," said Someone, "what a lot of nonsense people do talk."

He motioned towards the frail old figure threading a painful way among the sea of traffic. The horsy man did not speak. He was leaning forward reflectively; perhaps he saw, as I did, the shadow that followed the brave old man, the shadow of the grey, stone-fronted building "where they takes yer bits of things."

CORRESPONDENCE

A WOMAN'S POINT OF VIEW.

Suggested by Dr. William Barry's "Appeal to the Woman's Movement."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Dr. William Barry has a poor opinion of women as writers. He quotes Lord Northcliffe as saying that more than fifty per cent. of journalists are women. "Women's novels," he says, "now predominate"; and while they mainly discuss problems of a kind, they are of little value as touching the real problems of life. "They turn on the same question always, that of elective affinities. If we open one of the numberless novels thus commended to our study, we shall not expect to find in it any lofty, austere, bracing lesson." "The women who write these books for women . . . are anarchists," he says. "For such there is no law." "It is equally certain that those who write and those who read these novels are of the same sex."

I have read with pleasure, and I hope with profit, the articles in your previous issues from Dr. Barry's pen. But this one, all honourable women must read with pain. And as a woman one feels impelled to reply. Of what women does Dr. Barry speak? Does he include all women writers up and down our land? Or are they only the literary scum—those who publish worse than useless matter under the covers of magazines—those papers which instead should be a "storehouse" of valuable material for the mind?

Dr. Barry says: "Let them (i.e., those who want votes and privileges hitherto denied them) cleanse the literature of women from these exceedingly foul stains. Men cannot do it." Are men, indeed, so helpless? Have they achieved so little that they have really set themselves to do in the past? Or is it for private profit this degrading trade goes on? If it exists, does it not pay the publishing firms? Then why does not Dr. Barry look there for the higher moral conscience he demands? Do men expect the "weaker vessels" to be stronger than they? And, if so, how much voice have they hitherto given them in business affairs? Maggie Tulliver's father said he "picked the mother because she wasn't o'er cute—picked her from her sisters o' purpose 'cause she was a bit weak like"; for he "wasn't goin' to be told the rights o' things" by his own fireside. We all know a few men with whom it would be an honour to be associated in anything; but they are the few.

Can Dr. Barry conceive it possible, taking into account the question of sex alone, that women should write such books to be read by women only, if there were no male affinities to read and to enjoy their publications? It is impossible to believe that "those who write and those who read these novels are" all "of the same sex."

He says that these writers "weaken respect for the marriage bond." These "female incendiaries" would break up the family by unlimited divorce, and that they "are paid handsomely by a thoughtless public for their work of destruction." We shall not inquire as to the proportion of men whose respect for the marriage bond has remained strong and permanent, nor as to the women who have patiently endured till death brought them a happy release. But the number of bad books published and the sums paid for them by thoughtless people can be more readily computed.

It is unjust to lay so much of the responsibility for poisonous literature upon women. Many women are foolish, and greatly err. But every intelligent and observant woman knows that men themselves are largely responsible for the unrest, or worse, that abounds among women to-day. Men have driven them to it—by declining to regard them as sensible beings having equal human rights with themselves; by depriving them of time, opportunity, and natural incentive to educate and better themselves; by making tyrannous demands on their strength, their endurance, and their love; or by treating them as puppets and playthings, when they should have respected them as the most wonderful work of God. Is it surprising that, after centuries of such treatment, deliberate or unintentional, some fractional proportion of them should now heedlessly touch bottom, and mistake for freedom a short-lived splashing in the mire?

Dr. Barry says that "the standard of female purity, in romance as in reality, must be fixed by women themselves." If it be flouted by a few, God grant that, for the sake of the young and impressionable, they may grow fewer! But it is fixed, by all honourable women. And it is inviolable and absolute.—I am, sir, etc.,

MARGARET THOMSON.

THE POETRY OF JOHN MASEFIELD.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—There is an implied challenge to battle in Mr. Gilbert Thomas's article on "The Poetry of John Masefield," a fanfare to all who may dare to come forth and do battle with him on the merits of his favourite poet. Before one enters into combat there is a natural desire to know what the fight is about. Is it the fallacy of art for art's sake? Why, that was only a passing craze. We ought, says Mr. Thomas, "to go to the highways and byways of the world for poetry." Is not that exactly where poets went so long ago as Chaucer's days? And Shakespeare, Cowper, Wordsworth, Crabbe, Burns, Hood, etc., were they not all wayfarers on the common paths? What more? "Poetry is not to be cabined within the bars of convention and tradition." By this last issue let us test Mr. Masefield's merits.

Taking "The Widow in the Bye Street" for dissection, it is just because Mr. Masefield has cabined himself within the bars of convention and tradition "that the poem is a failure," a pitiful perversion of great powers and a warning example of the cramping influence of adherence to archaic forms. Why should the muse attire herself in a hobble skirt? Why pour the wine of the new spirit into the old bottles?

The stanza form chosen by Mr. Masefield is the favourite one of Chaucer, adopted by him in "The Flower and the Leaf," "The Assembly of Fowls," etc. It afforded a very natural outlet to the genius of Chaucer. It suited his garrulous tale-telling, and it has to be remembered that the language of those days was more plastic, yielding, and adaptable than now, many words then being double-syllabled which have now stiffened into one. This stiffening means an acceleration of pace, an objection to prosiness of operation, and a desire for the impressionist touch. Unfortunately, Mr. Masefield has not only adopted Chaucer's stanza; he also imitates his asides and interpolated philosophising, but without the deftness and subtlety of the master. The result is not a genuine poem, but a rhyming—not always a rhythmical—masquerade, that sometimes neighbours on the grotesque. Reading the stanzas of Chaucer the student is conveyed on a melodious stream where the rhymes glide with a natural flow into order as a non-obtrusive contribution to the general harmony. Mr. Masefield's rhymes are tortured into place, and never lose the look of the awkward squad. They are welded together, not at

(Continued on page 248.)

What do you know about Aristotle?

HAVE you any idea of all that he stands for in the great story of the world's progress?

The history of the evolution of knowledge as we know it to-day makes fascinating reading. But at the beginnings of most of the sciences we find the great name of Aristotle—the speculative thinker who was equally distinguished by the range no less than by the power of his work. He is an oracle to-day in philosophy and on the earlier elements of all natural science.

Aristotle is deservedly called "The Father of Philosophy." But, as the little "Science History of the Universe" points out, his encyclopædic method embraced the first systematisation of the data of all art and science.

He may be said to have founded the science of Comparative Anatomy. He distinguished the nerves, as such, but he called them the canals of the brain. He discovered independently the difference between arteries and veins. He decided that the physician should have a knowledge of natural sciences.

He was very wrong at times.

He believed as Diogenes and Xenophanes did—in spontaneous generation; he taught that not only the smaller animals, but also frogs, snakes, and eels are produced spontaneously from mud! It was long ere the development of embryology and a knowledge of the life history of plants and animals set aside case after case of supposed spontaneous generation.

"The Science History of the Universe" takes us on from Aristotle to Archimedes, who was his immediate follower in the study of physics, as Plato and Socrates were his predecessors in philosophy. The ten little volumes of the "Science History" take us swiftly and delightfully from the first beginnings of every science down to the wonders of to-day. They make the most fascinating reading ever issued; but nothing is perhaps more attractive than the vivid allusions to this wonderful thinker and scholar which occur so frequently in the early parts of the story of science.

ΑΡΙΣΤΟΤΕΛΗΣ ὁ ΣΤΑΓΙΡΙΤΗΣ
ARISTOTELIS STAGIRITES PHILOSOPHVS.
أَرِسْتَوْفُوكْلِسْ اِلْتِنَاخِرْ كِسْفِلسُوفِى اس
אריסטוטלס שטאגיריטס פילוסוף
ARISTOTLE, THE FATHER OF PHILOSOPHY.

"The Science History of the Universe"

Complete in 10 Handy Little Volumes.

The Wonderful Story of what Man has done.

NOW OFFERED ON APPROVAL FOR SEVEN DAYS' FREE EXAMINATION.

Our Special Christmas Offer.

We ask every reader of "Everyman" to take advantage of our special Christmas Offer; to send for the books free, on approval, without charge or obligation to order them; to read and examine them for seven clear days; and to send them back at our expense on the eighth day if you decide they will not be useful to you. This straight-forward Christmas Offer of Free Approval is the very best proof that the series is what we say it is—a complete record of the history of science from the earliest beginnings, long before the days of Aristotle, down to the marvellous achievements of our own day and the exploitation of science in the commercial markets of the world. Send for the books now and judge for yourself; it will not cost you a penny.

THE FREE APPROVAL FORM.

To the WAVERLEY BOOK CO., Ltd., 7 and 8, Old Bailey, London, E.C.

Please send me, carriage paid, for seven days' FREE APPROVAL, "The Science History of the Universe." If I decide not to order the work I will return it, carriage forward, on the eighth day after I receive it. If I decide to keep it, I will remit to you on the eighth day a First Payment of 2s. 6d., and, beginning 30 days after this First Payment, five further monthly payments of 5s. and one final monthly payment of 2s. 6d. (The price for Cash within eight days is 28s. 6d.).

N.B.—Orders from abroad will not be sent on approval nor on these terms; they must be accompanied by Money Orders for 32s. 6d.

NAME.....
PROFESSION OR OCCUPATION.....
ADDRESS.....
E.M.N. 1912.

POST
this
TO-DAY

N.B.—We pay carriage both ways if you decide not to keep the work.

the white heat of artistry, but go together with the clang of the forehammer. And, alas! the fusing is imperfect.

The poem has a whole of some 280 stanzas. It would have been infinitely better if it had been compressed into half that number by getting rid of the superfluous tags of rhyme called into order to eke out the stanzas.

Mr. Maschfeld further errs on the side of traditionalism by calling in the aid of a chorus to make comment, or otherwise do general service. Sometimes the chorus is Fate, sometimes it is Life and Death—Life introduced incognito by the pronoun "It," and remaining masked for the space of ten stanzas, when his identity is declared. Death is sometimes knitting a shroud, sometimes playing cards, sometimes chuckling over the fall of its future victim, sometimes uttering pietistical remarks.

A realistic poem should be realistic throughout, and the idea that an English court would be ignorant that a murdered man killed within a few miles of his home was married, and in consequence believe that a loose woman was his fiancée, calls for more credence than should be required, even in a poem.

Jimmy, a simple clown, killing a rival unintentionally through jealousy, is hung, the judge, in passing sentence, uttering sentiments that would do credit to a Braxfield or a Jeffries, amid the cheers of the crowd. How is this for realism? The judge, after passing sentence, adjourns to an adjoining room, and the afflicted mother calls upon her son and consoles him with the reflection that affairs will go on as usual after he is dead. The latter are melodramatic incidents that might well be excluded.

Artificial simplicity is the best verdict that can be passed on the poem. And there are inconsistencies. Jimmy varies in his utterances from the raptures of a Tennysonian lover to the slang of a clodhopper. Anna, too—the woman with a past—expresses herself often in falsetto tones and in high-set language.

It may be admitted freely that, after all, there is a glowworm, phosphorescent gleam about the poem after it is retired into the mind, and the wriggling form to which it is attached is forgotten. There are occasional passages with finish and form, and the poem concludes with five or six stanzas with melodious, rippling flow, which one finds restful and cannot be thankful enough for, after punting past the snags and sandbanks of its tortuous course. But that it is a great poem, or within measurable distance of being a great poem, the writer, in his obtuseness, cannot believe. How it came to be written by the author of "Captain Margaret" and "Multitude and Solitude" is to him an unfathomable mystery.—I am, sir, etc.,
Alyth, Perthshire. JAMES Y. GEDDES.

THE PROBLEM OF DIVORCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It was a great disappointment to me, and I doubt not to many others, to read the very negative character of the article by Mr. Hector Macpherson under the above heading. Bearing in mind the statement in the first number of EVERYMAN, that its aim and purpose was, and I suppose is, "to consider life from the higher plane of the ideal," it was doubly disappointing. I anticipated, and in view of that aim and purpose, I think not unreasonably, that your contributor's article would have been a severe denunciation of the Majority Report of the Commission just issued, for the question of divorce strikes deep into the very foundation of our life, individual and national.

To increase facilities for divorce would, in my view, be one of the most retrograde steps ever taken in this country. To weaken family life is to weaken the State, for the family is but the State in miniature. The suggestion to increase those facilities to the number specified in the Report seems to me to make it a matter of speculation whether marriage is to be necessary at all. Why go through the farce of a marriage ceremony? Surely it is a superfluity.

We may take it that at least 60 per cent. of marriages in this country are solemnised in church or chapel, and on the same basis we may assume that a similar, or nearly similar, percentage of divorces come from marriages so solemnised. Are we then to assume (having regard to the form of service used) that those people, who, in probably the most solemn moment of their lives, bound themselves before God until death should part them, were merely repeating a set of words which to them conveyed not the slightest significance?—that they were trifling with God for the mere sake of a respectable wedding ceremony? No, it cannot be believed—the thought is too awful. Yet day by day the Divorce Court proceedings give colour to that thought. How shall we reconcile the one with the other?

What is to be the end of it all? The effect of loosening the marriage bond must inevitably lead towards weakness of morals and instability of character, and so affect our national well-being, for if a nation is not prepared to honour its word in its domestic relations, how shall it be trusted in matters of international importance? With the very essence of its life sapped, with its most solemn promises counted as naught, a nation must slip for ever downward, even unto the deep. "A lie always comes back," said Carlyle, and the individual who lies when he promises to bind himself in marriage until death shall break the bond is bound to meet that lie somewhere in his earthly course.

Let us pause to think before we increase the facilities for dissolving family ties. To-day is ours, but to-morrow belongs to another generation. Let us consider, then, that those who are children to-day and fathers to-morrow need the best moral strength that we can impart to them. Shall we teach them that promises are of none effect, and that marriage is a convenience which can be set aside when it ceases to be attractive? No, no—a thousand times no! Let us rather try and "consider life from the higher plane of the ideal," and teach them in this age, "when established institutions are being swept away and old beliefs are being inquired into," that marriage is the most solemn and highest function of man's life, to be entered into in no light spirit, and to be lived until our eyes shall close upon this world for ever.—I am, sir, etc.,
FRANCIS E. LEWIS.

Westcliff-on-Sea, November 25th, 1912.

THE COLLAPSE OF SOCIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Why does Mr. Chesterton name his article "The Collapse of Socialism"? Not in any one of his seven paragraphs does he even discuss Socialism—its merits or its demerits. Why he should talk of the "collapse" of a system which has never had any real, physical existence, passes the normal comprehension.

It appears to the casual reader that the article is merely a letter aimed at the head of one F. McL., who has disagreed with Mr. Chesterton on the question of Peasant Proprietorship. The writer, thinking that it might conceivably be stretched out to the length of an article, proceeded to inveigh against the existing Labour Parliamentary Party, the existing

(Continued on page 250.)

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

For Christmas.
THE WORDS OF THE SONG ON THE ROLL

"Songola" Music Rolls enhance the charm of the Player Piano. Add a selection of "Songola" Music Rolls to your Roll repertoire and your musical evenings will be brighter and better than ever.

These Rolls are musically perfect, strong and climate-proof. They are manufactured by the makers of "Linenized" Music Rolls, which have long been recognised as by far the best Music Rolls produced.

SEND FOR "SONGOLA" CATALOGUE 22.

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., Ltd.,
94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.
Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.
Agents in all Large Towns. Names and Addresses on application.

"JUST WHAT I WANTED FOR THE OFFICE"

AN INEXPENSIVE BUT MOST USEFUL GIFT—USEFUL ALL THE YEAR ROUND—

IS A

"NUGGET" BOOT POLISHING OUTFIT

A "NUGGET" OUTFIT contains:
1 Tin of "NUGGET" Polish,
1 Special Brush (pure bristles),
1 Polishing Pad ("Schvylt").

In Black or Brown.
Of all Bootmakers and Stores, or direct from the NUGGET POLISH CO., LTD., LONDON, S.E., on receipt of 1/- (or in metal case, 1/3).

NUGGET
Waterproof BOOT POLISHES & BLACK-BROWN

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatin, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free, 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE.

This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued.

General Literature—Art—Science—Nature Study—Books of Reference and Fiction Generally.

All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy. Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

All who wish to understand the effect of Women's Work on the Wages and Employment of Men, should read the articles by Miss MARGARET McMILLAN and C. V. DRYSDALE, D.Sc., in the

"HANDBOOK ON WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE,"

14 other Distinguished Contributors. Published by the MEN'S LEAGUE, 136, St. Stephen's House, S.W. Price Sixpence; postage 1d.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

EVERYMAN AND EVERYWOMAN interested in good books is invited to send for a free specimen copy of the December issue of "M.A.B." (Mainly About Books), an illustrated magazine for book-lovers, containing a fine poem by RICHARD MIDDLETON, etc., etc.—Address the Proprietor, "M.A.B.," 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dep.: E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

The Marvel Piano

at 15 Guineas.

A FIRST-CLASS PIANO,
with all modern improvements.
In Oak, Walnut, or Ebonised Case.

This Piano combines all the excellences of a HIGH-GRADE INSTRUMENT
at a price that brings it within the reach of all.

GUARANTEED FOR TEN YEARS.

Instruments delivered carriage paid in Great Britain on receipt of first monthly instalment of 10/6

Send for our Illustrated Catalogue, containing particulars of this and many other models.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION,
56E, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original.
Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

FREE! Grand Set of 12 BALKAN STATES, including Greece
(Olympian Games), Turkey, Roumania, Bulgaria; send 1d. postage. Gift
C 406.—BRIGHT AND SON, 164, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied.
Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported.
METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE "IDEAL" DIVISIBLE MS. BOOK. All work can be done in one book and rearranged in any manner. Absolutely simple. No rings, posts, or staples. Rapidly becoming universal at all Universities. Send 1s. 6d. for specimen.—WM. HUNT, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

TYPEWRITING.—University resources. Ordinary matter 1/- 1,000. We give a higher degree of accuracy in any subject or language than elsewhere. Unnumbered testimonials, copies free.—HUNT'S OXFORD
COPYING OFFICE, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY invites lonely men and women everywhere to become members and obtain wider social and intellectual interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet and invitation form send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, GREENCROFT GARDENS, HAMPSTEAD LONDON.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN THE STUDY
OF ASTROLOGY. By ALAN LEO. Full particulars of these unique lessons on application to Secretary, Lessons Department, "Modern Astrology" Office, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London.

J. M. DENT & SONS will publish in January next

VOL. I.

THE

EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPAEDIA

Edited by ANDREW BOYLE.

1/-
NET.
CLOTH.

ONE VOLUME PER MONTH will be issued DURING THE YEAR, so that VOL. XII. will complete the full set in December, 1913.

There will be over 500,000 words in each volume, and the complete work will contain 6,000,000 words, and more articles than any similar work.

SEND FOR SPECIAL EIGHT-PAGE PROSPECTUS.

1/-
NET.
CLOTH.

137b, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD ST., STRAND, W.C.

Government, some recent legislative enactments, and a Bill now before Parliament. How any one of these is remotely connected with the theory of Socialism only Mr. Chesterton himself can explain. His castigation of the capitalistic oligarchy now governing England, however just and praiseworthy it may be, makes the title of his article still more remarkable.

Let us assume that Mr. Chesterton has mixed the name of the article with that for next Saturday's Daily News, and intended to call this "The Chance of the Peasant. Part II." Now let Mr. Chesterton consult any economic library he likes, and he will find that every economist with a reputation to lose will support and amplify these following points:—

(1) No prosperous Peasant State can exist unless there is a considerable external market for its produce. Denmark, the outstanding Peasant State of the Western world, owes its pre-eminence to its position amidst the great industrial areas of England, France, and Germany. Again, in France the peasant proprietor in Normandy is more prosperous than the peasant proprietor in Brittany, for the simple reason that Normandy is nearer the industrial areas which comprise his market. Still further to the south-west of France the peasant proprietors are in a worse condition than those of Brittany.

(2) Although the Peasant State may exist on the Continent, it by no means follows that it could in England. As a system, it is unsuited to the economic conditions of England, to her soil, to her climate, and to the temper of her people.

(3) In all the existing Latin-European systems of peasant proprietorship, the richest of the peasants are practically worse housed and worse fed than the better class of English cottagers; while the poorest of them work hard during long hours, but do not really get through much work, because they feed themselves worse than the poorest English labourers. Their horizon is limited by narrow hopes. They do not understand that wealth is useful only as the means towards a real income of happiness.

Sir, I have limited myself to these three brief criticisms of a system now existing, as Mr. Chesterton says, over a larger part of the planet. If he would only consider these points, taking the words in their practical and useful sense, and not asking whether it might not be used in a more vague (and useless) sense, I feel convinced that his views on the Peasant State in England would be materially modified.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHARLES W. BUCKBY.

ON "EVERYMAN."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I was amused, but not surprised, to see that you are accredited by two recent correspondents of being alike hostile to Catholic and Protestant interests.

This, no doubt, is owing to your liberal-mindedness in giving both an equal place as contributors to your journal. That, I perceived, was your motive from the first, because human and divine things cannot well be separated from each other in times of need.

I am neither Protestant nor Catholic, according to the theological teaching, but my heart has always yearned after a living and universal Church, where weary pilgrims may gather together for meditation and praise to the Giver of all good.

I have never sought to question the sincerity of genuine believers, whatever their creed may be, any more than doubt my own earnest convictions of right and wrong. Perhaps my sympathies lie closest to the Church of my fathers, the early Covenanters, though

I have never sought to blind my intelligence to the fact that theirs was a truant branch, like other dissenters, which had broken away from the original apostolic fathers, grafted and cultivated by their own independent principles on Scottish soil. And I have long realised, could it be possible for me to believe in the infallibility of the Old and New Testaments as direct revelation of God through Christ and the Virgin Mary, I should turn Catholic at once and bow to the authority of the Roman Catholic Church with fervent zeal. But, by a strange fatality, my reasoning and critical faculties have ever been the prevailing masters of my judgment from earliest childhood, curiously united to a naturally psychic temperament.

Perhaps what has appealed most to me among the general subjects you are bringing forward for critical comparison are the short articles which have appeared in EVERYMAN from the able pen of Dr. W. Barry, particularly "An Appeal to the Woman's Movement." Though only an obscure old woman, I shall await his judgment of "the tyranny of the novel" with heartfelt satisfaction.

SCOTSWOMAN.

November 24th, 1912.

P.S.—The pity is that such a versatile, broad-minded reviewer as Canon Barry did not think of tackling the anomaly of the woman Anarchist fully a quarter of a century ago, when it was first started by Olive Schreiner, and followed by a rapid succession of works of a similar order, as "An African Farm," down to Cycely Hamilton and a whole army of cackling incendiaries, each waving her flaming torch of revolt in the literary field of corrupt fiction.

But do not mistake me. I now most earnestly desire the Conciliation Bill to pass, and have done so for fully two years. For there are many highly gifted, noble, pure-minded women fitted to redeem womanhood from her present degradation by showing their willingness to work under the same banner with their fellow-men harmoniously and effectively for the nation's good.

A. C.

THE "EDWIN DROOD" CONTROVERSY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It is a pleasure to be in agreement with at least one writer upon the Drood mystery. I have long held with your contributor, Mr. Geddie, that "Edwin Drood" is the work of a man whose invention was gone, whose brain was spent, but who still cherished one ambition: to leave personality running into six figures instead of the five he did leave. When will blind admirers of Dickens (and my admiration is deep) bring themselves to admit that this half-told tale, except in descriptive powers, falls to pieces, is forced, the conversations stilted, and that characters like the Reverend Crisparkle, Datchery, Durdles, and Sapsea are unlike anybody they or I have ever met?

I offer Mr. Geddie two clues which may help him to fathom Dickens' intentions and to discover the real murderer of Drood. Mr. Geddie omits to state that when, in Chapter VIII., Jasper invites Edwin and Neville to drink a stirrup-cup with him, he drugs their liquor, and that Neville goes away intoxicated, leaving Jasper and Edwin together. That is the first clue. Clue 2 is to be found in Chapter I., "The Dawn," and Chapter XXIII, "The Dawn Again." The discovery of Drood's murderer was to have been made by Princess Puffer, when Jasper, visiting her opium den a last time, would have spoken words in drowsy tones. She would not then say, as she does in Chapter I., "unintelligible!" but "intelligible!" and the mystery would have been cleared up.—I am, sir, etc.,

FRANK WEAVER.

17, Balcombe Street, Dorset Square, N.W.

Be sure it's

Velma

chocolate REG.

—the result of years of study in blend and make. Side by side with Velma other chocolates taste flat. Velma is delicious, true chocolate, as true as it is fine, as fine as it is true—the greatest achievement in chocolate yet.

See the gold corner on the red packet

3d. 6d. 1s.

SOLE MAKER

Suchard

FREE LESSONS IN ENGLISH, LATIN AND LOGIC

The Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (Camb.), has obtained a world-wide reputation by his "Simplified" system of teaching the supposedly difficult Hebrew language which has gained the admiration of thousands of students and scholars. This method has now been successfully applied to the teaching of English, Latin and Logic. A thorough knowledge of these subjects will be a great asset to anyone whose desire is to improve his position and take his place in the forefront of commercial, social and political life.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

The first four Lesson Papers, with full particulars of this scientific and simplified system of teaching by correspondence, will be sent to you post free and without any obligation on your part.

The "WILCOX" System is Unique, Thorough and Tried.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

BOOKS FOR XMAS.—Our New Catalogue, containing the best Books of the Season—Books for Children, Bibles, Prayer and Hymn Books, Standard Books in Leather Binding, etc.—will be sent post free on receipt of a card.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, London, W.C.

NOVELS, Short Stories; Articles; Poems, placed with 175 Publishers and Periodicals, at highest prices. 16-pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

BOOKS WHICH CHARM

N.B.—One of the most beautiful books published this season.

POEMS OF PASSION

POEMS OF PLEASURE.

By ELLA WHELELER WILCOX.

With 20 Coloured Illustrations by DUDLEY TENNANT.

Size 11½ in. by 9 in. 300 pages. Cloth gilt and box, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe (500 copies only, on hand-made paper, bound in vellum, and signed by Author and Artist, £2 2s. 6d. net.

New Volume of Poems by ELLA WHELELER WILCOX, entitled:

THE ENGLISHMAN.

Cloth, 1s. net; lambskin, 2s. 6d. net; velvet calf, 3s. 6d. net. Postage 2d.

SOME OLD FLEMISH TOWNS.

Written and Illustrated by

GEORGE WILKINSON EDWARDS.

Size 10 in. by 6½ in. 336 pages, with 5 coloured and 30 half-tone full-page plates. Cloth gilt, with artistic designs, gilt top, boxed, 18s. net. Postage 4d. Standard.—“His sketches of quaint architecture, the imposing churches and belltowers, the hotels de ville, etc., are admirable.”

1,500 MILES ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Just Published. Demy 8vo. 24 full-page Illustrations. Cloth gilt, 6s. net. Postage 4d.

THE LOG OF THE “EASY WAY.”

By JOHN L. MATHEWS.

This book is the description of a honeymoon spent on a houseboat while drifting down the Mississippi from Chicago to New Orleans, occupying five months. A book of unique adventures.

One of the Best Novels of the Season. 6s post free.

THE MODERN EVANGELINE.

By CATHERINE WILSON.

Daily Mail.—“This is a strong and surprising novel. . . . ‘The Modern Evangeline’ is one of the best novels of the season.”

Morning Post.—“Catherine Wilson is a girl whom everyone must admire. . . . But it is not the story of her search that is the really interesting part of the book; it is the adventure that befalls Vickery in his life among the Moors and Arabs, and the humor and freshness with which they are described. . . . One awaits the denouement with breathless interest. . . . A very entertaining and well-written story.”

Just Published. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. Cloth gilt, 6s. post free.

THE BURGUNDIAN.

By M. P. ANOELLOTTI.

The Times.—“A spirited and capable historical romance of the struggle between France and Burgundy in the early part of the fifteenth century.”

London: GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd., 12 & 13, Henrietta St., Covent Garden.

THE BASIS OF FRIENDSHIP

By D. N. DUNLOP

—Editor, “The Path”—

Attractively printed on good paper, with brown and gold cover, designed specially for a GIFT BOOK.

Frontispiece, half-tone on cameo paper, of the Master Jesus, after the Portrait by Schmiechen.

This little Booklet is a reprint from The Path, of Aug. and Sept., 1911, and is published at the request of many who found inspiration in the original article.

Price 6d. Nett.

(By Post, 6½d.)

THE PATH PUBLISHING CO.,
Oakley House, Bloomsbury St., London, W.C.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GERMANY

THERE are lying before me on my table nine volumes dealing with Germany and German relations, and those only represent a small part of the literary output of the last two months. The fact proves, at least, the keen interest with which people in this country study German matters, and that although the study of German is neglected in the schools by reactionary pedagogues, it is not for lack of a demand on the part of the British public.

The place of honour in our list belongs to the two volumes of Maximilian Harden, “Word Portraits” (William Blackwood and Sons) and “Monarchs and Men” (Eveleigh Nash, 10s. 6d.). The author has been for twenty years the editor of the Zukunft, and during that time has been one of the best-hated men of the Empire. He combines political insight, encyclopædic knowledge, and the intellectual versatility—characteristic of the Jewish race—with a moral courage and artistic gifts of the very highest order. It is this rare combination which gives us the secret of his extraordinary influence in a country where political journalism is still in its infancy, and is not yet liberated from Government censorship. Whether the influence of Harden has been for good or evil, is one of the most controverted questions of German politics. His admirers remind us that on one occasion at least his splendid audacity has cleansed the Augean stables of Court and Society, and that he has achieved a historical victory in the most sensational political trial of recent times. On the other hand, his opponents remind us that again and again he has inflamed popular prejudice and stirred warlike passion. One fact is certain, that Harden is a dangerous Nationalist, that he is a loyal disciple of the old Bismarck school—the school which believes in blood and iron—and that if the German people were to listen to his advice, Europe would be plunged into an international war.

Whatever we may think of Harden’s influence, the political theories detract nothing from the fascination of the two volumes which are published by Messrs. Blackwood and Eveleigh Nash. The “Word Portraits” cover an enormous range, and include writers and soldiers, artists and actors, monarchs and statesmen, Frenchmen like Zola and Briand, Norwegians like Ibsen, Russians like Tolstoy. English readers will naturally turn to the portraits of King Edward VII. and William II. Students of European history will be attracted by the sketches of the Tsar, of Pope Leo XIII., of Bismarck and Holstein—that secret wirepuller of German diplomacy. Students of literature will be mainly interested by Harden’s criticisms of Ibsen, Zola, and Tolstoy. But it is difficult to single out any particular chapters where everything is arresting. For each study is written by a penetrating psychologist, who observes and analyses his heroes and victims from the inside. Each portrait is drawn by a man who is a superb artist in word painting. And the extraordinary fact is that when Harden is not biased by personal prejudice, he is catholic and generous in his appreciations, and he can mete out equal justice to anti-Semites like Stöcker and Lueger, to Chauvinist Frenchmen like the Marquis de Galliffet and Briand, to the rulers of the Roman Catholic Church.

MR. PERRIS* has made a serious and important contribution to the vast literature of the Anglo-German problem. Holding the eminently sane theory that the cure for most human ills is to know, he has set himself to acquire all the knowledge within his reach and to communicate it on the most convenient scale to his fellow-countrymen. To lay the spectre of the Anglo-German peril the customary formulæ of well-intentioned exorcists will not suffice; we must know how and why the phantom arose. Nor will it help to attempt simply to portray it as it appears to-day; spectres have uncertain features, and one artist's picture will have little resemblance to another's. Mr. Perris has, we are sure, taken the only sound course. He has explored the haunted house from roof to basement, and he has investigated all the details of the "crime"—if we may so express ourselves—that set the spirit walking. In other words, he has given us a short but pithy history of the German people from the earliest times, a compendious geography of Germany, short accounts of all the movements that have agitated or attracted the German mind, and some admirable sketches of the men who are, rightly or wrongly, supposed to have had most to do with the direction of modern German tendencies. "Germany and the German Emperor" is not exactly an encyclopædia, but it is a mine of facts and suggestions for the better understanding of what is, for the civilised world, a matter of life and death.

* “Germany and the German Emperor.” By Herbert Perris. 12s. 6d. net. (London: Andrew Melrose.)

BOOKS WANTED. All in 3 vols., First Editions, 25/- each offered. Lorna Doone, 1869; Wild Wales, 1863; Jane Eyre, 1847; Desperate Remedies, 1871; Romola, 1863; Adam Bede, 18 9; Workers in the Dawn, 1880; Men of Character, 1838; Harry Richmond, 1871; Richard Feverel, 1859; Rhoda Fleming, 1865; Emilia in England, 1864. 100,000 Books in Stock. State Wants. —Baker’s Great Book Shop, 14 & 16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FORTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

The diagnosis that Mr. Perris gives of the international malady—he does not prescribe, definitely at least—may be summed up in a very few words. Unless we have grossly misread him, the two chief causes he finds for the present unrest are the political and economical youthfulness of the German people and the influence of Bismarck on European politics and on the German mind. With regard to the former point he would find few to challenge him; German history is a record of disappointments and failures, till a century ago, when the steady upward progress began. Then, some fifty years later, success began to shower her brightest smiles on a race unused to prosperity. It is no wonder if the Germans threw aside their philosophies and lost their calm consideration of the world. Instead of, as heretofore, everything, nothing now was impossible. Mr. Perris points out that this late arrival in the front rank of the nations, though bad for the national ethics and dangerous for the national economy, has had its compensations. The Germans were able to profit by the experiences of their predecessors in the fields of industry, to save time and to avoid mistakes.

The second main reason, we have gathered from Mr. Perris, for the strained international situation, is the influence of Bismarck. We are not in the least disposed to quarrel with this view, but we cannot agree that the Iron Chancellor was as complete a failure as he is represented in these pages to have been. His mental attitude was wrong, his methods were wrong, and the last part of his career was not rich in positive successes; but without his wonderful decision and singleness of aim, it is difficult to believe that Germany would have stood where she does to-day. He sowed tares, a rich crop of them, but he also sowed much wheat. Mr. Perris prefers to think that Germany would have been as great, and Europe more habitable, if Bismarck had never existed. "If he had been born on the Liberal side"—then Germany would have been a nation indeed! As it is, she is gnawed at the vitals by a Red Peril, "four Irelands," a false Imperialism, a Prussian Constitution, a reptile Press, while Europe is a vast armoury, and "men's hearts fail them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." But nobody has shown more conclu-

MACMILLAN'S BOOKS FOR PRESENTS

George Frederic Watts. Vols. I. and II.: The Annals of an Artist's Life. By M. S. WATTS. Vol. III. The Writings of G. F. Watts. With 40 Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 3 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d. net.

The Globe.—"In this memoir Mrs. Watts has erected to her husband's memory a monument worthy of its subject."

Francis Paget, Bishop of Oxford. By STEPHEN PAGET and J. M. CAMPBELL CRUM. With an Introduction by His Grace the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY. With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo. 15s. net.

Further Reminiscences of H. M. Hyndman. 8vo. 15s. net. [Tuesday.]

White Ear and Peter: The Story of a Fox and a Fox-Terrier. By NEILS HEUBERG. With 16 Coloured Plates by CECIL ALDIN. Pott 4to. 6s. net.

Poems by William Allingham. Selected and Arranged by HELEN ALLINGHAM. With Portrait. Pott 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Golden Treasury Series.]

Pocket Edition of the Prose Works of Rudyard Kipling. Printed on thin paper. In blue cloth. With gilt edges. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d. net per volume. Also in scarlet limp leather, 5s. net each.

 List on application.

EDITH WHARTON'S NEW BOOK.

The Reef. 6s. The Times.—"There are at least half a dozen chapters in 'The Reef' that are models of construction, of climax, its imaginative beauty, its economy, its serene certainty of handling—its whole art and craft will be as welcome as they are familiar to the reader of 'The House of Mirth' and of 'Ethan Frome.'"

JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW BOOK.

The Heroine in Bronze; or, a Portrait of a Girl. A Pastoral of the City. 6s. The Observer.—"A pretty tale, full of noble sentiment and the quaint humour which delights all lovers of Mr. Allen's work."

ALICE WILSON FOX'S NEW BOOK.

A Regular Madam. 6s. The Daily Telegraph.—"Books such as this fill a real want. Interesting without being sentimental, exciting without being vulgar, avoiding all controversial subjects, and gracefully written. It is, in fact, a healthy story which will give thorough enjoyment to all readers."

MISS B. HUNT'S NEW BOOK.

Folk Tales of Breffny. 3s. 6d. net.  A new collection of Irish folklore.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

SVEN HEDIN'S NEW BOOK.

From Pole to Pole. A Book for Young People. By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.  A book of travel and adventure for young people.

The Magic World. By E. NESBIT, Author of "The Magic City," etc. With Illustrations by H. R. Millar and Spencer Pryse. Crown 8vo. 6s. The Field.—"There is no doubt that children will vote this book capital reading."

Peggy Stewart at School. By GABRIELLE E. JACKSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

 Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. Frank Hartley's Generous Offer to put another 100 Readers of "Everyman" upon the Royal Road to Success, Power and Influence.

Owing to the success with which his remarkable offer in last week's issue has met, Mr. Hartley has decided to extend the special arrangement for the benefit of another 100 ambitious readers of EVERYMAN.

So, if you are anxious to grasp this life's opportunities with both hands and make the most of them; if you want to know how to train your mind, to develop your personality, and acquire influence along true and scientific lines, get into communication to-day with Mr. Frank Hartley, the author of one of the most inspiring books ever published, entitled—

"HOW FAILURE BECOMES IMPOSSIBLE."

This book shows how to make failure impossible, and how to make sure and steady progress to success. It tells you how the Frank Hartley Course of Menti-Culture deals, as no other course of training does, with

The Mysteries and Secrets of the Mind.

It explains simply and clearly to the uninitiated the mysteries and secrets of the inner constitution and workings of the human mind. It shows how one can become compelling and attractive in personality, and how to influence the thoughts and actions of others. Mr. Hartley's Course is not merely one of memory training or mind concentration. It is more—much more. It is a scientific course of mind development—a development which puts one in possession of all the mysterious powers of the mind, and makes those who follow it a personal force wherever they go.

Mr. HARTLEY'S SPECIAL OFFER.

Every reader of "Everyman" can have a copy of this remarkable book, and also a specimen lesson, by sending two penny stamps, but to the FIRST HUNDRED who respond to this week's offer, and decide to enrol for the entire Course, Mr. Hartley's generous offer is to accept them at half his usual low fee. This means another 100 STUDENTS AT HALF FEES.

Guarantee of Successful Training.

There is no risk in taking the Course, no possibility of spending money uselessly. You must make satisfactory progress. Mr. Hartley guarantees it. He promises specially to readers of EVERYMAN taking advantage of his offer, that "If any student, after taking the Course, has not improved himself, he is at liberty to return his instruction papers, when the fee paid will be refunded in full."

1,000 GUINEAS GUARANTEE.

Further, in order to remove all possible doubt as to the success and efficacy of the Course, a few opinions of those who have already taken it are here given, under Mr. Hartley's penalty offer of 1,000 guineas if they can be proved not genuine.

Your Course is a gold mine.

"Dear Mr. Hartley,—I am more than pleased with the results I have gained from practicing the lessons of your Course. There seems to have been a gradual development of a power within me, giving a feeling of self-confidence and a consciousness of ability to attract whom I will. This power is invaluable to me in my occupation as a traveller . . . the Course will prove to be a 'gold mine.'"
—Yours sincerely, A. F. C."

Mr. R. CURTIS writes:—"I have just finished my fifth lesson, and I must say that I realize the truth it contains. If one does carry out the instructions carefully it will lead him to success, and if all would persevere in this principle it would make our nation a strong, self-reliant people."

Perfect happiness, influence, rapid progress and absolute success are now brought within your reach. If you are not totally indifferent to your own interests you will grasp this opportunity.

Application for the book and specimen lesson, which will be sent on receipt of two penny stamps, places you under no obligation to enrol. Please remember this. Write to-day, and address your reply to—

FRANK HARTLEY,

Room 10, London Institute of Menti-Culture,
35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

sively than Mr. Perris that Germany was suffering from a long and deadly disease, and for such there is need of stern remedies. It was Bismarck's mission to wield the surgeon's knife, leaving the rest to time; his mistake was to believe that amputation is the primary business of the healer.

WE now turn to another prominent writer on German topics who reveals some of the same characteristics as Mr. Harden, the same keenness of intellect, the same versatility, the same aggressiveness. Mr. Ellis Barker's book on "Modern Germany"* has long held its ground as the best book on the subject. The present volume is the fourth edition, and is for all practical purposes a new book. About one-third of the book has been re-written, and the whole has been brought up to date. Like the previous editions, the new issue is a storehouse of valuable information. In the case of a writer like Mr. E. Barker, who has a political message to deliver (Tariff Reform), and who has strong convictions, it is necessary to read with considerable caution and to carefully discriminate between fact and theory. Nor ought we to forget that the title of the book is misleading. Mr. Barker does not deal with the whole of modern Germany, but only with two or three aspects of it. Like Mr. Harden, he is mainly concerned with economics and with problems of internal and external politics. On the customs and manners and morals of the people he has little to say. He equally ignores the artistic and intellectual development of the German people, and, most important of omissions, he ignores the religious question and the vital conflict between Catholic and Protestant Germany.

THERE will be few readers of EVERYMAN who are not eagerly anticipating the establishment of cordial relations between ourselves and our cousins across the North Sea. When that Anglo-German friendship becomes an accomplished fact, and when the ghost of an Anglo-German war is laid for ever, we shall have to remember that no one in his time and generation has worked harder and more persistently than the veteran journalist whose "Memories"† Messrs. Heinemann have just published. Whereas Mr. Ellis Barker's attitude to Germany is one of vigilant distrust, that of Mr. Sidney Whitman is one of boundless sympathy, and it is this quality of sympathy which makes part of the value of "German Memories," for the simple reason that sympathy is indispensable to an intimate understanding.

The volume is mainly one of personal reminiscences. Those of Moltke and Mosen, of Bismarck and Bülow, will be found especially suggestive. Although Mr. Sidney Whitman has chosen to give his German experiences mainly in the form of recollections, he has at the same time reached some general conclusions, and has drawn some moral lessons of wider application. Those conclusions are, on the whole, unreservedly favourable to the German people. In Mr. Whitman's estimate, the Germans are better read, more sober, more cultivated, better educated than the British people. It is those qualities which, in the author's judgment, have made the greatness of contemporary Germany. In this connection, we cannot refrain from quoting the following passage of Mr. Whitman's book, which entirely supports the argument

* "Modern Germany." By J. Ellis Barker. (Smith, Elder and Co.)

† "German Memories." By Sidney Whitman. (Messrs. Heinemann.)

which Mr. Norman Angell has recently developed in the columns of EVERYMAN:—

"An illusion largely shared in Germany itself is that her material prosperity is a direct outcome of the military successes of 1866 and 1870, and her subsequent unification. As a matter of fact, Imperialism has little to do with the commercial and industrial rise of Germany. Of late it has even gratuitously fostered trade jealousies and other idiosyncrasies of a mischievous kind. Favouritism in high places has been the means of pitchforking unsuitable elements on to the boards of banks and great industrial concerns, instances of which are of common knowledge in German business circles.

"Many years' connection with German manufacturing life has convinced me that, though the Empire may have supplied an effective trade 'label,' the real source of growth has been the inevitable outcome of modern economical developments of Europe as a whole, taken advantage of, in spite of tariff walls and heavy taxation, by the industrious qualities of the race, fostered by a century of education and careful industrial training."

THE PERSONALITY OF NAPOLEON*

THERE has been such uninterrupted over-production of books—good, bad and indifferent—on Napoleon and on Napoleonic times, that we are in danger of ceasing to see the forest for the trees, and the true character for the hero, for the misrepresentation of his historians. For that reason, the ordinary reader will be grateful to Mr. Holland Rose for giving us a bird's-eye view and a synthesis of the most powerful personality of modern times, and probably of all times. Mr. Rose's synthesis is all the more acceptable, and all the more deserving of serious consideration, because he has achieved a high and well-deserved reputation through his special labours in Napoleonic history.

Mr. Rose studiously endeavours to be impartial, but the temperament of Napoleon is obviously antipathetic to him. That is probably the reason why, after reading his volume, we do not seem to have got very much nearer to our subject. Napoleon remains too much the conventional superman, abnormal, incomplete, elusive, inexplicable. I prefer to see in Napoleon a man possessing in a supreme degree the commonplace virtues of ordinary humanity. There was a great deal that was excessive in the Corsican. There is little that is abnormal. We forget too readily that Napoleon was a dutiful son, a self-sacrificing brother, a passionate lover, and an administrator of prodigious industry and of scrupulous order. Mr. Holland Rose dwells too much on the realist. He forgets that there was in Napoleon a great deal of the sentimentalist and the idealist. It is true that the sentimentalist was killed by the scandalous treason of Josephine, a few weeks after her marriage, but the idealist survived till the end. To the end Napoleon retained a keen sense of the heroic, as well as a profound appreciation for the most exalted forms of poetry. Mr. Rose tells us with insistence that Napoleon remained a vindictive Corsican. This opinion is in contradiction with Napoleon's special admiration of Cinna, in which Corneille, one of Napoleon's favourite poets, glorifies the clemency of Augustus. It is equally in contradiction with Napoleon's admiration for the British nation.

Mr. Rose calls the "Emile" of Rousseau "a suggestive novel." Is this not a misleading definition of the greatest educational treatise which was ever written? We might as well call the "Republic" of Plato a novel. Mr. Rose does not always render

* "The Personality of Napoleon." By J. H. Rose. (G. Bell and Sons.)

Sampson Low, Marston & Co., LTD.

Write for Complete Illustrated List of New and Important Books for Xmas and New Year Gifts.

ABSOLUTELY THE MOST ACCEPTABLE PRESENT OF THE SEASON.

THE BROAD HIGHWAY.

By JEFFERY FARNOL, Author of "The Money Moon." Small 4to (8½ by 6), handsomely bound in cloth, gilt extra, gilt top, specially designed cover, and 25 illustrations in colour by C. E. BROCK, R.I. 10s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

TRAVELS IN FOUR CONTINENTS.

ROUND THE WORLD FOR GOLD:

A SEARCH FOR MINERALS FROM KANSAS TO CATHAY. By HERBERT W. L. WAY. Medium 8vo, cloth, with special Maps. £1 1s. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

DAYS OF LONG AGO.

IN THE DAYS OF LONG AGO.

By FANNY HOMAN. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 3s. 6d. net.

COSTUME HAS ALWAYS A SIGNIFICANCE DEEPER THAN THE WHIMS OF FASHION.

DAME FASHION, 1786-1911.

By JULIUS M. PRICE, special Artist Correspondent of the "Illustrated London News," Author of "From the Arctic Ocean to the Yellow Sea," "The Land of Gold," "From Euston to Klondike," etc. Demy 8vo. 150 plates, mostly coloured. Cloth gilt, gilt top. £2 2s. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

IS WAR NECESSARY?

WAR OR PEACE:

A PRESENT-DAY DUTY AND A FUTURE HOPE.

By Brigadier-General H. M. CHITTENDEN. With an Introduction by ANDREW CARNEGIE. Large crown 8vo. New and Cheaper Edition. 3s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

A NEW AND CHEAPER ART EDITION OF ONE OF THE WORLD'S GREATEST CLASSICS.

LORNA DOONE:

A ROMANCE OF EXMOOR.

By the late R. D. BLACKMORE. The New Dulverton Edition. Containing grand coloured plates from pictures specially drawn by two celebrated artists, C. E. BROCK, R.I., and C. E. BRITAN. Large 4to, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, gilt edges. A New and Cheaper Edition. 10s. 6d. net.

THE ART BOOK OF THE SEASON, FRANK BRANGWYN, A.R.A.

EOTHEN; OR, TRACES OF TRAVEL BROUGHT HOME FROM THE EAST.

By A. W. KINGLAKE. With an Introduction by SAMUEL L. BENSUSAN. With delightful illustrations in colour and designs in black and white by FRANK BRANGWYN, A.R.A. Crown 4to, cloth gilt, gilt top, illustrated cap, boxed. Price 12s. 6d. net. Full Prospectus on application.

FOR THE IMPERIAL MARITIME AND OTHER LEAGUES.

TALES OF PLUCK AND DUTY.

Edited by Mrs. FREWEN LORD, of the Imperial Maritime League, Junior Section. Specially written by Famous Authors, such as CAPTAIN MAHAN, etc. Crown 8vo, handsomely bound, cloth gilt, illustrated. Price 3s. 6d. [In Preparation.]

A DELIGHTFUL BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

ROUND THE YULE LOG:

NORWEGIAN FOLK AND FAIRY TALES

By P. CHR. ASBJORNSEN. Translated by H. L. BRAEKSTAD, with an Introduction by EDMUND W. GOSSE. Small 4to, handsomely bound, cloth gilt, gilt top. 6s.

A SPLENDID NEW BOOK FOR BOYS.

WHITE RIVER RAFT.

By LEWIS B. MILLER. Crown 8vo, illustrated. 6s.

New and Important Fiction. 6s.

JOHN HASLETTE'S NEW NOVEL:

THE MESH.

By JOHN HASLETTE.

A NOVEL OF ABSORBING INTEREST.

WHEN THE GATES LIFT UP THEIR HEADS.

By PAYNE ERSKINE. First Edition sold out before publication.

A NEW AND CHARMING ROMANCE. 3rd Edition.

THE MOUNTAIN GIRL.

By PAYNE ERSKINE. Illustrated.

A CHARMING NEW ROMANCE BY A MANCHESTER AUTHORESS.

THE FAIREST OF THE STUARTS.

An Historical Romance by WINIFRED BROOKS MYLE-CHREEST. Illustrated.

LONDON: 100, SOUTHWARK STREET, S.E.

exactly the connotation of French words. A French collège is not adequately rendered by the English "college," still less is the French magistrat rendered by the English "magistrate" (page 143). And is it not unfair to Napoleon to blame him for depreciating Shakespeare? Napoleon had no means of appreciating Shakespeare, as he could only have known him through the grotesque versions and adaptations of the French versifier, Ducis.

THE WISDOM OF G. B. S.*

MRS. G. B. S. has just published a volume of selected passages from the works of her husband. Although the book does not contain one single word, by way of preface or commentary, indicating its scope or limitations, the selection, obviously, has not only the authority of the anthologist, but the sanction of Mr. Shaw himself; it may be considered as the indispensable vade-mecum of the Shavian student, and it may be assumed to give the quintessence of Shavian wisdom. Shaw is the most constructive and systematic as well as the most epigrammatic of writers. But Mrs. Shaw has refrained from any attempt at classification, and has given the selection in alphabetical order of subjects. She has acted wisely leaving it to the critics to make their own classification, and remembering the words of Goethe, "When kings are building palaces, there is ample work for the navvies." The book is beautifully bound and printed, and generally well got up. Our readers will note we have printed extracts from this most interesting volume following on Mr. Shaw's article on the "Alleged Collapse of Socialism."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

It is but seldom one meets with a story, well told, with variety of adventure and colour, allied to clear-cut characterisation. In "A Rogue's March" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) Miss Evelyn Tempest shows us the inevitable development of a nature cursed with a "fatal facility." In the beginning Percy Lanstone was a precocious child, brilliant and vivacious, but with a blind spot on the moral side. His father, inordinately proud of his cleverness, makes no attempt to rectify this obliquity of vision. It is to the good man a thing impossible to understand that a boy with such marvellous capacity should not realise that it is undesirable to lie and steal. Parental authority, strained to the utmost, is at last compelled to fall back upon punishment, and Percy makes acquaintance with a riding whip. The beating merely causes him to decide to be more careful in the future, and, realising that it will no longer serve his purpose to steal, he supplies himself with pocket money by less risky methods. He adopts the ingenious method of the "Finding Plan."

For a time—a short time—it yielded satisfactory results. People may be perfectly certain that they left a shilling on the table, the mantelpiece, or where not, but if a shilling be discovered a day or two afterwards between the seat and the back stuffing of an armchair or sofa it shows they were mistaken, and they have no right to question the probity of the finder who frankly—even loudly—proclaims his good fortune, and claims half.

Percy works this admirably, but eventually the plan wears thin, and once again he is faced with the problem of how to supply his wants without trouble or risk. The problem pursues him all his life, and he settles it from time to time with varying success. Like many brilliant boys of fatal facility, he does not justify his people's ambitions, and finally, having been designed first for the woosack, then for the Premiership, declines on a commission in a regiment of the line.

* "Selected Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw." Chosen by Charlotte F. Shaw. Price 5s. net. (Constable and Co., Ltd.)

Miss Tempest gives us a clever sketch of Anglo-Indian life. She writes convincingly, and the native element, sparingly introduced, is admirably dealt with. The Rogue adapts himself to his new environment, and reaps a rich harvest by betting on a certainty at long odds. He backs himself to perform certain feats, apparently on the spur of the moment, and inevitably comes out a winner. For hours he practised jumping a billiard table. Once he had mastered the trick, he engineered a bet that it could not be done, and promptly leaped the obstacle and pocketed the stakes. In the ultimate he overreaches himself, and meets with an end retributive but, at the same time, melodramatic. Miss Tempest would have done better to close her book on a quieter note. Percy's death strikes too loudly the crash of contrast. The drawing of the minor characters is not distinguished. Mildred, the Rogue's wife, is fairly feasible, but Craven, the quixotic admirer, does not live. The Rogue, after all, is the important person, and to him the author has done ample justice.

There is plenty of go in the "Lord of Marney" (Blackie and Sons, 2s. 6d.). Mr. G. I. Witham has the faculty of writing for boys, and, without wasting time in long-winded explanation, starts the hero of the story on his travels with but little delay. The possession of the sword of Marney is the motive of the tale. There is a prophecy attached to the weapon. Unless in the right hands it will bring disaster and death; in the right hands triumph in war, blessing in peace, the lordship of Marney and hereditary offices. The sword is given to Blaise, a boy in his teens, at the opening of the story. He is charged to guard the weapon until its possession is decided on. It is said that the ultimate owner will awake one morning and find the sword by his side, and will straightway say, "By the grace of God I am what I am." How little Blaise fulfils his trust and fares upon his quest the author tells in the picturesque fashion indispensable to a book for boys.

Mr. Harold Vallings has a certain vivacity of style and a capacity for representing the dramatic possibilities of a situation. In "Chess for a Stake" (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) these qualities carry the story over improbabilities as wild as any in fiction. Sensationalism should be judged by its own standard, and we do not quarrel with the author for his lurid lights and heavy shadows. But—and this is an important consideration—melodrama is no excuse for a fundamentally weak characterisation. The sensational novel, while it hampers the author in its clamant need for sustained excitement and unexpected developments, affords ample scope for simple yet forceful characterisation and sincere psychology. We have examples of this in the novels of Miss Braddon, a past master in the art of sensationalism. In "Henry Dunbar," in our opinion the finest piece of work she ever did, we have a combination of strong drama and simple characterisation. Her methods are convincing, the men and women she creates are actuated by motives that lie at the root of things. That the

(Continued on page 258.)

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd. CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS

"Messrs. Dent's can always be relied upon for delightful books."—THE STANDARD.

5/- net. A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS. 5/- net.

By WILLIAM CANTON, Author of "A Child's Book of Saints."

Illustrations in colours by HERBERT COLE. Large crown 8vo.

"Mr. Canton has written a fascinating account of Charlemagne, Olaf the Viking, Justinian, and other brave men of countries across the seas, who 'beat down Wrong and strove for Right.'"—The Times.

"Retells some of the old stories of classical and Teutonic legend . . . the narrative is written in a flowing, spirited style, which makes frequent use of direct speech, and which has the merit of not having been 'written down' to the level of the child's mind, while the book is handsomely put out."—Scotsman.

7/6 net. BEE: The Princess and the Dwarfs. 7/6 net.

Text: ANATOLE FRANCE. Translation: PETER WRIGHT. Pictures: C. ROBINSON.

"The adventures of Bee and George cannot fail to charm children, and even to their more critical elders it appears to be a wonderful imitation of the genuine thing."—Daily Graphic.

"I am sure it ought to have a great success. It is so simple and so pretty, and has such nice thoughts."—Daily Chronicle.

"Bee is a charming work, and tells of delightful people. Written by Anatole France, Bee makes a beautiful gift-book."—Evening Standard.

3/6 net: THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN. 3/6 net.

Text: Mrs. R. STAWELL. Pictures: F. C. PAPE.

"The old familiar fairies are perhaps the best, but Mrs. Rodolph Stawell's fairies, though unknown until discovered by the author, are not much less charming, nor any less elusive and mysterious. There are a round dozen stories in the volume, which is prettily illustrated, and all the tales have that imaginative frame-work and appearance of verisimilitude which characterise the classic stories of this description. It is good work in which any unsophisticated child and some elderly people should take pleasure."—The Scotsman.

4/6 net. THE SONGS OF INNOCENCE & other Poems. 4/6 net.

With Coloured Illustrations by CHARLES and MAY ROBINSON. Small 4to.

"As usual, Messrs. Dent's gift books appeal to all who love the dainty and the elegant. These poems are beautiful in themselves; with their old world restfulness and charm."—Yorkshire Post.

4/6 net. FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS. 4/6 net.

By HILLEL SAMSON. Crown 8vo.

"There is no great superficial resemblance between the 'Story of Francis Horatio and his Three Companions' and, say, 'La Reine Pédanque,' and yet both display a wide culture and a genuine re-creation of the mediæval atmosphere in a modern setting. The conspicuous quality which admirers of the French novelist have agreed to call irony is missing from this other book, yet the author, Mr. Hillel Samson, has managed to give us that rare thing, a modern prose idyll. In some ways it is a pity that it should be published at this crowded season; but, though it would be easy to quarrel with it on the ground of form, it will certainly survive, on account of the inherent vitality and sureness of its vision. There will be many to find it a book beautiful."—The Westminster Gazette.

5/- net. JOLLY CALLE, and other Swedish Fairy Tales. 5/- net.

Text: HELENA NYBLON. Pictures: CHARLES FOLKARD.

"The book is a collection of Swedish Fairy Tales by Helena Nyblom, with colour and other illustrations by Charles Folkard. Many of them emulate the spirit of Hans Andersen, and bid fair to make as many friends here, in Western Europe, as they must have made up in the North."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"'Jolly Calle' is full of laughter, and relates things which, though new to our own nurseries, should soon be added to the store of literature which loves the thought of the great fighters of the past."—The Standard.

2/6 net. THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN. 2/6 net.

Pictures: MARGARET TARRANT.

"A tastefully illustrated 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' would please a quite small person and lovers of fairy tales."—The World.

THE CONISTON CLASSICS

3/-
net.

are published in a new style of binding known as Bedford Morocco. These works have been selected from Everyman Library with a view to their popularity as presentation and gift books. Each volume contains a photogravure frontispiece and title page, whilst the binding, with its limp cover, round corners, and green under gold edges, has been specially designed for presentation purposes. A special Prospectus of the books issued in this particular style will be sent with pleasure on receipt of a postcard.

3/-
net.

21/- net. THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND. 21/- net.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A.

With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. QUINTON.

"A book like this, which, in its prose as in its pictures, keeps alive some of the sweetest aspects of the country, is sure to please readers who want to get away from town. . . . It is not surprising to find him feeling tender towards buildings that have inspired the principal living movement in the English architecture of to-day."—The Scotsman.

By the Author of "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER."

6/- FLORENCE CONVERSE, "The Children of Light." 6/-

"Really beautiful and arresting. The first part, which deals with the childhood of the three personages of the story, is by far the best. Here Miss Converse is on her own ground, and she treats the idealism and inspiration of receptive children with rare delicacy and intuition."—The Morning Post.

"A living book."—Edinburgh Evening News.

SEND A POSTCARD FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

137a, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

dramatis persona are involved in scenes of acute emotion does not derogate from the fact. Modern novels overlook this all-important truth, and Mr. Vallings has entirely forgotten it. The motive on which hangs the chain of sensational effects in "Chess for a Stake" is unconvincing in the extreme. The hero, Will Pigott, depicted as a strong man of indomitable will and purpose, consents to postpone a proposal of marriage to the girl he loves to please her worldly and matchmaking mother. Kitty, the girl in question, is vain and vacillating, influenced by every wind that blows, yet with an undercurrent of affection for Will, strong enough if called on to withstand all opposition. She is influenced to accept men of better prospects, financially speaking, and more than once comes dangerously near matrimonial misadventure. Yet all the time the indomitable hero remains passive, and does not attempt to break away from the leash. The story is exciting, and some of the scenes are cleverly handled, but the writing is marred and the effect blurred by inadequate characterisation, slipshod psychology.

In "John Scarlett" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) Mr. Donald Maclean tells the story of a young man who finds himself credited with another man's reputation, and sent on the credit of it to work for the Young Men's Christian Association among some very rough customers in an Australian railway camp. His embarrassments are naturally considerable, and his adventures are told pleasantly enough. In the end he secures the lady of his affections, as well as converting various pioneers to better ways of life—at least so we may be supposed to consider them, though many readers will very likely prefer the said pioneers in their unregenerate state. The book is evidently intended for edification as well as for entertainment, and perhaps the entertainment would be greater if the edification were left out, for Mr. Maclean is really quite a good story-teller, with a certain eye for character and for effect. Considered as a tale, "John Scarlett" is a good deal better than most, and can be enjoyed as such by many who will perhaps find it unconvincing as a tract.

Mr. David Ker has all the qualities that a successful writer of boys' books especially requires, and some that are only too rarely found in such writers. He understands a boy's love of pomp and colour; he can tell a story rapidly and vividly; he does not stop to indulge in long reflections, but gets on quickly from adventure to adventure; finally, he really writes extremely well. In consequence, his "Under the Flag of France" is quite one of the best tales of the kind that we have read. The background against which the figures are relieved is the Hundred Years' War, and of course we soon find ourselves the companions of King Edward and the Black Prince, the King of France and Bertrand du Guesclin. The interest does not flag, and the characters are not the mere puppets that characters in boys' stories too often are. Du Guesclin himself, for example, really lives, and is not only a striking and picturesque, but a convincing portrait of the chivalrous hero. So that one does not feel the exclamation of his English adversary at the end, "Would to God that I lay there in thy stead, noble Du Guesclin, for, if England hath gained by thy death, all Christendom has lost by it!" to be out of place. Mr. Ker understands boys, and comprehends their tireless love of rhetoric; and he is able to give them the sort of rhetoric that stirs their blood without its sounding silly even to older people.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Atteridge, A. Hilliard. "Marshal Ney, the Bravest of the Brave." (Methuen, 10s. 6d.)
 "A Rifleman." "The Struggle for Bread." (Lane, 5s.)
 Ashley, W. J. "Gold and Prices." (Longmans, Green, 1s.)
 Bonney, Prof. T. G. "Structure of the Earth." (Jack, 6d.)
 Bayley, Harold. "The Lost Language of Symbolism." Two vols. (Williams and Norgate, 25s.)
 Beerbohm, Max. "A Christmas Garland." (Heinemann, 5s.)
 Bennett, Arnold. "Those United States." (Secker, 5s.)
 Chatterton-Hill. "The Philosophy of Nietzsche." (Ouseley, 7s. 6d.)
 Clayton, Joseph. "Co-operation." (Jack, 6d.)
 Coloma, Luis. "The Story of Don John of Austria." Translated by Lady Moreton. (Lane, 16s.)
 Compton Rickett, A. "A History of English Literature." (Jack, 6d.)
 Davidson, H. S. "Marriage and Motherhood." The People's Books. (Jack, 6d.)
Daily News and Leader Year-Book, 1913. (6d.)
 Fitzgerald, Kathleen. "Gulliver à Lilliput et Gulliver à Brobdingnag." (Siegle, Hill et Cie.)
 Fitzgerald, Kathleen. "Don Quichotte de la Manche." (Siegle, Hill et Cie.)
 Farrow, Thomas. "Banks and People." (Chapman and Hall, 1s.)
 Field, Claud. "Persian Literature." (Herbert and Daniel.)
 Goldsmith, Oliver. "She Stoops to Conquer." (Hodder and Stoughton, 15s.)
 Galsworthy, John. "Three Plays." (Duckworth, 6s.)
 Gates, Richard T. "Divorce or Separation—Which?" (Divorce Law Reform Union, 6d.)
 Gasquet, Abbot. "England Under the Old Religion." (G. Bell, 6s.)
 Galsworthy, John. "The Eldest Son: A Play." (Duckworth, 2s. and 1s.)
 Garrett, Fyddel E. "Lyrics and Poems from Ibsen." (Dent, 4s. 6d.)
 Hall, William, R.N., B.A. "Navigation." (Jack, 6d.)
 Hutchison, A. N. "Hypnotism and Self-Education." (Jack, 6d.)
 Jeurwine, J. W. "The First Twelve Centuries of British History." (Longmans, 12s. 6d.)
 Klein, Sidney T. "Science and the Infinite." (Rider, 2s. 6d.)
 Lempfert, R. G. K. "Weather Science." (Jack, 6d.)
 Lightwood, J. T. "Charles Dickens and Music." (Kelly, 2s. 6d.)
 Lang, Andrew. "Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown." (Longmans, 9s.)
 Miles, Eustace. "Fitness for Play and Work." (Murby, 1s. 6d.)
 Monypenny, W. F. "The Life of Benjamin Disraeli." Vol. II. (Murray, 12s.)
 Prospero and Caliban. "The Weird of the Wanderer." (Rider, 6s.)
 Quiggin, A. Hingston, M.A. "Primeval Man." (Macdonald and Evans, 1s. 6d.)
 Shillito, Rev. Edward. "The Free Churches." (Jack, 6d.)
 Spiller, G. "The Training of the Child." (Jack, 6d.)
 Strindberg, A. "The Inferno." (Rider, 2s. 6d.)
 Tennyson. "Morte d'Arthur." (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)
 Tweedie, Mrs. Alec. "Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life." (Lane, 16s.)
 Vanoc. "A Day of My Life." (Macdonald and Evans, 1s.)
 Watson, Aaron. "Tennyson." (Jack, 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation.

There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Strapping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Strapping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

POST IT NOW

CUT THIS CORNER - POST TO US - GET THE BOOK.

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name _____

Address _____

POST IT NOW

DARN

Holeproof Hose

NO MORE

Stockings and Socks That Don't Want Mending.

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will Replace them absolutely FREE

You can imagine that we should not make such an offer unless we were convinced of the extraordinary good wearing qualities of our Holeproof Stockings. No more eye-straining, no more time-wasting mending. You can now turn to men, pleasurable and congenial occupations. These Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well-fitting and comfortable, with that just the right sense of good fit that is one of the many pleasures of our hose. It is so durable that it gives to continued use a wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping of the hand, and will have no damage done to its fabric. The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business elits and housewives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 2/10, post 2d.

Two Pairs Ladies' stockings 3/10, post 2d. COLOURED HOSE for Ladies, in Black, Navy, Mole, Champagne, Pearl Grey, Tan or Light Blue at same price. SILK HOLEPROOF. Most delightful. Specially strengthened in to sandals with our holeproof mixture yarn. The best Champagne colour is stocked, also Empire Blue, Tan, Pearl Grey, and Black. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 7/6, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 10/6 post 2d. On the guarantee that we will replace them free if a hole develops within Two Months of purchase, will you send our P.O. State boot size. Write your name and address distinctly. Call or write: VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS' LIGHT for 1 1/2 d.

"FOOL-PROOF" LAMP.

AGENTS WANTED.

We have named this the "Fool-Proof" Lamp, because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe. That is, there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense. But one of these little "Fool-Proof" Lamps, placed in those eerie corners or black staircase lanterns, will cost no more than 1 1/2 d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount and Now these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article. It is essentially "good" looking and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps. Burns Paraffin Oil.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely oilless; it wears for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Price 2/6. Postage and Packing, 2d. Agents Wanted. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER

Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm. It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to go to the theatre or have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/6 or 2/-. That is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster. Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. You knew before you were told that air improves a fire, or why do you blow it to make it go? Just fancy, only half as much coal to be bought. You must then send your postal order now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5 1/2 in. wide, 2 1/2 in. high) or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide) 1/6. Postage on each, 3d. Go to the Post Office NOW, and start this investment of 1/6 or 2/- earning big dividends for you at once. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years, an unheard of saving. Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

Agents Wanted.

Burning half coal, half air. Result: Great Heat with V. & H. Coal Saver

NO MORE GOLD FEET

Gold feet can now be a thing of the past. The new "Slipon" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm, non-irritating woolly material. Worn next to the skin. Your sock or stocking is worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/6 PER PAIR, post. 1d. extra. State boot size. P.O.'s only. — VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON. Far Men, Women and Children.

Agents Wanted.

1/- PER PAIR. Postage 1d.

BEDROOM SLIPPERS. Just the thing for DAINTY FEET, 6d. per pair Post. 2d. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON

The Talk of the GRAMOPHONE World.

'PARSONS' SEMITONE'

Improves the Sound, Avoids Scratching of the Needle. Old Records made New. Sold by Spiers and Pond, Whiteley's, Civil Service Stores, and all high-class dealers.

Sample Semitone sent post free for

1/6

Parsons' TRIPLE CRYSTAL NEEDLE will play 60 tunes. Increases sound. Stands alone for Quality. Boxes of six for 6d.

PARSONS' SEMITONE COMPANY, 37 & 39, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Have you seen The Seal Pen

The Seal Pen is the best idea in Safety Reservoir Pens. It frees you from pen-care. You can treat your Seal Pen the same way as a pencil. You can carry it upside down or flat in your pocket—it will not leak. When it is closed it is sealed and safe.

The Seal Pen writes instantly, always, for the nib is in the ink when the pen is closed. It writes with a smooth, even flow. You can depend upon it—in the pocket and in the hand. The Seal Pen is made in three sizes and twelve styles of nib. The nib is of 14-carat gold, tipped with iridium. Every pen guaranteed for two years.

For service and safety buy the Seal.

Your Stationer Sells the Seal

W. H. Smith & Son, Wholesale and Manufacturing Stationers, Kean Street, Kingsway, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 9. Vol. I, [REGISTERED
LATHE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1912.

One Penny.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
History in the Making—
Notes of the Week	261
The Alleged Collapse of Socialism—
Part II.—By Bernard Shaw	263
Napoleon as a Socialist—
Part I.—By Charles Sarolea	264
The Problem of Alsace—
By Prof. H. Lichtenberger	265
Literary Notes	267
Mons. Seguin's Coat—(From the
French of Alphonse Daudet)	268
Moments—
By George S. Astins	269

ARTICLES
BY BERNARD SHAW
PROF.
LICHTENBERGER
CHARLES SAROLEA
MARGARET HAMILTON

	PAGE
Correspondence	270
Reviews—
The Charm of Oliver Goldsmith	274
Oxford	275
"Blue Bird Weather"	276
"The Cloister and the Hearth"	276
"The Annals of Hampstead"	277
"Nell Gwyn"	277
"The Story of Francis Horatio and His Three Companions"	278
Christmas Books for the Bairns	280
"Æsop's Fables"	280
"The Child's Book of Warriors"	280
"A Cavalier of Fortune"	289

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PUBLIC interest, at present diverted from the Balkans, is now centred in London, where the Peace Conference is to be held. The King has given authority for St. James's Palace to be placed at the disposal of the delegates. Other arrangements permitting, His Majesty will receive the delegates during their stay.

It is stated that though Greece has not yet signed the Armistice, she will take part in the negotiations. Sir Edward Grey's proposal of a Conference of Ambassadors has been accepted by the European powers. The Triple Alliance has been renewed. Reports come to hand of Russian mobilisation on the Western frontier. Russia, it is stated, is vigorously carrying out military operations in order to be ready for every possible contingency. Shortly eighteen Russian Army Corps will be massed on the Western frontier.

The important announcement of a gift by Canada to the Mother-country of three Dreadnoughts, to form part of the Imperial Navy, has created widespread interest. The Admiralty has issued the memorandum on naval defence requirements, which, at the request of Mr. Borden, was supplied to the Canadian Government, and was read by him in the Dominion Parliament. The memorandum points out that the development of the German Navy during the last fifteen years is the most striking feature of the naval situation to-day.

In the House of Commons the matter received special attention. Mr. Churchill, replying to Lord C. Beresford, said that in introducing the supplementary estimates in July he stated that it was the wish of the Canadian Government that the aid of Canada should be an addition to the existing British programme, and that any step which Canada might take should directly strengthen the naval forces of the Empire and the margin available for its security. Mr. Asquith, replying to questions, said that the proposal that one or more representatives of the Dominions should be invited to attend the meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence was put forward last year by the Government in the proceedings connected with the Imperial Conference, and was accepted as desirable in principle by all the Prime Ministers. Mr. Asquith further said certain arrangements of a general character had been agreed to between the Admiralty and the Dominion Government with regard to the transfer of the Canadian battleships to the Royal Canadian Navy on notice sufficient to allow for their replacement, if necessary, being given, and with regard to replacing by the Admiralty of orders for some light cruisers in Canada, the training of Canadian naval cadets, and other minor and incidental matters.

The tone of the Canadian Press comments on Mr. Borden's speech is generally eulogistic, but the Liberal Press criticises the Government proposal, and emphasises the alternative of a unit manned and controlled by Canada. Speaking at Chester, Mr. J. A. Pease, Minister for Education, said the gift from Canada would materially help to maintain on the high seas throughout the world the predominance of the naval forces of the Crown.

The question of the Territorial Force still continues to be a disturbing element in the political world. Speaking in London, Colonel Seely declared the charges made against the force to be unfounded. After a most searching inquiry, the Committee of Imperial Defence has arrived at the considered opinion that with our military and naval forces as they stood, the danger of invasion might now be faced without fear. The Government had no intention of adopting compulsory service. Arrangements were on the point of completion whereby members of the National Reserve would be asked, in the event of imminent national danger, to place their services at the disposal of the King. Equipment was to be ready for the reservists, and funds would be placed at the disposal of the County Associations for the purpose.

In the House of Commons on Monday night, Mr. Runciman announced that several areas in Ireland had now been declared free from foot and mouth disease, and the importation into England and Scotland of fat stock for slaughter from these districts would be allowed. Restriction must still be maintained in suspected areas.

Anarchy at political meetings seems to be the order of the day. At a Home Rule demonstration in London, addressed by Mr. John Redmond, suffragettes kept up constant interruption. A free fight took place, and about fifty interrupters were ejected. Mr. Redmond was on his feet for over an hour and a quarter, but he was unable to speak for more than half that time. Sir Edward Carson was to have addressed an open-air meeting from his hotel at Torquay, but was prevented from speaking by bands of political opponents wearing helmets and carrying dummy rifles.

So far as Scotland is concerned, the old division of the Tory party into Conservatives and Liberal-Unionists is to be obliterated. The present Central Conservative and Liberal-Unionist organisations are to be united, and to form one consolidated Scottish Unionist organisation. Authority has been given to make the necessary arrangements for an inaugural conference of the combined association. Mr. Bonar Law is expected to be present.

A statement of great interest to the general public was made by Sir Herbert Samuel, Postmaster-General, at the annual dinner of the Liverpool Shipbrokers' Benevolent Society. He announced that his department were now experimenting with new machines between London and Liverpool, which would be able to send telegrams both ways simultaneously at the rate of 150 words a minute, and to transmit one thousand telegrams an hour.

The dispute between Mr. Lloyd George and the medical profession still remains unsettled. Following upon the deputation which waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, meetings are to be held of all the divisions of the British Medical Association for the purpose of considering its report and the Chancellor's memorandum explanatory of the points raised by the deputation, when a vote will be taken and the future action of the Association will depend on the result of the vote.

The Board of Trade returns for November give a sure indication of the marked revival in trade. They show imports valued at £70,995,218, an increase of £5,601,059 on the corresponding month of last year. Exports amounted to £43,358,387, an increase of £2,371,996, while re-exports totalled £9,631,336, an increase of £1,797,107.

The appointment is intimated of Prince Louis of Battenberg as First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, in succession to Sir Francis Bridgeman, who has resigned.

The workmen's section of the Coal Conciliation Board for the federated districts of England and North Wales have decided to ask a further increase of 5 per cent. in wages. An increase of 5 per cent. was granted last October.

Mr. Raymond Asquith, son of the Prime Minister, has been unanimously invited, at a meeting of the Derby Liberal Eight Hundred, to become the Liberal candidate for the borough. He has accepted the invitation.

At a suffrage meeting on non-militant and non-party lines in Glasgow, letters were read from Lord Haldane and Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Balfour sent a telegram wishing every success to the meeting. Sir Edward Grey wrote that if women's suffrage is put into the Government's Reform Bill, by the House of Commons, the Government will continue their support as a whole, and women's suffrage would become part of a Government measure. The greatest obstacle to the question, he said, is the exasperation which has been caused by militant acts of violence, and which will be increased to an overwhelming degree if they are continued. The greatest danger to women's suffrage consists in this exasperation, and those who attempt violence and intimidation are far more hurtful to women's suffrage than any of its declared opponents. It is by argument, sympathy, and conviction that the day will be won.

The North-Eastern Railway Company is confronted with a strike that threatens to be of a formidable nature. An engine-driver named Knox had been convicted at Newcastle of drunkenness, and the manager of the company thought proper to remove him to a less responsible position. If, however, at the end of a twelve months' probation, he had regained the confidence of the company, Knox was to be reinstated in his old position. Against this the railwaymen at Newcastle, the Hartlepoons, Carlisle, and various other branches struck work. Their contention is that Knox was innocent, and even if he were not, he was not on duty at the time of the offence, and in that case the action of the company is an unjustifiable attack on the personal liberty of railwaymen. It should be stated that if the Home Office grants leave to appeal, and the magistrates' decision is reversed, the company will immediately reinstate Knox. Meanwhile the railway service is being seriously dislocated, to the great inconvenience of travellers and traders.

In his farewell sermon at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Sunday, Canon Henson made a strong appeal on behalf of Christian unity. He objected to the intolerant habit of mind which too often coloured social practice—that of making Anglican isolation a religious principle. In his opinion, if Anglicans and Nonconformists came together in conference, not much more would be heard of Disestablishment and Disendowment.

According to a despatch from Washington, in the Senate on Monday, Mr. John W. Works, Republican Senator from California, declared himself in favour of a single term for the Presidency. He recommended the adoption of legislation prohibiting a President offering himself or being nominated for re-election. He seized the opportunity to make a bitter attack on Mr. Roosevelt, whose "third term" aspirations he declared to be a danger to the Constitution. While he was being denounced in the Senate, Mr. Roosevelt was presiding over a "Bull Moose" Convention at Chicago, at which plans were discussed for the purpose of ensuring the defeat of the Taft party at the next Convention.

THE ALLEGED COLLAPSE OF SOCIALISM

BY BERNARD SHAW PART II.

I.

I SEE only one ray of light in the gloom for Mr. Chesterton as Head Man of the Peasant State. It is just possible that he might meet St. Clare. But what would he do with her? He would offer her a peasant property. She would say, "No, thank you, Mr. Chesterton. You say I must have property. So did the Pope. He kept on saying that I must have property and not be a Poor Clare. I kept on telling him, in my serious, literal way—not your profane, meaningless way—that I would see him damned first. I did see him damned first. I hope I will not have to see you damned first; so will you be patient, and let me teach you a little religion? Or would you rather begin by telling me why your Peasant State will pay me more to be the mistress of a nobleman than the servant of God?"

II.

What is the use of ignoring the technical basis of the business of social organization? Ricardo's law of rent is very tiresome. So is Newton's law of gravitation. I have been more tired of the law of gravitation when driving a two-ton car down an Alpine pass than anybody but a real peasant could possibly be of the law of rent; but I did not let go the brake and fold my arms and let the car rip for all that. If Mr. Chesterton resettles England as America has been resettled, and lets the resettlement rip (and this appears to be his proposal), then he will simply have the history of America over again, millionaires, hunger-marches, and all. What is the good of that? Will any sane man make the terrible effort that alone can get him out of purgatory for no other purpose than to march straight back there?

III.

If Mr. Chesterton disclaims this intention, and proposes steps to prevent the private appropriation of land and all its consequences, what other method of doing this has he except the method of Socialism? He not only admits, he embraces the Socialist contention that the land must be expropriated with a view to redistribution. He embraces in the same armful the Syndicalist contention that Parliament cannot do it, and that the people must do it for themselves. He exposes the absurdity of expecting a government of poor men by rich men to emancipate poor men, or believing that Collectivism established by such a government could mean anything but extending the State guarantee of their Consols to all their other stocks and shares and rents and royalties. Presumably, then, he sees that his Peasant State must be so constructed that however the general level of prosperity may rise, no man shall be allowed to grow rich in money faster than his neighbors. In other words, his Peasant State must be a Socialist State. Then, what is there left to argue except whether the Socialist State will be a Peasant State or not? As to that, Mr. Chesterton may take it from me that it wont. It is only in Camberwell and Bloomsbury that people want to be peasants; and even they want to be peasants in art cottages, and spend their weekends in the Queen's Hall, listening to orchestral concerts. Anyhow, the thing is impossible: peasant cultivation could no more supply the needs of modern populations than it could produce that finest extant country product so far: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

IV.

The difficulty that confronts us all in this matter is the one raised by Mr. Chesterton when, having shown that our Parliament cannot save us, he suggests the further question, can the people who elect this Parliament save us? Some years ago Mr. Chesterton wrote one of his most memorable poems. The first line of it was also its burden. It ran thus:—

"We are the people of England; and we have not spoken yet."

At about the same time another poet, whose name is unknown to me, wrote for Mr. Eugene Stratton a lay with a refrain which came at every second line. It began:

"I'm going to sing you a topical song.
If you'll stand that you'll stand anything."

Had Mr. Chesterton written it, it would have begun:

"They've taken the abbeys away from the monks.
If you'll stand that you'll stand anything."

Both poems were to the same purpose. They recited all the crimes of society and history, and all the grievances of the people; but in Mr. Chesterton's the people said always, "We are the people of England; and we have not spoken yet," like Mr. Snodgrass at the battle of Ipswich, when he said he was just going to begin; whereas Mr. Stratton, addressing these same people of England, expressed no hope that they were going to speak or to do anything else than suffer, and simply said in good-humored despair, "If you'll stand that, you'll stand anything."

V.

And here is the real problem for us. There is no quarrel between Mr. Chesterton and the Socialists on the economic side: he agrees that we must have economic equality; and his cockney Arcadianism need divide us no more than my bog-trotting hatred of agriculture. The question is, how are we to induce a nation which has tamely stood everything, from the dissolution of the monasteries and the sweeping of whole countrysides of families into the sea to make shooting preserves for a ring of thieves and cads, to the Insurance Act and the Flogging Bill, either to work out its own salvation or to let anyone else do it? Or is Mr. Chesterton also waiting for the supermen?

I pause for a reply.

WIT AND WISDOM OF G. B. S.

SELF-SACRIFICE enables us to sacrifice other people without blushing.

If you begin by sacrificing yourself to those you love, you will end by hating those to whom you have sacrificed yourself.—Man and Superman.

SIR PATRICK: There are two things that can be wrong with any man. One of them is a cheque. The other is a woman. Until you know that a man's sound on these two points, you know nothing about him.—The Doctor's Dilemma.

Martyrdom, sir, is what these people like: it is the only way in which a man can become famous without ability.—The Devil's Disciple.

NAPOLEON AS A SOCIALIST * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA PART I.

I.

THE opponents of Socialism are never tired of arguing that Socialism at best is only the dream of impractical idealists, that it has never been tried on a large scale, at least, in modern society, and that wherever it has been tried on a small scale it has either been a lamentable failure or has resulted in practical unrest or periodical revolution. Now, the history of the French people shows that Socialism has been tried by the most realistic, the most practical ruler of modern times, that it has been a magnificent success, and that, so far from having proved a cause of revolution and instability, agrarian Socialism in France has proved a most conservative force, and has raised the most efficient bulwark against revolution.

II.

Academic historians keep us in such complete ignorance as to the meaning of the fundamental facts of history that most readers may fail to see that I am referring to the Testamentary Law of the Code Napoléon, and they will dismiss with a smile as a Chestertonian paradox the Socialism of a sovereign who created new aristocracies and new dynasties, and who partitioned the thrones of Europe amongst his relatives and his soldiers. Academic historians are so much deceived by watchwords and doctrinaire formulas that it does not occur to them that the Testamentary Law of the Code Napoléon is indeed the most daring Socialistic experiment which was ever attempted, as well as the most successful and the most beneficial, and that, therefore, Napoleon is entitled to the claim of being the greatest practical Socialist of all ages. I do not use the word in a vague sense, I use it in its literal technical meaning. The aim of Napoleon has been the establishment of social equality, his method the power of the State, his achievement the abolition of the landed aristocracy, and the division of the soil of France amongst six millions of peasant proprietors. Thiers may write twenty volumes on Napoleon, and ignore that fundamental fact. But poets like Béranger, and novelists like Balzac, have seen further and gone deeper than the bourgeois chronicler of the treatises and campaigns of the Empire, and they have proved once more the truth of the Aristotelian dictum that poetry is truer than history. They have realised that it is the Socialistic legislation of the Code Napoléon which has been the enduring monument of the First Empire. They have revealed to us why Napoleon has remained the idol of the peasantry and of the people, although he sent their sons by hundreds of thousands to the shambles of the battlefield. It is not to our present purpose to determine the exact part which Napoleon took in the elaboration of the Code Civil. His systematic adversaries see nothing but organised flattery in the "Procès verbaux" of the Conseil d'Etat, and they tell us that he gave nothing but his name to the Code Civil. Even so, Tolstoy reveals to us that Napoleon did not fight his own battles, perhaps paving the way for the future historian who will take up Archbishop Whately's argument that Napoleon never existed. Without going the length of Lanfrey, temperate critics tell us that, even admitting that Napoleon directed the legislative labours of the Conseil d'Etat, the Code Civil has only systematised existing legislation, and embodied the principles and the customs of the ancient monarchy. But to grant all this is not to diminish the historic part of Napoleon, it is only to raise him on a higher pedestal. For, on this theory, Napoleon must be considered not only as the armed soldier of democracy, the executor of the revolution, or, to use the quaint phraseology of Lord Rosebery, the "scavenger of Europe," he is made the heir to the whole tradition of the French people, and his legislative achievement is the ultimate outcome of French civilisation.

III.

Whatever credit the monarchy and the revolution may claim in the Code Civil, one thing is certain: where the revolution has failed, Napoleon did succeed. The revolutionists, inspired with the Socialistic ideal, deemed, and rightly deemed, that the hereditary aristocracy was the negation of social justice, the mainstay of oppression, the nursery of pauperism and corruption. They argued, and they rightly argued, that every citizen ought to have a stake in the land. Imbued with this conviction, the revolutionary statesmen set themselves to abolish the landed aristocracy with the fervour and logic of their race. The early revolutionists nourished the fond hope that the aristocracy might be abolished by the voluntary sacrifice and renunciation of the privileged classes, but they soon discovered that enthusiasm and self-sacrifice are fitful and short-lived, and that the Night of the Fourth of August, 1789, did not prove to be the night of Pentecost. After the failure of their hopes, the revolutionists soon resorted to the more drastic method of confiscation, and they finally were led to assume that the quickest way of suppressing the aristocracy was to suppress the aristocrats, and to send them to the guillotine. But the event proved that confiscation and wholesale murder were alike ineffective; for confiscation only transferred the land from the legitimate owners to the spoliators, and the hecatombs of the guillotine only transformed the oppressors of yesterday into heroes and martyrs, and only hastened on the Counter-revolution.

Whether Napoleon was the author of the Code Civil or whether he was not, he clearly read the signs of the times. He saw that a constructive revolution could only be achieved by law, and only by a law which would be in harmony with the elemental instincts of men, a law which would reconcile the interests of the State and those of the individual, a law which would make no exception of persons, and would not be aimed against individuals, but which would be universal in its operation.

IV.

What strikes us most in the Testamentary Legislation of Napoleon is the apparent disproportion between the simplicity of the means and the magnitude of the results. The memorable Article 913 of the Civil Code, which practically compels parents to leave equal portions to all their children, and which absolutely deprives them of the right of disinheritance, at first sight, seems nothing but a check against the injustice, vanity, and caprice of tyrannical parents; nothing but a moderate compromise between the rights of the older and those of the younger generations; nothing but the extension of an ancient principle, embodied in legislation at all ages and stages of human society.

But if we read the Article 913 in conjunction with the previous, exacting the compulsory sale or "licitation" of the family property in case of disagreement, the Testamentary Law becomes a formidable weapon which must inevitably break up all large landed estates, and make the re-establishment of a landed aristocracy impossible for all times.

For the Testamentary Law is automatic like a machine, relentless like the guillotine. And the greater an estate, the more surely it will be broken up. The wealthy French merchant may buy a large property and enjoy it during his lifetime, but on his death, in ninety-five cases out of a hundred, the property must needs be divided amongst his children. If the owner did leave it by will to his eldest son, two things might happen. Either the father would have to compensate the other children and leave them equal shares in money, in which case the eldest son, being burdened with an extensive estate with very little capital to work it, would probably not be able to make both ends meet; or the father would favour the eldest son to enable him to work the estate, and he would leave the other children only what the French law compels him to leave them, in which case the younger children would disagree and demand a compulsory sale or "licitation." As a matter of fact, the consequences of any inequality in the settlement are so serious that sentiment and tradition are against it, and, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, owners of property do not even take advantage of the not inconsiderable liberty which the Code Napoléon leaves them.

V.

It has been often contended by opponents of the law, and by none more emphatically than by Leplay in "La Réforme Sociale," and by Balzac in "The Country Doctor," that the Civil Code not only destroys large estates, but also breaks up small estates beyond the point where they can no more support the owner. Such a contention stands self-refuted, even if it were not contradicted by the facts. That the Testamentary Law breaks up land to the extreme limit, and divides it amongst the largest possible number of proprietors, is certainly true; and that extreme division is claimed by its supporters as the most desirable effect of the law. But beyond the point where the division would cease to be advantageous to the owner and become ruinous to agriculture, the breaking-up process cannot possibly go. Although there may occur individual cases where the minute division renders cultivation difficult or unprofitable, those cases must necessarily be few, and must inevitably be adjusted. Either the owner will ply another trade and work his little plot of land only to eke out his income, or, if his piece of land cannot be worked to advantage, he will sell it to his neighbour. Unless we assume that French peasants are far more stupid than they are habitually assumed to be, and they are generally credited with considerable shrewdness and practical sense, it is absurd to admit that in any settlement they will not make the best possible bargain for themselves.

VI.

It ought to be added that, whilst the law breaks up large estates and multiplies small holdings, it does not destroy moderate estates. Country life under the Testamentary Law, and under any law, continues to attract by tens of thousands the city-bred professional or commercial man. No doubt they will not be able, like the retired or successful British merchant, to buy a large estate and raise their social status by claiming admittance into the ranks of the gentry. But they will generally be content to buy a small property, and will do so all the more willingly because its moderate size will probably enable one of their children to retain it. There is no land on the continent of Europe which is more thickly studded than France with little country houses and delightful summer retreats.

The Testamentary Law, then, has attained the object which the legislator had in view. The country which boasted of the most ancient and the most brilliant aristocracy of Europe, the country which created the ideal of chivalry, has become the classical land of small holdings. The stately abodes of royalty and the magnificent abbeys of the Church are either picturesque solitudes like Chambord or have been turned into gambling dens like Vizille, or have been bought by aliens like Saint Wandrille and Chenonceaux, or are occupied by life tenants like the majority of the historic chateaux of ancient Gaul. It may be said that all over France real property has been largely transferred from the classes to the masses.

(To be continued.)

THE PROBLEM OF ALSACE

By PROF. H. LICHTENBERGER

(Of the University of Paris).

I.

GERMANS constantly reiterate that since the Treaty of Frankfort there is for them no "Alsatian question," just as since 1860 the "question of Savoy" no longer exists for France. Undoubtedly they are within their right from an international point of view. It is natural that they should decline all discussion on the ultimate cession of Alsace, and treat amateur diplomatists, who propose to modify the state of affairs created by the Treaty of Frankfort, with some irony. In return they are obliged to admit that, from the Alsatian point of view, the "question of Alsace" still exists. They can neither hide from themselves nor from Europe that to-day, as in the past, Alsace remains hostile to German influence, and openly shows her dislike of the government forced upon her by her conquerors. Forty years have passed since the annexation took place, and the assimilation of Alsace is not accomplished. What is the reason of this opposition, and how is it shown?

At the close of the war the people of Alsace combined in a movement of unanimous protest against the victorious Germans. They declared their sympathy for France, their antipathy towards the invaders. By emigration, by desertion to evade the period of military service, by affiliation to French patriotic societies, by repeated hostile elections, by endless signs in everyday life, the people showed that it was to force alone that they submitted, that they regretted the past, that they held themselves under no obligation of loyalty towards their conquerors, and that they intended to reduce contact with them to a minimum.

II.

This phase of resistance had been foreseen, and it continued for many years. Now it is ended, and no one can wonder. The Alsatians could not indefinitely preserve an attitude of fruitless opposition. They could not live in a perpetual state of latent revolt against the established order of things. They could not remain indifferent to the methods by which they were governed, neglect their material interests, risk the economic prosperity of their country by unceasing loyalty to memories of an ever-receding past.

Little by little they have had to change their tactics. They have acquiesced in the existing state of affairs. They have accepted their position as German citizens. In return they have demanded Alsatian autonomy, "home rule," in opposition to the invasion of German influence and German ideals, and have rallied to the cry of "Alsace for the Alsatians." This formula had at first in their eyes a perfectly definite and practical meaning. It is well known that, by the Treaty of Frankfort, Alsace was declared to be "Imperial territory" (Reichsland). She was, and still is, governed, in the name of the Empire, by a German administration appointed by the Kaiser, and exclusively responsible to the German Government. It is against this exceptional system that the representatives of Alsace, supported by the unanimous voice of the people, have risen in opposition.

III.

But the watchword, "Alsace for the Alsatians," has developed another and a wider interpretation. Alsatians do not merely ask to be treated on the same footing as other citizens of the Empire; they further desire that Germany should recognise "Alsatian individuality." Now, what is it that differentiates the Alsatian people from the rest of the Germanic family? It is this: they have always lived at the confluence of two ideals of culture. They are a mixed race, not a purely Germanic race. In their ideas, their books, their habits and traditions, their customs and beliefs, in their whole manner of life, in short, they resemble the French type. Further, they do not mean to change. They hold that, in the matter of civilisation, superiority does not lie with Germany. In so far as they share in French culture they feel themselves to be, not only different from, but superior to, the Germans.

IV.

The Germans have watched this development in the direction of autonomy—so unforeseen by them—with very varied feelings.

Amongst the party (that of the Left), who are endeavouring to promote the democratic ideal in Germany, the claims of Alsace have met with real, though somewhat platonic, sympathy. Even in Alsace some sincerely liberal men are to be found, amongst whom Professor Wittich should be mentioned, who demonstrate the futility of the efforts of the Government towards the Germanisation of Alsace, and claim for the annexed countries a more humane government and a more effective autonomy. In Pan-Germanist circles, on the other hand, the attitude of the Alsatians has been looked upon as an intolerable scandal. The resistance of "these renegades whose blood is German, but whose language is barbarous," has been condemned with ever-increasing indignation. The necessity that the Government should use strong measures to repress these insolent Pan-French leanings has been emphasised. Alsatians suspected of French sympathies have been bitterly denounced. All movements towards conciliation have been opposed. Even the Stadtholder, Count Wedil, was not spared, his offence being that he looked kindly on the Alsatians, whilst his wife committed the grave fault of speaking French fluently.

V.

The Imperial Government has attempted to find a midway path between Alsatian nationalism and Pan-Germanic chauvinism. In all essentials, however, it sides with the Pan-Germanists. It finds fault with Alsatian particularism for its French leanings; it calls on the Alsatians to turn to German culture, and declares that, in the present state of affairs, the annexed countries are not ripe for autonomy. In return it has yielded so far to Alsatian particularism as to grant the apparent advantage of a Constitution. Unfortunately, it was evident from the first that this Constitution, the product of Reichstag and Bunderstag deliberations, introduced no real amelioration in the condition of the annexed countries. It grants a Parliament to Alsace, but the Lower Chamber, elected by universal suffrage, is paralysed by an Upper Chamber, in great part composed of high dignitaries and officials and of members nominated by the Kaiser.

The administration is still entirely dependent on the Stadtholder, who exercises absolute authority in the name of the Kaiser, and is responsible to the Kaiser alone. Nothing has been changed in Alsace-Lorraine by the grant of this Constitution, and public opinion has never for one moment been deceived. The Government hoped to checkmate Alsatian nationalism, chiefly recruited from the rich and cultured middle class, by granting universal suffrage, and so strengthening the Democratic or Socialist party. It was soon seen that this forecast was mistaken. The new Alsatian Parliament, in spite of the defeat of some of the "Nationalist" party, was as resolutely "particularist" as the old Alsatian Diet, as determined to oppose the invasion of Pan-Germanism.

VI.

Matters stand thus for the present. Alsace refuses to be assimilated. The Government, in return, sets itself, by means of endless petty tyrannies, to checkmate this stubborn resistance, which irritates it by its unceasing continuity. One day it dissolves sports-clubs suspected of French sympathies; another it prevents French sportsmen from renting shootings in Alsace. Recently the industrial society of Nudhouse was threatened that all State orders for locomotives would be withdrawn unless the manager of the Grafenstadin factory, whose sympathies were supposed to be French, were instantly dismissed. In a memorable conversation held a short time ago at Strasbourg the Kaiser, William II., declared that, if the opposition continued, he would suppress the Constitution and reduce Alsace to the condition of a mere Prussian province. But the Alsatians are not to be intimidated.

By all legal methods, by speech and in the Press, by open protests or by caricature and irony, in Parliament or in the papers, they declare their intention of maintaining their own individuality. If, after forty years of occupation, the spirit of Alsace is still stirred by the music of the "Marseillaise"; if the first desire of little Alsatian schoolboys, when on an expedition to the frontier, is to decorate their hats or buttonholes with the French colours, it would appear that the "benefits" of annexation have not effaced the memory of a time when Alsatian individuality was more respected and freer to expand after its own manner than is the case to-day.

VII.

The consequence of this state of affairs, from the international point of view, may be easily realised. The discontent prevalent in the annexed countries must have its effect on French public opinion. France, who has always scrupulously observed the terms of the Treaty which binds her, has never interfered in the affairs of Alsace. This was her duty. It was also in her interest, for it is clear that a French propaganda in Alsace would have compromised the Alsatians without doing any good to France. She has never given advice to the people of Alsace-Lorraine, and her influence counts for nothing in the present situation of this part of the Empire. But no power on earth can force France to lose all interest in a country which used to be one of her most loyal provinces, and which is still, in its ideas and culture, a French outpost on German territory.

If the Germans had known how to deal with the Alsatians as England has dealt with the Boers, if it had been agreed that the Alsatians were free to develop their life along their own lines, there is no doubt that the cause of Franco-German friendship would have been greatly advanced. But it is clear that this reconciliation is far from being accomplished. Considering this state of affairs, who can wonder that it should be impossible for France to forget the past, that she should maintain that attitude of reserve of which Germans complain, and which their ready suspicions interpret as a symptom of hostility towards themselves? Thus the Alsatian question, a conflict, sometimes half suppressed, sometimes frankly avowed, which exists between annexed Alsace and her masters, remains, whether we like it or not, a permanent menace to the peace of the world; and France can do nothing to modify a situation which she did not create, and for which she is not responsible.

LITERARY NOTES

THE literary event of the week has been the publication of the third and final volume of the Second Supplement of the "Dictionary of National Biography." Thus closes another chapter in the history of what, with the possible exception of the "Oxford Dictionary," may proudly be regarded as the most colossal literary enterprise ever carried out in this country. The interesting event finds me in a reminiscent mood, and I have been trying to recall some of the incidents of the luncheon given by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House on a bright June day in 1900, in celebration of the completion of the original sixty-three volumes.

Lord Morley, I remember, with his customary felicity, proposed the toast of the "Dictionary," and somewhat apologetically confessed to having written only one article to the titanic work—that on Cobden. But the most interesting speech was that of Mr. George M. Smith, the enlightened publisher, who originated the idea of the work. Mr. Smith gave some startling figures regarding the magnitude of the "Dictionary." The expenditure, he said, could not be stated at less than six figures, and the second figure would be a four or a five. More important still, he added that he would consider himself fortunate if the return equalled half the expenditure.

But the hero of the present occasion is Sir Sidney Lee, who has not only maintained, in the new Supplement, the high standard of earlier volumes, but has even surpassed it. A striking instance of the thoroughness and accuracy of the editorial work came to my knowledge the other day. A contributor had forwarded an article about a relatively unimportant personage. He had had great difficulty in collecting sufficient material to fill a column of the "Dictionary," but was confident that he had exhausted all the sources of information. Great was his amazement, however, when the volume containing the article was published, to find that his contribution had been supplemented in certain important particulars, and fresh references given.

Sir Sidney Lee's connection with the "Dictionary" is now an old story. He joined the staff so long ago as 1883, and worked for seven years under the late Sir Leslie Stephen. In 1890 Sir Leslie, owing to ill-health, associated with himself as joint editor his young lieutenant, who in the following year assumed entire editorial control. Sir Sidney Lee's labours have, indeed, been prodigious. Besides editing the major portion of the "Dictionary," he has, I dare say, contributed more articles to its pages than any other writer. In the original sixty-three volumes, he wrote no fewer than 820 articles, covering 1,370 pages, and when to these we add his contributions to the First and Second Supplements, including the two brilliant and illuminating articles on Queen Victoria and Edward VII. (the latter extending to sixty-four pages), the sum total must be over one thousand.

We are now well in December, and the Christmas book trade is in full swing. I have been inspecting the publishers' lists, and should say that the output of this class of literature is not only larger but of finer quality than ever. What has revolutionised the Christmas book more than anything else has been the invention of the three-colour process. But it is a very expensive process, and I sometimes wonder if publishers who place sumptuous Christmas volumes upon the market really get an adequate return for their outlay. Be that as it may, the artistic excellence of the Christmas book is indisputable. I have only one criticism to offer, and that is, that there is a tendency in some quarters to lavish money on illustrations, and to be parsimonious as regards literary matter. This is a regrettable feature, though I suppose it is a concession to the view that Christmas books are bought to be looked at, not to be read.

Mr. H. Buxton Forman will, no doubt, have his reasons, but I am surprised to learn that he is bringing out a new edition of Medwin's "Life of Shelley." Its biographical value is almost nil. Besides revealing strong bias, it is full of inaccuracies. The only redeeming feature of this memoir, which was first published in 1833, and afterwards (1847) expanded into a two-volume work, is that the author was the cousin and schoolfellow of Shelley. Medwin's "Life" may possess historical interest, but the most complete and authoritative record of the poet's life is that by Professor Dowden, supplemented, perhaps, by Mr. Clutton-Brock's critical study.

Much sympathy will be felt for Mr. Thomas Hardy, who has suffered a severe blow by the death of his wife. A niece of Archdeacon Gifford, Miss Emma Gifford was married to the distinguished novelist in 1874, the year in which, it is interesting to recall, "Far from the Madding Crowd" appeared. Mrs. Hardy had both literary and artistic tastes. In earlier years she wrote short stories and occasional verses, but she made no mark. Mrs. Hardy revelled in the scenery of the Wessex country, and tried to convey something of its charm in a series of water-colour sketches. To the cause of woman suffrage she devoted much of her time, and was frequently to be found walking in London processions.

There ought to be some high bidding at Messrs. Sotheby's on December 18th, when a valuable series of autograph letters and literary MSS. will be disposed of. Mr. Meredith seems to have had a literary gardener, for that functionary is now placing upon the market three of his master's MSS., "The Revolution," 21 pages quarto; "Napoleon," 57 pages quarto; and "Alsace-Lorraine," 50 pages quarto. Meredith's autograph letters to the Rev. Augustus and Mrs. Jessopp, many of which appear in Messrs. Constable's recently published "Letters of George Meredith," are also being sold. Another interesting lot consists of twenty-one of Scott's letters to his brother-in-law, Charles Carpenter, including the epistle (published by Lockhart) in which Scott announced his purchase of the land on which Abbotsford was reared.

Many, I feel sure, will regret the dispersal of the late Mr. Andrew Lang's library. As was to be expected in the case of so versatile a bookman, it covered a wide field, and was particularly rich in works on folklore and comparative religion, critical editions of Greek and Latin authors, and copies of books which had been presented to Mr. Lang by some of the most noted of his contemporaries. It also contained a copy of Montaigne's "Essays," dated 1595, with the autograph signature of Drummond of Hawthornden, and a fine copy of the first French translation of Bunyan's "Pilgrim Progress," 1685. Then there were a large number of books containing marginal notes by Mr. Lang, though I doubt if these will be of much use to anyone, as Mr. Lang's caligraphy was execrable. I possess several of his letters, which I have never been able more than to partially decipher. X. Y. Z.

MONS. SEGUIN'S GOAT (From the French of Alphonse Daudet)

My poor Gringoire, you will never change! How now? You are offered a post on one of the best Parisian newspapers, and you have the face to refuse it? Look at yourself, wretched boy! Look at your ragged doublet and your demoralised hose and your thin face, that tells of hunger! Your passion for rhyme has brought you to this pass. This is all you have to show for ten years of loyal service in the train of the great Apollo. Will nothing bring you to shame?

Be a journalist, idiot, be a journalist! You will earn beautiful golden crowns. You will be able to have your place at Brébants', and to show yourself on first-nights with a fine new feather in your cap.

No! You would rather not? You prefer to remain free, in your own way, to the end. . . . Well, just listen to the tale of M. Seguin's goat. You will see what those gain who try to keep their freedom.

M. Seguin never had any luck with his goats. He lost them all in the same way. One fine day they would break their rope, go off into the mountains, and up there the wolf ate them. Neither their master's endearments nor fear of the wolf—nothing held them back. They were goats of an independent spirit, it seemed, who craved above all for space and freedom.

Good M. Seguin, who did not in the least understand the character of these animals, was horrified. "It is no good," he would say; "goats get weary here with me. I shall keep no more."

All the same, he did not let himself be discouraged, and after having lost six goats in the same way, he bought a seventh. This time he took care to get a very young goat, so that she should get used to living with him.

Ah! Gringoire, how pretty that little goat of M. Seguin's was! How pretty she was, with her soft eyes, her little beard like a sergeant's, her shining black hoofs and striped horns, and her long white wool like a cloak! She was nearly as charming as Esmeralda's goat—do you remember, Gringoire?—and so docile, so affectionate; she allowed herself to be milked without moving, without putting her foot in the pail—a love of a little goat.

Behind his house M. Seguin had an enclosure, surrounded by a hawthorn hedge. There he put the new tenant. He fastened her to a post in the most pleasing part of the meadow, taking care to allow her plenty of rope, and from time to time he went to look at her, to see how she was getting on. The goat was quite content, and munched away so heartily that M. Seguin was delighted. "At last," thought the poor man, "I have found one who will not weary here!"

M. Seguin was mistaken: his goat did weary. One day she said to herself, as she looked up towards the mountains:

"How happy one might be up there! What bliss to gambol in the heather, without this cursed tether grazing my neck! . . . It is all very well for a donkey to graze in an enclosure. Goats need scope."

The grass in the meadow was tasteless from that moment. She was sick of life. She got thin, and her milk was scarce. It was pitiful to see her straining all day long on her chain, her head turned towards the mountains, her nostrils dilated, sadly crying, "Mee-e-e."

M. Seguin noticed that something was wrong, but he could not tell what. One morning, as he finished milking her, the goat turned round and said in her patois:

"Listen to me, M. Seguin; I am weary of being here with you; let me go up into the mountains."

"Good heavens! She too!" cried M. Seguin aghast; and so great was the shock that he dropped his pail, then sitting down on the grass beside his goat: "What is this, Blanquette? You wish to leave me?"

Blanquette replied: "Yes, Monsieur Seguin."

"Is it because there is not enough grass here for you?"

"Oh, no, Monsieur Seguin."

"Are you tied too short—would you like me to lengthen the rope?"

"It is not worth while, Monsieur Seguin."

"Well, then, what do you need, what do you want?"

"I want to go up into the mountains, Monsieur Seguin."

"But, miserable little creature, do you not know there is a wolf up there in the mountains? What would you do when he came upon you?"

"I would butt him with my horns, Monsieur Seguin."

"The wolf would make fine sport of your horns. He eats goats with very different horns from yours. You remember old Renande who was here last year? A queen of goats, strong and wicked as a he-goat. She fought with the wolf right through the night—and at dawn the wolf ate her."

"Oh, pity! Poor Renaude! But it's all the same, let me go up to the mountains."

"Gracious goodness!" said M. Seguin. "But what happens to my goats? Yet another to be eaten by the wolf? No. I shall save you, in spite of yourself, little wretch; and for fear that you should break your rope, I am going to shut you up in the stable, and you shall stay there always."

Thereupon M. Seguin led away the goat into the dark stable, and double-locked the door. Unfortunately he had forgotten the window, and almost before his back was turned the little thing was off.

It makes you laugh, Gringoire? By heavens! I daresay you are on the side of the goats, against poor, good M. Seguin. We shall see presently if you are still laughing.

There was widespread delight when the white goat reached the mountains. The old pines had never seen anything so pretty. She was received like a little queen. The chestnuts bent down to the ground to caress her with the tips of their branches. The golden brooms blossomed as she passed, and smelt their sweetest for her. The whole mountains held festival.

You may imagine how happy our goat was, Gringoire. No more rope, no more post, nothing to prevent her gambolling and grazing at will. And the grass was grass indeed! right over her horns, mon cher; and such grass—delicious, delicate, lace-like, made up of a thousand plants. It was a very different matter to the turf of the enclosure. And then, the flowers! Great blue campanulas, long-cupped purple foxgloves—a whole forest of wild flowers, overflowing with intoxicating juices.

Half-mad with joy, the white goat rolled amongst it, kicking her legs in the air, went head-over-heels down the banks, helter-skelter through the fallen chestnut leaves. Then all at once, with a bound, leap to her feet, hop! off she goes, her head down, through the thicket and the brushwood, now on a hill-top, now at the foot of a ravine, up above, down below, everywhere. You would have thought there were ten of M. Seguin's goats on the mountains.

You see, our Blanquette was afraid of nothing. With one bound she would cross great streams that spattered her as she passed with froth and foam; then, dripping, stretch herself out on a flat rock to dry in the sun. Once when she had gone to the very edge of a plateau, a citisus flower between her teeth, down below, away down in the plain, she caught sight of M. Seguin's house, with the enclosure behind. It made her laugh till she cried.

"How tiny it is!" said she; "how could I ever exist there?"

Poor little thing! Finding herself perched up so high, she fancied she was at least as big as the world.

It was a splendid day for M. Seguin's goat. Towards mid-day, as she was running about hither and thither, she fell in with a herd of chamois, busily munching at a wild vine. Our little madcap in her white dress caused quite a sensation. They gave her the best place at the vine, and all the gentlemen were very gallant. I even believe—this is between ourselves, Gringoire—that a young, black-coated chamois had the good luck to take Blanquette's fancy. The lovers wandered amongst the woods for an hour or two, and if you wish to know what they said, go and ask the little brooks that run hidden through the moss.

All at once the wind freshened. The mountains turned violet; it was evening. "Already!" said the little goat, and stopped, amazed.

Down below the fields were shrouded in mist. M. Seguin's meadow was just disappearing in the fog, and all that was to be seen of the little house was the roof and some smoke. She listened to the tinkling bells of a herd homeward bound, and felt her heart grow sad. A homing falcon brushed her with its wings as it passed. She started. Then a long howl came echoing through the mountains:

"How! how!"

She remembered the wolf; the whole day long the madcap had never thought of him. At the same moment the sound of a horn rose up from the valley below. It was good M. Seguin making one last effort.

"How! how!" went the wolf.

"Come back! come back!" cried the horn.

Blanquette was starting for home when she remembered the post and the tether and the hedge of the enclosure. No, now she could not stand that life, she thought; she had better stay.

The horn was heard no more.

The goat heard a rustling of leaves behind her. She looked round and saw in the shadow two short, straight ears and two shining eyes. It was the wolf. There he was, enormous, motionless, sitting on his hind haunches, looking at her and smacking his lips in anticipation. As he knew perfectly well that eventually he would eat her, the wolf was in no hurry; but when she turned round he started laughing in an evil way: "Ho! ho! M. Seguin's little goat!" and he licked his chops with his great red tongue.

Blanquette felt she was lost. For one moment, remembering the story of old Renaude, who fought through the whole long night, only to be eaten in the morning, she thought 'twere better perhaps to allow herself to be eaten at once; then, changing her mind, she fell on guard, head down, horns advanced, like M. Seguin's brave goat that she was. Not that she had any hope of killing the wolf—goats don't kill wolves—but just to see if she could hold out as long as Renaude.

Then the monster advanced, and the little horns began the dance.

Oh! the brave little goat, how bravely she went at it! More than ten times—I am not lying, Gringoire—she forced the wolf to retreat to take breath. During these momentary truces the greedy little thing hurriedly took one more bite of her beloved grass, and returned to the battle with her mouth full. This went on the whole night. From time to time M. Seguin's goat looked up at the stars dancing in the clear sky. "If only I can hold out till the dawn!" she would sigh. One after the other the stars went out. Blanquette's horns worked with redoubled energy; so did the wolf's teeth. . . . A pale light appeared on the horizon. . . . The hoarse crow of a cock came up to them from some farmstead. "At last!" said the poor little animal, who only awaited the day to die; and she stretched herself out on the ground in her lovely white wool, now all splashed with blood. Then the wolf flung himself on the little goat and ate her.

Good-bye, Gringoire.

The story I have told you is not a tale of my invention. If ever you come to Provence our housewives will tell you of "La cabro de monssu Seguin, que se battégué touto la niue emé lou loup, e pici lou matin lou loup la mangé." ("M. Seguin's goat, who fought all night with the wolf, and in the morning the wolf ate her.")

Do you hear, Gringoire?

E pici lou matin lou loup la mangé."

(Translated by A. B. CHALMERS.)

MOMENTS

THERE are moments in a lifetime,
Lurid as the shafts that fly,
When the Storm-god's loosened arrows
Flash across the midnight sky.

Moments crammed with revelation
In their all-revealing hue,
Piercing unsuspected armour,
And the false we thought was true.

Moments—ah! and less than moments—
Lit by Truth's all-flaming lance;
And the traitor stands discovered
In a gesture or a glance.

Moments stamped with God's own blessing,
White with sacrificial flame:
When we break a cherished idol,
Saving weaker ones from shame.

Flashes of the vision splendid,
Longed-for, and at last revealed;
And we know the fight is worth it,
Though we perish on the field.

Moments when the clay's as nothing:
And the flesh-freed soul ascends,
For an instant, catching echoes
Of the Song that never ends.

Moments of ecstatic wonder,
When the Eastern curtain's drawn,
And Aurora scatters roses
For the pearly feet of Dawn.

Or, when West's aflame with glory,
Slowly, in the fading light,
One by one an unseen Captain
Calls the starry hosts of night.

There are moments in a lifetime,
Fraught with such immensity;
They are plucked from Time's frail fingers,
Destined for Eternity. GEORGE S. ASTINS.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHARLES KINGSLEY, MGR. BENSON, AND
THE BAPTISTS.To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If you have not yet quite done with Charles Kingsley and his alleged one-sidedness of portraiture, it might be mentioned that it is not only Roman Catholics that he has represented in a crooked mirror. He has this description of the Baptists: "The elder was a little sleek old man with a weak, blank face, just like a white rabbit. . . . The other . . . was . . . tall, grim, dark, bilious, with a narrow forehead, re-creating suddenly from his eyebrows," and so on. In another passage, the missionary is "a squat, red-faced, pig-eyed, low-browed man with great soft lips that opened back to his very ears; sensuality, conceit, and cunning marked in every feature." That is religious polemics with a vengeance. No doubt Monsignor Benson is right in saying that Kingsley was "simply incapable of seeing truths with which he had not a temperamental sympathy." But, curiously enough, the critic lays himself open to the same retort, for in "The Nonconformists," by R. H. Benson, a Baptist family is so unfortunate as to be required for the purposes of the novel, and has to pay for it by suffering the innuendo that the father, a deacon in a village chapel, was addicted surreptitiously to the bottle. Now, a little knowledge of village Nonconformity would have prevented this misrepresentation. But it is hard to keep one's temperamental bias in hand, for, in the very article in which Monsignor Benson charges Kingsley with "fallacious and abusive portraiture," he himself damns the word Puritan to the following company of epithets:—"Absurd, snivelling, Puritanical skulkers," and "Puritan hypocrite" occurs in the next column. Is this, again, a want of temperamental sympathy, or is it for want of knowing such books as Prof. Dowden's "Puritan and Anglican" or Canon Henson's "Puritan Studies"? Anyhow, the psychology of the situation is interesting to a NON-BAPTIST.

Broughton Park, Manchester,
December 1st, 1912.To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—On the conclusion of Mgr. Benson's article on Charles Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" I trust some well-qualified, non-partisan judge may be forthcoming who will sum up the case between these impassioned representatives of antagonistic faiths. Kingsley's latest critic would have us believe, because some of the minor portraits are wry-necked in the prejudiced vision of the Protestant, that the whole of the great canvas is a caricature. In a glow of graceful and courteous appreciation, the Catholic contrives to label the whole work a monument of injustice, apparently because it fails to expose and castigate equally and at the same time the weaknesses of both English and Spaniards, Nationalists and obedient sons of Rome. And he finds it peculiarly regrettable that there should be discernible a religious purpose in the book. Surely, then, there is need for the advent of a competent lay arbiter who, for the sake of right and not of polemics, in the cause of art rather than of sect, with strong love of what Stevenson calls "truth in a relation," shall deal on broad lines, not with details as to the personal gifts of Campion and Persons—nor with the spelling of their names—but with the state of ethical development of the various Western nations at the period represented, with English hatred of Spain and righteous horror of the Inquisition, with Kingsley's general faithfulness to that point of view, and with the perspective, chiaroscuro, and colour of his picture as a whole.

Meanwhile, it seems to me, a simple reader of EVERYMAN, that Mgr. Benson's general claim, so far, amounts to this: that Kingsley, in the interests of historical truth, ought to have taken pains to indicate all the way through that there was much to be said on both sides. Not only does he accuse the artist of narrowness for not constantly shifting his point of view during his execution of his picture, but he would have him tone down its brilliance and diminish its vigour by the introduction of irritating safeguards against our young people supposing that the facts of the case were exactly what they appeared to the Elizabethan Protestant. A Trojan critic of the "Iliad" on similar grounds would be certain to call it a monument of injustice, and a sufferer in the Inferno dub Dante's vision a caricature.

But when Mgr. Benson forsakes for a moment his rôle of critic, and shows us what sort of history he would give our romantic boys in order not to poison their minds, what do we find? "Even Spain never used the pains of the Inquisition except for the crime of 'relapse.'" Shades of Froude and Motley! Were ye, then, black, hideous, and horrible liars, beside whom Kingsley stands a white saint? What of Torquemada's ten thousand two hundred and twenty individuals burned alive, and ninety-seven thousand three hundred and twenty-one punished with infamy, confiscation of property, or perpetual imprisonment, all within his eighteen years of administration? ("Rise of the Dutch Republic," Part II., Chapter III.) Seminary priests and even Mgr. Benson may have some loophole of escape on a technical point as to the meaning of "relapse," I know. But that is of no avail on the broad issue. And it is on the broad issue that Kingsley's work is unassailable. His picture represents, not unfairly, our English horror of the devil-doms of Spain, and the plain man's contempt of jesuitry, "the science of villainy on the motive of superstition," as he still believes it to be.

Personally, I am inclined to thank Mgr. Benson for strengthening my opinion "that one who so greatly loved youth and truth" did not "poison the minds of the one by a caricature of the other."—I am, sir, etc.,
W. A. FINCH

Birstall, Leeds.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I had hoped that in this twentieth century one would not have found anyone of enlightened culture making such an unjust and foolish statement as that "the Pharisaism, irreligion, child-murder, and lamentable social conditions of to-day are directly traceable to Protestantism." Such a statement is paralleled by the opinion held by some in the middle ages, that because appearances of Halley's comet synchronised with the Norman Conquest and with the fall of Jerusalem, therefore the comet was the cause of these catastrophes!

The above-quoted remark is not only so grave an exaggeration as to be practically unrecognisable in the light of history, but it is also entirely irrelevant to the point at issue, viz., "Was Kingsley a reliable historian?" As a Protestant I regretfully agree that Kingsley did here and there allow his Protestantism to somewhat mar what is otherwise the finest historical romance in the English language.

But, even so, I submit that there are allowances to be made.

Catholics have frequently persecuted Protestants solely because of their religious opinions, although they were in other respects good citizens, but declined to profess adherence to dogmas which they could not honestly believe. Fundamentally, this is a question which only concerns a man and his Maker. But when we come to Protestant persecutions of Catholics in England during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the case was not always quite analogous.

In spite of the noble example of patriotism set by many Catholic gentry at the time of the Armada, it happened time and again that Catholics showed that they were possible—or even probable—danger centres to the body politic, ready to join in revolutionary movements.

Therefore the Government had to choose between abdication and acts of repression. These facts were doubtless present in Kingsley's mind, and tended to cause him to make some unwarranted generalisations. —I am, sir, etc.,

C. ROBINSON, M.A.,

Lecturer in Astronomy to Manchester University.

Reform Club, Lancaster, December 1st.

[This correspondence is now closed.]

ON "INDUSTRIAL UNREST."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It is strange how fond theorists are of asserting that History has always illustrated their theories, just as theologians used to be of claiming the support of the Bible for every dogma. Thus I see that M. Vandervelde declares that there is no instance in history of any class obtaining emancipation from those who ruled them, through the goodwill of the latter or by any means but force or threats of force.

What, then, of the abolition of slavery in England and America? In both cases the measure was dictated by the conscience of the governing class, and was in no way due to fear of violence from the enslaved.

The fact is, of course, that we may see in History, past or contemporaneous, countless instances of justice and injustice, kindness and cruelty, in every class; but unfortunately we are all of us apt to see only what our natural prepossessions lead us to seek.

But even if M. Vandervelde were correct in asserting that there is no recorded case of rights and justice freely conceded by those in power, would it not still be worth while for England to try the experiment of righting wrongs by goodwill, instead of stirring up civil strife and hatred, or adopting panaceas tried (surely with questionable success?) by countries differing from our own in size, influence, and most other conditions?—I am, sir, etc.,

November 26th.

BONÆ VOLUNTATIS.

WAR AGAINST POVERTY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Like many another eager volunteer, I have read Mrs. Sidney Webb's article with expectant interest. Her crusade in Scotland in favour of the abolition of our Poor Law system raised expectation high. This was followed by the publication of "Prevention of Destitution," which is virtually a revised edition of the Minority Report. But neither it nor her recent article helps us very much.

As Mrs. Webb is generally understood, she admits that we are still to have poor folk—widows and orphans, deserted women and children, lunatics and imbeciles, and the generally unfit, to say nothing of the "waster" and the drunkard—all of whom must be supported by funds obtained for the purpose by compulsory assessment under statutory powers. These poor people are still to be entitled to assistance, but they are no longer to be paupers! Why or how is not made clear. They may get their assistance from officials who act under another name; but is that abolishing pauperism? Is this the way Mrs. Webb is to execute her boast that she is to "abolish both the name and the thing"? The name may be changed, but the so-called "shame and disgrace" will remain, just as the "Stinking-willie" is quite as vile when called by its more polite name of "Wild-tansy."

It is not the province of the Poor Law to prevent destitution. To abuse it because it does not do so is about as intelligent as to assert that we ought to abolish our scavengers because they do not prevent the soiling of our streets, or to "break up" the police organisation because they do not prevent the occurrence of crime.

Among other influences of social disintegration—so long, for example, as the Licensing Authorities appear to care more for money (licence fees) than for men (sober, fit, and industrious citizens)—there will be human wreckage for the Poor Law to sweep up, for the Poor Law is but the social scavenger in the wake of the-cause-of-destitution.

But instead of having one responsible scavenging authority, Mrs. Webb would give us five, each with statutory powers and offices and officers, and, of course, salaries. From all this, would it not seem that Mrs. Webb, taking a leaf from the fable-book, wanted to send us five water-snakes to eat up the already very heavily burdened tax-payer?

The only means by which the Poor Law can be abolished is not by making new Poor Laws, as Mrs. Webb suggests, but by cutting off the avenues to destitution—by doing away with the necessity for recourse to public assistance.

It is not abolition or breaking-up that is required in connection with the Scots Poor Laws, but strengthening—broadening out, so as to fit them for coping with present-day conditions, in a manner satisfactory both to the destitute and to the rate-payer.

We in Scotland have been hugging the idea that we were on the highway to a complete system of local self-government. But Mrs. Webb steps in to put a spoke in the wheel. She would break up instead of connecting and linking up into a compact organic whole.

Mrs. Webb's proposal to have five separate authorities visiting the same family, and ferreting out their secrets, would be intolerable. It would be as bad as the London octopus!—I am, sir, etc.,

D. B. MUNRO.

IS RELIGION RESPONSIBLE FOR SOCIAL CONDITIONS?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I am much interested to notice that Mgr. Benson, in his reply to Mr. Candlish, considers that the "lamentable social conditions" of the present age are "traceable directly to Protestantism." I had thought that our present condition in Glasgow was largely due to causes with which Protestantism had as much to do as the precession of the equinoxes, viz., cheap coal, cheap labour, steamships, and the American trade. Doubtless these things presented a test to the Scottish character, bringing new power to master and workman, and so testing them both. The test has brought out the imperfections of their morality.

So what we call feudalism was not in the least traceable to the undivided Church, but was the outcome of the needs and conditions of the mediæval age. But it threw enormous power into the hands of the nobles, and so formed the test of the morality their Church had brought them. How imperfect that morality was one may see from the continual peasant risings of the middle ages.

These, the jacqueries, the Wat Tyler rebellion, are the exact parallel to our modern strikes, the signs of an imperfect social condition. If Mgr. Benson traces the strikes to Protestantism, let him stand by the parallel, and trace the mediæval risings to Romanism. I, for one, am not slow to accept the test. The rebels of the mediæval ages murdered and looted; the strikers of the modern age do not. Who taught them their higher morality?—I am, sir, etc., A. C. W.

Glasgow, December 2nd, 1912.

CONSTANTINOPLE AND CHRISTENDOM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Sentiment is an excellent thing—at the right time. I cannot, however, countenance the sentiment—and ideas—of the Rev. Percy Dearmer. He would have us believe that the present war in Turkey is a Crusade—a war between the Cross and the Crescent. King Ferdinand proclaimed the war to be a Crusade—and why? Was it to urge on the Christian soldiers to revenge, and thus gain the praise and thanks of Christendom? Or was it to blind the rest of Europe to the real casus belli—namely, the acquisition of new territory? I prefer the latter explanation. King Ferdinand is hardly sentimental, but he is certainly very practical.

The reverend gentleman says: "The recovery of Europe for the Europeans is not yet complete." May I point out to him that the recovery of Asia for the Asiatics is not yet complete—thanks mainly to the English? He grudges the Turks Constantinople, but has not, I am sure, the slightest objection to the English possessing India, Canada, and South Africa. One can only conclude that the Rev. Percy Dearmer is himself an Englishman.

This reverend gentleman wishes the Allied States to capture Constantinople, in order that the Church of St. Sofia may once again be in the hands of the Christians. He forgets, however, that this great building would become a Greek Church; it would not, therefore, return to the original owners—the Roman Catholics. And this good clergyman is desirous that the next owner of the Church of St. Sofia should be a man who abjured his faith to please Russia. More sentiment!—I am, sir, etc., J. G. W.

December 1st, 1912.

CHARLES KINGSLEY AND THE IRISH.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to make a remark on Mr. Robert Candlish's article on "Westward Ho!" He says, "It is curious that Kingsley should be charged with using English prejudice against the Irish," in view of his admiration of their heroism in the Crimea in 1854.

In face of the cruel sneers at the Irish peasantry contained in Kingsley's reply to Newman's pamphlet in 1864 (note the date), the charge is not at all curious. No one will deny that Kingsley's was an honest and good heart, but his prejudices could allow him to bring this indictment against a whole nation, and it is regrettable that no one answered him as effectively on their behalf as Newman answered him on his (Newman's) own behalf. He wrote of Newman's work in Ireland:—

"He has taught the whole Celtic Irish population, that as long as they are chaste (which they cannot well help being, being married almost before they are men and women) and sober (which they cannot well help being, being too poor to get enough whisky to make them drunk), and 'go to their religious duties'—an expression on which I make no comment—they may look down upon the Protestant gentry who send over millions to feed them in famine; who found hospitals and charities to which they are admitted freely; who try to introduce among them capital, industry, civilisation, and, above all, that habit of speaking the truth, for want of which they are what they are, and are likely to remain such, as long as they have Dr. Newman for their teacher."

An Englishman may find it easy to forgive Kingsley, making allowances for his theological bias, but I cannot see how Irish Catholics could ever forgive the bad taste and unchristian uncharitableness of his sneers at their poverty—I had almost said, their chastity and sobriety.—I am, sir, etc.,

November 25th, 1912.

FRED. PAGE.

"SCOTLAND'S DEBT TO PROTESTANTISM."

A REPLY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I rubbed my eyes in astonishment on reading the following sentences from Mr. Hector Macpherson's article on this subject in issue of November 29th:—"To Protestantism Scotland owes her existence as a nation. Until the Reformation Scotland had no real national existence. . . . Knox, in the interests of patriotism, opposed the Papacy," etc. My reading of Scottish history is very different from that of the writer. It was the Catholic party—composed of the Sovereigns (the Jameses and Mary Stuart), the Catholic prelates, the Catholic nobles, and the common people who adhered to the Church—that, for several successive generations, were the patriotic defenders of Scotland's independence; it was the Protestant party—composed, for the most part, of venal and unscrupulous nobles—who were in the pay of England to make Scotland a mere appanage of that country. I do not see how this can possibly be denied by anyone who studies the works of respectable historians dealing with the periods of James IV., James V., and Mary Stuart (Henry VII., VIII., and Elizabeth in England); and I care not whether these historians are Protestant, such as Tytler, Hill Burton, Andrew Lang, Keith, Sadler (papers); or Catholic, like Forbes Leith ("Narratives of Scottish Catholics"), Bellesheim (transl. Hunter-Blair). A study of the life of that great Churchman, Cardinal David Beaton, will more than anything else convince the reader that the Catholic authorities were, from first to last, the real patriotic and loyal upholders of Scottish nationality and independence against the ambitious and criminal designs of Henry. "Through four reigns," says Mr. Andrew Lang ("Short History of Scotland," p. 73), "till James VI. came to the English throne, the Tudor policy was to buy Scottish traitors, and attempt to secure the person of the Scottish monarch." Again, "The ambitions and the claims of Henry VIII. were those of the first Edwards. England was bent on the conquest of Scotland at the earliest opportunity, and through the entire Tudor period England was the home, and her monarch the ally, of every domestic foe and traitor to the Scottish Crown" (p. 77). Ample proof of this is to be found (1) in the attempts of Henry, oft repeated, to kidnap his nephew James V. and persuade him to make war on the Church, as well as to do away with Beaton and the other chief opponents of his policy; (2) in his offers of money and rewards to the Protestant lords if they would aid him in securing this end; and (3) in the perfidious selling of themselves to Henry and his agents. On the part of these same lords, Henry himself said that the noble prisoners taken at Solway Moss (except one) had "not sticked to take upon them to set the crown of Scotland on our head." And his failure to conquer Scotland and make it a vassal of England "was due," says Mr. Lang, "to the genius and resolution of Cardinal Beaton, heading the Catholic party."

Anything more deplorable than the action of the Protestant nobility towards their King and country—a nobility greedy, treacherous, self-seeking, venal, and hypocritical—is not to be found in the annals of any nation. The "rapacity of the nobles" has become a byword in Scottish history; they had their eye ever and only on the loot that might come from the spoiling of the Church. Scotland, then, may owe much to Protestantism, but its independence and separate existence as a nation it certainly does not. After all, if it had remained the ally of France instead of England, would it have been any less of a nation than it is to-day?—I am, sir, etc., HENRY GREY GRAHAM.

Our Lady of Good Aid, Motherwell,
December 2nd.

AN APPEAL TO THE WOMAN'S MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Anyone, not backed up by money or reputation, who has ever tried to place novels or short stories containing a sex-problem, even treated with unimpeachable morality and delicacy, cannot but be amazed at the ignorance shown in the article of Dr. William Barry in your issue of November 15th. It is therein assumed that to write of such subjects at present in England is the short cut to notoriety and big sales. Nothing could be further from the truth. It is next to impossible for anyone whose reputation is not already firmly established by the treatment of other themes to get such a novel accepted by any reputable publishing house, and it is dangerous to the sales of even well-known authors to embark on such subjects. A big bookseller of a large provincial city, speaking to me about the authors who sell best, touched a row of volumes by a very worthy and well-known writer. "He was one of our best sellers," he said, "until he published his last book" (mentioning it). "That has done for him. Just let there be a hint of anything 'nasty' in a book, and it is done for." I haven't read the book in question, so I don't know what constitutes "nasty" in this case—and can't, in any case, conceive of the writer in question ever being "nasty"—but I know, from a considerable experience, that anything distantly treating of sex is considered "nasty" and banned by all ordinary firms. As further proof, one might mention a well-edited review, treating openly of sex-problems, which died in less than a year. To what and whom, then, does Dr. William Barry refer when he writes: "A wife may desert her unoffending husband, leave her little child to die, pursue and run down the man she fancies, quit him for another, be divorced, and take up with as many more as she chooses; yet this edifying tale, a woman's composition, will be accepted with joy by an eminent publishing house, and in cheap editions crowd our bookstalls." The name of the "eminent publishing house" which published this instructive but dull and monotonous tale would, if Dr. Barry will kindly supply it, be of great help to despairing authors with sex-problems on their hands!

Men are fond of throwing at women writers the gibe of only writing prurient literature. They take care to speak anonymously, however, not only from reasons of prudence, but because they are quite unable to point to any woman writer who counts whose work could be distantly described thus. By personal experience I only know one prurient novel by a woman whose books sell well, and the mere name of another such third-rate woman writer; but then I do not go nosing about at bookstalls for strong-smelling literature. I read only the average magazine and review and the books of ordinarily reputable publishers, in none of which do I find the offensiveness of which Dr. William Barry complains. Even if it were true, however, that women tend to write only of sex in its most elementary form, there would be nothing surprising in it. Men have done all that in them lies to imprison women in their sex, to make them focus all their attention upon it, and should not complain therefore if their minds get mouldy—nay, noisome—as the result. The woman's movement, to which Dr. Barry so unnecessarily appeals, is doing what it can to expel this noisomeness—to open women's minds to the winds that blow from the four cardinal points of Science, Art, Philosophy, and Social Service; but it is no thanks to men that it is being done at last, and women will not brook being lectured by men at this stage on the right way to do it. Let Dr. William Barry lecture his own sex about Free Love—whose way of exercising it is a great deal more offensive than the way in which any woman of the same status is likely to indulge in it; and if he wishes to preserve the integrity of marriage, let him urge his fellow-men to study the majority report of the Divorce Commission and other documents relating to the legal position of wives and mothers, whereby they may discover how marriage may be rendered more tolerable to independent and self-respecting women.—I am, sir, etc.,

November 24th, 1912.

E. M. WATSON.

A CHANCE FOR STUDENT TEACHERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Reading the article which appeared in your issue of the 22nd ult. under the above heading, one naturally asks, "What is this chance?"

It seems that if a teacher will give up his present position, go abroad at his own expense, work hard, and learn a foreign language, he may have a chance of something profitable. It is not stated what this chance is, except that he will have some opportunity of making the educational dough rise, so perhaps this about the profit is mere "gas."

One of the 20,000 young men mentioned in this article, longing for something more substantial, has requested me to try to obtain answers to the following questions:

1. Has teaching ability ever secured the promotion of an elementary teacher? If so, to what was he promoted?
2. Does any employing body whatsoever offer any inducement to a qualified teacher to continue the study of purely professional subjects?
3. Of those appointed to headships in elementary schools, can it be said that as many as one per cent. of the whole occupy their positions on account of their professional qualifications?

Apologising for asking you to submit these apparently stupid questions to your expert readers, I am, sir, etc.,

SETON GREY.

December 5th, 1912.

BEAUTIFUL CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS

THE CHARM OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH

MESSRS. HODDER AND STOUGHTON have issued a rarely fine edition of SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER (15s. net), exquisitely bound and printed, delightfully illustrated by Hugh Thomson. The most winsome and at the same time most impracticable of men, Oliver Goldsmith filled a niche in literature peculiarly his own. Tried by the eternal lack of pence that is too often the portion of the man of letters, he never lost the sweetness of soul and sense of gentle comradeship with life that endeared him to his friends and to this day wins the affection of his readers. Perennially in debt, shamefully exploited by publishers, he never soured, and, with the bailiffs at his hearth, penned the most humorous and poignant of his books, "The Vicar of Wakefield," that Dr. Johnson said was "poor stuff, but would serve"—to pay the bailiffs out.

The great Doctor, past-master in the art of selling manuscripts, went forth, and returned in due course with the money for the rent. The man in possession departed, Oliver breathed again, and one of the most exquisite pieces of fiction ever given to the world was launched upon the tide of public favour. For all his gentleness, Goldsmith at times had a wit that could cut fine as a rapier; too often the butt of his friends, he could disarm them with a sudden brilliant thrust.

Edmund Burke's contemptuous epitaph met with a fine repartee.

"Here lies our poor Oliver, for shortness called Noll,
Who wrote like an angel and talked like poor Poll."

The great orator flicked the phrases from his pen as a man flicks a blot of ink. But the vagabond poet, impecunious and impracticable, with the heart of a child and the brain of a genius, gave the statesman his answer:

"Here lies our poor Edmund, whose genius was such,
We scarcely can praise it or blame it too much.
Who, born for the universe, narrowed his mind,
And to party gave up what was meant for mankind."

One realises the serenity of mind that could deliver so dignified a blow, untainted by spite or venom. Oliver had always a small opinion of himself, and doubtless accepted the rebukes of the great orator with due humility. Something of his temper of mind, his gratitude for acts of kindness, his invincible light-heartedness under the stress of poverty, is shown in his dedication to Dr. Johnson of "She Stoops to Conquer": "It may do me some honour to inform the public that I have lived many years in intimacy with you. It may serve the interests of mankind also to inform them that the greatest wit may be found in a character without impairing the most unaffected piety."

The native humour of the comedy, bubbling over with good spirits and a schoolboy sense of fun, shows us our vagabond at the zenith of his humour. Tony Lumpkin is as much alive to-day as at the moment Goldsmith created him. The airs and graces of the fine madams painted by the dramatist are good for all time; and who can ever forget the irresistibly provocative phrase, "agreeable rattle"? It hits off a character with the precision of a master. One might suppose Oliver had lived his life in ease and luxury, and had never known the cares and troubles of New Grub Street.

Those who love the play—and who does not?—will find unending delight in the text, printed with all the finish that is due to a great masterpiece—a masterpiece that, in its rollicking mood and manner, reveals no trace of impecuniosity, no touch of hardship, shows no wounds from "outrageous fortune."

From "She Stoops to Conquer." (Hodder and Stoughton.)

Not a hint of poverty, not a suggestion of the struggles to live for himself and his family; writs and bailiffs, debts and duns could not depress him, were powerless to cripple his buoyant spirit. But if he patiently endured his own troubles, his lance was ever in rest against the rich for their oppression of the poor. The people's rights, their liberties, were the very breath of his soul. Nowhere can we find a more superb challenge to the lords of the earth than in "The Deserted Village":

"Ye sons of wealth, ye statesmen who survey
The rich man's joys, increase the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to say how wide the limits stand
Between the splendid and the happy land."

Only a man who had known the bitter pinch of poverty, the grinding power of oppression, could have written this; only a poet hopelessly impracticable, impecunious, could have felt thus for the dispossessed of the earth.

MARGARET HAMILTON.

OXFORD*

THE books on Oxford are legion, and the appearance of yet another volume on this well-worn theme fills us with an almost pugnacious loyalty to our old favourites. We turn to the latest publication with a secret hope that it may prove a useless addition to the bibliography of that city. If such be our mood, we are doomed to disappointment. Mr. Cecil Headlam has done his work admirably, and we have to thank him for a valuable contribution to the study of the oldest University town in England.

The volume contains a masterly sketch of the most important events in the history of Oxford, from the days of Frideswide, daughter of Didan, down to the Sorbonne and the leading English University, in the endless friction between Town and Gown, which led to the subjugation of markets and trade to the arbitrary control of an ecclesiastical corporation. "The University found Oxford a busy, prosperous borough, and reduced it to a cluster of lodging-houses." At the time of Grossetete the city was "a microcosm, in which might be distinguished the tendencies of the age, and in which almost every aspect of the nation's life was represented." There was a large Jewish population, whose presence meant wealth and facilities for borrowing; but, still more important, it meant the introduction of the study of the physical sciences and the first beginnings of a medical school. The city was foundation of Keble and the lectures of John Ruskin. On glancing at the list of contents, the uninitiated may perhaps wonder at the space devoted to Mediæval Oxford. A few hazy memories of the martyrdom of Ridley and Latimer, visions of stormy Parliaments in the reign of the first Charles Stuart, later the gleam of Redcoats in the city—Oxford as the Royalist capital—such perhaps is the average man's knowledge of Oxford's history. But he has missed much, for by far the most fascinating period in the annals of the city is to be found long before the days of Tudor and Stuart.

From "Oxford and Its Story." By Cecil Headlam. (Dent.)

The interest of Mediæval Oxford lies in the schools of thought that arose there—connected with the names of Roger Bacon, William of Ockham, and Wycliffe, in the extraordinarily close relationship between the fortified, and formed one of the chief military centres north of London. Its position on the Thames made for its commercial importance, though the predominance of the Academic element in the town had already begun to sap the life-blood of its commerce. Then, too, Oxford was an important ecclesiastical centre; numerous convents and nunneries were to be found in its vicinity, and the struggle between the Chancellor of the University and his superior, the Bishop of Lincoln, is an interesting episode in the ecclesiastical history of the day. Thus on all sides Oxford may be studied as typical of English mediæval life. Therein lies the fascination of its story.

* "Oxford and Its Story." By Cecil Headlam. Illustrated by Herbert Railton. 10s. 6d. (Dent.)

"Oxford and the Reformation," "The Oxford Martyrs," "The Royalist Capital," are the titles of some of the later chapters in the book. The last mentioned is perhaps especially interesting. The description of Oxford after the Restoration is very graphic. "The groves and quadrangles that echoed with the clash of arms, the loud laugh of roystering cavaliers, or the gentle rustle of sweeping trains, or the whining of a Puritan, now resounded with the noise of the bowling green and tennis court, or the chamber music of such scholarly enthusiasts as Anthony Wood with his fiddle, and Edmund Gregory with his bass viol" (page 335).

The value of the book is greatly enhanced by the charming illustrations of Herbert Railton. Those reproduced on rough paper, such as the etching of The High (page 151), being especially fine, and the little inset sketches give the reader a sense of the wonderful delicacy of the architectural effects to be found in every corner of Old Oxford.

From "Blue Bird Weather." By Robert W. Chalmers.
(Appleton and Co.)

Mr. Robert Chambers has done nothing better in its own way than BLUE BIRD WEATHER (Appleton, 3s. 6d.). It is an idyll of duck-shooting, a dainty fragment of life, wherein a girl, fresh, young, and sweet-hearted, learns to love for the first time, under the stars. Molly Courtney had lived alone in a remote spot among the marshes of Virginia, with only her father and her boy brother for company. John Marche goes down to this remote spot for shooting. In the old days the island was owned by a club, but latterly the members have trailed off, and at the finish Marche is the owner of the little property. The keeper of the club-house, Molly's father, is ill when he arrives, but as days go on, he feels there is an element of mystery in his continued disappearance. Who and what Molly's father is, and his reason for hiding in this remote spot, we learn at the conclusion of the idyll, which ends with the betrothal of Molly and the only man she had ever known on terms of friendship and affection. The story takes its title from an old ballad that Molly sings, telling of quiet sea and sky and snowflakes flying:—

"Till lass and lover come together
This is blue bird weather."

❁ ❁ ❁

"THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH"

The reproduction of Charles Reade's great masterpiece, THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH, in a particularly attractive form, by Messrs. W. and R. Chambers, is a matter for heartfelt rejoicing. The decline in the popularity of the author is one of the most baffling and distressing literary symptoms of the present age. Reade won his spurs, and held his own, against some of the most virile pens and some of the greatest minds in English literature. There were giants in the land in those days. Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, Anthony Trollope, Wilkie Collins—these were his competitors; and, greater than all of them in some respects, the author of HARD CASH and PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE contrived to capture and to keep a firm hold over the affections of an enormous section of the reading public. But now, in these lean and barren years of literary achievement, Charles Reade, one of the greatest masters of narrative in our literature, is largely forgotten, his works ignored.

It would be idle to affect any rash certitude as to the cause of this strange decline in his popularity. As every author knows, public favour is given and withdrawn as capriciously as a woman's love. But even for that there are reasons strong enough, if we could but see them; and, if we take the trouble to compare the generation that gloried in Reade's achievements with that which has remained so strangely indifferent to them, we may perhaps discover why it is that lesser men have passed him in the race, or, at any rate, why their editions are still selling rapidly, while his remain unmoved. It will be found, I think, that the fault is not that of the author, but of the generation of readers who have come after him.

In the first place, it should be remembered that Reade's present competitors are largely his imitators also. It was he and Wilkie Collins (who has somewhat shared his neglect) who, between them, founded the modern serial and the modern sensational novel. The art of piling one breathless incident on top of another, of developing some family mystery or relationship, of holding the reader's attention by some engrossing struggle between two mighty and unscrupulous forces, each using men and events as their implements, all this was new to literature till Charles Reade wrote his novels. They are now, of course, the merest commonplaces of literary strategy; but there is this one enormous difference between Reade and the crowd of smaller men who have achieved a certain vogue by debasing his methods: he was not only a master of sensationalism, he was in the truest sense a realist. That is to say, he found his sensations in the common, everyday occurrences of life, in things that he knew were happening, or might happen, to thousands of men and women, day by day, hour by hour. It is on record that Reade's study walls were covered with cuttings from the papers, news items detailing some curious actuality that had really happened and been recorded. It is this passion for the real that marks Reade out from his unworthy successors, with their fantastic sensations, their unreal situations. Reade knew that the actual things which happen are a thousand times more romantic, more breathless and more stimulating, even more bizarre, than forced imaginings. What situation, for instance, in any modern serial comes near to that where Henry Little has, for fear of the Sheffield "ratteners," to turn the old church into a forge? Imagine the modern sensational serialist attempting such a master stroke. He would remember that the Sheffield "ratteners" were trade unionists, that trade unionists and their friends are very numerous, and he would be told that he must not offend such a powerful section of the population. Similarly, he would take care, if he were writing "Hard Cash," not to depict the doctor of the asylum as being insane, for are not doctors also numerous and influential? and it would never do to discredit one of them in the eyes of the public. And so on, and so on, till, in order to preserve the sanctities of make-belief, there is nothing to fall back upon except characters and events too unreal to disturb anybody.

That, perhaps, is the real cause of Reade's decline. Our age is one, or has been, of solemn and pompous make-believe, which not only refuses to call a spade a spade, but will not dub a rogue a rogue. There are signs that at long last the dry bones are quickening; that the superstitious and fantastic belief in the superiority of our own time, the grotesque and distorted confidence in evolution as a cure for evil, are banishing, and that the recognition of grave national perils, pressing evils, is proceeding apace. Simultaneously with this quickening of the consciousness of the nation there is a certain rise in the literary taste of the public, of which perhaps EVERYMAN is the most hopeful symptom. Certainly not the least significant of the straws which show the way of the wind is the revival of the interest in the works of Charles Reade, one of the most delightful results of which is the appearance from the house of Chambers of the work by virtue of which Reade takes his place definitely among the immortals. The book is published at 10s. 6d., and is sumptuously "gotten up." It is indeed a gift to treasure.

"THE ANNALS OF HAMPSTEAD"

THIS is an age of beautiful books. Sumptuous editions de luxe, exquisitely printed, charmingly embellished, pour in on us from every side. Dainty reprints that would have filled our fathers with amazement are as common almost as cheaply produced periodicals. Their name, in fact, is legion; yet, even so, there are certain books that stand out from them as supreme achievements, and one of these is the really magnificent volumes which we have just received from Messrs. A. and C. Black, devoted to THE ANNALS OF HAMPSTEAD. The work has been undertaken by Mr. Thomas J. Barratt, who has brought to bear upon his task not merely an intimate personal acquaintance with London's most beautiful suburb, endeared to him, as he tells us, by many personal memories dating from childhood, but a wealth of material gleaned from a large variety of sources, and including, not only the musty records of the dead past, but the intimate recollections of many notable residents, jotted down from time to time in their diaries and letters. Mr. Barratt has laboured for many years at the task of arranging and comparing these, and the present volume more than justifies his arduous efforts. He writes of Hampstead with an enthusiasm that is positively inspiring. There is hardly a tree on the beautiful heath, he tells us, that he did not know and love when a boy. There seems, now that he is a man, to be hardly any period of its history, any phase of its existence, that he does not comprehend also. And let no one rashly imagine that this involves a mere cursory glance at local records. As Sir Robertson Nicoll points out in his preface, "The history of Hampstead is connected with the history of the nation at many vital points, and intimately associated with the literary and artistic developments of the past two centuries." It will give the reader some idea of the scope of this monumental work when we point out that the first chapter, dealing with Hampstead from prehistoric times to the Norman Conquest, occupies seventeen pages, and the first volume carries us only as far forward as the Georgian period, when Steele delighted the members of the Kit-Cat Club who met at "The Upper Flask," close to his cottage on Haverstock Hill (the tavern still abides, honoured by the name of the essayist); when Gay, the author of the "Beggars' Opera," came in shattered health to recuperate, and Pope and Arbuthnot fraternised here, and cheered each in adversity; and when, later, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, Fielding, and Smollett repaired to the old Hampstead Wells to partake of the much-discussed water. It was at Hampstead, by the way, that the Doctor "paused awhile from letters to the wise," and wrote his most famous couplet on

"The ills the scholar's life assail,
Toil, envy, want, the patron and the jail."

Mr. Barratt, by a curious slip, prints garret for patron. Here also came Sheridan to flirt with Mrs. Crewe, to whom he dedicated "The School for Scandal." Here too came many a buck, seeking pleasure in the gambling and dissipations which characterised Belsize, that most staid and severe of suburbs, which seems to-day as far removed from the flash resort of a hundred years ago as does the Hampstead of our time from the feudal village which Mr. Barratt so delightfully sketches for us; when there were five free tenants of the Hampstead Manor paying a total rent of £5 13s. 10d. yearly. "It is estimated," says Mr. Barratt, "that the cash receipts of the Manor averaged some £22, and that the home farm was worth at least as much more: making a total income of, say, £45." We ought to add that the book is admirably illustrated, and that the published price is £5 5s.

"NELL GWYN"

THERE has gathered about the figure of NELL GWYN (Foulis and Co., 5s. net.) a mass of tradition; legends have grown up as to her ancestry, her amours, her brilliance, and her wit, until the clear-cut personality of the favourite of Drury Lane was in danger of disappearing, smothered under the weight of sugary plays and sentimental novels. Mr. Cecil Chesterton has rescued her from such a fate, and in his remarkable and arresting volume has shown us Nell as we feel she most indubitably was. Her origin is doubtful, Mr. Chesterton thinks; "but it seems increasingly certain that her father was a broken-down soldier named Captain Thomas Gwyn, and not, as has sometimes been asserted, a fruiterer of Covent Garden." The vividness of Nell's character stands out in startling clearness against the background of mean streets, the sordid surroundings of the slums. But—and we feel this throughout the book—the author makes it clear that she was never ashamed or depressed by her family; her buoyancy of temperament carried her over her troubles and trials, or, rather, her quick wit and happy temperament showed her only the humorous side of things. Nell's loyalty, her fundamental truth and honesty stand out of the picture. She never deceived herself, never denied the facts of her position, and she never used her power as a weapon against others or for her own advancement. It is given to few authors to recreate a temperament, paint a character—long dead—with so sure a touch that the salient features impress themselves upon you.

This, and more than this, Mr. Chesterton has done. For the first time we understand the soul of Nell, her temptations, her passionate affection for the poor, her swift tongue, her blunt speech, the speech at times of the City arab.

An even more important achievement is the characterisation of Charles II. No monarch has suffered so greatly at the hands alike of the historians and the people. "The popular picture of Charles II," says the author, "is of a good-humoured but worthless and even-magnanimous to his enemies. . . . He might have said with Danton that he could find no use for hate. . . . What then was wrong with this man? Something was wrong with him, or the legend that makes of him a vicious voluptuary and trifler would never have arisen. His defects, I think, may be summed up in one phrase—he had no roots."

In a phrase, in a swift stroke of the brush, the author has laid bare the canker of Charles' soul. It was denied the monarch to possess that central loyalty necessary to every human being. Children legitimate he had none, and he desired them greatly; his own religion he was forbidden to practise openly, and the worm of deceit gnawed at his belief. His love of country had been wounded almost to death. The men who had ruled England during his wanderings had killed his father, and put a price on his own head. "It would be expecting impossibilities of human nature to expect him to have been passionately patriotic—to have felt the fatherland as the central and inviolable thing."

One feels the tragedy of Charles, the wasted energies, the great possibilities squandered on trifling things. One feels also his heroism, the fortitude that laughed at pain, the magnanimity that could pardon even treachery and betrayal.

The closing scene of the king's life is one of the most vivid in a book notable not only for its historic sense and fine style, but for the rare qualities of criticism and understanding, the capacity it shows for weighing men and things in the balance, finding out where and how they are found wanting. Mr. Chesterton's verdict is arresting and convincing. "Nell Gwyn" is a great book.

• • •

THE STORY OF FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS (Dent, 4s. 6d. net), by Hillel Samson, is told with a freshness and beauty rare in modern literature. Tuned to the spiritual side of art, viewing life through the medium of a temperament tinged with mysticism, the author is still keenly alive to the problems of existence; he does not shut his eyes to the fret and worry of this world, the care that gnaws the heart of a strong man; but, while admitting pain and struggle, he emphasises with a joyous clarity the note of triumph running through our lives. Francis Horatio is a messenger boy in a London city office. His mother was a devout Italian, who christened her son after St. Francis of Assisi; his father, a Cornish sailor, called him Horatio, after the greatest sailor that ever lived. He had Spanish blood in his veins from a far-off ancestor rooted in England, flotsam and jetsam from the wreck of the Armada, and because of this strain of Spanish blood he carried within a box-shaped locket round his neck a rough, faded print, hardly bigger than a florin, of Don Quixote de la Mancha, together with a shred of brown serge, once part of a habit worn by St. Francis, and a morsel of blue cloth from Lord Nelson's coat. These three relics, typical of the three men, were his constant companions—saint, sailor and soldier—they were Horatio's dearest friends. The walks the four trusty comrades make, their conversations, and the people they encounter, are described with the sure yet delicate touch that makes the book remarkable. A more gracious gift than this illuminative book we could not wish.

From "The Story of Francis Horatio." (Dent.)

lounger, with some wit but no wisdom; no picture could be more fundamentally false. . . . He was tall and of powerful physique. His voice was loud, his laugh hearty and even boisterous. He was an indefatigable walker, whose rapid pace was the despair of those who attempted to accompany him."

In that simple and most significant touch the author has pricked the bubble that declared Charles a dilettante, pleasure-loving rake. One gets the impression of a submerged but restless energy, physical and temperamental.

"Morally, Charles had many fine qualities. He was brave, and by instinct he was honest. . . . He never lied to his own soul, and when he felt he could tell the truth he was frank to the verge of indecency. He was naturally humane, generous to his friends, placable

Xmas Books for Xmas Presents

SOME OF
OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER'S
IMPORTANT BOOKS.

THE ROAD. A Study of John Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress."

By the Rev. JOHN KELMAN, D.D. Vols. 1. and 11., completing the Commentary. Each volume contains Eight Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net each, (By Post 3/10 each.) Also in Vellum Back, Gilt Top, 6/- net each.

"Not a feature worthy of notice escapes Dr. Kelman's keen eye, and his explanatory remarks, whether in caustic criticism or sympathetic appreciation, compel and sustain our interest. For he has this rare faculty in large measure—he carries his readers with him step by step and to the journey's end. . . . One constantly feels that he has caught the real spirit of John Bunyan and is a thoroughly trustworthy interpreter."

—Glasgow Herald.

JACOB BEHMEN: An Appreciation.

By the Rev. Principal WHYTE, D.D., LL.D., Author of "The Bible Characters," "Bunyan Characters," etc. Velvet Persian Leather, 3/6 net. (By Post 3/10.)

"Dr. Whyte has written an admirable appreciation of Jacob Behmen. It is perhaps the best thing he has yet published, and only those who know something of Behmen will do justice to the care and thoroughness with which the work has been done."—British Weekly.

SANTA TERESA: An Appreciation.

With some of the best passages of the Saint's Writings, Selected, Adapted and Arranged by the Rev. Principal WHYTE, D.D., LL.D. Velvet Persian Leather, 3/6 net. (By Post 3/10.)

"Its author is a Presbyterian minister, but he has the Catholic quality that can recognise the good, reverence the holy, conceive the true, outside the limits of his own community."

—The Nation.

MEMORIES OF TWO CITIES. Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

By DAVID MASSON, LL.D., Litt.D., late Historiographer-Royal for Scotland, late Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Edinburgh University. With Photogravure Frontispiece. 7/6 net. (By Post 7/11.)

"Masson's old students scattered all over the world will welcome them for his sake and for what they contain, as indeed should all men who rejoice in strong, scholarly prose, genial humour, and shrewd observation and reminiscence."

—Da ly Chronicle.

THE CONTAGION OF CHARACTER. Studies in Culture and Success.

By NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, Author of "The Investment of Influence," "A Man's Value to Society," "Great Books as Life Teachers," etc. 3/6 net. (By Post 3/10.)

"Mr. Newell Dwight Hillis wields a facile and graceful pen, and the wealth of literary, historical, and scientific illustrations he employs makes the sage advice which it is his primary purpose to give most delightful reading."—The Scotsman.

THE BOOK OF COURAGE.

By W. J. DAWSON, D.D., Author of "The Reproach of Christ." 3/6 net. (By Post 3/10.)

"There are books we should not read; there are books we are compelled to read; and there are books we delight to read. Of the last class is Dr. W. J. Dawson's 'Book of Courage.'"

—Expository Times.

NON-CHURCH-GOING. Its Reasons and Remedies.

A present-day problem discussed from various points of view by prominent public men, including: Sir OLIVER LODGE, Rev. Prebendary CARLILE, J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P.; Rev. Prof. STALKER, Rev. THOMAS MARTIN, D.D.; WM. WARD, P. WHITWELL WILSON, and others. Edited, with Introduction, by W. FORBES GRAY. Price 3/6 net. (By Post 3/10.)

British Weekly says: "The fruit of careful research into one of the most elusive problems of our time."

Complete Catalogue Post Free on Application.
100 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
21 Paternoster Square, London.

Ideal Gifts for the Xmas Season.

For a Friend Abroad.

A Regular Supply of Popular Recent Fiction, sent Monthly, Post Free, to any part of the World. In lonely stations, or even in the remote parts of the United Kingdom, a book is a welcome guest.

One good 6/- Novel per month (includes purchase of the books) from 17/6 per annum.

For a Friend at Home.

A Subscription to the most Efficient, Convenient, and Economical Library Service possible. We send a ticket indicating the term and nature of the subscription. An autographed message can be enclosed from the donor, with compliments.

Annual Subscriptions from 21/- Class A. The newest and all books in circulation.

For a Deserving Institution.

A Donation of Books from the Best and Largest Stock in the World of New and Used Books, at Reductions of 33½ per cent. to 80 per cent. For Hospitals, Workhouses, Workmen's Institutes and Clubs, Village Reading Rooms, etc.

Special Parcels of Books from 10/- to £5 and upwards.

For Any or All of Them.

The W.H.S. Popular Library of Modern Fiction. Recent 6/- Novels of the best Authors, strongly and durably rebound in uniform style—W. H. Smith & Son's binding. For presentation, singly or in sets, to individuals or institutions. Single volumes 2/6 each; sets, 34 volumes, £4 4 0

A Polished Fumed Oak Case, sold separately for 5/6,
is included free with sets.

Send at once for
Catalogues and Order Forms
W. H. Smith & Son's Library,
186, Strand, London, W.C., and Branches.

A VALUABLE CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT

A Translation into Modern English from the Original Greek (Westcott & Hort's Text)

Extract from a Review.—"A very remarkable translation, perfectly fascinating in fresh and vivid English; open it where you will, it arrests immediate attention and lights up the various scenes with quite a new interest."

Popular Edition.

Cloth, 1/6 net. Post free 1/10.

Cloth, gilt top, 2/6 net.

Post free, 2/10.

Leather, gilt edges, 3/6 net.

Post free, 3/10.

Presentation Edition on India Paper.

Bound in green or black calf, gilt edges, in box, 5/- net.

Post free, 5/4.

Large Type Edition, Royal 8vo.

Green cloth, gilt edges, 5/- net.

Post free, 5/5.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION,
57 and 59, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.,
And of all Booksellers.

HANDSOME XMAS PRESENTS.

The Book of the Century.

The Tissot Pictures.

Illustrating the Life of Our Lord.
Drawn and Painted in the Holy Land by the late JAMES J. TISSOT.
Two Vols. Royal 4to. Half bound in superb White Parchment, chastely ornamented in gold. £6 6s.
net. Illustrated Prospectus post free.

A Masterpiece.

A History of Lace.

By MRS. BURY FALLISER. Royal 8vo. White
Buckram. Fully Illustrated. Third Edition.
£2 2s net. Full Prospectus post free.

Edition de Luxe.

Lorna Doone.

By R. D. BLACKMORE. Demy 4to. Superb binding. Limited to 250 copies. Full morocco gilt, original and appropriate designs. Printed on real English hand-made paper, deckle edges, each copy numbered and the name of the subscriber registered. Original Impression, £3 3s.
net. Illustrated Prospectus gratis.

Absolutely the most acceptable
Present of the Season.

The Broad Highway.

By JEFFERY FARNOL. 25 Illustrations in colour by C. E. Brock. Small 4to. Handsomely bound. 10s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

London:
SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.,
100, SOUTHWARK STREET, S.E.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS FOR THE BAIRNS

ÆSOP, whoever and whatever he was, knew beyond other men the secret of the fabulist's magic, seeing that he contrived to make himself also into a fable. This year he is in luck. He has been retranslated and reillustrated, and will be more read and more of a 'able than ever. In one variant, as the folklorists say—for editions as well as stories have variants—we have the new-old book with the same old classical title, ÆSOP'S FABLES, illustrated by Charles Folkard (A. and C. Black, 6s.). Here the Fox and the Grapes revive in one coloured page, and the unhappy Blackmoor, that could not be made white, in another. The Old Man and his Son and the Ass offer a typical Old English street scene (English, of course, for Æsop is a Londoner in London), with a pump, a shop-front, and a comedy group. Mr. Folkard has indeed a pretty fantasy. Why are mice and why are frogs so attractive in the Æsopian cartoon? One might answer,

From "The Bran Pie," p. 240 (Duckworth and Co.).

"Because they are so ridiculously human." Turn now to the other book of fables, variant No. 2, a new translation by V. S. Vernon Jones, with G. K. C. writing the introduction, and Arthur Rackham doing the pictures (Heinemann, 6s. net) in his most expressive Rackhamish manner. He and G. K. C. contrive together to persuade one that Æsop is a sort of algebra of human nature, with impersonal persons, pattern pigs, fairy-tale foxes, and a gnat like a stinging and singing atom of arithmetic. As for Mr. Rackham's pictures, the Quack Frog is good and everything that fable asks. So is that of the Lion and the Elephant; and so is the Fisherman Piping. As a contemporary illustration, note "The Two Pots," in which the artist has excelled himself, for, without intending it, he has made the brass-pot ever or never so little like G. B. S., and the other figures as a kind of Toby pigs, ever or never so little like G. K. C. "The Fir-Tree and the Bramble," of which the bramble is rather like a lady now appearing nightly on the stage, is another example of the same subtle, and possibly unconscious, adaptation from the life.

From fables it is but a step to fairy-tales. "But the princess sat with a cherry in her hand, and her mouth open, forgetting to pop the cherry in, so absorbed was she in listening to Sven. When he had come to the end of his last trill, the princess said, 'It was just like the ice melting, and the chaffinches twittering, and the trout dancing in the brook.'"

This comes from the story of "The Boy who could not Tell a Lie." If anyone, little or big, wishes to fall into the same happy state of oblivion as the princess, let him or her get and read JOLLY CALLE (Dent and Sons, Ltd.), a book of Swedish fairy-tales by Helena Nyblom. All the stories are told with a sort of gay, adventurous humour that is most infectious. Moreover, there is a kind of canny folk-wisdom in them which is tonic as well as amusing. In some of the stories, such as "Rolf of Orkanäs" and "The Wild Waves of the Sea," the spirit of adventure, the sense of the mystery that always waits a little further on, is wonderfully expressed. Indeed, it would be difficult to praise these tales too highly, so fresh are they, so delightfully told. The illustrations by Charles Folkard are about as good as can be, charming in colour and line, and full of resource, and no child but will revel in their artistic reality.

THE BRAN PIE (Duckworth and Co.), as its name suggests, is full of good things. The fairy stories are of the kind that every child loves and believes in, and the chief essential in telling a fairy tale is, after all, to inspire belief. Beautifully got up, with fine illustrations, it is a gift to make glad the heart of a bairn this Christmastide.

The flavour of George Macdonald's goblin stories for children hangs about those written now by his son, D. Greville Macdonald. TRYSTIE'S QUEST succeeds last year's "Magic Crook" (Fifield and Co., 5s.), both illustrated by the delicately imaginative pencil of Arthur Hughes. This second story is a very decided improvement on the first; there is a more definite line drawn about the creatures of the fairy landscapes, though there is just a tendency in both creatures and landscape to dissolve and pass in a mist, leaving a dream-like effect upon the senses. What, however, the book loses as a constructed tale of adventure it gains as a work of imagination. The true child will recognise it at once, and find scope for fancy in filling up the chinks. The idea of the Pigwidgeons, a goblin family, cut out of turnips, carrots, and parsnips by a boy, and attired in character, is the master-stroke of the book.

With his CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS (Dent and Sons, Ltd., 5s. net), Mr. William Canton has broken into a new and heroic region. In his "Child's Book of Saints" he was like a modern man who has stepped into antiquity through a painted window. Here he has used another approach to the fiercer fields beyond the Saints' Rest, as he had need. With Balt the

(Continued on page 282.)

Xmas Books for Xmas Presents

Fine Literary Gifts

THE WORKS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

Exquisitely bound Pocket Edition, Cloth Gilt, 2s. 6d. net each; also in Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net each.

THE WORKS OF GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

Bound in cloth, 6s. each. Plays in separate editions, 1s. 6d. net Paper, and 2s. net Cloth.

THE WORKS OF ERNEST THOMPSON SETON

The Book of Woodcraft and Indian Lore

With 500 Drawings by the Author. 6s. net.
Each volume profusely illustrated. The Best Christmas Gift for a Boy.

THE ARCTIC PRAIRIES	TWO LITTLE SAVAGES.	6s. net
12s. 6d. net.
ROLF IN THE WOODS	THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SILVER
6s. net	FOX.	5s. net
MONARCH, the Big Bear of Tallac.	ANIMAL HEROES.	6s. net
5s. net

The Works of MARY JOHNSTON

CEASE FIRING (Just Published)	*THE OLD DOMINION
THE LONG ROLL	*LEWIS RAND
*SIR MORTIMER	*AUDREY
	*BY ORDER OF THE COMPANY

Pocket Edition on thin paper, each with Frontispiece. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net each volume; or full Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net. *These volumes are also bound in Velvet Persian, yapp, 3s. net. Crown 8vo Edition, Uniform Cloth gilt, 6s. each.

N.B.—Write for detailed prospectuses, free on application to:—

CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd.,

LONDON, W.C.

Off the Beaten Track.

New Books Published by C. W. Daniel, Ltd.

Old Stories and Sayings from Many Lands.

Compiled by Isabella Fyvie Mayo. Six Vols. 1s. net each. Postage 1d. The Set of six volumes post free for 5s. One hundred and ninety-one Stories and over two thousand Proverbs from Great Britain and Ireland, Northern Europe, Southern Europe, India, China and Japan, and Africa.

THE COTTAGE FARM MONTH BY MONTH. By F. E. Green. 1s. net. Postage 2d. "Altogether this is a pleasant, informing, and suggestive book."—Daily News.

THE TECHNIQUE OF BERNARD SHAW'S PLAYS. By Augustin Hamon (Translator into French of Bernard Shaw's Plays). Translated by Frank Maurice. 2s. net. Postage 2d.

FREE POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS: Their Nature, Essence & Maintenance. 1s. net. Postage 2d.

FELLOWSHIP IN WORK. By A. L. Pogosky. 6d. net. Postage 1d. Should be read by all who are interested in the revival of handicrafts.

Complete lists free on application.

London: C. W. DANIEL, Ltd., 3, Amen Corner, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 2/6 net.

The Agate Lamp.

(Poems.)

By EVA GORE-BOOTH.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Admirable Xmas Gift Books.

A New and Charming Illustration Edition of a Famous Book.

Traditions of Edinburgh.

ROBERT CHAMBERS, LL.D. 21/- net.

An entirely NEW EDITION, which contains 30 Original Drawings in Colour, and over 60 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by JAMES RIDDEL, R.S.W.

Manchester City News says: "A famous book in sumptuous new raiment. Delightful illustrations, an ideal gift book, a fund of unending entertainment to the mind and a joy to the eye. An edition which for taste and style, and for the beauty of illustrations, leaves nothing to be desired."

The Cloister & the Hearth.

CHARLES READE. 10/6 net.

With 20 beautiful Coloured Illustrations and numerous exquisite Pen-and-Ink Drawings by GORDON BROWNE.

Daily Telegraph says: "Is all the keenest admirers of this classic could desire. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are worthy of the tale. They entirely catch the spirit and the motive of the original. A better gift book than this there could hardly be."
Globe says: "Beautifully printed, handsomely got up, superbly illustrated by Gordon Browne, the artist above all others whose genius is specially suited to the period."

New and Cheaper Edition, revised to 1912.

Chambers's Biographical Dictionary of Celebrities of all Nations & all Times.

1006 pages.

6/- net, cloth. Half Mor., 10/8 net.

Athenaeum says: "The best biographical Dictionary in a single volume that has appeared for a long time."

Write for Descriptive Coloured List of Gift Books to
W. & R. CHAMBERS, Ltd.,
38, Soho Square, London, W.; and Edinburgh.

Macmillan's LIST.

George Frederic Watts.

Vols. I. and II. The Annals of an Artist's Life. By M. S. WATTS. Vol. III. The Writings of G. F. WATTS. With 39 Photogravure Plates, 3 vols. 8vo. 3 ts. 6d. net.
THE GLOBE.—"In this memoir Mrs. Watts has erected to her husband's memory a monument worthy of its subject."

Francis Paget, Bishop of

Oxford. By STEPHEN PAGET and J. M. C. CRUM. With an Introduction by his Grace the Archbishop of CANTERBURY. With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo. 15s. net.

Further Reminiscences of H. M. Hyndman.

8vo. 15s. net.

Dr. Sven Hedin's New Book.

From Pole to Pole

By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. With Illustrations and Maps. Extra Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.  A book of travel and adventure for young people.

Highways and Byways in Somerset.

By EDWARD HUTTON. Illustrated by NELLY ERICHSEN. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.
(Highways and Byways Series.)

THE POCKET KIPLING.

Pocket Edition of the Prose Works of Rudyard Kipling. Printed on thin paper. In blue cloth. With gilt edges. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 1d. net per volume. Also scarlet limp leather. 5s. net each.

H. G. Wells's Most Successful Novel. Marriage. 21st Thousand. 6s.

James Lane Allen's New Book.

The Heroine in Bronze;

OR, A PORTRAIT OF A GIRL. A pastoral of the City. 6s.

THE STANDARD.—"We have not forgotten his work in 'The Choir Invisible,' and 'The Mettle of the Pasture' when we say that we believe the section of 'The Heroine in Bronze' entitled 'The Waiting' to be the finest thing that he has yet done."

Edith Wharton's New Book.

The Reef. 6s.

PUNCH.—"The whole book is delightful, illuminating, fragrant, sympathetic. It is the author of 'The House of Mirth' at her best, and that best has long ago placed her in the small front rank of contemporary novelists."

THE BEST BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

ROSA N. CAREY'S NOVELS.

Crown 8vo. Blue Cloth. Gilt Lettered. Price 3/6 each.

Nellie's Memories	The Old, Old Story
Wee Willie	Mistress of Brae Farm
Barbara Heathcote's Trial	Other People's Lives
Robert Ord's Atone-ment	Mrs. Romney, and But Men Must Work
Wood and Married Heriot's Choice	Rue with a Difference
Queenie's Whim	Herb of Grace
Not Like Other Girls	Highway of Fate
Sir Godfrey's Grand-daughters	A Passage Perilous
Mary St. John	At the Moorings
For Lillias	The Household of Peter
Uncle Max	No Fri nd Like a Sister
Only the Governess	The Angel of Forgiveness
Lover or Friend?	The Sunny Side of the Hill
Basil Lyndhurst	The Key of the Unknown

 Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Choice Gift-Books.

AN IDEAL CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOK.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight.

Translated by REV. ERNEST J. B. KIRTLAN, B.A. (Lond.), B.D. (St. Andrews). With an Introduction on the Arthur and Gawain Sagas.

"An admirable version . . . simple, direct and natural in prose."—Athenæum.
"A satisfactory and handsome version of one of the best of the Arthurian romances."—Athenæum.

"Unique and charming."—Christian World.
"I found to be a winner. . . The Introduction is a piece of enthusiastic scholarship . . . a brilliant book."—Young Man.

Price 3/6 net.

Nature's Nursery Tales.

By S. N. SEDGWICK; M.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3/6. 70 Photographs direct from Nature.

Leeds Mercury says: "A charming and really clever book for children."

Charles Dickens and Music.

By J. T. LIGHTWOOD. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 2/6 net. Paste grain limp, 4/- net.

Manchester Courier says: "Really historical and extremely valuable."

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS AND LIBRARIES.

CHARLES H. KELLY, 25-35 City Road, London, E.C.

A Book for Christmas.

A Book for all who enjoy the weird and the mystical.

STONEGROUND GHOST TALES.

3s. 6d. E. G. SWAIN. 3s. 6d.

CONTENTS—The Man with the Roller; Bone to his Bone: The Rhipins; the Eastern Window; Lubrietta; The Rockery; The Indian Lamp Shade; The Place of Safety; The Kirk Spook.

Read what the Reviewers say:

" . . . The scholar and the gentleman pleasantly occupied in making us go doubtfully to bed."—Times.

"The Man with the Roller is one of the best ghost stories we have ever read."—Englishwoman.

"Excellent entertainment for a leisure hour."—Daily News.

"If it contains a dull page it has escaped us."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The reader who has no great liking for ordinary tales of the supernatural will, in spite of himself, appreciate these."—Nottingham Guardian.

"One's curiosity is aroused from first to last, and it is impossible to lay the book down until the mysteries are satisfactorily solved."—Occult Review.

CAMBRIDGE: W. HEFFER & SONS, Ltd.; and from all Booksellers and Libraries.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Scotland's Debt to Protestantism.

By HECTOR MACPHERSON. Price 1/-

The Marshall Case.

Third Edition.

By F. J. ROBERTSON. Price 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
45, George Street, EDINBURGH.

REMAINDERS.

BOOKS AT BARGAIN PRICES.

Send a card for GLAISHER'S December Catalogue of

Publishers' Reminders,

which contains Books in all departments of

Literature offered at REMARKABLY LOW PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

Attacot he has overleapt the Roman wall, and from a north-country moor reached the Bithynian hills when the chestnut woods are in their June flush. From Balt he can pass east to Jacob of Edessa, who told the stirring story of "How They Saved Nisibis" (which would make a good ballad), and then west to Breton and Celtic sea-coasts. In a later page he has made Charlemagne twice alive—the two Charlemagnes, we ought to say, the Iron King, and, for contrast, the good-humoured giant, half a fairy-tale creature. His Iron King is indeed an addition to hero-lore: he is the hero of heroes.

Every boy scout who expects to be a warrior, whether with men or microbes, or the forces of death in any kind, should read Mr. Canton's book, though he may say a boy is not a child at all.

Three or four years ago poetry was said to be out of fashion. This blessed Christmas proves it to be handsomely come in again. Take a volume like THE POEM-BOOK OF THE GAEL (Chatto and Windus, 6s. net), which Miss Eleanor Hull has gotten out of the Irish Gaelic poets with the aid of a noble company of translators.

Better winter nights' solace by the fire than Runeberg's saga it would be hard to find. We do not know if the OXFORD BOOK OF VICTORIAN VERSE (Clarendon Press, 6s. net; India paper, 7s. 6d. net) which "Q." otherwise Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, has added to his other famous Oxford book, can be put in the Christmas list; but we are sadly tempted to co-opt it by the batch of timely verse it contains, including Miss Barlow's "Christmas Rede," Miss Guiney's "Carol" and "Tryste Noël," and Miss Coleridge's song of "Our Lady." It is curious that nearly all the Christmas pages are by women poets.

It is natural to fall back upon Blake after anything that has an echo of Nativity music in it. Here, by good fortune, is the newest setting of that most inexhaustible of all small song-books, THE SONGS OF INNOCENCE, decorated by Charles Robinson and Mary H. Robinson (Dent and Sons, Ltd., 3s. 6d. net). The artists and the decorators have turned to him with a refreshing transparency of idea and purity of colour. The frontispiece is a lovely piece of work—a child descending a cloudy ladder in a luminous skyey world. The lily and the tiger are not forgotten, white or striped and tawny, in other pages; but the tiger is ingeniously dis-terrified. Set by this—the ANTHOLOGY OF BABYHOOD, which Mrs. Muriel N. d'Auvergne has edited (Hutchinson and Co., 3s. 6d. net). It ranges far, from Blake and Coleridge to Swinburne and Christina Rossetti, from Greene and Crashaw to Mrs. Meynell and Mrs. Hingston (Katherine Tynan, to wit). Some of the older poems in it wear well. What better than Southwell's "Burning Babe"? which ends:—

"With this He vanished out of sight,
And swiftly shrunk away;
And straight I called unto mind
That it was Christmas Day."

Mrs. d'Auvergne's rhymed version of Eugénie de Guérin's lyric of a child's kiss is charming.

The Tomboy in fiction is always popular, but not often so well drawn as Raymond Jacbern's charming little heroine (TABITHA SMALLWAYS. W. R. Chambers, 3s. 6d.). It is one of the most difficult things in art to draw a girl in her early teens. She must possess the frank, high spirits of the healthy child, with some of the reserve of after years. The author has given us a spirited and convincing story. Tabitha goes to live with the Stevensons at the Rookery to be a companion for Audrey, aged fifteen. Mrs. Stevenson, who has spent some years of her married life in India, does not find it the easiest thing in the world to manage her daughters, who, in her absence, have been under the care of Aunt Caroline, who had spoiled them to their hearts' content. It is decided to send the two girls to school with Tabitha, and the complications and adventures that ensue make good reading. Tabitha is the life and soul of the school, the ringleader of all mischief, a delightful, feckless lassie, whom we all love. TABITHA SMALLWAYS is one of the brightest Christmas books that we have met with, and we confidently recommend it for fun-loving children.

The tale of WHITE EAR AND PETER (Macmillan and Co., 6s.), a fox terrier and a fox, is easily written, with bright, descriptive touches, and a suggestion of the open air, an atmosphere of country life. Mr. Neils Heiberg writes convincingly about animals, and the story is strong enough to hold boys and girls, as well as their elders, from the start. The author, however, falls too much into the psychological vein, and discusses the motives and the temperaments of his chief "characters" too minutely. He is quite obviously at home with animals, and his observation of their habits is keen and careful; but however strong an attachment may exist between a human and a four-footed creature, there is a gulf beyond which neither can pass. That dogs reason we may believe, that Peter in particular deduced certain moral laws from the tragic death of White Ear we cannot suppose. The fox, in his character of Ishmael—he is brought up as a cub in the stables where Peter reigns supreme—is convincing. We understand and accept the fact that he feels every man's hand against him, that he appreciates his position as a pariah cut off from his own breed—hated and feared by the dog kind with whom he is forced to dwell. Mr. Heiberg is at his best when he is describing a run across country; one feels the fresh, strong air, hears the wind in the trees, tastes the full savour of the instinct for the chase. The book is well got up, the illustrations spirited, and excellently reproduced.

There is only one way in which to commence a book of fairy tales, and Mr. Arthur F. Wallis has opened on the right note (MAGIC DOMINIONS, Smith, Elder and Co., 3s. 6d.). "Long, long ago," he tells us, "there lived a King who ordered his Court with the greatest splendour, and received homage and honour from all the nations." Imagination quickens, memory gets to work, as the door of the enchanted kingdom swings ajar, and we catch our breath as we peep at the wonders inside. The combination of mystery with plain fact takes us back to the days of childhood, when it was not only the transmutation of Cinderella's pumpkin into a coach that delighted us, but the inimitable touch relating to the footmen, the coachman, the golden buttons on their coats. Mr. Wallis has mastered the art of the fairy story, and has achieved a notable success. "The Jar Fairy and the Star Fairy" handles the ever popular theme of love disguised as a swineherd, and a pretty, petulant Princess, who at the end finds the whole world in her lover's arms. An old tale, yet ever new, and told as Mr. Wallis tells it, instinct with charm and freshness. "The Prince who was Somebody Else"

THE NEW ARTIST

FOR CHILDREN—AND OTHERS.

GULLIVER'S VOYAGES TO LILLIPUT & BRODDINGNAG.

Cover Design.
6/- net.

Greatly Reduced.
6/- net.

With EIGHT Colour Plates and over EIGHTY Drawings in the text. (Printed in two colours throughout.)
By P. A. STAYNES.
Write for coloured prospectus, and ask your Bookseller to show you the book.

3/6 ROUNDABOUT WAYS 3/6

Verses by FRIDA WOLFE, Pictures by P. A. STAYNES
(Authors of "The Orange Cat").
A charming book dealing with Towns and Countries, Lakes and Rivers, Roads and Mountains, from a fanciful and witty point of view.

THE GRANDEUR THAT WAS ROME

A SURVEY OF ROMAN CIVILISATION AND CULTURE.
By J. C. STOBART, M.A.
A Companion Volume to "The Glory that was Greece," issued last year.—"A vivid picture of a wonderful civilisation." Profusely illustrated, 30/- net. Write for prospectus.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S GREAT POEMS

THE EVERLASTING MERCY. (7th Impression.)
Awarded the Edmond-de-Pollignac Prize of £100, and described by Mr. J. M. Barrie as incomparably the finest literature of the year.
THE WIDOW IN THE BYE-STREET.
Cr. 8vo, 3/6 net each, cloth gilt. (2nd Impression.)

1/- net. THE NEW CHILD'S GUIDE TO KNOWLEDGE 1/- net.

By LAURENCE HOUSMAN.
A Popular Reprint with all the Original Illustrations.

NEW FICTION

ROSEMARY & RUE. By BEATRICE STOTT
(Author of "Rosemonde") 8/-
"A real piece of artistry this."—Dunlop Advertiser.
THE TEMPLE ON THE HILL. By ELSA DE SZASZ.
3/6 net.
"We congratulate Madame de Szasz most warmly on her achievement."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.
PRIDE OF WAR. By GUSTAF JANSON. 6/-
"A very fine work of art."—Manchester Guardian.

WRITE FOR SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

SIDGWICK & JACKSON,
LONDON, W.C.

contains certain dainty fancies. At the marriage of the Prince and Princess we read that the clerk "wrote their names in a book made of rosemary leaves; while the wedding march was played by the white moths that had become music." The illustrations to this dainty collection of old-world fairy tales are not wholly satisfactory. They lack the touch of matter-of-fact earnestness that is so necessary a corollary of phantasy, and, generally speaking, are of too impressionist a character. The most admirable, the "Magician and the Sprat," is the accompanying sketch to the "Battle of the Fishes."

There is plenty of sword play in THE CAPTAIN OF THE KING'S GUARD (W. and R. Chambers, 5s.). The thrill of steel on steel, the shock of battle, runs through the book; stirring adventures take us to old Spain, we are plunged into the mystery and romance of Madrid, then in a twinkling carried to bonnie Prince Charlie, the young Pretender, who is so popular a hero in picturesque fiction. Commander Curley knows how to handle a fight, and shows amazing fertility in concocting startling situations. The characterisation is at times carelessly drawn, but your schoolboy cares but little for psychology; as long as there is movement and colour in a tale he is content. We have nothing but praise for the English which the author uses throughout the book. He frankly adopts modern phraseology, and with the best possible results. The narrative runs crisply, and there is a diversity of setting that will give joy to every boy scout ambitious of qualifying for brave deeds and hairbreadth escapes.

"Is that true?" asked a voice at my side.
From "Oddle and Iddle" (Smith, Elder and Co.).

THE RED HUSSAR (W. and R. Chambers, 3s. 6d.) introduces us to Napoleon III. and other historical personages. We are plunged into the midst of the Franco-German War, in company with Will Trevor and his French cousins, Antoine and Marguerite. The author, Mr. Reginald Horsley, is not convincing in his methods. His style is stilted, his situations mishandled, and we must frankly take exception to his interpretation of the Emperor's thoughts on the eve of campaign. It is always a delicate matter to introduce an historical figure into a romance. To present Louis Napoleon with any degree of success, qualities of introspection, imagination, and deduction are required, which we find utterly lacking in the author. To tell a tale simply and forcefully is an ambition to which, in time, he might attain. He invites criticism, however, by his interpolation of figures that do not belong to the world of boys' books.

How Augustus Dight suddenly found himself in a world of wonders, and what he did therein, is set forth in ODDLE AND IDDLE (Smith, Elder and Co., 3s. 6d.). Returned from his work on the farm—this is the real, right atmosphere for a tale about hobgoblins—Augustus is about to crack a nut presented to him by a small boy at a Christmas party, and supposed to be imbued with certain magic qualities. It was, in effect, a wishing nut, and Augustus decided then and there to test its power. "I happened upon one of the large black beetles that one sees in the neighbourhood. He was engaged in rolling along a ball of dirt, several times the size of himself, with another beetle, his wife, perhaps, to help him." Augustus wishes, on the impulse of the moment, that he were the size of the beetle, "and able to understand whatsoever language he talks." And straightway, in the true and orthodox fashion of fairyland, the thing comes to pass. He learns many things from the beetles, and makes the acquaintance of Oddle, "in form like a little boy, but with a face that resembled neither man nor beast. His skin was green, he wore a brown tunic, and had a soft green hat on his head." Iddle, the goblin's brother, is exactly like him, and Augustus is worried somewhat by the resemblance. During the time of his sojourn with the imps, his size remains unchanged. The story is deftly woven, compounded of fancies light as gossamer, and swift touches of sure fact. A dainty conceit that will charm alike the child and the child-lover.

Alan Mackenzie, at nineteen years of age, leaves school, and goes into the world to seek adventure. The tale (THE GHOST ROCK, Nisbet and Co., 3s. 6d.) is told in the first person, and the hero is a clean-limbed, honest English boy, typical of many another. He goes to his uncle's home, "a dilapidated castle on the shore of Loch Hourn, a desolate enough spot, but never so to me, who knew and loved every inch of its lonely country." Mr. Frederick Watson sets Alan on the trail of buried treasures, and many startling and weird things come to pass in the search for gold. The story of buried treasure always has, and always will, fascinate a boy, and though Alan meets with happenings little short of miraculous, the author is to be forgiven by reason of the sustained interest in the plot, and the vivid nature of his description. Alan and his uncle set sail up the Amazon, "that unending river,

(Continued on page 286.)

An Assured Income for Life

Purchasing an Annuity is a very different matter to-day from what it was twenty years ago. Then it was simply a question of paying a lump sum down and receiving in return an income which terminated at the Annuitant's death; but now you are offered by the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada a choice of a dozen or more forms of Annuity Insurance. You can buy an Annuity out and out; or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it from your Income—so much per year until the Annuity is due. You can buy joint Annuities for yourself and your wife; you can buy Educational Annuities for your children; you can buy Annuities with the whole return of your Capital guaranteed.

Annuitants with impaired health are offered better terms because of their ill-health.

Undoubtedly the best form of investment to-day is the purchase of an Annuity from the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada. This Company is one of the strongest Insurance Institutions in the British Empire. Its assets are nearly £10,000,000 invested under strict Canadian Government supervision, and there is a present undivided surplus of £1,000,000 over all Liabilities.

Send for full particulars to Mr. J. F. Junkin, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, 94, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, stating your age and kind of Annuity required.

Just the thing for the Xmas Party.

The only practical and effective instrument of the kind on the market.

Mirroscope
PROJECTOR.

"Have a MIRROSCOPE Christmas this year."

And a merry one is assured to you and yours—first this year, next year, and many years to come.

The MIRROSCOPE is the Fairy Godmother of the modern home. The transformation this machine effects at Christmas-time is a scene of delight to the family man. Once used its magic spell and your folks will wonder if they really did enjoy their last Christmas; half an hour of the MIRROSCOPE will convince them that they did not, and you will heartily agree with their conviction.

It is safe to assert that the picture—always a first love with mankind—holds more sway in the great home festival than at any other season of the year. Take away the picture element from the Christmas party and you have merely a party. Introduce however, this element in its strongest and most charming form—through the MIRROSCOPE, that is—and all the subtle mystery, the heart-warming associations of Christmastide are brought to the fireside in a way that is at once a delight and a revelation.

Christmas is the time of foregather; the interest of the MIRROSCOPE is general and associated; its appeal spreads through all generations, pleases all tastes and never wearies.

What Dickens did for the Christmas of a generation ago, the MIRROSCOPE does for the Christmas of to-day.

Prices for the New Season's Models, 15/- to 84/- fitted for Electric, Gas, or Acetylene. Already stocked and demonstrated by Boots Cash Chemists, Harlequin; (all branches), Selfridge's, Gamble's, Benetton's, Ltd., Chilton Edwards & Co., J. Fallowfield, The Junior Army & Navy Stores, Spicers & Pond's Stores, etc. For Free Illustrated Booklet containing full particulars (Demonstrations also arranged), apply—

CARR BROS., Ltd., 11, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

"Thank you, dear. It is just what I wanted for the Office."

An inexpensive but most useful gift—useful all the year round—either at home, at the office, or when travelling, is a

"NUGGET" BOOT POLISHING OUTFIT
BLACK OR BROWN. PRICE 1/-

A "NUGGET" Outfit contains:—
1 TIN of "NUGGET" Polish.
1 SPECIAL BRUSH (pure bristles).
1 POLISHING PAD ("Selvyt").

It is the finest value on the Market.

Of all Bootmakers and Stores, or direct from The Nugget Polish Co., Ltd., London, S.E., on receipt of 1/- (or in metal case, 1/3).

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's Navy Cut Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original packets and tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute.

Reed. No. 154011.

which runs like a great canal of brown, muddy water twenty miles wide, now silent and devastating, and always suggestive of danger and death." They travel in search of the Hidden City, where, according to the legend, the buried gold lies hidden. The thrilling escapades of the quest, the final outcome of the adventure, together with the secret of the Ghost Rock, we must leave to Mr. Watson to tell. The book should stand high among Christmas favourites, and will certainly win a rapturous reception from every schoolboy, who secretly nourishes the hope that one day he will set sail on adventurous seas and sojourn among savages.

The joyous adventures of a dog, a cat, and their boon companions are told in SPIDER AND CO. (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.). A violent storm throws the creatures on their own resources, divorcing them at once from the care and the restraint of man. The story is slight, but by the author, S. H. Hamer, told with delicious humour, and the difficulties Spider and Co. encounter in their efforts to found a home are recounted with exactly the right touch. Mrs. Rooster is the type of a woman with a miserable soul, who by some accident has found her way into the body of a farmyard fowl. The Elephant, who, in the course of the story, breaks in upon the happy family, carries the companions off for a long ride, during which they meet Mr. Quacker, the Wart Hog, and other diverting zoological specimens. Children will revel in this book. The adventures are of the kind that appeals to young minds, and the conclusion of the story will satisfy them. For, in the end, Spider and Co. grow tired of liberty, and return to the discipline and the comforts of their old homes, content once more to be under human dominion.

Miss Grace James has given us a collection of Japanese fairy tales (GREEN WILLOW, Macmillan and Co., 5s. net), taken in part from the mythology of Japan and in part reproduced by her from memory. There is a suggestion of modernity about the style and in the illustrations which strikes an unexpected and at times an almost jarring note. The stories lack the simplicity that properly belongs to the folklore of the world, for phrasing counts less in a story of goblins and ghosts than the capacity for setting the nerves athrill or sending a sensation of creepiness up the spine. The best of the collection, we consider, is "The Maiden of Char." The phrasing here is simpler, and the effect produced is more direct, the emotion raised more intimate. "Then they took her, her mother, and the wise woman, and they tied her hair, and pinned it high upon her head with gold and coral pins, and held it with a great lacquer comb. She said, 'How heavy it is!' When they dressed her in the robe of grey silk, and tied the girdle of brocade fast, she shuddered, and said, 'I am cold!' Then they would have thrown over her a mantle 'broidered with plum blossom, but she would have none of it, saying, 'No, no, I burn.'" "The Land of Youth" suffers from flowery language, and too great a number of ornate adjectives, in marked contrast to the story quoted above. We have an uneasy sense that we are in a strange land, peopled not with fairies and goblins, monsters and ghosts, beautiful princesses, romantic knights, but with meticulous beings, who respond to attenuated feelings unknown to the lovers of fairy lore. The book is well bound, and makes a handsome, tasteful volume.

Rachel and Penelope Shaw (SALLIE'S CHILDREN, W. and R. Chambers, 3s. 6d.) come to England to stay with their grandparents while their mother runs a tea-shop in New Battersea. On the voyage they meet one Mr. Addison, who looks after them, and gives them the best time possible in the restricted possibilities of a steamer. Their trials and tribulations in England are surmounted by a patience and tact phenomenal in schoolgirls, even of the American variety. There is an effect, a touch of the goody-goody about the story, which discounts its interest and detracts from its healthy, breezy atmosphere. In the ultimate, of course, the children win the hearts of the old people, and become first favourites among the surrounding villagers. The mother rejoins them, having made the tea-shop pay, and the curtain comes down on the thanks of everyone concerned that Sallie sent her children over the water.

Miss Mary Wilkins inevitably writes with a literary flavour and polished style, and her latest essay in the art of the child's books, THE GREEN DOOR (Smith, Elder and Co.), is notable for the qualities of atmosphere and delicate characterisation. "Letitia's Great-aunt Peggy used to play grace hoops with her, and dominoes and checkers, and even dolls. Sometimes it was hard for Letitia to realise that she was not another little girl." Miss Peggy, indeed, fulfils the functions of the perfect aunt to admiration. Sometimes, however, the world grew very narrow, the child became dissatisfied, wanted more clothes, more dolls, more everything. She wanted to pass through the little green door, "at the very back of the house, towards the fields, in a room opening out of the kitchen."

Eventually, like Fatima, she could resist no longer the desire to pass the boundary, and after much heart-burning she fitted the key in the little green door and went through. Of Letitia's experiences there Miss Wilkins treats in her own inimitable fashion. The story has a freshness and originality that makes it fragrant.

Schooldays are the happiest time in a boy's or girl's life. We had the same thing told to us in our childhood, and believed it as little as the young people now addressed in the same vein. But if boys and girls but little appreciate the charm of school, there is not one among them who does not like to read of the things that happen there. SCHOOLGIRL HONOUR (Nisbet and Co., 3s. 6d.) is a good story, well told, with a shrewd insight into the workings of the young and feminine mind. Miss Kathleen Rhodes starts her story with commendable promptitude, and from the moment that Maimie Green puts her head in at the door of the fifth-form class-room and announces she had a piece of news to tell her friends, we know that mischief is afloat. The author's girls are healthy studies of flesh and blood, brimful of high spirits and vivacity, and always thinking out some daring escapade. The story will make delicious reading for more than one girl home for the holidays.

The story of TWO TROUBADOURS (Smith, Elder and Co., 3s. 6d.) lacks the touch of spirit and adventure necessary to justify its title. The twins—Louis and Francis—are good little boys, of a painfully prim character and ordered neatness, and they become more model as the story advances, until at last one almost fears an early death-bed for the irreproachable pair. Miss Esme Stuart spares us this catastrophe, but finds it necessary to inflict a severe illness on Louis, in consequence of an heroic drowning act, in which he saves the life of a small girl, and narrowly

(Continued on page 288.)

J. M. DENT & SONS' LTD., CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS

"Messrs. Dent can always be relied upon for delightful books."—THE STANDARD.

FRANCIS HORATIO & HIS THREE COMPANIONS

By HILLEL SAMSON. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 4s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES of Thursday last said:—"A book of unusual beauty and freshness, written in language that is often as poetical as good prose dare be. The product of a mind in tune with nature and the spiritual side of art, and yet alive to the problems and needs and anxieties of the workaday world. There is about the characters the same spirituality that is characteristic of the mind of the author and makes his book remarkable. All are lovable, and all, in their different ways, are strong, for there is nothing mawkish about Mr. Samson's writing. He makes you feel on every page of his book that it is a joy to be with so cultivated, so high-minded, and inspiring a companion."

PRESENTATION VOLUMES FOR CHILDREN.

BEE: The Princess and the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Translated by PETER WRIGHT.

Numerous Pictures in Colour by CHARLES ROBINSON.

"The adventures of Bee and George cannot fail to charm children, and even to their more critical elders it appears to be a wonderful imitation of the genuine thing."—Daily Graphic.

"A charming story full of delicate fancy, . . . there are plenty of coloured illustrations and pretty marginal sketches by Mr. C. Robinson."

—Spectator.

UNIFORM WITH "A CHILD'S BOOK OF SAINTS."

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

By WILLIAM CANTON, Author of "A Child's Book of Saints," etc.

With Illustrations in Colour by HERBERT COLE. Large crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"Mr. Canton has written a fascinating account of Charlemagne, Olaf the Viking, Justinian, and other brave men of countries across the seas, who 'beat down Wrong and strove for Right.'"—The Times.

"A Child's Book of Warriors' makes an ideal gift for children, picturesque in prose and in the superb illustrations which accompany the text."

—Morning Post.

JOLLY CALLE, and other Swedish Fairy Tales.

Text: HELENA NYBLÖM. Illustrations in Colour by CHARLES FOLKARD. Square crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"The book is a collection of Swedish Fairy Tales by Helena Nyblom, with colour and other illustrations by Charles Folkard. Many of them emulate the spirit of Hans Andersen, and bid fair to make as many friends here, in Western Europe, as they most have made up in the North."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Jolly Calle' is full of laughter, and relates things which, though new to our own nurseries, should soon be added to the store of literature which loves the thought of the great fighters of the past."—The Standard.

THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN.

Text by Mrs. R. STAWELL. Numerous Coloured Illustrations by F. C. PAPÉ. 3s. 6d. net.

"The old familiar fairies are perhaps the best, but Mrs. Rodolph Stawell's fairies, though unknown until discovered by the author, are not much less charming, nor any less elusive and mysterious. There are a round dozen stories in the volume, which is prettily illustrated, and all the tales have that imaginative frame-work and appearance of verisimilitude which characterise the classic stories of this description. It is good work in which any unsophisticated child, and some elderly people, should take pleasure."—The Scotsman.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY AND THE COMPANION VOLUME CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY.

Each volume has 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.

Size, imperial 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net each.

By CECIL HEADLAM and the (late) Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, BISHOP OF TRURO, respectively.

"Mr. Headlam has given us a book on Oxford, which has the same feeling for the pervading spirit that Dr. Stubbs has shown in the twin book on Cambridge."—Country Life.

RENAISSANCE LIBRARY.

Edited by

EDWARD HUTTON.

LE POESIE DI LORENZO DE'MEDICI. 2 Volumes. Edited by JANET ROSS and EDWARD HUTTON.

1/2-morocco, vellum sides, 21s. net; full vellum, 25s. net.

The first complete edition of Lorenzo's poetry that has ever been printed. These books are printed with a special type designed by Mr. J. M. Dent, after the famous XVth century Jenson type. The first volume published in the series was: "HERO AND LEANDER," by CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE, from the rare edition of 1598 in the British Museum. Only a few copies remain of this.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. Numerous Coloured Illustrations by A. R. QUINTON.

"Mr. Ditchfield shows sound judgment in selection as well as ability to avoid the commonplace, and the result is wholly satisfactory. He has much that is interesting to say about porches, gardens, dormer windows, market crosses, bridges, moats, and farm buildings. He tells his readers why and how the old cottages were built; why the thin tile replaced the thick stone for roofing; why ingle-nooks have vanished from modern cottages; and why the old cottages take such a varying form."—The Field.

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: Historical—Pictorial—Colonial.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Original and other Photographs and Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The book will certainly find a place amongst intelligent readers and those who are studying the present-day questions of that country."

—The Athenaeum

A LIST of PRESENTATION VOLUMES and GIFT-BOOKS will be gladly sent on receipt of Postcard.

137c, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

AN XMAS GIFT

YOUR FRIENDS WILL VALUE

is a copy of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration—the finest system of all-round Mental-Training in existence. The late Mr. W. T. STEAD said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success." If you have a friend who lacks the power to concentrate, whose Memory is poor, Will-power, Self-reliance and Self-confidence weak, he will welcome your gift of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, which is now being practised in every part of the civilised world. Send a P.C. for full particulars to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. See the splendid testimony of "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "John Bull," and "Great Thoughts."

A TON OF COAL

for 2/6

*It's cost a box of Seldonite
Abundantly repays;
In every hundredweight of coal
A hundredweight it saves.*

"Seldonite" (so called after the discoverer, Prof. Frank Seldon) doubles the heating and lasting power of Coal, Slack, or Coke. It makes one scuttleful of cheap Coal go as far and give as good a heat as two scuttles of the best Coal do in the ordinary way. It can be applied to all Coal, Slack, or Coke in a few moments, and Coal which has once been "Seldonised" retains its double strength for any length of time. By using "Seldonite" you can save half or more of your coal-money, and you will ensure greater cleanliness and comfort, because your Coal will burn to fine ashes with a complete absence of soot.

"SELDONITE" is Concentrated Heat

If you use only one ton of coal per month "Seldonite" will save you about £4 in the winter. It is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, does not smell or smoke, and gives a bright, beautiful, intensely hot fire. "Seldonite" can be used easily in the smallest household as well as in the largest factory, and its money-saving effect is equally great, whether for kitchen, grate, oven, copper or furnace.

AS A SPECIAL INDUCEMENT to encourage you to convince yourself of the marvellous efficiency of this Coal-Improver, the Sole Licensees have decided to send a full-size 4" box (sufficient to treat one ton of Coal, Slack, or Coke) to all readers for only 2/6, provided the order and P.O. for 2/6 is received within the next few days. Beware of imitations which are useless. Write to-day, enclosing P.O. for 2/6, to the Sole Licensees—

"Seldonite" Laboratories, Dept. 51, Holborn Hall, W.C.

A FEW WELL-KNOWN USERS OF "SELDONITE."

DOWAGER COUNTESS OF GUILFORD; VISCOUNT COMBEAMERE; LADY ANGLIER; LADY L. WENERS; LADY HARRIET WARDE; LADY BROWNLOW CRELL; SIR S. PONSONBY; HON. MRS. SIDNEY PONSONBY; HON. R. HENLEY EDEN; ADMIRAL SIR JAMES BRUCE; COL. LEIR; COL. BUTLER; CAPT. RICHMOND; CAPT. WEBBER; THE MOTHER SUPERIOR, House of Retreat, London; ST. EDITH HOME FOR GIRLS; REV. D. LEWIS, Llanon; REV. JOHN M. MILLER, Strimling; REV. ALEX. WALKER, Millport; REV. C. WILSON, Arklow; REV. T. T. TAYLOR, Chelmsford; REV. CANON WILSON-BROWN, Bury St. Edmunds; REV. C. D. SNELL, Sevenoaks; REV. R. R. CORBOLD, Ipswich; REV. DR. L. WILLIAMS, Royston; REV. BANFIELD, Hertingfordbury.

MAPLETON'S
NUT
FOODS

Essentially the Foods for Brain Workers; maximum of nutriment, minimum of trouble. Full List and Sample of FRITTAMIX, the New Savoury, Post Free. Mention EVERYMAN.

MAPLETON'S,
Garston, LIVERPOOL.

BOOKS FOR XMAS.—Our New Catalogue, containing the best Books of the Season—Books for Children, Bibles, Prayer and Hymn Books, Standard Books in Leather Binding, etc.—will be sent post free on receipt of a card.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED. All in 3 vols., First Editions, 25/- each offered. Lorna Doone, 1869; Wild Wales, 1862; Jane Eyre, 1847; Desperate Remedies, 1871; Romola, 1863; Adam Bede, 18 9; Workers in the Dawn, 1830; Men of Character, 1838; Harry Richmond, 1871; Richard Feverel, 1859; Rhoda Fleming, 1865; Emilia in England, 1864. 100,000 Books in Stock. State Wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14 & 16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

SHORTHAND (PITMAN'S); Postal Instruction. Syllabus on application.—A. H. CLOUGH, 16, Victoria Street, Moldgreen, Huddersfield.

loses his own. We wish the twins would develop a little natural naughtiness, and we hunger for them to tear their clothes, pull someone's hair, or throw brickbats at their aged aunt. Alas! our craving for impropriety of conduct remains unappeased; the twins remain spick and span throughout the book. Shade of "Helen's Babies"—if only they would do some desperate thing; but the poor children, trimmed to pattern, pruned to shape, cannot escape from the vigilance of the author; the unhappy Troubadours are uncannily good, and remain so to the end of the story.

Dedicated "to the three dearest children in the world," Miss Kate Douglas Wiggin gives us in THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL (Gay and Hancock) a dainty little volume, charmingly illustrated by Francis E. Hiley. As we are reminded by another publication from her pen, Miss Wiggin communed at least on one occasion with the greatest interpreter of children and childhood that our literature has produced—Charles Dickens; and her carol has caught something of the master's tender but hearty love of all that pertains to the little ones and to the season which is theirs. A delightful volume, whose only fault is that it is too slender.

TOTA, who is introduced to us by Mrs. Hobart-Hampden (Macmillan and Co.), is a very prim little lady, the most interesting member of a prim, precocious family resident in the East. The sister instructs the elderly nurse to say "Mother" instead of "Ma," and all of Tota's sisters have a quaint air of charming staidness. Tota herself has also a spice, and more than a spice, of Anglo-Saxon venturesomeness, and she determines to visit "on her own" the territory of a neighbouring Rajah, whose reputation is forbidding, not to say sinister. It is not very clear where the exact geographical whereabouts of the Rajah's territory may be, but Tota's adventures with his officers and retainers, who have long curved knives stuck in their belts, and wear little round caps, are very entertaining, and the child's simplicity and fearlessness are thrown into bold relief by the brilliance and colour of her new surroundings, whose half-picturesque, half-sordid character are convincingly portrayed. Needless to say, the object of her captors is to wed her to the eldest son of the Rajah, but "Tota came of a fighting stock," and the steps that she and her friends take to thwart this little plot make amusing enough reading, though, to be quite candid, the story lacks something of originality, and the theme is—well, a trifle musty.

Frankly, we are disappointed with GOLDEN HOUSE, by Bella Sidney Woolf (Mrs. R. H. Lock) (Duckworth and Co.), which opens charmingly, introducing us to a Mrs. Smith, who has to type furiously for a living in the suburbs, and two of the jolliest little boys it has been our good fortune to meet, Peter and Bungo. The children have their Golden House in the back garden of the little villa that their mother works so hard to support. "Golden House," the authoress explains, "was their manner of putting into words the things they had not got—the fairy-tale life that lay outside their everyday world." . . . "It's all gold walks and everything," says Peter, "and all the flowers in the garden are yellow, and canaries in the trees, and it's in the country and by the sea—and it's, oh, too lovely for words!" So far, the Court is with you, Peter, and we listen to further accounts of the castle with delight, and then the fairy godmother appears—and, alas! the illusion vanishes. For the fairy godmother, Lady Merivale, has a novel of 100,000 words waiting to be typed, four motor cars, "rare sympathy," and a cottage in Somerset, and is, in fact, an entirely incredible person. However, the sympathy and the cottage are both placed at the disposal of Mrs. Smith, who later turns out to be Mrs. Wykeham-Bell, and the daughter-in-law of a rich man, whose residence is near the cottage in question; and so the pretty romance that promised is spoilt.

Miss May Baldwin contrives to break distinctly fresh ground in CORAH'S SCHOOL CHUMS (W. and R. Chambers), no easy matter in the writing of a child's story. Corah is a typical young English schoolgirl, who proceeds with her brother Jock to South Africa. Thus we get an excellent outline of life in one of our most fascinating colonies, so written as to interest young people. A girl who has followed Corah through Miss Baldwin's pages would have gained an infinitely better idea of the colony that has played so important a part in our own history than if she read through a thousand laborious text-books, with their misleading and inadequate "statements of fact." Perhaps, also, she will be tempted to turn her footsteps later on to the direction of the land of the gold mines and the great Karoo. In view of the fact that women are in an overwhelming majority in this old land, while they are at a premium in all our colonies, we may hope that books such as this will render real service to the Empire.

The pages which record the adventures of 'A CAVALIER OF FORTUNE, by Escott Lyner (W. and R. Chambers), are, if we may be permitted the expression, terribly noisy. The clash of swords, the snapping of pistols, the thud of falling bodies, the strange oaths of stranger men deafen our ears in every chapter, and the wild attacks and hairbreadth escapes must surely pall on the spirit even of the most adventurous juvenile. The book is written, however, with a certain verve and freshness, even at parts with a real power, that carries us forward, jaded as we are by combat, and nauseated by adventure. It is just well enough written to make one wish that the author had taken sufficient pains to avoid the crudities and absurdities which plentifully besprinkle his pages. At the same time—for boys are not, fortunately, hypercritical—the interest is undeniably well sustained, and the volume should have many readers. It is, therefore, perhaps a pity that the author should have perpetrated many gross historical caricatures, of which the worst is his portrait of James II.

There are few gifts we can imagine a boy learning to value more than the admirably produced volume of nature sketches which Mr. St. Mars has written under the title of ON NATURE'S TRAIL (Nesbit and Co., Ltd., 6s. net). Beautifully illustrated, the work should have a permanent place in the affection of the schoolboy, who loves to read of birds, beasts, and fishes. Lieut.-Col. Patterson, in his preface, states that Mr. St. Mars "seems to have not only a genius for the wilds, but the most intimate and extraordinary knowledge of beasts and birds. He must have studied nature at first-hand as well as in books . . . and he has a remarkable gift for picturing what he has seen." It is just that faculty which most writers of nature-books lack, and it is this that gives the pages of Mr. St. Mars their peculiar charm and value. Witness this forceful piece of descriptive writing: "He got within spring—he sprang. Then

Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcases make splendid Christmas Gifts

EVERY MAN who loves books is faced with the problem of finding shelf accommodation for the books he receives as gifts and those he is constantly purchasing. A G.W. "Elastic" Bookcase solves the problem, for it is built of interlocking units.

Give your friend a G.W. "Elastic" Bookcase—then he can add more units as he needs them, and his bookcase will always be complete. Catalogue No. 72B shows the idea exactly. Packing Free. Orders for £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,
44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C. 1;
82, Victoria Street, S.W. 1; 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

CLEARANCE CATALOGUE of General Literature post free on application. First Editions, Scarce Items, and Illustrated Works at low prices. Books sent on approval if desired.—Address J. BALDWIN, 14, Osborne Road, Leyton, Essex.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS."
All Subjects. Never known to fail.
Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift.

Musicians, Actors, Architects, Engineers, Artists, Speakers, and all who need memory, should write—

GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College).
Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogue No. 614, and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

LITERARY WORK of every description successfully placed by The Surrey Literary Agency. Booklet Prospectus free.—Locksley, Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN THE STUDY OF ASTROLOGY. By ALAN LEO. Full particulars of these unique lessons on application to Secretary, Lessons Department, "Modern Astrology" Office, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); in Iude Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

he rolled over sideways and screamed, because a thing, a big half-white, half-grey thing, which was like a cat, and yet not like any cat he had ever seen, flew past over his back and hit him on the cheek. It sprang for the rabbit, that thing, even as the cat had done, but its spring was no mere jump as the cat's was, it was a long, grand leap, and it reached that rabbit. A pitiful, child-like squeal announced the fact, and thereafter was silence—just silence—and Grey Ghost crouching low over the dead bunny." If nature is shown to us red in tooth and claw in these sketches, the portrait is faithful as well as vivid. This book will be eagerly read by many old boys as well as young.

PHŒBE'S HERO, by the author of "Laddie" (W. and R. Chambers, Ltd., 2s. 6d.), is of a type that is too much neglected in these days, when the homely virtues of those who put duty first are in danger of being ignored for the showy achievements of men who are determined to be successful at all costs. Yet often the really strong man—the real super-hero—is he who plods on steadily through life, with no illusions as to the dreariness of the common round and the simple task, but determined to go "through with it" because it is the right thing to do. That, after all, is the quality that has made our race, and in this book is admirably portrayed in Giles Gerard, the eldest son of the parson of Little Mapleton, who dies leaving his family with little of this world's goods. Giles goes as clerk to an iron works, in order that his brilliant young brother may go to the 'Varsity and become a Senior Classic. In life, perhaps, the latter would have the best time of it. Still, even the plodder has his victories, and Phœbe's hero, at any rate, is rewarded.

The THREE HUNDRED AND ONE THINGS A BRIGHT GIRL CAN DO, by Jean Stewart (Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd.), marks the change that has come over the spirit and outlook of women. As the authoress tells us in her preface, had the book been written many years ago, it would have contained more pages about needlework and fewer about out-of-door exercises. We are not quite so sure, however, that, as she affirms, girls and women are surpassing boys and men in carriage, health, and intellect, still less that men are carelessly sucking filthy tobacco pipes, and for ever crowding into parlours and hot billiard-rooms (why should that most fascinating and healthy of games be played in the cold?). Apart from these extravagances, however, the tone of Miss Stewart's book is eminently practical, and her work ranges over an immense variety of subjects, including not only such well-known outlets for woman's energy as hockey, lawn tennis, and croquet, but swimming, rowing, sculling, and golf. To come to more useful accomplishments, it provides some admirable hints for home theatricals, the making of fruit cordials and sweets, and the organising of indoor games. On the whole, the book will well repay a bright girl's attention.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Special features for No. 10 include G. K. Chesterton's Rejoinder to G. Bernard Shaw, the conclusion of "Napoleon as a Socialist," by Dr. Sarolea; a Character Sketch, with Portrait, of John Masfield; "The Tyranny of the Novel," by Dr. Barry; a Sketch of H. G. Wells, by Richard Curle; "The Trial of the Knights Templars," by Henri Mazel, of the Mercure de France.

In KITTY DONOVAN, DADDY'S GIRL, and PEGGY FROM KERRY (W. and R. Chambers, Ltd.), Mrs. L. T. Meade maintains the high level of careful workmanship which has always distinguished her work. Her characterisation is always interesting, if not profound, and, without being in the least namby-pamby, still less dull, her stories have that serious note, with that appreciation of home-life and its charms, which is too often lacking nowadays.

Those who believe in Bible teaching by means of tableaux representation will welcome BETHLEHEM TABLEAUX, by J. K. C. Chesshire (Dent, 5s.). The book gives a vivid account of how Bible pictures can be represented with very limited material, and the effects produced, as seen in the illustrations, are marvellously Scriptural in character.

Constable has brought out a new children's edition of THE ARABIAN NIGHTS (illustrated by René Bull, 10s. 6d.). The illustrations will make the book beloved by children; weird, bejewelled Eastern figures are to be found there, fantastic wizards, with all the implements of their black magic; strange forest scenes, where gnomes and spirits of the wood emerge from every tree; wondrous ships, perilously overloaded, whose approach scatters the gaping monsters of the deep—these, and more than these, will throw their spell over the lucky children who possess this book.

TOY BOOKS FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

Messrs. W. and R. Chambers have published a delightful selection of toy books this Christmas. Among the most notable of their issue is the ever popular BUSTER BROWN, brought up to date in a series of amusing sketches. We have also the adventures of KAPTEN KIDDO AND PUPPO, and other picture-books equally delightful to the small children, who will find infinite satisfaction in their pages. ROUND ABOUT PAPERS (Sidgwick and Jackson, 1s. 6d.) are refreshing and delightful. Well got up and charmingly illustrated, it will please every child to read the discussion of the rival merits of Banbury Cakes and Chelsea Buns, and we ourselves were allured by the picturesque presentment of the Potteries.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

The GIFT THAT GIVES SATISFACTION

every day in the year

YOU ARE SAFE AND SURE TO PLEASE

IF YOU GIVE HIM A

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

No other Gift you can possibly select approaches it for value and lasting satisfaction.

Remember the Name CLEMAK—Refuse Imitations.

The CLEMAK Makes a real present.

It is the one Safety Razor sold at a reasonable price. The complete 5/- Outfit consists of Triple Silver Plated Frame; Self-contained Stropping handle; and Seven Sheffield Steel Blades. The whole contained in neat case, size 2 in. by 3 3/4 in.

CLEMAK Razor & Seven Blades - - - 5/-

NEW MODEL SET and Twelve Blades - - - 7/6

COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades - - 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, &c.,

The CLEMAK saves time and money.

Safest.

Shaves Easiest.

Outlasts all others.

No dull blades.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER.

The CLEMAK STROPPING MACHINE (price 3/6, including a good velvet-hide Strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a keen blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

or post free from the CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street, LONDON.

DARN NO MORE

Holeproof Hose Stockings and Socks That Don't Want Mending.

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will Replace them absolutely FREE

You can imagine that we should not make such an offer unless we were convinced of the extraordinary good wearing quality of our Socks and Stockings. No more eye-straining, emptying, washing, mending. You can now wear your Socks and Stockings in all occupations. For every pair you buy you get a GUARANTEE TICKET, which guarantees that if the smallest hole appears within TWO months of purchase the hose will be replaced absolutely free. So you can see the enormous saving that is gained by purchasing our Holeproof Hose. These Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, snappy, well-fitting and comfortable, with that special sense of good fit that is one of the many pleasing features of our goods. It is probable that it gives to countless people just as sponge may be depressed by gripping of the hand, without any damage done to its fabric. The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business elite and busy housewives to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 2/10, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' stockings 3/10, post 2d.

COLOURED HOSE for ladies, in black, Navy, Mole, Champagne, Pearl Grey, Tau & Lt. Bl. in M. at same price. SILK HOLEPROOF. Most delightful. Specially strengthened in toe and heels with our holeproof mixture yarn. The latest Champagne colour is stocked, also Empire Blue, Tan, Pearl Grey, and Black. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 7/6, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 10/6, post 2d. On the guarantee that we will replace them free if a hole develops within Two Months of purchase, will you send our P.O.? State boot size. Write your name and address distinctly. Call or write: Vaughan & Heather (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS' LIGHT for 1½d.

"FOOL-PROOF" LAMP.

AGENTS WANTED.

are also highly dangerous, besides looking rather poverty stricken. Now, these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article. It is essentially "good" looking and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps. Barns Paraffin Oil.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely odourless; it wears for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Price 2/6. Postage and Packing, 2d.

VAUGHAN & HEATH & R (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

We have named this the "Fool-Proof" Lamp, because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe. That is, there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or in draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense. But one of these little "Fool-Proof" Lamps, placed in these eerie corners or dark staircase landings, will cost no more than 1½d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount and

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER

Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

Agents Wanted.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm. It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to go to the theatre or have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/6 or 2/-. That is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster. Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. You know before you were told that air improves a fire, or why do you blow it to make it go? Just fancy, only half as much coal to be bought. You must then send your postal order now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5½ in. wide), 2/-; or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide) 1/6. Postage on each, 3d. Go to the Post Office NOW, and start this investment of 1/6 or 2/- earning big dividends for you at once. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years, an unheard-of saving.

1/6 Postage 3d. Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

NO MORE COLD FEET

Agents Wanted.

Cold feet can now be a thing of the past. The new "Slip-on" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm, non-irritating woolly material. Worn next to the skin. Your sock or stocking is worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/- PER PAIR, post. 1d. extra. State boot size. P.O.'s only—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

1/- PER PAIR. Postage 1d.

BEDROOM SLIPPERS. Just the thing for DAINTY FEET, 6d. per pair. Post. 2d. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON.

The Talk of the

GRAMOPHONE

World.

'PARSONS' SEMITONE'

Improves the Sound, Avoids Scratching of the Needle. Old Records made New. Sold by Spiers and Pond, Whiteley's, Civil Service Stores, and all high-class dealers.

Sample Semitone sent post free for

1/6

Parsons' TRIPLE CRYSTAL NEEDLE will play 60 tunes. Increases sound. Stands alone for Quality. Boxes of six for 6d.

PARSONS' SEMITONE COMPANY,
37 & 39, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

3/9

The Xmas Gift with a purpose

Instead of the pretty trifle, give a fountain pen this Xmas and let your gift carry with it real, lasting pleasure. It costs no more.

THE W.H.S. PEN

is the original, low priced, self-filling Fountain Pen. It writes as well as any pen. Is certain in action—never fails, never spurts, never blots. Further, it is self-filling. You can fill it in 5 seconds, without a filler, without soiling your fingers.

Every Pen is guaranteed for two years, and any style of nib can be matched from stock. The nib is of 14-carat gold, tipped with hardest iridium. Buy the W.H.S. Pen and give Useful Gifts this year. See the new model.

Of all Good Stationers

Refuse Substitutes. Insist on the Pen with the WHS on the barrel

W. H. SMITH & SON

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 10. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1912.

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	293
The Strikers and the Public—
By Rowland Kenney	295
A Salute to the Last Socialist—
By G. K. Chesterton	296
Life at High Pressure	297
Napoleon as a Socialist—
Part II.—By Charles Sarolca	298
Silhouettes	299
Mr. Masefield's Portrait—
By Ernest Rhy's	300
Portrait of John Masefield	301
The Trial of the Knights Templars—
By Henri Mazel, of the Mercur de
France	302
Results of Competitions	303
H. G. Wells—
By Richard Curle	304

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

G. K. CHESTERTON

ROWLAND KENNEY

RICHARD CURLE

HENRI MAZEL

Literary Notes	PAGE
The Street that Never Sleeps	305
Nostalgia—Short Story—
By Peter Altenberg	307
The "Westward Ho!" and "Refugees" Controversy—
By Prof. Saintsbury	308
Correspondence	308
Reviews—
The Iona Books	312
Under Which King?	312
"The Strangling of Persia"	314
Christmas, Yule and Noël	315
A Traveller in the Unseen	316
The Odysseus of Mumper's Dell	316
Books of the Week	318
Gift Books	320
List of Books Received	322

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Turkish and Balkans Peace delegates held their first meeting at St. James's Palace on Monday. They were welcomed by Sir Edward Grey, who in the name of His Majesty the King expressed best wishes for the success of their labours. "In this country," continued Sir Edward, "you will find an atmosphere of calm and impartiality that will be favourable to your work." By accomplishing peace they would not only build up the prosperity, moral, economic, and national of their respective countries, but would also secure the respect of the whole of Europe. In reply, the Greek Premier expressed the hope that with the help of the Almighty they would reach the long-desired goal of lasting peace.

Dr. Danef, Bulgarian delegate to the London Peace Conference, in an interview, said that the chief points to be settled with Turkey were frontier questions, financial problems, and then important territorial questions in connection with Adrianople, the Adriatic, and the Ægean Islands. On the question of Adrianople, the Bulgarians would not give way. If Turkey refused to yield that place, which was necessary for the security of Bulgaria's future frontiers, Bulgaria would begin the war again, and her allies had given the assurance that they would march with her.

In Committee on the Welsh Church Bill in the House of Commons an important amendment was moved by Mr. France, a Liberal member, the effect of which would be to take from the Church the tithe rent charge, and leave her the other funds. He thought this could form the basis of a settlement by consent. Mr. Gladstone seconded the amendment, as he believed it offered the only settlement which could be accepted by both parties with honour and satisfaction. The Home Secretary said if the amendment were carried he would have to drop the Bill. On a division the majority of the Government fell to 50.

The strike on the North-Eastern Railway is at an end. The Commissioner appointed to enquire into the circumstances of the conviction of Knox, the engine-driver, reported that the evidence failed to convince him that Knox was drunk, in the police sense of the term. As a result Knox has been granted a free pardon, and reinstated in his old position. Under the terms of settlement the men on strike are to resume duty on their former conditions. The men are not to molest or annoy such of the company's employees as have not joined in the strike. Those who struck work are to be fined six days' pay at the standard rate, and no man to be proceeded against for breach of contract who pays the fine. The men's representatives state that they deprecate these spasmodic strikes, and consider that in future North-Eastern men must not strike except with legal notice to the company, and, in the case of members of a Trade Union, in accordance with the Trade Union rules. The strike has cost the company £50,000.

Since Lord Lansdowne's announcement that there would be no Referendum on Tariff Reform there has been considerable dissatisfaction in the Conservative party. In an important speech at Ashton-under-Lyne Mr. Bonar Law made special reference to the subject. Whenever the Opposition are in office they will call a conference with the colonies with regard to food duties. If the colonies do not think these duties will be necessary they will not be imposed. If considered necessary, he did not think the people of this country would object to the necessary readjustment. In view of the proposed conference Mr. Bonar Law thought it would be unfair to resort to a referendum. The question of whether or not food duties should be imposed would not arise until after the negotiations were completed. That was the reason why they objected to submit the proposals to the Referendum.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain, speaking at Carlisle, referred to the proposal of "some of their friends" that Tariff Reform should be postponed. That policy, he believed, would be disastrous to the party. At a Tariff Reform demonstration in Glasgow Mr. Chamberlain outlined the proposed policy. No pedantry forced them to put a tax on raw material, and it would not be done. For manufactured articles they proposed a 10 per cent. duty, and on foreign wheat a duty of 2s. per quarter, which equalled a farthing on the four-pound loaf, and a 5 per cent. ad valorem duty on other foodstuffs. The party leaders would not exceed these duties without a fresh mandate from the people.

Mr. Churchill, in a speech at the Royal Volunteer Naval Reserve in London, referred in an optimistic tone to the position which the nation at present occupies in the world. The delegates had come to London because they knew that we were seeking no selfish ends. It was the Navy which gave to British diplomacy the power to work effectively for the peace of Europe, and it was the Navy which, perhaps more than any other material agency, was binding together the great dominions of the Crown and leading on, not merely to national safety, but to Imperial union.

In London there has been formed a National Insurance Practitioners' Association for the purpose of promoting the interests of those doctors prepared to accept service under the Insurance Act. The results of the voting by medical men all over the country on the Government's terms for insurance work continue to show a large aggregate majority for a refusal of service. The difference between the figures, however, is not quite so marked as on previous occasions.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons the Postmaster-General said, in view of the fact that, according to the reports that had at present reached him, not a single letter had been destroyed in the recent malicious attempts upon pillar-boxes, he did not consider that the circumstances required the imposition upon the counter staff of the additional work which would be involved by allowing firms, companies, and individuals who required to post large numbers of letters at the same time to have facilities for handing them in direct at the Post Office.

Rumours have been heard to the effect that if a woman's suffrage amendment were carried the Prime Minister would resign. The subject came before the House of Commons in the form of a question. In reply, Mr. Asquith said he was not aware that a belief existed among members of the House of Commons "that the result of carrying an amendment to the Franchise and Registration Bill enfranchising women would be the resignation of the Prime Minister and the break-up of the Ministry," or of any ground upon which it was supposed to rest. His public declarations on the subject were on record, and were perfectly plain and explicit.

The question of juvenile employment is occupying the Board of Trade. At a meeting at London Mansion House Mr. Sydney Buxton explained the method of procedure by means of Advisory Committees, representative of education authorities and labour exchanges.

In connection with diseases of animals Mr. Runciman is receiving advice from a number of representative scientific men and agriculturists to deal with the equipment of buildings, land, instruments, and staff, in order to establish a research institution.

According to the Times, a telegram has been received from the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of Canada advising that it has signed an agreement with the Newfoundland Government, under which the Canadian Company is granted exclusive rights for wireless telegraphy stations until the year 1926. A number of coast stations are to be erected, and the Company is to receive a Government subsidy.

Mr. Lionel Vexley, speaking to the Naval Stewards' Association, Portsmouth, said he spoke with authority when he stated that the scale of pay just issued was but an instalment, and that further increases were to come. The Admiralty Christmas box was simply to meet the pressing needs of the lower deck, and was in no sense finality.

A note has been presented to Persia by the British Government demanding adequate reparation for the shooting of Captain Eckford by tribesmen near Shiraz. The Governor of Fars has exonerated Captain Eckford from any charge of carelessness, and has asked for the co-operation of the Governor of Behbahan with a large force for the purpose of punishing the guilty tribe. The Persian Government has promised to make compensation.

General Botha has resigned the Premiership of the South African Union. For some time there have been acute differences in the Cabinet between the Moderates, of which he is the leader, and the Dutch party, led by the Minister of Justice, General Hertzog, whose attitude is said to be anti-British. In accepting the resignation, Lord Gladstone requested General Botha to form a new Administration.

Naturally the views of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with regard to Canadian Naval Policy are attracting much attention. He prefers a fleet built, owned, and manned by Canada, with the object of not merely defending the Dominion coasts, but also helping to fulfil the requirements of the Admiralty Memorandum of "restoring greater freedom to the movements of British squadrons in every sea." In Canada there is a growing feeling that the Conservative and Liberal parties are not very far apart in regard to the naval policy of the Dominion. Both parties have gone much further than could have been expected a few years ago. Both recognise the obligation of Canada to join the Mother-country, Australia, and New Zealand in the defence of the Empire.

The death is announced of Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the United States Ambassador to Great Britain. In a telegram to President Taft, King George, in deploring his loss, says, "I shall mourn an old friend of many years' standing, for whom I had the greatest regard and respect." In the House of Commons tributes were paid by Mr. Asquith and Mr. Balfour. The Prime Minister announced that the Government proposed to offer a British battleship to convey the remains of the Ambassador to his native land.

Increased expenditure on the German Navy and new taxation to meet it are foreshadowed in the semi-official North German Gazette. Such demands are said to be inevitable, in view of the political situation.

According to a Peking dispatch, the Russian Minister has warned the Chinese Government that a rupture of negotiations is imminent if the settlement of the Mongolian question is further delayed.

THE STRIKERS AND THE PUBLIC * * BY ROWLAND KENNEY

[IN the recent railway dispute, the public have had abundant opportunities of hearing both the opinions of the railway companies and of the impartial outsider. We thought it would be interesting to our readers to have also the opinion of the railway men. Our contributor, Mr. Rowland Kenney, a former railway worker and the first editor of the Daily Herald, whose contributions to the English Review have attracted widespread attention, is fully qualified to voice the grievances of the railwaymen. We trust that Mr. Kenney's paper may elicit some definite facts, reassuring the public on the risks involved to the men in the working of our railway system.]

I.

IN considering the North Eastern Railway dispute, we can pass over the Driver Knox incident with a paragraph, and get on to more important phases of the trouble in the railway world. At the conclusion of the inquiry instituted by the Home Office, the Commissioner, Mr. Chester Jones, decided that Knox was not legally drunk; consequently the conviction by the local magistrates and the penalising of Knox by his employers was a miscarriage of justice. The police, the magistrates, and the railway officials were wrong; the strikers were right.

Now no one interested in railway work was surprised when the men struck, just as no one who has followed recent developments believes for a moment that they struck on the driver's point alone. The really remarkable thing was that the strike did not immediately spread from one end of the country to the other.

II.

Ever since the so-called settlement of last year's national dispute, railwaymen have gradually become more and more convinced that their leaders committed a grave blunder in sending them back to work when they did. The fact that over one hundred thousand railwaymen were working for less than a pound a week had been driven home to the public, and public sympathy was entirely on the side of the men. The companies were hopelessly beaten. Had the men's leaders held out for more definite and better terms than a Royal Commission and reformed Conciliation Boards, their claims would have been met.

Added to this there is the undoubted fact that, although some men's wages have been increased during the past year, many who are known as active trade unionists have been victimised in various ways. Under these circumstances, is it any wonder that the men are sullen and discontented? If they take no steps to improve their conditions, they are scandalously overworked and underpaid. Should they take any effective steps they are robbed of their means of livelihood.

With regard to dismissals of trade unionists for trifling offences, the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants says: "I have repeatedly drawn the attention of the officials of the Midland to these (the Midland) cases, and have only received a curt acknowledgment. Many persons who took a prominent part in the strike (of 1911) have been removed from their positions, and have suffered reductions of 10s., 15s., and in some cases 20s. a week in their wages." That is evidence enough of the system of petty tyranny in which the railway officials indulge, and which will, if persisted in, precipitate another national railway war.

III.

And now let me deal with the other phase of the North Eastern dispute. A certain section of the press has raised a cry to the effect that the men struck for the right to get drunk, and has tried to raise shudders of horror by pointing out to members of the travelling public the risks they run from drunken drivers. In spite of the fact that the first contention is a malicious lie—the men all along protested that Knox was innocent—their appeal to the public for sympathy with the company has had some effect. It would be a matter of surprise if it had not. With the exception of shipwreck, there are few thrills so horrible as those experienced in a railway accident. And that is where the companies and the tremendous interests bound up with the companies have scored.

IV.

But, with its accustomed hysterical partisanship, there is one thing the press has not done. It has not dwelt upon the horrible loss of life and the terrible number of accidents annually registered against the British railway system. It has not pointed out the grievous risks the public run from existing defects in the working of British railways. It has done very little to familiarise the public with the lack of safeguards so far as employes are concerned, and it has never pointed out that nearly every step taken by the companies to prevent accidents has been taken under compulsion, or because interests more powerful than themselves have indulged in peaceful persuasion.

Yet it must be admitted that much has been done to protect the lives of passengers. The reason for this is obvious. Members of Parliament, their wives and families, even railway directors and their wives and families, do occasionally travel, and in their interests a tolerable degree of safety must be assured.

V.

With the men the case is different. They have no powerful interests at work to protect them. The press make no public outcry about the risks they run. According to the railway returns for 1907, one shunter in thirteen was killed or injured in the United Kingdom during the year. Thus a man engaged in the peaceful occupation of shunting runs seven times the risks our soldiers ran in the South African War. From Board of Trade figures, which have been ably marshalled by Mr. A. T. Brockelbank, in his book "Mammon's Victims," there were 12,500 shunting accidents on British railways (including private sidings) during 1907-8-9-10. Of those accidents no less than forty-five per cent. occurred under the two most risky operations, braking, spragging, and chocking wheels, and coupling and uncoupling vehicles, both of which can be made comparatively safe by the adoption of safety appliances.

It may be asked, what has all this to do with the public? It has everything to do with the public. It is the duty of the public to see that the murderous British railway system is humanised. Nearly 400 men are killed and 25,000 injured annually in attending to the transport requirements of the public. Also, when one realises this terrible state of affairs, it is not difficult to understand why the men become more and more sullen and discontented. The wonder to me is, and I write from personal experience of railway work, that the men are so careful of the lives and limbs of the public, considering what little interest the public displays in their welfare.

A SALUTE TO THE LAST SOCIALIST * * BY G. K. CHESTERTON

I.

AT the beginning of this discussion I said that Individualism and Socialism were both dead. I think it is now established; for I speak quite seriously when I say that Mr. Bernard Shaw could raise the dead, if anybody could. But besides his vitality, he has another great quality I could never achieve—neatness. And he lays the corpse of Socialism so neatly and correctly beside the corpse of Individualism that he makes his opponent's task easier, like the magnanimous combatant he is.

For what was it that killed the Manchester School? It was the thing that kills every superstition—an unfulfilled prophecy. The Individualists said that something must happen; and it did not happen. Of course, there must have been something wrong in theory about a system that has turned out so totally wrong in practice. But it is not any economic theory that has made the Capitalists drop competition, and even the Collectivists rather faintly follow them. It is experience. Competition has not made the nation rich; it has made more and more of it poor. After that it is useless to prove by printed figures in a book that it must make it rich. And it is equally useless for Mr. Shaw to prove in a book that the Peasant State must turn into the Capitalist State. For the simple and unanswerable answer is that it never does.

II.

If Mr. Bernard Shaw's criticism of the Peasant State were correct, there could not be any Peasant State for him to criticise. He says that the Peasant State, in the twinkling of an eye, under my bewildered gaze, turns into Chicago. He then says I am right in saying the Peasant State ("more's the pity") occupies most of the planet. Thus the question (which is often a difficult one) seems to be simplified. Does Chicago occupy most of the planet? There is private property practically all over the earth. If it had ended in Chicago there would be nothing but Chicago; and Mr. Shaw's "bogtrotting" dislike of peasantry could not find in the whole planet so much as a peasant to dislike. Why should he sneer at the money-love of the French peasants? Has he not heard the news? Does he not know that the whole of France is now covered by the commercial city of Lyons? Why should he bother about the gombeen-man in the Irish village? Surely by this time his full fell work is accomplished; and the city of Belfast covers the whole of Ireland. On Mr. Shaw's principles it is plainly impossible that there can be any peasants anywhere. I believe I have two true affections—one for truth, and the other for Mr. Shaw. I follow truth with reluctance.

And the truth is this: that Mr. Shaw might just as well say that a horse always turns into a donkey (because a foal's ears grow longer) as say that a society of small owners always turns into a capitalist society like Chicago. The plain facts of the planet are against him. Almost everywhere where you have that patient horse, the peasant, his foals are peasants after him for centuries and centuries. Almost everywhere where you have that donkey, the Capitalist, or that equal donkey, the proletarian, you will find they came out of some other donkeydom. You say a village state like Montenegro must produce millionaires as in Chicago. Very well; who are the millionaires of Montenegro? Tell us about the Montenegrin

Soap Trust. Give us the latest news of the Montenegrin Mutoscope Multi-Millionaire Ring. The simple fact is that Montenegro, being a peasant state, will not produce millionaires. That is why it will produce soldiers.

III.

It is exactly the same taken the other way. If the peasant state must produce Chicago, what was the peasant state that did produce Chicago? Tell us about their agriculture, their legends of the spade and spear, their peasant festivals and dances. Sing us one of the songs of Zion. Revive the hopeless but heroic story of that Montenegro that became Chicago. Or, if you do not mind a cold douche of common sense, abandon such an effort, and realise what you know quite well already. That is, that the town called Chicago was made as all such towns are made, out of the sweepings of other towns; and that only after they have established a lying and swindling reputation as money magnets do they attract the most desperate of the rural poor. What kind of people did found Chicago? A very mixed lot, no doubt; adventurers, younger sons, men fleeing from justice, travelling showmen, penitent convicts, touts, advertisers, money-lenders, jerry-builders, runaway slaves. But if any peasants went there, they must have been a mere margin of European peasantry: for the quite evident reason that they have not prevented the great part of Europe from remaining peasant, nor even the overflows of Italian or Irish peasantry from resuming, as soon as possible, a peasant life, even in America. In fact, Mr. Shaw has acknowledged that the peasant society does stay put. He cannot admit it is universal without admitting it is enduring.

IV.

He has drawn a delightfully pathetic picture of me staring at Montenegro as it turns to Chicago before my eyes. But I think I can imagine a more pathetic and a much more probable picture. I can imagine Mr. Shaw going, year after year, to a village in France, which I happen to have visited in childhood, and at roughly regular intervals ever since. Nearly everybody in that village has had land and food and wine and essential self-government for centuries upon centuries; but now much more than before, as in the case of Ireland. I can imagine Mr. Shaw going there every year to see how the evolution of Capitalism is getting on. I picture him every year peering eagerly along the dreary French road for the first factory chimney; and then, with a sudden sinking of the heart, seeing only the dreary French poplar. I conceive him crouching with his hand to his ear, or, perhaps, even his ear to the ground, to hear the far-off sound of the factory "hooter" which makes men so happy in Belfast; and then bursting into tears as he hears only the confounded old cattle-call that tells him that free men are still alive.

V.

I want to add two paragraphs; one about how my way would work, and the other about how his would work. Now a society of small proprietors does in unquestionable fact survive, because it knows what the peasants of the Balkans have just taught the world, while all the Capitalist states, with their Collectivist ideals, stood helpless. It knows how, in the short or the long run, to make tyranny a dangerous game. The Turks have been particularly brave; but I will bet my boots that for centuries they have had some fear even of Montenegro. The Rothschilds have not been particularly brave; but I will bet my boots they have never had the faintest fear of the Fabian Society. (The reason is that the sense of property, of controlling and protecting something from all wrong (including official wrong), does develop an instinct of instant self-defence. Thus the experiment of the usurper and exploiter is watched from the beginning, and prevented in all its doings. Mr. Shaw says the gombeenman is in Ireland, as in England, and may as much be Tim Malone as Ikey Mo. True: but in Ireland, a peasant country, he is called the gombeenman. In England, a country without peasants, he is called neither Malone nor Mo. He is called the famous philanthropist, Lord Windsor. He has not been watched from his filthy beginnings.

VI.

And for the second point, Mr. Shaw asks me how I can solve our huge human problems without Socialism. I ask him how he can solve them with Socialism. Socialism does not mean putting capital in the hands of the people. The only way to do that is our way; to put as much capital as possible in the hands of as many people as possible. Socialism means putting capital in the hands of the Government—that is, the Politicians. He asks me what St. Clare would have said if the Pope forbade her to go without property. The Pope never did forbid her to go without property. May I, in turn, ask what St. Clare would have said if the Pope had said this: "I propose to take away from all the poor people in Italy their doors and hearthstones, their little yards and struggling vines, and give them and their ox and their ass and everything that is theirs into the hands of the Doge of Venice (that complete Republic), of the government of the somewhat fluctuating state of Florence, now I think under some dictator, and of myself—who am a temporal prince. Outside Us there shall be no private property." Which would have strained St. Clare's Catholic loyalty most?

PROGRESS

WHENEVER a god rides out of the east,
Crying a new-dawn creed,
At every stone that is flung in scorn
The wounds of the old gods bleed;
For never a faith or a creed was yet
But once was heresy;
Never a god first spake to men
But spake a blasphemy.

Whenever a man achieves desire
And turns to rest again,
That hour a thousand thousand men
Have lived and died in vain;
For never a halt was called as yet
But that an end befell,
And never a star dies out in heaven
But a new lamp burns in hell.

And never a god or a man toil yet,
By the broken road of dreams,
To the highest peak, but ever beyond
A higher vision gleams;
And never the end of that road shall be,
Never its last fulfil,
Till the stars shall fall from the roof of time
And the sun and the moon stand still.

E. G. BUCKERIDGE.

LIFE AT HIGH PRESSURE

FORTUNATUS, we are told, had a wishing-hat which, when he put it on and wished himself anywhere, behold! he was there. He triumphed over space. We moderns are improving upon Fortunatus: we are triumphing over time as well as space. By our marvellous discoveries and inventions, the world, in regard to distances and intercommunications, is shrinking to quite modest dimensions. As a consequence, civilisation has so quickened the pace, so increased the pressure of life, and taxed human powers, that man is in danger of being sacrificed on the altar of progress. So much is plain from the disquieting report of the Medical Officer of the English Local Government Board. It is to the good that there is a marked decline in the death-rate; against this is the fall in the birth-rate, a circumstance which gives cause for serious thought. Another grave fact which the report brings to light is the increase of 9 per cent. in the death-rate between the ages 55-65. This is attributable to the high pressure of modern times, the real effect of which tells at an age when the natural forces are abated, when man, so to speak, is descending the hill of life, and can ill bear the storm and stress of business.

What is the remedy? On the present lines, when the gospel of work, as glorified by Carlyle, holds the field, no remedy is within sight. The moneyed class—as we see conspicuously in the United States—occupy the seat of honour. In the words of Martineau, "prosperity is their idol; the spread of luxury, the multiplication of external refinements, their criterion as a nation's happiness." So long as mammon worship all but universally prevails, the devotees are condemned to a life of bustle and hustle in which anxiety and worry too often predominate. The remedy can only come by the appearance of a higher ideal. As Franklin puts it, the purely material side of life has to be subordinated to the service of the mind. But it will be said, as a nation, we are making strides in that direction. Not only the schoolmaster, but the professor is abroad, and what between secondary schools and University extension schemes, higher education should soon be within the reach of all. Unfortunately, education is sharing in the materialistic tendency of the times; it is aiming at bread-and-butter results rather than at mind-culture. Education of this type will not lessen but intensify the pressure of life, because, by increasing the number of competitors, it increases the struggle for existence among the so-called professional classes. Unless we are on our guard, we may find that utilitarian education, with its specialising and narrowing effects, may retard culture in the highest sense of the term. We may have to expiate this fault, in the words of Renan, by widespread intellectual mediocrity, vulgarity of manners, and lack of general intelligence.

The remark made by Spencer in New York thirty years ago, that America needed a revised ideal, is applicable to this country to-day. The conquest of the earth and the subjugation of the powers of Nature to human use he admitted to be the predominant need, and this task Spencer saw the Americans were discharging with a feverish energy that was bringing about in business men a nervous collapse and a weakened physique. "Life, he remarked, is not for working, but rather working is for life; by which he meant life with leisure to be devoted to intellectual and moral ends. Carlyle's gospel of work has had its day. The time is ripe for Spencer's gospel of leisure.

NAPOLEON AS A SOCIALIST

CHARLES SAROLEA

PART II.

BY

I.

But although the Testamentary Law has completely attained its object, and has led, in one or two generations, without violence and confiscation, to the suppression of the landed aristocracy, the much more important question remains to be solved, Was the object a desirable one? Have the results been beneficial, or have they been detrimental to the welfare of the French people?

Without entering into theoretical considerations as to the desirability of the object in itself, most economists are satisfied with examining the immediate effects of the revolution. And the main result, the creation of a whole nation of landowners, seems to them so marvellous, so far-reaching, that in the judgment of the majority of economists the testamentary provision of the Code Napoléon must appear as the most beneficent law in the history of mankind. John Stuart Mill has changed his opinions on many fundamental problems of economics, politics, and ethics, but he has never changed or wavered in his admiration of peasant proprietorship. And although, strange to say, he has failed to trace peasant proprietorship to its direct cause, and has even, in flagrant contradiction with himself, expressed disapproval of the Napoleonic laws of succession, the chapters on the subject in his "Political Economy" remain as the most eloquent plea in favour of the social conditions of France and Belgium.

But it is only when we examine the indirect results of the system that we can realise all that France owes to the Testamentary Law, and, even though the benefits conferred have been attended with some disadvantages, those are only the price and compensation which mankind has to pay for every permanent blessing conferred upon it.

(1) The creation of peasant proprietorship has enormously increased national prosperity and the productive capacity of the French people, and has proved once more the truth of Arthur Young's aphorism: "The magic of property transforms a desert into a garden." France has, indeed, become the garden and the market garden of Europe. The vitality of French agriculture has withstood every crisis. French viticulture has emerged triumphant from the dire invasion of the phylloxera, which has cost the French nation more than the German invasion of 1870. It may be that, under the new conditions of scientific agriculture, large estates are more productive than the small ones; but, after all, political economy is human economy, and it is the breeding of men, and not the breeding of cattle, that matters to a nation.

(2) The Testamentary Law has encouraged thrift and all the prudential virtues. To him that hath shall be given. The man who can buy independence, security, and dignity by converting his savings into a plot of land will be induced to save more. Hence that passion for saving which is mainly the result of the hunger for land. Hence the hidden treasures, the woollen stockings full of louis and napoleons, which have made France one of the great money markets of the world.

(3) By increasing the national prosperity, by encouraging thrift, the Testamentary Law has raised the standard of living. It may be that the French peasant will submit to hardships which few farm-labourers would submit to in England, but, in the long run, the peasant is rewarded for his toil. No one who knows the French provinces will doubt that, on the whole, the standard of comfort amongst the lower classes is higher in France than in Great Britain, and that where in individual cases it is lower, it is so, not as the result of poverty, but of that sordid miserliness which is the national vice of the French people. The comparison ought not to be made to apply to individual cases or to particular districts. It ought to be made between the five or six millions of French peasant proprietors and the three or four millions of British unskilled labourers and unemployed whom the agricultural or commercial or industrial crises have driven into the slums of our large cities.

(4) And it is because the Testamentary Law has given to millions of French people a stake and an interest in the country that it has made for order and stability. That great constructive measure of reform of the French Revolution has been in effect a great conservative measure. Paris may be the revolutionary centre of Europe, because it is the intellectual centre, and because the French intellect, which is ever creating new ideas and new ideals, must needs be revolutionary. Paris may be the ever-smouldering volcano, it may be ever experimenting in politics. But the provinces of France are probably the most conservative part of civilised Europe. The French peasant is conservative because he has something to conserve, as the Russian peasant is a rebel because he has everything to gain by insurrection.

(5) Peasant proprietorship has enabled France to escape from the curse of pauperism. And, therefore, without the inexhaustible source of wealth possessed by England, France is, nevertheless, the richer country, because wealth is more equally divided, and because the division ensures the happiness and comfort of the greater number. There is no corresponding term in the French language to the hideous word slum. The word does not exist because the thing is non-existent. There is a great deal of individual poverty in France, because wherever there are large centres of population there must be poverty, but there is no systematic poverty such as exists in England, and such as Rowntree has revealed to us in comparatively small cities like York. France has been saved through the Testamentary Law from the appalling evil which is the source of most other social evils, and which must bring about in a few generations the moral degradation and the physiological decline of the British race.

II.

It remains for us to examine whether those incalculable advantages produced by French peasant proprietorship, which we have just analysed, are not counterbalanced and outweighed by even greater disadvantages.

(1) It has been objected in the first place that a nation may be threatened with an even greater evil than the degradation of the race, namely, its extinction, as the result of the systematic restriction of the population. And it has been contended that in France the Testamentary Law is directly or indirectly responsible for that evil.

Now it is quite true that peasant proprietorship tends to the diminution of the population. But that diminution is in reality caused by a law which is the tragic paradox of human history, and which in all times has been a menace to nations in an advanced state of civilisation. It is a universal law and a natural law, which has only been checked by the interposition of Belgium, in Catholic countries like Canada and Ireland, in Belgium and Germany. In all times and in all countries the increase of population seems to have been in inverse ratio to quality. The more means parents have to support their children, the fewer children they have. It is the proletariat that always have been most prolific; it is the miserable and unhappy that multiply at the expense of the strong.

(2) There is another accusation levelled at the Testamentary Law which is just as true and just as false, according to one's preconceptions, namely, that the Testamentary Law is responsible for the failure of French colonisation. France has always produced pioneers and soldiers, but France has not produced colonists, because France does not produce emigrants. But the Frenchman fails to emigrate not because of peasant proprietorship, but because his native country, partly, no doubt, owing to peasant proprietorship, has more attractions than any foreign country. The Frenchman does not emigrate because French life is too easy, and because France is the most beautiful country God ever created, after His own Kingdom of Heaven. And it is as fair to blame the Testamentary Law for the failure of emigration as it would be to blame the radiance of the sun, or the abundance of the soil, or the smiling vineyards, or the temperament of the people.

(3) There is one other accusation which seems to contain more truth. The Testamentary Law, the small holdings have discouraged industry and checked commercial enterprise. France could not, in any case, not being a great coal and iron producing country, have become a great commercial power, but the Testamentary Law still further discourages industry and hampers commercial development. For, under modern conditions, commerce and industry on a large scale cannot be carried on without considerable enterprise and risk. The French peasant will risk his life, but he will not risk his money, because in risking his money he risks more than his life—he risks the future of his children, his leisure and independence, his place in society.

III.

The above analysis, brief as it is, may suffice to put the problem of the Testamentary Law in its main aspects, and to provide the reader with the necessary elements for forming an independent judgment. In a question of such formidable complexity, raising so many vital issues, where the evil is so often mixed up with the good, it is impossible to expect unanimity of opinion. I shall leave it to the reader to draw his own practical conclusions from the previous pages. For those conclusions must force themselves on his consideration. Assuming that the Testamentary Law has been a blessing to France, the question immediately arises, Why should it not be applicable to England? It has been applied to Belgium, to Holland, and to many Continental countries. Bulgaria, which only thirty years ago was living under the aristocratic régime of the Turkish landlord, has become, through the operation of the Napoleonic Law, the peasant's paradise, and this beneficent revolution has taken place in less than a generation. Bulgaria has become, in consequence, the paramount power in the Balkan, whereas Roumania, whose land is appropriated by a needy aristocracy and mortgaged to the Jewish moneylender, has become a feudatory State of Austria and Germany.

The great problem which Napoleon set himself to solve still remains unsolved in this country. Most Radicals are agreed that landed estates are an anachronism and an evil, and that their suppression is desirable. They may be right or they may be wrong, but if they are right they ought to employ the most efficient and the simplest means to bring about the desirable consummation, and they ought to profit by the experience of other nations. Now, the experience of France, as well as of smaller countries like Belgium and Bulgaria, has shown that all other means to suppress large landed estates are makeshifts, or involve such a measure of injustice and violence as renders them impracticable. The ultimate question is, therefore, whether the reform of the Testamentary Law is not even for England the only simple, direct, logical, efficient, practicable and conservative method to bring about a better social order based on equality, and that Mr. Lloyd George can only succeed by following in the footsteps of the first Napoleon.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascope and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette.

It was a brilliant morning. The sun was blazing, and the water cool, and it was Sunday, when a man can loaf and invite his soul. We were not rich, but we "borrowed" a motor launch, stowed a cargo of beef sandwiches and bottled beer, and felt like plutocrats. She was a down-river boat, which means she was built for work, and had none of the airy fairy smartness of the up-river craft and their swagger crew.

As far as Richmond things were very comfortable. But after we had safely engineered her through the lock we found ourselves in trouble. A punt was wobbling in midstream, aimlessly drifting right across our course.

The skipper grew excited, and said rude things. "Keep 'er out," he shouted to our steersman. "Yer don't want to drown this yere infant in his cradle?"

He pointed to the elegant young man in the punt, immaculate in creamy flannels and white shoes. I have never seen such shocked surprise on any face. He interrogated the river, questioned the low-lying meadows on either side fringed with willows, through whose green flamed the gold of laburnum, the rose-red of the may. We had come into the land where it is always afternoon tea and banjos, and they did not want us! A pleasant land, very far away from the factory, the workshop, the grind and clatter, the dust and din of our life. Hardly fair, somehow, that the young man in flannels should have it all his own way. Did he grudge us a peep at his river? Hadn't we eyes to see the gold of the laburnum? Couldn't we smell the scent of the nutsie may? And the lark that was singing in the blue of the middle heaven, wasn't he singing to us?

We slowed down as we passed Hampton Court. A dinghy shot swiftly round the bend, sent along by a slip of a girl in a green frock. She gave us a smile as she passed, and we cheered her, which was very wrong indeed; you must not shout up river: it disturbs the people taking tea!

There was a whole heap of boats waiting to go in at the next lock, smart motors, a skiff or two, and a swagger punt. Our launch was a bit unwieldy by the side of the trim-looking craft, and we were painfully conscious that a black serge suit and a billy-cock hat were hardly correct wear. Down river was the place for us, among the barges and the lighters, where the tide runs strong, and the clang of the hammers in the foundries, the throbbing of the engines in the factories, take the place of the banjo and the gramophone, and the smut and the grime of the city shut out the presence of green fields.

Somehow the beauty of the scene before us, the red in the sky, the white and pink and yellow of the flowering trees upflung against a background of soft green, gripped one almost to pain. Almond and wild cherry, lilac and chestnut drenched the air with colour and perfume; and somewhere—everywhere down river—were little children who had never gathered daisies, who would not know the deep note of the thrush. . . .

The skipper, possessing a deep knowledge of tides, announced it was time to turn, and through the soft grey gloaming we raced down stream. Some day we may visit the land of promise again, and rescue our comrades from down river. But the day is not yet. And what shall we do with the youth in cream flannels?

MR. MASEFIELD'S PORTRAIT BY ERNEST RHYS

I.

TEN or eleven years ago—it can hardly be more—a note from Mr. Yeats served to introduce a new acquaintance, whom he said had shared adventures with a brother of the present writer's in America. This new acquaintance was Mr. John Masefield, then unknown to the world that he has excited by "The Everlasting Mercy" and probed in "The Street of To-day." One might have anticipated, from the wandering and seafaring he had done, a burly, weather-beaten, sailor-like person, with a touch in his speech of the sailor's lingo. Instead there appeared what his portrait still may suggest—a stripling-like figure with one of those faces innocent and seemingly transparent that hide more than they tell, and a voice of fine and delicate timbre. Much had happened since he had left America; and the brother with whom he had made friends had—unknown to him—died on a journey along the Hudson River banks; and there were topics in plenty to be talked on—rough experiences and wild seafaring, and hard days in queer seaports where people like Jimmy Hicks and the schooner-man rub against the shore-posts. This is not to be taken as anything more than a freely filled-in draft of that particular, or any other, conversation; for Mr. Masefield has a notable gift of taciturnity, and what he communicates is apt to be brief and to the point, with the colloquial extemporiness (the word is Dr. Johnson's) left out.

II.

The pages that carry the fantasy of those years of travel and apprenticeship are widely scattered, and include many ballads and stories. Among the latter, several ran through the columns of that classic newspaper, the Manchester Guardian, into which so many rare things stray by instinctive attraction. Some of these sketches were afterwards collected in "A Tarpaulin Muster," the volume that appeared in 1907. Others have, I believe, never been reprinted. A sensation of life, keenly lived and experienced, a realism dashed with imagination, was to be felt in the tales of this prentice or diploma work. They told of the souls of men and the souls of places (which are even harder to express) after a mode vivid as Bret Harte's early tales, or the "Noughts and Crosses" of "Q," although with less narrative certainty. And if we look for the personal traits in them, and the marks of those memories and apprehensions, nervous whims and susceptibilities that spring of reality, and betray the man in the book, the man's voice in the page, it is necessary for the sake of the portrait. They tell, or half-tell, what it is goes to make the other picture of the mind that is behind the mask the painter paints. So you may dip into the page describing a white night at sea, with an uncanny mist ("for the most part," says its writer, "my significant memories are of the sea!"), to get at the unusual temperament it betrays.

The imagination of life looked for in the very article of life; the other thing "greater than life expressed in life"—these are the desires of the seer, who is bound to individualise what he sees in order to relate it to his own region and vision. We come to this, then, that Mr. Masefield's portrait is that of a wanderer and a realistic visionary who may have danced below-decks with strange shipmates, but who saw in the ship's lantern all the stars of the sky strung together.

III.

It follows, too, that, having what the late Philip Gilbert Hamerton called "the itch of transcendentalism," he should be continually making experiments, venturing on the impossible; destined never to be quite satisfied perhaps with anything he does. He would surprise the ghosts, if he could, of the human hopes and fears that have been gathered up through centuries in a place, a street, a landscape, and surprise it in prose, too. Necessarily his prose gets lyrical, even too lyrical at times; as when his hero, escaped from the street of to-day, tries to envision the natural world from the hilltop. There he is seized by the exultation of the Mount of Vision. He is a creature obsessed by the spirit of life; he has the sense of being thrust up by the power of the earth into the cup of the sky, attaining a life new and strange, fiery and glorious. Richard Jefferies, in his "Story of My Heart," made the same attempt to reach the supernature that attends on nature. Herman Melville tried it in "Moley Dick." Mr. W. H. Hudson has come very near indeed to its achievement in one of his books of the Purple East. If a little gallery of the actual portraits of these transcendents of the everyday art were got together, I do not know—indeed, it is very doubtful—if there would be any family likeness; but their imaginary portraits might be given a certain subresemblance.

IV.

"Once upon a time," said the sailor, "the devil and Davy Jones came to Cardiff, to the place called Tiger Bay. They put up at Tony Adams's, not far from Pier Head, at the corner of Sunday Lane. And all the time they stayed there they used to be going to the rum-shop, where they sat at a table, smoking their cigars and dicing each other for different persons' souls. Now, you must know that the devil gets landmen, and Davy Jones the sailor folk; and they get tired of always having the same, so then they dice each other for some of another sort."

In the Cardiff story of "Davy Jones's Gift" that thus opens, in which the sailor and the devil play for souls, we have the actual fable, it may be, of Mr. Masefield's art. For in his poems and fictions the stake is always really the same: he is playing for men's and women's souls against the ravening demons that seek to destroy the balance of "Perfect Life" and free intelligence in nature and human nature. And that, again, is why, if you want a satisfying picture of the artist in the man and the man in the artist—a hard thing to get—you must paint this portrait with a tinge of foreign colour in the cheeks.

It will prove of interest to our readers to recall the fact that recently the Royal Society of Literature honoured itself and Mr. Masefield by awarding the distinguished poet the Polignac Prize of £100 for his poem entitled "The Everlasting Mercy." This work, published in the pages of the English Review, and since issued in book form, gives expression in the highest degree to those qualities of temperament and imagination emphasised by Mr. Rhys in the foregoing article. —ED.

W. H. CARRYN

JOHN MASEFIELD, NATUS 1878

THE TRIAL OF THE KNIGHTS TEMPLARS

BY HENRI MAZEL (of the "Mercure de France")

I.

THERE have been few trials in French history more important than that of the Templars; firstly, because of the number and rank of the accused; secondly, because of the gravity of the political consequences following their conviction; and lastly, because of the obscurity of the attendant inquiries and discussions, and the difficulty which historians even to-day find in arriving at an indisputable conclusion as regards the guilt or innocence of the Knights Templars.

It is known that the Templars, like their brothers-in-arms, the Hospitallers, constituted an order of monk-knights, having for its mission the defence of the Holy Land against the Saracens. For nearly two hundred years (to be exact, from 1119, the date of the founding of the Order by Hugues de Payens, until 1291, the date of the capture of Saint Jean d'Acre, the only fortress which in Palestine remained to the Christians) the Templars had shed their blood in floods for the Cross. In fact, at this last fateful hour, the Master of the Templars, William De Beaujeu, with 500 of his Knights, perished on the walls of Saint Jean d'Acre. From this date onward the Order of the Templars (unlike the Order of the Hospitallers, which continued the struggle against the infidels, at the same time establishing themselves at Rhodes) considered its military career as finished, and concentrated its energies solely upon the administration of its wealth, which was enormous.

II.

It is difficult to know how the Order of the Templars came to be the greatest banking house in Christendom. The Knights, at the time of the Trial, appeared little better than unlettered and stupid soldiers, with all the ignorance appertaining to such. The Grand Master, Jacques de Molay, knew neither how to speak, how to act, nor how to direct. Can it be credited that under the governing committee whom the public alone knew worked a mysterious band of financiers, weaving invisible webs, in which the kings and barons of that time found themselves caught? It is probable that this is the explanation of the eagerness with which the most powerful sovereigns of that time, the King of France and the Pope, encompassed the ruin of the Order. It is incontestable that there were as many mysteries connected with the Order of the Templars as with that of the Masons, which body, it is said, became heir to their secrets. It is difficult to fathom the motive for these secret practices. Was it simply the desire of throwing dust in the eyes of the public, or was it a means of indulging with impunity in sacrilegious orgies, as their accusers would have it; or was it merely a process of carrying on shady financial operations? One cannot say. It is, nevertheless, curious that at the time of the trial, when the wealth of the Templars was undoubtedly the true cause of their condemnation, their status as bankers was never called into question.

Without a doubt, it was in order to appropriate the wealth of the Order that the Chancellor, William de Nogaret, attacked them. King Philippe-le-Bel was in great straits for money, and the Order was known to be inordinately rich, being possessed of nearly ten thousand manors in Christendom, and holding in its hands the greater part of the money deposits then in existence. A judicial robbery which Nogaret had essayed against the Jews in 1306 had not been productive of great results, so in the following year it was decided to take proceedings against the Templars. Whether the Jews had any part in this change of front cannot be affirmed, for it was not until later, and indirectly by taking their place, that they profited by the ruin of the banker-knights.

III.

The arrest of the Templars was made with a precision and a rapidity of which there are few examples in history. Even to-day, with all our resources of administration, we could hardly succeed better in bringing off such a colossal coup. Sealed orders had been sent by Nogaret to all the King's officers. These were opened at the same hour, and the authorities immediately arrested all the Templars in their jurisdiction. Nowhere was there any resistance. The Templars themselves were not prepared. It is true they were well aware that in popular opinion they were held in disfavour, and still more so in that of the King of France; but nothing could have made them credit the possibility of such an unexpected catastrophe. Jacques de Molay was quite justified in believing that he had dissipated all prejudice against him in the mind of the Pope, and that he was on good terms with the King. On October 12th, 1307, he was seen in the company of Philippe-le-Bel in Paris at the funeral of a princess of the Court; but the following day he was arrested with 139 of his brethren, being all of the Order that were then in Paris.

They were delivered over to the Inquisition, an Inquisition fully as devoted to the King as that of Spain to its monarch, and which did not hesitate to have recourse to the most terrible tortures in order to drag from its unhappy victims whatever it was desired that they should confess. In order to blacken the Templars in the eyes of the people, as well as in those of the Church, it was thought necessary to convict them of sacrilege, orgies, and unnatural vices. The unfortunate men, conquered by suffering, confessed that the Order had a secret law, that the knights denied Christ, spat on the Cross, and gave themselves up to infamous practices. The tortures had been so atrocious that twenty-five of the accused died after the ordeal of questioning. A few, however, of the more heroic, with difficulty, were able to withstand the tortures. All the others, and among them Jacques de Molay, confessed to whatever their executioners desired, "dixerunt voluntatem torquentium."

IV.

Their fate would have been sealed from this moment if Clement V. had not intervened. The Pope was a deplorably weak man, but the iniquity of the officers of the King of France had been so odious that he could not choose but raise his voice against them. This he did in order to delay proceedings. Nogaret felt that his prey would escape him if he could not silence the Pope, and to that end he set on foot against him a campaign of violent calumny accompanied by unbridled threats. The King of France held over the unhappy Pope the proceedings which had been brought against the memory of Boniface VIII., who had been a personal enemy of the King, and whose memory that monarch desired to dishonour. Clement V., however, sought to save it, feeling that otherwise the Papacy itself would be dishonoured along with it. A compromise was effected; Philippe-le-Bel did homage to the memory of Boniface VIII., and Clement V. abandoned the Templars to their fate.

The trial against the Order itself was relegated to a General Council, which was convoked at Vienne, in Provence; but the trial against the persons of the Templars was given to the hands of the Diocesan Bishops and of the Inquisitors. This was what Nogaret wanted; he was certain of being able to lay hands on his victims whenever he should desire it. To begin with, he allowed a Pontifical commission to be formed at Paris, and before this appeared those Templars already interrogated by the Inquisitor, William, being those brethren who, on the rack, had renounced the vows of the Order.

Brother Ponsard de Gisi afterwards wrote of the matter in these words: "They bound my hands behind my back so tightly that the blood spurted from my finger-nails. Further, I was made to submit to other tortures equally severe. I denied all that I now believe. I said everything they wanted me to." Another brother, Aimery de Villiers-le-Duc, writes in a similar strain: "I could not resist the torture by fire; I confessed to anything. I feel that I should have confessed that I had murdered God had they demanded it."

V.

The King's satellites now began to scent danger to themselves, and at once had recourse to the Episcopal authority, which the Pope had unhappily authorised. The Archbishop of Sens, Metropolitan of the Bishop of Paris, was the brother of one of the principal ministers of the King. He was a man of great authority and versatility. He brought together a provincial council, an inquisitorial tribunal which possessed the right of condemning those accused without appeal, and of having those who had been arrested executed on the day of or the day following their condemnation. In virtue of this atrocious right, fifty-four Templars, who had recanted were condemned as heretics, and on the same day were publicly burnt on a spot between the gate Saint Antoine and the Bois de Vincennes, on May 12th, 1310.

From this moment there were no more recantations. The Council of Vienne, in Provence, assembled, and was closely supervised by the King of France, who was in residence at Lyons. Nine knights presented themselves unexpectedly for the purpose of defending the Order. They were thrown into prison without being given a hearing. As the Council was not sufficiently docile, the King himself removed to Vienne, and it was there that, on the 3rd of April, 1312, the Pope read a Bull, Vox in excelso, the object of which was to satisfy Philippe-le-Bel without seeming to violate the claims of justice. The Pope declared that nothing appeared against the Order which would justify canonical condemnation, but that the Order was odious to the King of France, and that no one had appeared to defend it. Thereupon he decreed its suppression, not by a definite sentence, but by a provisional measure.

VI.

This was the utmost that the King desired, for it allowed him to lay his hands on the goods of the Templars. At once his indebtedness to them (for the Order was a creditor of the King of France for enormous sums) became extinct, from the mere fact of the suppression of the Templars. Afterwards the King repudiated his debts, and these were so heavy that the Hospitallers, to whom the goods of the Templars had been transferred, were more impoverished than enriched by this Greek gift. It was therefore the Royal treasury which, as Nogaret had wished, benefited by this odious act of spoliation.

Those Templars who were still in prison were released, or at least those who confessed themselves guilty. The others were broken by the tortures which the Inquisition was wont to inflict upon heretics and unbelievers. The two highest dignitaries of the Order, Jacques de Molay and Geoffroy de Charney, ought to have been freed from prison after having served seven years, inasmuch as they had confessed to the crimes of which they had been accused. This they had hoped would be the case; but they were sentenced to perpetual detention. Then from the depths of their despair their courage returned. "We are only guilty," they cried, "of having basely betrayed our Order with the object of saving our lives. The Order is pure; it is saintly; the accusations are absurd; the confessions lies." They were at once delivered over to the Provost of Paris, and on the same day beheaded on an island in the Seine, which is now part of the city, and which supports the statue of Henry IV. by the Pont Neuf. Their tardy heroism redeemed somewhat their former weakness and honoured their Order.

VII.

During the six months which followed, Pope Clement V., King Philippe-le-Bel, and his Chancellor, Nogaret, died. Popular opinion regarded their deaths as the just chastisement of their cruel conduct against the Knights Templars, and as a proof of the innocence of these latter.

As regards this last-named point, history has ended by ratifying the verdict pronounced by contemporaneous opinion. Those who have believed in the guilt of the Templars have been carried away by their desire to absolve the King or to excuse the Pope. In fine, the Templars were innocent; and those condemned in 1307 and 1314 should be regarded as victims of the atrocious hate of a Chancellor, of the cupidity of a King, and the weakness of a Pope.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS

COMPETITION No. I.

Prize of £5 for an Essay on THE BEST METHODS OF ORGANIZING READING CIRCLES IN CONNECTION WITH "EVERYMAN."

PRIZE.—M. Taylor, Old Manor House, Presham, North Shields.

HIGHLY COMMENDED.—(1) Rev. A. Hankey, 8, Second Avenue, Hove; (2) Charles H. Rule, 39, Hardman Lane, Failsworth, Manchester; (3) R. H. Boyd, 52, Weltje Road, Hammersmith, London.

COMPETITION No. II.

Prize of £3 for the best Essay on THE ENGLISH BOOKS MOST SUITABLE FOR A SCHOOL CURRICULUM FOR BOYS AND GIRLS OF 14-18.

PRIZE.—A. G. Phillips. (We should be glad if Mr. Phillips would communicate with us.)

HIGHLY COMMENDED.—(1) Miss Marie Lattersall, 40, Bessborough Road, Birkenhead; (2) Miss Emily Collins, 10, Queen's Crescent, York Road, Exeter, Devon; (3) J. Inch Low, High School, Stirling.

COMPETITION No. III.

Prize of £2 for the best Essay on THE FEMALE CHARACTERS OF BERNARD SHAW.

PRIZE.—Arthur Owen Orrett, 55, Botanic Avenue, Dublin.

HIGHLY COMMENDED.—(1) C. G. L. Du Cane, 21, Henshall Road, Chester; (2) John Ritchie, 8, Albany Lane, Dumfries.

H. G. WELLS * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

I.

CRITICISING Mr. Wells is rather like criticising an active volcano—any moment he may burst out on completely new ground. For he has the mind of a tireless experimenter. He is never satisfied with one position for long. And he has all the Socialist's fervour in regard to life—his is a positive attitude. He knows there are things worth getting, and he intends to get them. In all his later books there is an enormous visible struggle after some ideal which he is just unable to express. For, curiously enough, he gives one, in spite of his fluency and mastery of expression, a sense of incoherency. It is never quite clear what his aims really are—perhaps because they are always changing, because he thinks too quickly. At any rate, the result is that, although he is the easiest of writers to read, he is one of the most difficult to keep up with. His rapid, questioning, and restless brain permeates his work below the surface, as it were. His novels are really immense doctrinaire tracts on the problems of existence, stated so dramatically, so fascinatingly, and with what we may call such devilish cleverness that they have had probably more influence on recent opinion than the works of anyone else. For, to the younger generation, Wells is a force, and Shaw isn't. In another few years, no doubt, someone else will be a force, and Wells won't—but that doesn't concern us here.

II.

But Mr. Wells' novels are not merely dissertations on life; they are something much better than that—they are alive in themselves. They are full of electric vitality, of boundless energy. His characters have the advantage of being really interesting. They are seldom creations in the highest sense of the word (perhaps Uncle Ponderevo, of "Tono-Bungay" is his greatest achievement in that line), but they are certainly not dummies and certainly not just repetitions of the author's personality. They live, not because of profound or delicate psychology, but because of the vast energy with which they are imagined. For Mr. Wells pours into them all the cravings of this nervous generation; they are representative of every tendency of our time. One feels that Mr. Wells must be acutely sensitive to surrounding conditions. More than any other writer he gives one the idea of having his finger on the very pulse of the passing moment. And with it all he is intensely critical—not a mere observer at all, not a mere approver. He accepts nothing without putting it to the test of his own judgment. And he is fearless, not simply of conventionality, but (what is much rarer in that type of mind) of unconventionality. He is inherently inquisitive, he likes knowledge—knowledge of people, knowledge of movements, knowledge of sensations, knowledge of facts. And he doesn't want only to watch, he wants to be at the wheel; he wants to taste life, and he wants to guide it.

III.

Broadly speaking, one can divide Mr. Wells' work into three classes—scientific romances and stories, sociological studies, novels. In the first class you have such books as "The War of the Worlds" and the "First Men in the Moon"—distinguished by a singular quality of minute realism. He uses technical terms so skilfully that he makes his narrative precise, clear-cut, and strangely convincing. He is like Poe in his gift of rendering powerfully the emotions of people in physical as apart from spiritual crises. And, above all, he is exciting, absorbingly exciting. He knows how to create in his readers that responsive mood which is the secret of the romancer.

And in his sociological studies, too, he writes with that personal air of conviction which is so telling. His style is almost familiar. He seems to be speaking at one with friendly and reasonable vehemence. There is nothing eccentric about him. He indulges in none of those brilliant flashes which one naturally distrusts. Yet he gives invariably a feeling of extraordinary cleverness and sincerity. He reads like a prophet who has donned a new mantle.

IV.

But, of course, Mr. Wells' really important books are his novels. It is they which have raised his reputation to where it stands; it is by them that he will be placed hereafter. They display all his usual gifts—realism, detail, vitality, and so on; but they are saturated with a kind of malicious spirit of caricature which you aren't aware of in the earlier books. Nowadays Mr. Wells appears always to have his knife into someone or something. One has the impression that he is hard at work paying back old scores. Yet, with it all, his huge zest for life still remains. His latest novel, "Marriage," shows it as strongly as ever; so do the "New Machiavelli," "Tono-Bungay"—all of them, in fact. His novels have the bright hardness of an emotional, imaginative, but not too compassionate nature. His sympathy with the unfortunate is very real, but no more real than is his irritation with the smug.

The best of all his books whatsoever is "Tono-Bungay," for it is the book of his that is the most original, the most breathing, and the only one in which there is an abiding glow of atmosphere. In other words, it is the greatest just because it is the most poetical in its realism. The description of the quap upon the shores of the African wild is very impressive, and the whole underlying plot of the book is romantic. "Tono-Bungay" is truly imaginative, much more imaginative than the "New Machiavelli," for instance, because it is not all conceived in that one tone of startling light. Moreover, it is less polemical than "The New Machiavelli" or "Marriage," and thus the more centralised. Perhaps, after all, its nearest rivals amongst his novels is the ever fresh and delightful "Kipps." In regard to the others, "Love and Mr. Lewisham" and "Mr. Polly" are of the order of "Kipps," but "Anne Veronica" is decidedly tedious.

V.

Mr. Wells' style represents clearly the qualities and limitations of his mind—it is a keen style, and pliable, and most capable, but it is not touched with the finest modulations. It is not, as a rule, either thrilling or poetical, but it is invariably alert, virile, and amazingly in hand. He is an absolute master of his medium.

One must admit that lapses from good taste are not uncommon in Mr. Wells' work. As to that, he would probably answer that good taste was a mid-Victorian fetish. Nevertheless, there is such a thing, and it seems as well not to offend it, considering that it has really nothing to do with Mrs. Grundy but is much more subtle. Somehow one does feel uncomfortable when one notes how Mr. Wells causes undergraduates to speak, or when one hears his heroines crying so often, "Oh, my dear"; then naturally his very prevalent tone of stinging satire leaves its mark—not altogether a pleasant mark.

Still, these are trifles which must count for very little in the burning energy of his work.

LITERARY NOTES

BIOGRAPHY is dear to the heart of every bookman, and I make this my excuse for referring again to Sir Sidney Lee, who, if not the most eminent, is certainly the most experienced of living biographers. In the current number of the Nineteenth Century and After, Sir Sidney records some of his editorial impressions in connection with the newly published volumes of the "Dictionary of National Biography." Incidentally, the article sheds a strong light upon the principles which ought to govern all biographic effort. These the author has already expounded in his Leslie Stephen Lecture, but they receive reinforcement in the light of his latest experiences.

It will, I daresay, interest many readers of EVERYMAN to learn that Sir Sidney Lee has become a convert to early biography. That there are very decided advantages in writing a biography soon after the death of the subject few will be disposed to deny, for, as Sir Sidney Lee observes, if the task is postponed to a period when direct testimony is no longer available, much of biographical value is likely to be missed. On the other hand, early biography has this very important disadvantage, that it is extremely difficult for the biographer to see his subject in its true proportions. I am aware that there are instances of early biography in which the proper perspective has been obtained, but, as a rule, I should say the chances of success are immeasurably increased if the writing of the biography of a man of conspicuous eminence is delayed for at least five years.

Towards the close of his article, Sir Sidney Lee pays a tribute to the "ardour and magnanimity" of his contributors, despite the fact that he was compelled, in many cases, to handle their MSS. pretty freely. A striking instance of this came under my own notice. A contributor whom I knew possessed a decided talent for circumlocution found (on his MS. being returned with the proof) his article so transformed that his claims to be the author were certainly dubious. The MS. was literally one mass of deletions and corrections. But, though somewhat taken aback, the hapless contributor uttered no complaint. Indeed, such was his confidence in the ability and judgment of his editor that he tried to profit by this lesson in subsequent contributions to the Dictionary, and, I believe, largely succeeded.

In the December issue of Blackwood's Magazine there is a discriminating tribute to the late editor, Mr. William Blackwood, which, I should not be surprised to learn, is from the pen of Mr. D. S. Meldrum. There are two kinds of editors. In the first class I should place the late Mr. W. T. Stead, the impress of whose strong personality was to be found on almost every page of his magazine. The other class of editors are those who possibly never write a line for their journals, but whose influence, nevertheless, is equally powerful by reason of the unerring skill with which they judge literary wares and gauge the needs of their readers.

Mr. Blackwood belonged to the latter category. He was not a writer himself, nor a man of outstanding intellectual ability; but he knew a good article when he saw it. To my mind one of the most gratifying features of his long editorial reign is the encouragement he gave to young writers. He tried, as has been well said, to make reputations, and not to buy them ready made. The tendency nowadays is to worship "names," not literary merit. It is forgotten that some eminent writers have a habit of living on their past reputation, and frequently exhibit their names to articles which are unworthy of them. It is to Mr. Blackwood's credit that he encouraged by liberal remuneration literary merit wherever he found it.

The departure of Sir Hugh Clifford for the Gold Coast, where he will shortly assume the duties of Governor, recalls the interesting fact that he is not only a distinguished Colonial Civil Servant, but a man of considerable literary capacity. For many years he was resident in the Malay States, and wrote two books on that region which are now recognised as standard works. "In Court and Kampong," published some fifteen years ago, gives many fascinating pictures of native life. This was followed in 1905 by "Further India," in which Sir Hugh graphically, as well as authoritatively, relates the story of exploration in Burma, Malaya, Siam, and Indo-China. The new Governor of the Gold Coast is also joint compiler of a dictionary of the Malay tongue. Lady Clifford was formerly Mrs. Henry de la Pasture, under which name, I need hardly add, she has published many popular novels and plays.

In the obituary notice of Father John Gerard, in the Times, mention is made of his book on the Gunpowder Plot; but, by a curious omission, no reference is made to the fact that it attracted the notice of the late Mr. S. R. Gardiner, who subjected it to the withering fire of his criticism. Those who would find the great historian at his best should read the reply to Father Gerard in his book, "What Gunpowder Plot Was." In later times Father Gerard, in his "The Old Riddle and the Newest Answer," crossed swords with Haeckel. This book also created some stir, and quickly ran through several editions.

The Bodleian Library, Oxford, which, like the British Museum and other three libraries, is entitled to a copy of every book published in this country, is being extended in order to cope with the formidable influx. During the debates on the new Copyright Act, it was urged that extension would be unnecessary if the authorities restricted their demands to books suitable for the library. I am glad, however, that the Bodleian persists in making what Lord Haldane called "a sort of omnibus demand for every book," for it is difficult to over-estimate the advantage of having libraries in various parts of the country to which the reader may resort with every confidence that he will see the book he wants.

I am glad to note that preparations are about to be made for the fitting celebration of the 300th anniversary of the publication of the work in which John Napier of Merchiston first described his famous invention of logarithms. Napier was not exactly a man to stir the popular imagination, but in simplifying and shortening the processes of multiplication and division, he made us all his debtors. Hume somewhere in his "History" refers to Napier as the person to whom the title of a great man is more justly due than to any other whom Scotland ever produced. Hume did not live to know Burns and Scott, and his judgment will not be upheld; but unquestionably Napier was a man considerably in advance of his age. He not only invented and wrote books on logarithms; he devised warlike machines for defence.

X. Y. Z.

THE STREET THAT NEVER SLEEPS

ALL day long it resounds with the roar of traffic, and at night, when the whole world around is hushed, its presses throb with fierce intensity. In the dark, deserted streets of the City itself (where the very houses seem not merely to sleep, but to be dead) silence reigns supreme, but, west of Ludgate Circus, you come on a scene of feverish bustle and excitement. All is light and movement. Dozens of men are rushing with white bales of papers to waiting carts, whose drivers are vociferously eager to be off. Motors are speeding away at a reckless pace. There is a babel of strange sounds—curious orders shouted in stentorian voices, mingled with entreaties to "hurry up." What is happening? The "dailies" are catching their trains, and, though nearly two o'clock in the morning, it is the hour of all others for Fleet Street, for, note well if these are missed, then the work of the day goes for nothing. Every nerve, therefore, is strained to avert that calamity; from the chief "Sub" to the "Printer's Devil," everybody works as one man.

* * *

In the old days, indeed—so the story runs—at least one proprietor used himself, on occasions, to join in the arduous of the rush, until a new hand from the North, who knew not Pharaoh, one night told the great man to "Get out o' the way." A fat, excitable little person, he used to drop more copies than he ever carried to the carts, what time he proclaimed aloud his impending ruin to the perplexed crowd, who assembled at the strange spectacle of a gentleman in evening dress clasping a four-quire bundle to his shirt front. But his was the spirit that wins through even in Fleet Street, where many a great circulation has been built up with little capital, but confidence and hard work. That clean-shaven, hard-faced man, for instance, elbowing his way through the crowd with the swing of a boy, and reputed to be worth thousands, was, not long ago, a struggling journalist, hard put to it to live. He conceived a bright idea for a paper—and it made his fortune. His friend, who waves to him from a motor, came penniless to Fleet Street from Australia but a year or so ago, and is to-day a rich man, reputed to know more about the science of advertising than any ten others.

* * *

Fleet Street has been kind to these. But there are others who pass one by in the jostling, eager crowd, men of worn mien and anxious air, some of them brilliant scholars, some of them writers whose books are known throughout Europe, some of them men who seemed once to have the world of letters at their feet. But they have missed their chance. The reading public has forgotten their achievements, and the years find them still struggling on, although hope has left them—the tragedies of the street, "whose ways," poor Robert Buchanan said bitterly, "were paved with broken hearts!"

* * *

Every failure is not a tragedy, however. Some of the unsuccessful take life with a light touch, instinct with that spirit of adventure that finds exhilaration in the glorious uncertainty that depresses other more careful souls. And then the chances of existence fluctuate so swiftly in Fleet Street. To-day a man is penniless, living on hope—in the confident assurance that the book which he is writing will one day ring the bell, that the articles he so patiently submits to office after office will eventually see the light of day in print and materialise into a pink beneficent cheque. To-morrow the unexpected has happened; a new paper has been started, which strikes the angle of his particular point of view. His "copy," that a little while ago was mere waste paper, becomes an asset, and his articles are in demand. Many are the devices that editors, more kindly or less determined than their fellows, employ to keep the outside contributor at bay. The presiding genius of a big weekly, unable to find it in his heart to turn down the many applicants that offered him their articles, hit on a plan for cutting short the interview. He would place a sheet of manuscript, freshly written, on the chair beside his desk on the approach of a pressman, and thus ensure a speedy issue to the conversation. There was no other chair available, and the eloquence of the greatest hustler in the street inevitably filtered into a thin stream under the prolonged ordeal of standing. For the most part, if you don't sound your own trumpet in the newspaper world, nobody will do it for you. That is perhaps partly the reason for the failure of real talent. Ineffective genius is one of the saddest things in all the world.

* * *

But the street that never sleeps is too concerned with the world's business to think overmuch of its own failures, and, besides, it is served by all softs and conditions of men, and has learnt to take the rough with the smooth. Too many figures crowd upon its consciousness for it to give them more than passing thought, figures that seem to baffle classification and to defy analysis. There is, for instance, that strange irregular of the press, "the liner," the man who to-day reports a fire at Dalston, and who to-morrow chronicles a burglary in Regent Street, who writes up a murder or a wedding with equal gusto, and who seems incapable either of reticence or fatigue. He has no regular engagement, no settled work. But his sources of information, like Sam Weller's, are extensive and peculiar, and seem to cover half London. His ingenuity and resource are endless. Sometimes he gets the first news of a great "scoop" that startles all the world. Sometimes he is idle for days on end. He is bright, alert, indomitable; not always, alas! is he reliable. He is the last of the old Bohemian figures that used to crowd the street, which are now, slowly but surely, giving way before the impact of a younger generation.

* * *

Of all the representatives of that generation, none, I venture to say, have had so truly a revolutionary effect as the lady journalist. At her coming, as the Napoleon of the press has told us; the old Bohemianism vanished, and the street became more businesslike, more efficient, less slovenly, and more human. The new spirit found expression in several directions. The dingy old offices, hidden away in corners of quaint courts—picturesque, if insanitary—gave way to spacious buildings, beautifully furnished, admirably equipped. Woman proved herself again the great civilising agent, and Fleet Street became respectable.

* * *

It is only when the ladies have gone home, when late at night the news is crowding in, and the tape is busiest, that we lapse back to the old condition of affairs. For then we have no time to think of the amenities, we forget ourselves in the pressure of the work in hand. Perhaps, after all, that is when we are at our best, and fulfilling our truest function. For surely the greatness and the tragedy of Fleet Street consists in this: that it is ready to tell anybody's story—except its own.

M. H.

NOSTALGIA * * *

BY PETER ALTENBERG

It was a gigantic yellow house, and it stood amidst meadows and orchards.

It was a school for girls, especially for "Englischen Fräulein." Pious, gentle nuns taught in it, and there was a great deal of home-sickness within its walls.

Fathers came sometimes to visit their little daughters and take them out. "Papa, God greet thee," said the little Austrian daughters, and in the simple music of the greeting lay the hymn of their whole small hearts. In "Adieu, papa," it died away like harp-arpeggios.

I sat alone one rainy November Sunday afternoon in the warm, snug café of the little country town, smoking and dreaming.

A tall, handsome man came in with a wonderful little girl. She was exactly like an angel without wings, in a green velvet coat.

The gentleman took a place at my table. "Bring illustrated papers for the child," he said to the waiter.

"Thank you, papa, but I don't want them," said the angel without wings.

Silence. Then the father asked:

"What's the matter with you?"

"Nothing," answered the child.

"How far on are you in mathematics?" he asked again, feeling that this was a safe general topic.

"At fractions," said the angel. "What are they? What's the use of them? I haven't the least idea. Why must one learn arithmetic? I can't understand why."

"Long hair, short understanding," said her father smiling, and playfully stroked the fair, silky locks that shone like gold.

"Well. Why must one . . ."

Silence again. I don't think I ever saw such a pathetic little face. It trembled like a flower in a snowstorm. It reminded you of Eleonora Duse saying "Oh!" or of Gemma Bellincioni singing it.

The father thought to himself, "A little mental arithmetic will be a distraction. Anyhow, it can do her no harm. . . . Her interest needs rousing. . . ." So he said aloud: "Arithmetic is fine. It used to be my forte at school." (A gleam of long past arithmetical triumphs flitted over his face.) "Now look here. . . . Suppose . . . for example, that someone buys a house. Are you listening?"

"Yes. Someone buys a house."

"Say, for example, the house you were born in at Görz. (He thought that it would make the lesson more exciting to bring knowledge into relationship with family affairs.) Say it cost 20,000 gulden. How much ground-rent would it have to bring in to make it worth 5 per cent.?"

The angel said: "No one can possibly know that. . . . Papa, does Uncle Victor come often now to see us?"

"No. He comes very seldom. When he does come he sits in your empty schoolroom. Now attend to me. How much is 5 per cent. interest on 20,000 florins? As many five florins, of course, as there are hundreds in 20,000. That is simple enough, isn't it?"

"Oh, yes," the child said, without seeing it in the least. She wondered—why Uncle Victor came so seldom.

The father continued: "How much must it bring in in rents?—1,000 florins. It's quite simple."

"Yes, 1,000. Papa, does the big white lamp in the dining-room still smoke when it is lit?"

"I believe so. Now you have some idea of 'interest,' haven't you?"

"I suppose so. But, papa, how can money yield interest? It is not like a pear-tree. It is just dead money."

"Little duffer!" said her father, and thought, "It's her teachers' business, after all."

Another silence, broken by a whisper, "Papa, I want to go home with you . . . please. . . ."

"No, you are too sensible a little girl."

Two tears came swimming slowly down her cheeks, shimmering pearls of home-sickness. Then she said with a smile:

"There are three little sisters at school, papa. The eldest may eat three buns for tea, the next eldest two, and the youngest only one. I wonder if next term they will be raised?"

Her father laughed. "There, you see, you ought to be happy at school. You have plenty of fun."

"Fun! Things may be funny and make us laugh without making us happy."

"You little philosopher," he said, looking at her proudly, and he read in the dewy, shining eyes of his little daughter that philosophy and life were one and the same thing.

She became rosy and pale, pale and rosy by turns. A kind of combat went on in the sweet, small face. "Adieu, papa; oh! papa, adieu," was written on it.

I should have liked to say to the father, "That little Madonna-like face, sir, has a breaking heart underneath." He would have answered, "My dear sir, it can't be helped. C'est la vie. Everyone, you know, cannot sit in a café smoking and dreaming all day."

"Where are you in history?" the father asked, thinking to distract her again.

"We are doing Egypt," answered the little girl.

"Egypt? That's capital!" he said, as if there was no other country in the world to compare with Egypt. "The Pyramids," he said. "Mummies, King Cheops. Then the Babylonians and Assyrians, eh? . . ." The more he could trot out the better, he thought.

"Yes, all those," said the child, as much as to say, "What do I care about dead races?"

"When do you have dancing?" asked her father cheerfully. Dancing was a lively theme.

"To-day."

"At what time?"

"When you are gone, papa. Dancing is from seven to eight."

"Ah! Capital! Dancing is good for you. Be industrious. Take pains with your dancing."

The pair rose to go, and I came forward and said: "Excuse me, sir; excuse me. I have a very great favour to ask of you."

"Indeed. What may it be?"

"I entreat you, sir, to let your little daughter off her dancing lesson to-day."

He stared at me. Then he pressed my hand.

"Granted," he said.

The angel looked up at me with her shining eyes.

"How is it you understand me so perfectly, strange man?" the eyes said.

"Run along," he said to the child. Then he turned to me again. "I beg your pardon," he said, "but is it the right principle?"

"Yes, certainly," I replied. "In affairs that affect the soul the only right principle is to have no principle."—Translated by Beatrice Marshall.

THE "WESTWARD HO!" AND "REFUGEES" CONTROVERSY

As the Editor has asked me to undertake the honourable, if rather dangerous, task of summing up this debate, it would be pusillanimous to refuse; but, as in nearly all critical cases, there are hardly any positive statutes to appeal to, and the common or case-made law of the subject is of a very vague and floating description.

Perhaps to say that Father Benson has answered himself is not only the shortest but the best "rede," and I have no doubt that both Mr. Candlish and Mr. Huffington saw this in their different ways and with regard to their different subjects. "One of the best historical novels in the world" means "one of the best prose epics in the world," and when you view it in that light, the question of truth simply falls. The maker has made, by his accuser's confession—and made consummately—that which he set out to make; and nobody has any business to complain that he did not make something else. On the other hand, as I understand it, without taking any side on this part of the question, it is scarcely alleged that "The Refugees" is one of the best historical novels in the world; and, that being so, it is deprived of its privilege, and is open to indictment on fresh counts. But of it I should prefer to say no more, for I have a great objection to speaking of the work of living writers unless I am actually reviewing it.

On the "Westward Ho!" side, however, there is more to be said, and something not difficult to say. It is quite unnecessary to review the details of Monsignor Benson's charge. Having a tolerably familiar acquaintance, not merely with the literature, but with the history of the sixteenth century, I should certainly say that in cruelty, treachery, injustice, and general confidence their own end justified any means, the Reformers were no whit behind their opponents; in fact, considering their smaller numbers and lesser opportunities, they probably deserved the palm—or whatever vegetable is the symbol of demerit. Nor, though I am a very patriotic person, can I vindicate for the English so extreme a superiority in those respects over the Spaniards—though perhaps we deserve a less scarlet colouring than they do. The point is, "does the frank partisanship of Kingsley's attitude injure the artistic effect of his book?" Monsignor Benson seems, accuser as he is, to admit that it does not. Now, curiously enough, I should say (speaking quite impartially) that it conceivably might do so. For my own part, having read "Westward Ho!" I should say about once a year—at least once a year or two—since it was first given me in 1859, I can also say that, from the very first, I never thought of taking my views of history from it. But there is undoubtedly a kind of propaganda—certainly a kind of purpose—in the book, and in so far it is open to the reproach of being bad art. If a man cannot disengage himself from that purpose, cannot even utilise it as a stimulus and vivifying agent, and neglect it as anything else, then, to him, it is bad art; but whether this is his fault or Kingsley's is another question. I should say it is his.

For myself, I disagree in toto with Shelley's religious and poetical views; but I never found these views—or his eagerness in attempting to make proselytes to them—interfere in the very slightest degree with my enjoyment of him as a poet. Though I disagree far less, I still do not agree, with Kingsley's political and (if not with his religious) with his ecclesiastical views:

I know him to be a master of inaccurate though honest statement, and an almost equal master of, again honest, paralogism and fallacy. But these things are, in the first place, flagrantly—almost childishly—open, and, in the second, they are ultimately whelmed in; they even, by the passion and conviction with which the writer produces them, add to the volume and vigour of his creative presentment. It is, of course, not wrong—it is, on the contrary, quite right to point them out; but in the circumstances they can neither be sentenced nor even condemned—only left to be called up for judgment on the Greek Kalends.

There are some minutiae into which I have neither space nor desire to enter, such as the case in which proselytism in a work of art is malicious and insidious, not open and naïf. This would, of itself, be inconsistent with good art, and, therefore, could never be excused by it. But in the case before us the thing seems to me to be simple enough. The beatification of art has been achieved, the work has entered into the heaven thereof, and so its faults are purged—nay, they have even ceased to be faults at all.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE CASE FOR THE EUGENIST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Your contributor, Mr. Hector Macpherson, seems rather to have deserted his thesis in his article entitled "The Case Against the Eugenist," which, while it is very interesting, does not appear to state the case either for or against the Eugenist, but merely a set of co-existent problems.

One sentence at least is woefully ambiguous—"the new science of Eugenics would stop Nature's waste by the propagation of the fit." That sentence may mean two things, one of which is quite absurd, and so can be disregarded, as I am sure that Mr. Macpherson had no desire to imply that "Nature's waste" is "by propagation of the fit"; the other is right, so far as it goes, but it shows that your contributor has missed the whole point of the science of Eugenics, which seeks to "stop Nature's waste" by preventing the propagation of the unfit—quite a different thing.

Mr. Macpherson, for the purposes of his "argument," has fallen into the usual error of endeavouring to dissociate heredity from environment, although his remarks about "social heredity" appear to show that at the back of his mind he is convinced of their inseparableness.

The action of heredity apart from environment is most felt in matters relating to temperament and mental defectiveness, and it is against this, particularly in the case of epileptics, that the Eugenists' campaign is principally directed.

I am sure that the bulk of Eugenists will agree with the abolition of slums and the improvement of environment generally, but the improvement must come from both ends; to use a homely simile, in order to minimise the amount of ash from your sitting-room fire, you do not only improve your grate, but also you seek for a better, cleaner burning coal.

Legislation at present militates against the raising of the physical and moral standard by encouraging the reckless and improvident, as well as the unfit (biologically), to propagate thoughtlessly, and laying such heavy burdens on the middle-class man that he is forced into a soul-cramping, nature-souring repression, or an even more wasteful veiled licentiousness, in order to live; here we have, I think, the real problem, where the Eugenist, the Hygienist and the Religionist meet on common ground.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHAS. S. ADCOCK.

Birmingham, December 6th, 1912.

CONSTANTINOPLE FOR CHRISTENDOM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Does the Rev. Percy Dearmer seriously suggest that King Ferdinand of Bulgaria and King Peter of Servia were only actuated by Christian motives in declaring war upon the Turks?

If Europe shuddered when this took place, it absolutely rocked with horror and indignation when King Peter so far forgot his Christian obligations as to connive at the murder of his predecessor.

In the light of present events, it is probably bad taste for me to mention this, but one is compelled to consider it a freak of fancy that the Balkan Nero should be judged a Christian hero.

I should like proofs also of King Ferdinand ever showing the slightest feeling of sympathy for the miserable Macedonians.

He saw Macedonia not as a country misruled, misgoverned, and under the heel of religious fanatics, but as a country rich in potential possibilities, the attaining of which would prove the crowning point of a life's ambition.

The reverend gentleman's article, in my opinion, breathes the same spirit that has made Mohammedanism the sinister force it is to-day—a religion inculcating a fervour that brooks no obstacles, sees no danger, for the extension of which the Turks, as a disunited nation, are willing to fight as one man, and fight and suffer for months under conditions that would not be tolerated by any other army in the world.

We, as Christians, must remember (we so often forget) that the milk of human kindness is not an ingredient of Mohammedanism. Brotherly love is considered by the Turks an unnatural weakness.

Their religion is essentially a religion of the sword. When they slay innocent unbelievers, they are performing a religious duty, and if only Christians were half as determined to carry out their religious duties as the Turks are to perform theirs it would be a splendid thing for Christianity.

Christian slackness has caused quite as much misery in this world as Mahomet's tenets of intolerance. We know perfectly well that wherever the Turk has conquered, he has brought ruin, tears, and devastation. But he cannot help it! He is as much amazed at Europe considering him incompetent as we Europeans are at his incompetence. It is Europe's fault the Balkans are throbbing with war to-day—a war that Europeans are fondly hoping will soon be over. The signing of Peace treaties, or any safeguard with the Turks, means absolutely nothing, so far as the principle of adhering to them is concerned. She really would appreciate a breather.

The Ottoman problem will yet become the most serious that European diplomatists have had to face.

The sword of Mahomet is never sheathed, and Europe must wake up to the fact that the surest guarantee of her peace and progress is the absolute suppression of Turkey as a controlling or governing nation.—I am, sir, etc.,

F. W. M.

Nottingham, December 6th, 1912.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In expressing my thanks for EVERYMAN, which I hold to be the best penny literary paper, and one which allows universal freedom of expression, I beg your indulgence for a few remarks on your article, "Constantinople for Christendom," in which the Rev. Percy Dearmer proposes, in the name of sentiment and Christianity, to take Constantinople from Mohammedanism and give it to Christendom. This proposal is certainly not new; all the papers are full of it. But I am astonished to see a rev. gentleman, who is supposed to represent Christianity, coming forward with such a proposition on behalf of his religion. A religion in the abstract is neither good nor bad; all depends on the interpretation.

I agree that the Turks are not without fault, but it would have been well for the rev. gentleman to have followed his advice to the politicians and read his history books. He would have found that "cruelty, intolerance, obscurantism, and fatalism" have stained Christianity a darker hue than Mohammedanism. The kingdom of heaven ruled amongst the Christians when they were few in number and the State was in the hands of their opponents; but since their accession to power that ruling spirit has been dethroned. I agree that the European world is more civilised, more cultured, but not more humane than the Turkish. Sometimes, indeed, the bestial side is more conspicuous with the former, because of that culture. And Japan has the European culture without her religion. But let Mr. Dearmer turn his eyes to Russia, "from Kieff to Vladivostock," and let him see how the Poles, the Finns, the Jews are treated in the name of "sentiment and Christianity." But why go so far? Let him turn to the war itself and see the achievements of the Greeks in Salonica. One instance only—I quote now from the Times: "It is regrettable that one cannot so highly compliment the Greeks upon their occupation as upon their conquest of Salonica. . . . While the Turkish flag still floated over the Konak, the inhabitants of Salonica, Christian and Mussulman, enjoyed perfect security. . . . Now, unfortunately, all this has changed, so changed that a complete record of all the cases of wounding, pillage, and looting of the last few days would fill pages of the Times." This must certainly have been dictated by "sentiment and Christianity." I fear that some of the mistakes committed by the Young Turks were a result of their training in Christian Europe.

It would have been better for the writer, instead of humanising Turkey by depriving her of Constantinople, to have loved Turkey a little less and to have preached Christianity to the Christians. He who does wrong wittingly is more guilty than he who does wrong unwittingly; and the rev. gentleman says that the Turks regard the massacre of Christians "as a natural and meritorious act." Humanity, the glory of Christianity, is a dead letter in Europe: occasionally it is used to mask the misdeeds of Christians. Christ said of the Pharisees, "Whatever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works, for they say and do not." Would He arise now, He would not wait for another to crucify Him: He would crucify Himself, seeing His teachings so crucified by His vicars. To take by the sword the home of others is neither sentiment nor Christianity, for though the owners won it by the sword, they have possessed it for four and a half centuries. Many great modern States hold by the same right territories which were not theirs a shorter time ago. The contention that the Turks prove good servants but bad masters has no basis; you can only be a good master when there is no outside power constantly provoking you. Let the rev. gentleman read the reports of impartial papers; he will see who the aggressors were. Many Mohammedan women have been outraged and Mohammedan mosques desecrated by Christians, no doubt in the name of "sentiment and Christianity." I wonder what a Christian State would say if a party of Mohammedans desecrated Christian churches and outraged Christian women in their own State. Not long ago Russia, fearing that the Jew would have a little shelter in England, set up the agitation over "Peter the Painter," who is now almost forgotten. Such mischievous interference, on a larger scale, was constantly being perpetrated in Turkey by some interested parties, giving the Turk no opportunity even to set his house in order, as, indeed, was his earnest intention. The proof of this earnestness lies in the fact that he was unprepared for war. Five years for such a task was an impossibly short period. King Ferdinand proclaimed this war as one between the "Cross and Crescent"; but, then, he is a king. Possibly Russia influenced him in this sentiment. But these words will become a reverend gentleman. True religion, let it be Christianity, Mohammedanism, Judaism, does not come with a sword: it preaches, convinces, and nothing more. Leaders who preach the sword are not leaders, but misleaders.—I am, sir, etc.,

Manchester.

I. WASSILEVSKY.

THE SERVILE STATE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Hilaire Belloc, in his article entitled "The Servile State," makes two statements which cannot be allowed to go unchallenged, for upon them, in the present writer's opinion, rest the logical argument of his theory. Mr. Belloc says firstly:—

"We live in a state of society in which the means of production (that is, capital and land) belong to a fraction of the free citizens composing that society."

I submit that this statement is in substance entirely incorrect. Capital by itself is no longer Capital from a marketable view; it is valueless. Land by itself produces as much as—the Sahara. They become productive factors when considered as correlatives, and only as correlatives, of labour. And this brings me to Mr. Belloc's second remarkable sentence.

"The great majority possess no land, nor the instruments whereby things necessary to their livelihood can be produced. . . ."

I agree with him that the majority possess no land—there is not sufficient of it to go round—but they certainly do possess the instruments necessary to produce their daily needs—labour. In this respect the majority have the advantage of the wealthy minority. For the prehistoric man was able to make himself an axe by tying a flint stone to a branch of a tree, and, so armed, seek out and kill some animal for food. Capital deprived of Labour is ineffective, but Labour without Capital can at least subsist.

The means of production, I contend, are in the hands of the majority. They control the food store, because it remains with them to fill the food store or not, and, not only this, they can and do decide what compensation they shall receive for their labour.

In any society there will always be a class of non-producers, the physically unfit, moral degenerates, etc., and there is admittedly present a certain degree of insecurity and insufficiency. There is also much underpaid labour. But this social disease is not so much the result of Capitalistic tyranny as a condition in which the, as yet, untried power of Labour finds itself, a condition which, as she continues to find her own power, she will rectify. In the industrial struggles of the past two years Labour became cognisant of her own inherent power, and she measured swords with her enemy. The partial failure of the Labour agitation of 1911-12 was not a victory for Capital as an economic force, but was the result of treachery by the leaders of the democratic party. It proved the impossibility of Socialism, inasmuch as this, a democrat, as soon as he becomes an official, is no longer a democrat. He is an autocrat.

The means of production being in the hands of the majority, the majority will see that such a condition of affairs as that indicated by Mr. Belloc be made impossible. The masses wield the same power to-day as they did when they repealed the corn laws; they exercised the same power to confiscate the rule of the Upper House. And by that same power which put an Insurance Act on the Statute Book, so will the majority, if necessary, erase it. That power is not the insignia of a "Servile State."—I am, sir, etc.,

LEWIS ESSEX.

THE "EDWIN DROOD" CONTROVERSY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Weaver, appears to be taking too much for granted when he claims that Mr. Geddie holds (with him) "that 'Edwin Drood' is the work of a man whose invention was gone, whose brain was spent, but who still cherished one ambition: to leave personalty running into six figures, instead of the five he did leave." I fail to discover where Mr. Geddie gives occasion for such an interpretation (or perversion) of his meaning. He distinctly states "that 'Edwin Drood' is not a poor story." My admiration of Dickens does not prevent me from perceiving that he was over-anxious, in his closing days, to accumulate a large sum of money; but Mr. Weaver seems singularly blind to the flashes of the old genius in "Edwin Drood." Admittedly, it cannot be compared to "David Copperfield" or "Great Expectations." One might as well expect the heat of the sun to be as powerful at sunset as at noon-day. It is not a fair comparison. Nobody thinks "Count Robert of Paris" comparable to "Waverley" or "Guy Mannering"; but nobody will deny that the wizard's touch is visible there. So with "Edwin Drood." Dickens' powers had declined, but his genius did not desert him till that noble heart was stilled. His last unfinished book is thoroughly characteristic, abounding in touches of true Dickensian humour. Consider the amazing fertility of genius necessary to produce the number of characters which stalk through the pages of Dickens. Possibly Mr. Weaver's invention would fail him if he had created one-tenth of the number. If "Edwin Drood" is Dickens' sunset, let us say that it is a brilliant sunset, and sheds its expiring beams over a course gloriously run. I agree with Mr. Geddie that the evidence pointing to the death of Edwin is conclusive; so strong, in fact, is this position, that no argument is necessary for its support. He has no further part nor lot in the novel. Dickens was too great an artist to leave no place in a book for one for whom resurrection was intended. Edwin was murdered by Jasper, or the whole story is unintelligible.

The most baffling question, and the one to which Mr. Geddie devotes no attention, is, "Who is Datchery?" Sir William Robertson Nicoll argues strongly in favour of Helena Landless. This seems to me improbable. I am one of those who think the internal evidence in favour of Bazzard. What says Mr. Geddie?—I am, sir, etc.,

S. WHORTON.

Norton Canes, near Cannock, Staffs.

THIRTY-TWO years' experience in the specialized training of Boys and Girls for Civil Service Exams. and Business Appointments has enabled me to eliminate from the various courses of training everything that is not absolutely essential to the progress and ultimate success of the student.

Well over 65,000 students successfully trained and placed out in the world is a record of which I am justly proud. Over 600 First Places in Civil Service Exams. have been secured by my students, and the demand, in the Business World, for Boys and Young Ladies trained at my College is so great that I am enabled to guarantee a Salaried Position to every student taking a course of Business Training, upon proficiency. Write for illustrated Civil Service Prospectus No. 79, or Business Training Prospectus No. 79a. Either or both gladly sent post free.

WHEN YOUR BOYS & GIRLS leave School,
SEND THEM

to

CLARK'S COLLEGE

LTD.

The Civil Service and Business University of London to be trained for CIVIL SERVICE ● ● EXAMINATIONS ● ● or

● ● BUSINESS
● ● APPOINTMENTS

DAY & EVENING Classes
Also POSTAL TUITION direct to the HOME.

CLARK'S COLLEGE,
1, 2 & 3, Chancery Lane, London.
Branches in all important London Suburbs and at Cardiff, Leeds and Swansea.

NEW TERM
MONDAY, 6 JAN., 1913
and TEN following days.

THE IONA BOOKS*

THESE books, unpretentious in themselves, are the outcome of a movement which, though not yet fully realised, may have immeasurable results. In its immediate aspect it is national: in its wider meaning it affects Christendom. It is finding expression in many and varied ways, and its origin is deep rooted in the past. As Miss Small puts it in her introduction to the first of the series, "Scotland is, in characteristically deliberate fashion, awakening to the fact that her history, at all events her religious history, is not yet closed: she has a duty within herself which she owes to herself and to her 'Chief End,' which, when fulfilled, may send her forth upon a mission beyond herself far greater than she has ever dreamt." The underlying spirit is manifesting itself, not only in the growing recognition of the necessity for Christian unity in a land too long distracted by sectarian strife, but in weariness of that strife and a sense of its sinfulness. With a deepening and quickening of spiritual life there is dawning upon the people the fact that in essentials they are at one; and the efforts that are being made to draw together the two great Presbyterian bodies are the first result of that growing consciousness. The ultimate goal, though it may not yet be appreciated except by the dreamers, is the reunion of Christendom.

A great statesman has said that the youth of the nation are the trustees of posterity. It is to the younger people of Scotland that the primary appeal of the Iona Books is made: to those in the homeland and to the rapidly increasing number in the nations beyond the seas to whom Scotland is dear. They seek to supply two aids towards the achievement of her high destiny. "The first is the sympathetic study of Scottish religious history": there is little in Scottish history which is not associated with her religion. "The second is the use of prayer." Wherefore this is a series at once devotional and patriotic. The name they bear is happily chosen; for piety and patriotism cling about the sacred isle like music round a shell. Or, in the words of Fiona Macleod, "Here Learning and Faith had their tranquil home. . . . And here Hope waits." It is with prayer and the use of prayer that the earlier books deal. The first is an indication of the forgotten treasures in devotional literature that await recovery. It is a series of "Ancient Scottish Prayers," or rather collects, originally printed at Edinburgh in 1595, and, then, intended for those "quha glaidlie wald carie ane thin buik." The quaint language of those beautiful petitions, so far from being a hindrance, is an added attraction, for its cadences linger in the memory as echoes from the Scotland of long ago. The next, entitled "An Act of Prayer," has been prepared by Miss Small. Its purpose is explained in the introductory note contributed by Professor Cairns, of Aberdeen. The keynote of it is this: "True union must begin in common worship." Mr. J. H. Oldham deals in the third booklet with "The Possibilities of Prayer," and to his most convincing and devout paper are appended "Some Thoughts About Prayer," selected from various writers. "A Scottish Anthology" combines in itself both the patriotic and the devotional. The authors quoted range from S. Columba to R. L. Stevenson, and the selection is made with considerable skill. It is a delightful companion for the pocket.

Women have played a high and noble part in the

* "Ancient Scottish Prayers." With Introduction by Annie H. Small. "An Act of Prayer." Prepared by Annie H. Small. Introduction by Professor D. S. Cairns. "The Possibilities of Prayer." By J. H. Oldham. "A Scottish Anthology." By A. H. S. (London and Edinburgh: T. N. Foulis.)

history of Scotland and of her Church. Her ancient Pictish capital was dedicated to St. Bride; to St. Margaret she owed the revivifying of her Church when it was falling into laxity and decay. These Iona Books are understood to be a part of woman's service to Scotland to-day. They are but the forerunners of others on the isle itself and of the Celtic saints. We heartily commend them. Of their aim and of their contents something has been said. In external form they are attractive; in that and in paper and type they are worthy of the publishing house from which they come. No better or more appropriate gifts could be bestowed at Christmastide than these, nor any which seek to serve a higher end.

UNDER WHICH KING?*

THE book before us is not in every detail the work we were intended to see. Mrs. Lang tells us that her husband "had no time even to correct the first proofs," and was thus debarred from probable modifications. She goes on to "ask those who differ from the author to remember the circumstances in which the work has been published." It is sad to use the past tense in speaking of Andrew Lang, but it is difficult not to feel stimulated by the perusal of his last book. He "was ever a fighter," and it was with no failing arm that he broke a last lance for his beloved "Will." In some respects his last exploit is his most notable of all. A garrison that has withstood a siege of half a century might well have lost appetite for a vigorous offensive; but Andrew Lang sallied forth with the well-founded hope of reversing the positions and of besieging the besiegers in their own entrenchments. Never did battle's end see a more gallant charge.

The campaign or the siege—to keep the metaphor we have already used—is not over. Perhaps it never will be over. To quote the book before us, "It is absolutely impossible to prove that Will, or Bacon, or the Man in the Moon, was the author of the Shakespearean plays and poems." Truly it is a dreary prospect that lies before us—a vista of irritating and interminable bickerings. And Andrew Lang forbids us to remain neutral; the cause he champions is too splendid, too universal.

"You see these things as the Baconians do, or as I do. Argument is unavailing." This is not very reassuring for the lovers of peace, unless, indeed, the Baconians and the "Anti-Willians"—to use Andrew Lang's own glorious and inclusive neologism—are to-morrow to be one with Sennacherib's host. And yet it is true that we must all take sides or have already taken sides. When we first awoke to this controversy, and had heard the first amœbic strophes of "Anti-Willians" and "Stratfordians," it was with us as with a Gilbertian chorus, say the impressionable "Pirates of Penzance"; conviction lurked in each last word. Now we recognise that even a prejudice may be true; that a prejudice rooted in a broad faith in human nature may be truer than a diseased conscientiousness, akin to a belief in the nastier medicines; that vegetarianism, agnosticism, and anti-vaccinationism may be not only unpalatable, but even untrue. "But the story does not suit you, and you call it 'a mere myth,' which, 'of course, will be believed by those who wish to believe it.' But, most excellent of mortals, will it not, by parity of reasoning, 'of course be disbelieved by those who did not wish to believe it'?"

We are infinitely indebted to Andrew Lang for the

(Continued on page 314.)

* "Shakespeare, Bacon and the Great Unknown." By Andrew Lang. With 8 illustrations. 9s. net. (Longmans.)

Be sure it's

Velma

chocolate REG.

—the result of years of study in blend and make. Side by side with Velma other chocolates taste flat. Velma is delicious, true chocolate, as true as it is fine, as fine as it is true—the greatest achievement in chocolate yet.

See the gold corner on the red packet

3d. 6d. 1s.

SOLE MAKER

Suchard

Make them a feature of your Xmas Giving

"KOH-I-NOOR"

PROPELLING PENCILS

Just time to buy

"Koh-i-noor" Propelling Pencils are produced in so many styles that all tastes can be suited. You can get a "Koh-i-noor" with refills at the end, or with a sharpener at the end. You can get one in plain silver at 2/6, in chased silver at 3/6, in rolled gold at 5/6, or in plain 9-ct. gold at 15/6, fitted with the inimitable "Koh-i-noor" lead, of course. Your stationer or jeweller will gladly show you the series.

From 9d. each

List free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London, W.C. (Paris, Vienna, Milan, Dresden, Brussels, Barcelona, Zurich, New York.)

LINENIZED MUSIC ROLLS

(for all Player-Pianos)

are what your friends want for

XMAS GIFTS

A Special Christmas List has been prepared, and the following are a few of the good things your friends might like. If they don't care for the compositions you send them we shall be delighted to exchange within 7 days of purchase.

- | | | |
|--|-----|----------|
| Christians, Awake | } | Nett 4/6 |
| Good King Wenceslas | | |
| While Shepherds Watched | | |
| Hark! the Herald Angels | | |
| O REST IN THE LORD | 2 6 | |
| MESSIAH SELECTIONS | 6/3 | |
| OH! YOU BEAUTIFUL DOLL | 5 - | |
| "GIRL IN THE TAXI" SELECTIONS | 6/3 | |
| MYSTIC BEAUTY (Herman Finck's Latest) | 4/- | |

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

Accompaniments to songs with the words on the roll.

Send for Catalogue 22 (Mention "Everyman") to

PERFORATED MUSIC CO., LTD.,

94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.
Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE ST., EDINBURGH.

AGENTS—

- | | |
|---|---|
| LIVERPOOL: Rushworth & Dreaper, Ltd., 11-17, Islington. | BATH: Duck, Son & Finker, Pulteney Bridge. |
| CHELTHAM: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., Promenade. | CARLISLE: C. Thurnam & Sons, Whitehall House. |
| CARDIFF: Dale, Forty & Co., Ltd., High Street. | STOCKTON-ON-TEES: Joho Burden, 52, Yarm Lane. |
| BRISTOL: Duck, Son & Finker, 1, Royal Promenade, Clifton. | NOTTINGHAM: H. Farmer & Co., High Street. |

AN XMAS GIFT

YOUR FRIENDS WILL VALUE

is a copy of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration—the finest system of all-round Mental-Training in existence. The late Mr. W. T. STEAD said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success." If you have a friend who lacks the power to concentrate, whose Memory is poor, Will-power, Self-reliance and Self-confidence weak, he will welcome your gift of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, which is now being practised in every part of the civilised world. Send a P.C. for full particulars to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. See the splendid testimony of "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "John Bull," and "Great Thoughts."

SECRETARIAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR GENTLEWOMEN.

Miss J. E. COHEN,
75, New Street, Birmingham.

SHORTHAND AND TYPEWRITING,
BOOK-KEEPING BY CHARTERED ACCOUNTANT,
MODERN LANGUAGES.

Good Appointments. Moderate Terms. University References.
Prospectus on application.

MAPLETON'S
NUT
FOODS

Essentially the Foods for Brain Workers: maximum of nutriment, minimum of trouble.

A Sample of "Nutter" and full list of Foods, &c., sent post free, Mention EVERYMAN.

MAPLETON'S,
Garston, LIVERPOOL.

Buy "Seals" this Xmas

Buy "him" a Seal, buy "her" a Seal. Buy one for yourself. There are Seals for everybody. Seals for the busy business man, Seals for the traveller and the man of leisure, Seals for the lady—to carry in her handbag. Long Seals, Middle Seals, Short Seals. There is a big range of heavy 14-carat gold iridium tipped nibs to choose from. Every hand can be suited.

The Seal Pen is the Fountain Pen that writes right and is ink tight. You can carry it upside down or flat—it is quite safe. It's the most novel gift you can give—and useful. Guaranteed for two years.

The Seal Pen

The Fountain Pen That Cannot Leak.

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

Your Stationer
Sells the Seal

W. H. SMITH & SON

word "Anti-William," coined with a special view to Mr. Greenwood. It not only classifies and includes all his adversaries; it describes them. They are "Antis." A new "Anti" sect has recently arisen in Belgium, where, by the way, they have revived the forgotten art of breeding Shakespeares, with Rutland on its banner. Its common feeling with the now almost venerable Baconian heresy is one of envy, hatred, and malice for the "illiterate clown of Stratford." Andrew Lang shows that he was not by any means illiterate, or, since the burden of proof lies with the attacking party, that his illiteracy is palpably "not proven." In any case there is strong presumptive evidence for supposing that Shakespeare had all the grounding and all the tags for such display—commonplace in his day—of classical lore as he made. Lyly and the ante-rooms of palaces gave the necessary minimum of social instruction. Andrew Lang thinks the "Anti-Williamians" ill-advised in insisting on the complete illiteracy of Shakespeare. How could a man who could not write his own name carry off the farce of covering a Bacon? Detection was certain. Churton Collins was an indiscreet ally of the Stratfordian forces. His zeal for a learned Shakespeare drove him into one of the worst of scholarly diseases, a compilation of most unconvincing parallels. With the bulk of the positive evidence on its side, the concession of perfectly conceivable hypotheses, and genius thrown into the scale, the Stratfordian theory can repel that "fool of a word 'impossible,'" and, with Andrew Lang, sally out to take the enemy's forces in the rear.

THE STRANGLING OF PERSIA*

"The Strangling of Persia" is the story of the last and vain struggle of Persia in asserting her political independence against the encroachment of Russia. Mr. Morgan Shuster was called from the Civil Service of the United States to control the finances of regenerate Persia, and to save the country from bankruptcy. On accepting the high and responsible office the young American administrator thought that he was the servant of a free Persian Government. He was very soon made to realise that Persia was being bullied into vassalage by Russia, and that England and Germany were the tacit accomplices of Russian policy, and were partly bound to her by agreement.

One cannot help admiring and respecting the candour and truthfulness and admirable intentions of Mr. Morgan Shuster, and one must admit that his book contains a true record of recent political events in the kingdom of the Shah, and constitutes an historical document of prime importance. Yet admitting all this, and whilst lamenting the impending destruction of an ancient Asiatic nation, whilst anticipating great trouble from the aggressive policy of the Russian Government, we do not agree with Mr. Morgan Shuster's severe condemnation of Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy, for British foreign policy is determined by that of the Triple Entente, which is itself the outcome of the Triple Alliance. As long as the international situation remains what it is, as long as the peace and balance of power of Europe is threatened by the Triple Alliance, the British Government will be helpless in Persia, and will be compelled to acquiesce in a policy* which the British people disapproves of.

The cause of peace and of European liberty would certainly not be served by Great Britain challenging the policy of an Empire of one hundred and seventy million people, and by transforming the already formidable Triple Alliance into a Quadruple Alliance. The truth of the matter is that unhappy Persia is now paying the penalty of the aggressive militarism which is still the dominant political philosophy of Europe.

* "The Strangling of Persia." By W. Morgan Shuster. 12s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

CHRISTMAS, YULE AND NOËL*

MR. MILES has compiled a most enthralling book, completed by exquisite illustrations. Christmas is discussed under many headings and from several points of view; in fact, so uncertain is the point of view of the author, that we are never sure whether such a word as "enlightened" on the one hand, or such a one as "Catholic," for instance, on the other, wears with the better grace its inverted commas. To be quite just, we think that words of the latter class have mostly been spared this adornment; but the inference may be drawn from many passages of the text that the truth is normally to be found on the other side of the hill. Mr. Miles has divided his book into two parts—"The Christian Feast" and "Pagan Survivals"—and we seem to detect a change of attitude as he turns from the one to the other. In Part I. he is sometimes almost a mystic, in Part II. he has got his folk-lorist spectacles on, and never strays far from the side of Dr. Frazer. We may note that in the preface readers of a certain cast of mind are recommended to skip Part I. and pass on to the really interesting part of the book.

If we may be allowed a preference, we shall vote for Part I., where detail does not run riot to quite the same extent, and where the broad principles belong rather to history, in the ordinary sense, and to life as we know it, than to a system of philosophy and research that can only have its full meaning for the most special kind of specialist. We do not mean to disparage the second part of the book; it is a storehouse of interesting facts and theories, presented in an entertaining manner, and, with the bibliography appended, should form a valuable book of reference. "Christmas, regarded in all its aspects, is a microcosm of European religion," and, as we have already hinted, a good many aspects of the festival are considered in Mr. Miles's book.

In the first part, for instance, the origins of the Christian feast are discussed. Mr. Miles, by the way, does not confine himself to the central day of the festival. He includes in his subject the whole period from the beginning of November to Candlemas, laying, of course, special stress on the "Twelve Days," and enlarging on the observances of the Continental New Year, which successfully disputes a large part of the patrimony of Christmas. He shows how the theological and secular conceptions of the season fought out a long rivalry, till the Church ended by conniving at customs and conceptions that had nothing to do with asceticism. The Roman and Germanic predecessors of the Christian festival are also discussed, and their part assigned in its subsequent development. Two delightful chapters deal with Christmas poetry, and the reproduction of many examples of curious or beautiful carols points the moral, and provides the purchasing reader with a valuable little anthology. Mr. Miles defines the Christmas sentiment as the union of "the carol spirit and the mystical spirit." "Christmas in Liturgy and Popular Devotion" is another fine chapter, containing, besides a very good account of that rather hackneyed subject, Christmas in Rome, descriptions of the Italian Christmas in London, and the history of the presepio, Krippe, or crèche. In the

* "Christmas in Ritual and Tradition, Christian and Pagan." By Clement A. Miles. With four coloured plates and seventeen other illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

Just the thing for the Xmas Party.

The only practical and effective instrument of the kind on the market.

MIRROSCOPE
(Patented Trade Mark)
PROJECTOR.

"Have a MIRROSCOPE Christmas this year."

And a merry one is assured to you and yours—for this year, next year, and many years to come.

The MIRROSCOPE is an instrument which exhibits pictures, in black and white or natural colours, as desired, upon a six-foot illuminated surface. There are no costly slides to purchase, and no skilled operator required, for any photographs, picture-postcards, or cut-out illustrations will provide material for a Mirroscope show.

It is safe to assert that the picture—always a first love with mankind—holds more sway in the great home festival than at any other season of the year. Take away the picture element from the Christmas party and you have merely a party. Introduce, however, this element in its strongest and most charming form—through the MIRROSCOPE, that is—and all the subtle mystery, the heart-warming associations of Christmastide are brought to the fireside in a way that is at once a delight and a revelation.

Christmas is the time for gathering; the interest of the MIRROSCOPE is general and associated; its appeal spreads through all generations, pleases all tastes and never wearies.

What Dickens did for the Christmas of a generation ago, the MIRROSCOPE does for the Christmas of to-day.

Prices for the New Season's Models, 15/- to 24/-; fitted for Electric, Gas, or Acetylene. Already stocked and demonstrated by Boots Cash Chemists, Hamley's (all branches), Selfridge's, Gamages's, Bonetink's, Ltd., Chiswick Edwards & Co., J. Fallowfield, The Junior Army & Navy Stores, Spiers & Pond's Stores, etc. For Free Illustrated Booklet containing full particulars (Demonstrations also arranged), apply—

CARR BROS., Ltd., 11, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

"Thank you, dear. It is just what I wanted for the Office."

An inexpensive but most useful gift—useful all the year round—either at home, at the office, or when travelling, is a

"NUGGET" BOOT POLISHING OUTFIT

BLACK OR BROWN. PRICE 1/-

- A "NUGGET" Outfit contains:—
- 1 TIN of "NUGGET" Polish.
- 1 SPECIAL BRUSH (pure bristles).
- 1 POLISHING PAD ("Selvyt").

It is the finest value on the Market.

Of all Bootmakers and Stores, or direct from The Nugget Polish Co., Ltd., London, S.E., on receipt of 1/- (or in metal case, 1/3).

discussion of the Christmas drama we feel that the author is too busy in avoiding the fringes of a bigger subject to be quite at his best. Mr. Miles believes that Protestantism emasculated Christmas by discountenancing the bluff irreverence that was often the garment of a robust faith.

Part II. is, we have hinted, rather a mine than a narrative. The pagan survivals of the season are taken step by step, festival by festival, and special sections deal with such matters as the Yule Log, the Christmas Tree, and the Mistletoe. The material is good, so is the treatment.

A TRAVELLER IN THE UNSEEN*

IT is good to find so distinguished a member of the Society for Psychical Research as Professor Sir W. F. Barrett turning the attention, which that society has tended to focus so much on séances where trivialities abound, or on country-house ghosts, and to find him directing his scrutiny to more important objects. In the booklet before us, "Swedenborg, The Savant and the Seer," Professor Barrett endeavours to deal scientifically, and yet sympathetically, with the life-work of one of the great succession of those who, in all ages and under all the great religions of the world, have professed to bring tidings from beyond the veil.

The booklet is, in the main, the same as the lecture given by Sir William before the Swedenborg Society last spring, when Count von Wrangel, the Swedish Ambassador, took the chair. In two pages the bare outline of the life of the great Swedish savant is given; twenty-three pages are devoted to his work as a man of science, chiefly in the regions of mathematics and engineering; the rest deals with his life as seer from 1744-1772.

Everyman and Everywoman, ignorant of the life and work of Swedenborg, will make a good beginning by reading Sir William's careful lecture. Later, they may wish to get Garth Wilkinson's study, or even to tackle one of the large volumes which the Swedenborg Society keeps so faithfully before the public; "voluminous and wearisome," Sir William calls them. One is tempted to ask, had he read the one on "Conjugal Love"? By that time the reader will not be guiding his or her reading by the reviews in a penny weekly paper. They may even have discovered the "Theosophic Correspondence" of Louis Claude de St. Martin, and many of his other works, which contain such sympathetic and yet spiritually discriminating criticism of Swedenborg. It may even have dawned on their opening spiritual intelligence that the unseen world is fully as complex as this world, and possibly may have some rare and untried complexities greater even than any we are aware of here.

THE ODYSSEUS OF MUMPER'S DELL†

"MORE than most authors, Borrow appears greater than his books, though he is their offspring." That is very nearly the whole truth about this extraordinary writer, to whom literature in certain forms—etymology, rhetoric, and a boundless curiosity about languages and dialects—was the breath of life. That he ever became a writer is largely due to accident; that he ever became a professional writer he would have been the first hotly to deny. He was essentially

* "Swedenborg, The Savant and the Seer." By Professor Sir W. F. Barrett. 6d. (John M. Watkins.)

† "George Borrow: The Man and His Books." By Edward Thomas. 10s. 6d. net. (Chapman and Hall.)

an amateur of life. For these reasons the literature about Borrow is always likely to bear a very heavy ratio to the literature by Borrow, and for these reasons the volume of so excellent a writer and so sound a critic and psychologist as Mr. Thomas is likely to appeal to a wide circle of readers.

The quasi-autobiographical character of all Borrow's work at once arouses his own biographer to the consideration of the great problem of truth in literature. "A brute memory" like that of Borrow is too great a force to be turned loose in literature. "The facts may convey a false impression which an omission or a positive 'lie' may correct." Mr. Thomas instances a correction in the proofs of "Lavengro," where Jasper Petulengro's short arm is coolly changed into a long one. "The short arm was true to 'the facts'; the long arm was more impressive, and was truer to the created character, which was more important." Borrow never quite made up his mind whether to give his work to the world as fiction or as unmitigated "fact." The queer reappearances that his characters make in the most unexpected places seem to confirm the idea of fiction, but Mr. Thomas contends justly enough that these chance encounters were more probable in the case of an inveterate vagabond than for the ordinary stay-at-home. There are, of course, glaring exceptions to the general verisimilitude of the work, but we think that Borrow's truth of intention and truth of effect are ably and convincingly vindicated. Mr. Thomas is right, we are sure, on the difficult subject of Borrow's relations to Isopel Berners. "There can be little doubt that this episode is truthfully reported." And why? Because "it is an extraordinary love-making, but then all love-making, when truthfully reported, is extraordinary." We are not sure that this would be quite enough to silence a sceptic. As to Borrow's travesties of Catholicism, Mr. Thomas asks for a grain of humour in the swallowing of them.

Borrow was a mass of paradoxes. His tastes and his distastes were of a most positive kind, but they clashed in a bewildering manner. "His contempt for those who were not middle-class Englishmen seemed unmitigated." And he spent his whole life getting outside of the circle of "middle-class Englishmen." By the people he met in queer corners of the world he was taken for everything but an Englishman. The proud circumstance of a middle-class origin he insisted on noisily in his later, more prosperous years. And through his national prejudices he saw Spain and Romany, Russia and the unattainable China as fairylands of romance. He drew wonderful portraits of his casual acquaintances, but he failed to give an impression of his father, whose portrait strikes Mr. Thomas as "too much done to a turn." He was once on the point of starting for London on an atheistic crusade, and his literary immortality is due to the fact that he wrote—and lived—"The Bible in Spain." Mr. Thomas has no doubt of the sincerity of the missionary; it was no mere prejudice or fanaticism that sent him to Spain; it was not entirely his admiration for a country where "the wealthy are not blindly idolised," and where there were wild regions and wild men; it was because he believed that the Bible was, in his own words, "the well-head of all that is useful and conducive to the happiness of society."

Mr. Thomas has special chapters on the styles of the various books; the Borrowian style he finds, in the main, less eccentric than it is generally represented, and he recognises most often "the massive style of the early Victorian Quarterly Review." Altogether a good book; Borrow may feel satisfied with his latest biographer.

J. M. DENT
GIFT BOOKS AND

& SONS, Ltd.
PRESENTATION VOLS.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. Numerous Coloured Illustrations by A. R. QUINTON. 21s. net.

"Mr. Ditchfield shows sound judgment in selection as well as ability to avoid the commonplace, and the result is wholly satisfactory. He has much that is interesting to say about porches, gardens, dormer windows, market crosses, bridges, moats, and farm buildings. He tells his readers why and how the old cottages were built; why the thin tile replaced the thick stone for roofing; why angle-nooks have vanished from modern cottages; and why the old cottages take such a varying form."—The Field.

"A book like this, which, in its prose as in its pictures, keeps alive some of the sweetest aspects of the country, is sure to please readers who want to get away from town. . . . It is not surprising to find him feeling tender towards buildings that have inspired the principal living movement in the English architecture of to-day."

"One of the most beautiful Gift-Books produced by any publishing house this season."—Court Journal.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY AND THE COMPANION VOLUME CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY.

Each volume has 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.
Size, imperial 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net each.

By CECIL HEADLAM and the (late) Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, BISHOP OF TRURO, respectively.

"Mr. Headlam has given us a book on Oxford, which has the same feeling for the pervading spirit that Dr. Stubbs has shown in the twin book on Cambridge."—Country Life.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net each volume.

A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and English thought.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY.

By Professor JAMES SETH, M.A. (Edinburgh University).

"'English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy' is admirably written."—Spectator.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY.

By Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A. (Glasgow University).

THE TIMES.—"Professor Dixon . . . spends little time in that most tedious business the paraphrasing and summarising of plots of poems; he knows better. He tells his own story well, and while he seems to be doing little more than making notes, reviewing, and describing, he gives a large part of the history of poetry, and through it the history of the life of England."

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA: Vol. II.

By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University.

Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. Volume III. in the press. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net each volume. [Prospectus.

"The work covers every aspect of the development of Russian Institutions—political, economic, legal, and religious."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

By the Author of "THE HOUSE OF PRAYER."

6/- FLORENCE CONVERSE, "The Children of Light." 6/-

"Really beautiful and arresting. The first part, which deals with the childhood of the three personages of the story, is by far the best. Here Miss Converse is on her own ground, and she treats the idealism and inspiration of receptive children with rare delicacy and intuition."—The Morning Post.

"A living book."—Edinburgh Evening News.

SEND A POSTCARD FOR FULL ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

"The finest Review in the English language."
—Arnold Bennett.

The ENGLISH Review 1/-

JANUARY, 1913

1913	Frederic Harrison
THE BLUE BOTTLE	Henri Fabre
WILD WINGS	W. H. Hudson
THE HILL	R. Ellis Roberts
ON THE THEATRE	Gordon Craig
THE LOVE CHILDREN	B. Macdonald Hastings
MODERN MINSTRELSY	Norman Douglas
THE SUBLIME AUDACITY OF THE CHURCH	The Rev. S. C. Carpenter
THE CHINESE PALE OF SETTLEMENT	Dr. E. J. Dillon
DEMOCRACY AND PUBLIC HONOURS	"Anon"
WHAT IS OURS IS NOT OURS	Austin Harrison
POETRY	W. W. Gibson

PLAY AND BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

The ENGLISH Review 1/-

JUST PUBLISHED.

Scotland's Debt to Protestantism.

By HECTOR MACPHERSON. Price 1/- net.

The Marshall Case.

By F. J. ROBERTSON. Third Edition. Price 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
45, George Street, EDINBURGH.

FOR A CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

Beautiful New Setting of Tennyson's

"CROSSING THE BAR."

By HENRY HARFORD. 2/- net.

London: WEEKES & CO., 14, Hanover Street, W.

FOR the best Exhibition of all the Newest as well as the Largest Selection of Standard Books, a visit should be paid to MESSRS. JOHN & ED. BUMPUS, LTD., Booksellers by appointment to H.M. the King.

Special Departments for Handsomely Bound Books, and for Scarce and Second-hand Books. Catalogues issued, Handsomely bound sets of writings by the great authors a speciality. Libraries purchased, catalogued or valued, have been sent to 350, Oxford Street, London, W.

* "Swedenborg."
W. F. Barrett.

† "George Borrow: Parables for Children, Bibles, Prayer and Hymn Books, Thomas. 10s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Co., London, W.C.) will be sent post free on receipt of a 5/- order."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THIS new and revised edition of Mr. Herbert Paul's QUEEN ANNE (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s.) comes opportunely at the present moment, when the thoughts of the public are turning more and more towards a serious examination of the forces which have built up our party system. The sovereign whose character Mr. Paul analyses in these pages had little direct personal influence on the course of events. None the less, the political happenings of her life are of profound interest, for probably at no other period of English history had party divisions a more real significance. When Bolingbroke opposed Harley, when Pope wrote his immortal satire on Addison, when Swift crossed swords with Defoe, the words Whig and Tory meant something. In the great struggle between the two parties, Anne, though secretly a decided Tory, did little of her own volition that counted either way. Sovereign in name, it was her pathetic fate to be, as Mr. Paul says, "a bone of contention between ambitious statesmen and plotting favourites." True, she presided, as Mr. Paul points out, at her own Cabinets. She assisted at the debates in the House of Lords. But "she was the creature of bed-chamber intrigue," and she was in some respects the most pathetic figure of her reign. "Her sad life was as inconspicuous as the life of royalty can be. Married to a husband whom she could not respect, seeing all her children die in childhood, . . . suspicion haunted Anne's life and increased its gloom. The secret tragedy of her maimed existence and her wasted years may be read in the little coffins at Westminster Abbey, where the bodies of her children lie."

THE GODS OF THE DEAD, by Winifred Graham (William Rider and Son, Ltd.), were first let loose in the neighbourhood of a suburban household by the burning in the back garden of an Egyptian mummy, which had been given to the great-grandfather of Cosmo Tarnus, a struggling architect. Cosmo, it seems, had been somewhat unfortunate, and had attributed his ill-luck to "the Princess," whose preserved remains he secretly detested. Cosmo's wife was expecting a happy event, and the architect fondly hoped that it might be a son. But, alas! Fate determined otherwise, and the child, who was born on the night of the mummy's cremation, had "something of Egyptian beauty in her slumbrous eyes, and the parents had always a strange feeling that she did not belong to them." Camilla—the child's name—was enabled by some unborn power to unconsciously command veneration, and willed a charm over meaner minds. Her subsequent adventures it would be unfair, indeed impossible, to summarise. They include so much that is mysterious and eventful, that the reader will like to master them for himself.

THE LOG OF "THE EASY WAY," by John L. Matthews (Gay and Hancock, Ltd.), is the record of one of the most original and, in its way, delightful voyages to be found in the whole history of navigation. It was on the first day of September, 1900, that the author chanced on old Mac, an ancient mariner, with whom and his wife Janet he set out on an adventurous journey. The end was—nowhere! The boat, "heavily framed and heavily planked, with two-by-six timbers extending out two feet each side of the cabin to support the guard and bear transverse shocks, with gunwales two feet high and without a break from end to end, and, lastly, with heavy straps of iron on the outside, two and a half inches wide and half an inch thick"—the boat was named The Easy Way. For seven months the author and his party went drifting here and there, "up an old canal in Fairy Land"—otherwise the old Illinois and Michigan Canal, that goes to the Mississippi and thence on to Chicago and Memphis and Arkansas City, past all sorts and conditions of interesting scenes that we find very charmingly described in this refreshing book, which gives one a pleasant insight into the joys of vagabondage.

One of the daintiest anthologies that it has been our good fortune to light upon is that prepared by Mr. Alfred Rawlings and published by Messrs. Gay and Hancock, under the title of A FLOWER ANTHOLOGY. It contains some of the most felicitous thoughts of our poets on the flowers that they loved and wrote about. The book is charmingly illustrated, and contains some admirable translations from Ovid and Claudian. The book is as refreshing as the flowers it depicts.

THE BURGUNDIAN (Gay and Hancock, 6s.) goes at a quick pace. It is a tale of old France, and we have mystery, romance, bloodshed, and the clash of arms throughout the piece. Miss Angelotti can create atmosphere, and possesses the faculty of painting scenes from the past with a strength and vividness that crashes home to the reader. The style is at times a touch stilted, but there are moments when the author gets away from precision, and the narrative flows on in quick, nervous English. The author is, we think, hampered at times by the consciousness that she is writing of the Middle Ages, and is at a loss to adopt a prose mediæval enough for the purposes of her narrative and at the same time void of too great a similarity to modern phrasing. When she is in the full flight of her story she forgets her period, and her characters live; but there are certain passages that bear the mark of straining after effect, a too marked attempt to conjure up the phraseology of the days when Burgundy had a part to play in the destiny of France. The characterisation is not marked by distinction or subtlety, but for the purposes of the story the hero is convincing enough, and Marguerite is cleverly portrayed. The chief merit of the book lies in the hurry of event, the clash of arms, the roar and bustle of conflict. One carries away a definite impression of stir and stress, swift thrust and parry. It is a book that should be read in the chimney corner, its bustle gaining contrast by the quiet atmosphere of the domestic hearth.

THE RED DAGGER (Murray and Evenden, 6s.) tells of a romantic quest for a missing sister. This long-lost relative, after many alarms and excursions, is discovered in a convent, whose shelter she declines to leave. Mr. Hugh Nayland has a gift for vivid presentment of exciting scenes, but he would do better to try his hand at a quieter theme, one less out of the track of common, everyday occurrence.

Brightly written, with a certain capacity for characterisation, Miss Evelyn St. Leger should, we think, have found a more literary title for her book than THE BLACKBERRY PICKERS (Putnam and Sons, 6s.). The story opens with a newspaper poster. Flaming head-lines greet the passer-by, containing items concerning the latest "Ragging Scandal." In somewhat disjointed fashion we are introduced to Luke Hammond, who, we also learn, is suspect of being someone of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

100 Copies in 10 Minutes

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX duplicates all gelatines, graphs, stenoids, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

SHORTHAND (PITMAN'S); Postal Instruction. Syllabus on application.—A. H. CLOUGH, 16, Victoria Street, Moldgreen, Huddersfield.

WANTED, Concert and Stage Singers who wish to get stage experience.—Call, The Stage Agency, 304, Regent Street.

TWO GOOD THINGS. The "Ideal" Divisible MS. Book. No rings, 108s, staples. All work in one book, rearranged afterwards. Specimen 1s. 6d.—The Transfer Duplicator, produces 100 good copies once writing, your own pen. Quato 6/8, Foolscap 8/3, post free.—WM. HUNT, 19, Broad St., Oxford.

WANTED, a correspondent interested in literature. Either sex.—Apply W. H. c/o "Everyman," Bedford Street, London, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

BOOKS WANTED. All in 3 vols., First Editions, 25/- each offered. Lorna Doone, 1869; Wild Wales, 1862; Jane Eyre, 1847; Desperate Remedies, 1871; Romola, 1863; Adam Bede, 1859; Workers in the Dawn, 1890; Men of Character, 1838; Harry Richmond, 1871; Richard Everell, 1859; Rhoda Fleming, 1865; Emilia in England, 1864. 100,000 Books in Stock. State Wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14 & 16 John Bright Street, Birmingham.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN THE STUDY OF ASTROLOGY. By ALAN LEO. Full particulars of these unique lessons on application to Secretary, Lessons Department, "Modern Astrology" Office, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

NOVELS, Short Stories, Articles, Poems, placed with 176 Publishers and Periodicals, at highest prices. 16-pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS."

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE.
A natural gift.

Senior Physician in large Hospital writes—"A most valuable thesis."

Senior Medical Inspector—"I cannot dispute a single point."

Headmaster and Examiner—"All I have heard and seen of your new system fortifies my belief in it."

Master in Elementary School—"The nation that adopts this first will be on the top."

Doctor—"In your medical and scientific facts, I can find no flaw."

A London Teacher and Lecturer—"I consider the instruction of great value to parents, teachers, professional men—in fact, to all who realise the importance of memory, will, and clear thinking as the basis of successful achievement."

A Teacher—"Its great simplicity makes it the more wonderful."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

The British Review

with which is incorporated

THE OXFORD & CAMBRIDGE REVIEW

—Edited by R. J. WALKER—

Messrs Williams & Norgate have much pleasure in announcing the publication of the first number of The British Review. Each number will consist of 192 pages, and be issued at the popular price of One Shilling. All the finest features associated with Reviews published at several times the price will be found in this important monthly, and the most prominent writers of the day will be among the contributors to what should prove a notable development in periodical literature.

The outlook will be Imperial; whilst all sides will be given impartial hearing, combined with fearless candour in proclaiming facts.

Literature and Criticism will be treated from the newest standpoints; every art and development will receive recognition.

Among the Contributors to the first issue may be mentioned—

Rt. Hon. F. E. SMITH,
K.C., M.P.

Count LEO TOLSTOY

Sir ARTHUR QUILLER-
COUCH

HILAIRE BELLOC

G. K. CHESTERTON

KATHARINE TYNAN

GERALD MAUDE
CECIL CHESTERTON

F. M. ATKINSON

PHILIP GIBBS

L. F. SALZMANN

J. E. HAROLD TERRY

WILLIAM CAINE

The Editor, etc.

January Number ready end of the month. Royal 8vo. 192 pages.
1/- net.

LONDON: WILLIAMS AND NORGATE

The Talk of the GRAMOPHONE World.

'PARSONS' SEMITONE'

Improves the Sound, Avoids Scratching of the Needle. Old Records made New. Sold by Spiers & Pond,
Whiteley's, Civil Service Stores,
Harrods, and all high-class dealers.

Sample Semitone sent post free for

—❧— 1/= —❧—

Parsons' TRIPLE CRYSTAL NEEDLE will play 60 tunes. Increases sound. Stands alone for Quality. Boxes of six for 6d.

PARSONS' SEMITONE COMPANY,

37 & 39, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

else!—not the real heir, but another. The story continues on gossipy lines, and we are introduced to various phases of social, political, and country life. Hammond, the victim of the ragging scandal, drifts through life, amiable, easy-going, fatally weak and facile. He was not sorry to have been practically drummed out of his regiment; he could not stay the pace, there or elsewhere. He cannot even keep up his enthusiasm for the girl he loves, and his confession at the end of the chapter, when he lies dying, is the corollary of his career. "I did love you! Darling, I did love you, and I did try, Rachel; but I know I failed." We are glad that, in the ultimate, Rachel marries a more stable person, but feel sorry that, at the same time, it is proved that, after all, Luke Hammond was not himself, but changed at his birth, the real Simon Pure having died. A bright story, full of light and shade, and, on the whole, well worth the reading.

❧ ❧ ❧

A new edition of the saddest and most beautiful of the world's legends, UNDINE, by La Morte Fouqué (Sidgwick and Jackson, 2s. 6d. net), is just issued from the press. Translated by Mr. Edmund Gosse, the story is rendered with a simplicity and charm of singular distinction. This edition includes a pre-fatory note by the translator on Fouqué, and a short appreciation of this his best-known work.

"Heine, always so penetrating in the independence of his criticism, became entirely enthusiastic about this one work of Fouqué's, and called 'Undine' a wonderfully lovely poem. 'It is a very kiss; the genius of poesy kissed the sleeping spring, and he opened his eyelids with a smile, and all the roses breathed out perfume, and all the nightingales sang—this is what our excellent Fouqué clothed in words and called "Undine."'"

The present edition is beautifully printed, attractively bound, and makes a dainty and a charming Christmas gift.

❧ ❧ ❧

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor has given us a pretty sketch of a small boy, LITTLE THANK YOU (G. P. Putnam, 3s. 6d.). The story opens with a childish discussion as to the merits of Englishmen. The small people are American, instinct with the vivacity and quickness of their nation. Nancy, the little girl, who speaks so feelingly on behalf of her black nurse, "Mammie," is subsequently the young bride of a handsome boy who has never kissed any woman but her. He is thrown, out hunting, and dies of a broken back. The baby, "Little Thank You," is born after his father's death, and develops into a happy, human boy. Nancy, after years of vicissitudes and struggle, marries again, with the entire approval of her child. A simple story, freshly told, with a quaint charm of its own.

❧ ❧ ❧

GIFT BOOKS

ILLUSTRATED EDITIONS.

The Bells, and other Poems. By Edgar Allan Poe. Illustrated by Edmund Dulac. 15s. net. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

Mr. Edmund Dulac has this year chosen to give us an interpretation of the poems of Edgar Allan Poe in general, and of "The Bells" in particular. That Mr. Dulac should have been attracted by the genius of Poe was in the fitness of things, for there certainly exists an elective affinity between the exuberant imagination of the American poet and the fantasy of the English artist. That Mr. Dulac should have entirely succeeded in his attempt was not only not to be expected, but was simply impossible. For Poe's genius

(Continued on page 325.)

J. M. DENT
GIFT BOOKS AND

& SONS, Ltd.
PRESENTATION VOLs.

FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

By HILLEL SAMSON. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 4s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES:—"A book of unusual beauty and freshness, written in language that is often as poetical as good prose dare be. It is the product of a mind in tune with nature and the spiritual side of art, and yet alive to the problems and needs and anxieties of the workaday world . . . there is nothing mawkish about Mr. Samson's writing . . . it is a joy to be with so inspiring a companion."

"Mr. Hillel Samson has managed to give us that rare thing, a modern prose idyll. There will be many to find it a book beautiful."—The Westminster Gazette.

BEE: The Princess and the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Translated by PETER WRIGHT.

Numerous pictures in colour by CHARLES ROBINSON. 7s. 6d. net.

"Bee is a charming book, and tells of delightful people. Written by Anatole France, Bee makes a beautiful gift book."

Evening Standard.

JOLLY CALLE, and other Swedish Fairy Tales.

Text by HELENA NYBLOM. Numerous coloured illustrations by CHARLES FOLKARD. 5s. net.

"'Jolly Calle' is full of laughter, and relates things which (though new to our own nurseries) should be added to the literature which loves the thought of the great fighters of the past."—The Standard.

Uniform with "A CHILD'S BOOK OF SAINTS."

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

Written by WILLIAM CANTON. With illustrations in colour by HERBERT COLE. 5s. net.

"Stories which are not to be found in ordinary books."—Morning Post.

"'A Child's Book of Warriors' is a good example of that school, of which Mr. Kipling is the master, whose writers make a history a pleasure to their readers."—Spectator.

THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN.

Text: Mrs. R. STAWELL. With illustrations in colour by F. C. PAPE. 3s. 6d. net.

"Mrs. Rodolph Stawell is more intimately acquainted with fairies than any writer of recent times. . . . she more than maintains her reputation by the present volume."—Morning Post.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

With several charming full-page drawings by MARGARET TARRANT. 2s. 6d. net.

"A tastefully illustrated 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' would please a quite small person and lovers of fairy tales."—The World.

THE CONISTON CLASSICS.

3/-
net.

There are few daintier and more elegant books than these for presents.

3/-
net.

The volumes are published in a new style of binding known as Bedford Morocco. These works have been selected from Everyman Library with a view to their popularity as presentation and gift books. Each volume contains a photogravure frontispiece and title page, whilst the binding, with its limp cover, round corners, and green under gold edges, has been specially designed for presentation purposes. A special Prospectus of the books issued in this particular style will be sent with pleasure on receipt of a postcard.

SEND A POSTCARD FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

is rather musical than pictorial, and it has a spiritual quality which baffles expression. That, notwithstanding those almost insuperable difficulties, the artist should have partly succeeded is the best proof of his power. He does reproduce to us the atmosphere of Poe. He conveys to us his capacity of suggestiveness, his uncanny sense of mystery, and his unutterable melancholy. The music of the rhythm, the haunting beauty of the word, and Mr. Dulac's symphony of design and colour constitutes one harmonious whole, which ought to make this book one of the favourites of the present season.

A Book of Discovery. By M. B. Synge. 7s. 6d. net. (T. C. and E. C. Jack.)

Miss Synge's "Book of Discovery" is only a juvenile in the sense that "Treasure Island" or "Gulliver's Travels" are juveniles, for it is a book calculated to appeal equally to young and old. It is a comprehensive survey of human exploration from the earliest times down to the age of Shackleton, Sven Hedin, and Amundsen. It embraces all countries and all ages. Lucidly written, copiously illustrated with coloured plates, drawings and maps, Miss Synge's book is instructive without savouring of the school-room. It is full of stirring adventure, but all its adventures are real, and they are all inspiring. It is the kind of book that is certain to stimulate that sense of the heroic, that appreciation for all daring and enterprising deeds, which more than any other qualities require to be stimulated in the young generation.

The Net. By Rex Beach. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

A well contrived story of a Sicilian vendetta. The interest is maintained throughout at a high level. A thoroughly readable novel.

Fate Knocks at the Door. By Will L. Comfort. 6s. (J. B. Lippincott and Co.)

This is a good, though an exasperatingly disconnected, tale of love and adventure. The portion which deals with the Philippines is extremely well done.

The Weaving of the Shuttle. By C. Holmes Cantley. (Duckworth and Co.)

A novel written for the most part in the Yorkshire dialect, but the author does not possess the genius necessary to the success of this method. To any but a "Tyke" this story will prove dull reading.

Tamsie. By Rosamund Napier. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

A romance of Romany life set in the Exmoor Forest. The writer shows an intimate knowledge of gipsy life and of gipsy superstitions, and the descriptions of Exmoor are good. The story, however, is too protracted, for the authoress is not a Borrow.

The Forest Farm. By Peter Rosegger. (A. C. Fifield, the Vineyard Press.)

A volume of charming tales of the Austrian Tyrol by the Burns of Styria. Not the least interesting part of the book is Dr. Julius Petersen's biographical sketch of this prophet, poet, and teacher from the Styrian hills.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- "All About" Library. (Dean, 3s. 6d.)
 Allingham, William. "Poems." (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)
 Animal and Nature Painting Book. (Dean.)
 "Arabian Nights." Illustrated by Rene Bull. (Constable, 10s. 6d.)
 Ayliffe, Augusta. "Time is Money." (Bloodworth and Peppworth, 3s. 6d.)
 Baldwin, May. "Corah's School Chums." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Bodley, J. E. C. "Cardinal Manning." (Longmans, 9s.)
 Bonser, A. E., and Read, M. M. "The Delightful Book." (Dean, 3s. 6d.)
 Cunliffe, R. J., M.A. "A New Shakespearian Dictionary." (Blackie, 9s.)
 Currey, Commander E. H. "The Captain of the King's Guard." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Dickens, Charles. "Gone Astray." (Chapman and Hall, 1s.)
 "Dollie's Book of Nursery Rhymes." (Dean.)
 Dromgoole, W. A. "The Island of Beautiful Things." (Pitman, 6s.)
 "Everyday Painting Book." (Dean, 1s.)
 Fishwick, Lt.-Col. "Shakespearian Addresses." (Sherratt and Hughes, 10s. 6d.)

- Hall, Cyril. "Wood, and What We Make of It." (Blackie, 3s. 6d.)
 Hallard, J. H. "Omar Khayyam" (Trans.). (Rivington, 2s. 6d.)
 Harris, J. C. "Uncle Remus and the Little Boy." (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.)
 Hays, Margaret G. "Kiddie Land." (Dean, 3s. 6d.)
 Hedin, Sven. "From Pole to Pole." (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.)
 Homan, F. "In the Days of Long Ago." (Sampson Low.)
 Horsley, Reginald. "The Red Hussar." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Hunt, B. "Folk Tales of Breffny." (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.)
 Jacobens, Raymond. "Tabitha Smallways." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Kelman, John, D.D. "The Road." Two vols. (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 3s. 6d.)
 Lamont, Annie K. "A Little Book of Verse." (William Kidd.)
 Leonard, R. M. "The Pageant of English Prose." (Oxford University Press, 1s. 6d. and 2s.)
 Letts, Winnifred. "Naughty Sophia." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
 Lowell, James R. "Poems." (Oxford University Press, 1s. 6d. and 2s.)
 Lucas, E. V. "The Life of Charles Lamb." (Methuen, 7s. 6d.)
 Mackenzie, Compton. "Carnival." (Martin Secker.)
 Macpherson Hector. "Scotland's Debt to Protestantism." (Blackwood, 1s.)
 Marsh, H. G. C. "We Two and Others." (Dean, 2s. 6d.)
 Mason, Charlotte. "The Parents' Review." (Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., 6d.)
 Masson, David. "Memories of Two Cities (Edinburgh and Aberdeen)." (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 7s. 6d.)
 McKilliam. "A Chronicle of the Popes." (Bell, 7s. 6d.)
 Meade, L. T. "Peggy from Kerry." (Chambers, 6s.)
 Paget, Stephen, and Crum, J. M. C. "Francis Paget, Bishop of Oxford." (Macmillan, 15s.)
 "Patchwork Puzzles," Nos. 4 and 5. (Dean.)
 Poe, Edgar Allan. "The Bells, and Other Poems." (Hodder and Stoughton, 15s.)
 Raffalovich, G. "Hearts Adrift." (Griffiths, 6s.)
 Reade, Charles. "The Cloister and the Hearth." (Chambers.)
 Re-Bartlett, Lucy. "Sex and Sanctity." (Longmans, 2s. 6d.)
 Quiller-Couch, Sir Arthur. "The Oxford Book of Victorian Verse." (Clarendon Press, 6s.)
 Sackville, Lady Margaret. "Lyrics." (Herbert, Daniel, 3s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.)
 Sackville, Lady Margaret. "Jane Austen." (Herbert, Daniel, 2s. 6d.)
 Scott, Edith H. "With the Eyes of a Child." (Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 7s. 6d.)
 "Scottish Ballads." A Selection. (Grant Richards, 6d.)
 Sharland, R. E. "Voices of Dawn." (Arrowsmith, 1s.)
 Smith, H. W. "The Life Worth Living." (Watts, 5s.)
 Sneath, E. H. "Wordsworth." (Gunn and Co., 7s. 6d.)
 Stanley, Arthur. "Bedford Street Ballads." (Gay and Hancock, 1s.)
 "The Inns of Court and of Chancery." Six Lectures. (Macmillan, 1s.)
 "The Three Bears." (Dean, 6d.)
 "The Year." (Headley, 2s. 6d.)
 Ward, A. W., and Watter, A. R. "The Cambridge History of English Literature." Vol. IX. (Cambridge University Press, 9s.)
 Walters, J. C. "The Complete Edwin Drood." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Watson, E. J. "A Tale of Wulstan." (Arrowsmith.)
 Wilson, Philip. "The Beginnings of Modern Ireland." (Maunsell, 12s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

WEAK SIGHT CURED

WITHOUT SPECTACLES, DRUGS, OR OPERATIONS

REMARKABLE RESULTS ACCOMPLISHED IN IMPAIRED
VISION OF MANY YEARS' DURATION.

WHOLE MEDICAL PROFESSION ENDORSES ITS PRINCIPLES.

If you suffer from weak sight, send at once to me. I will tell you how you can make your weak sight perfect. Learn now how to take care of your eyes, how to cure strain and disease, how to discard unsightly spectacles for ever. I ask everyone who desires perfect sight to send to me. I will give you advice and information from an eminent eye specialist. It is advice that would cost you pounds if obtained from any other source. I offer it to you free of charge.

SPECTACLES DISCARDED IN THREE WEEKS.

Every sufferer from weak sight will be interested in how I cure weak sight without glasses, medicines, or operations. You can achieve this yourself in your own home with the knowledge I give you. I have even completely cured people in one month. I have their letters, full of heartfelt praise and thanks, saying so. My remarkable remedy will positively and permanently benefit your weak sight, no matter how long you may have suffered. With this conviction I give the world something to cure the afflicted, to prevent others falling into the ways that injure. I want you to write to me, and I will give you the true means of curing your weak sight.

I have a personal message to those who wear spectacles. Glasses CANNOT cure weak sight—they cannot even relieve. My system is a vital necessity to you if you wear them. It enables you to discard glasses entirely and make your sight perfect.

I will benefit every sufferer from weak sight who applies to me. Read the following letters:

Mr. H. O. Webber, 261, Foxhall Road, Ipswich, September 30th, 1912:

"I am very glad to say that after three weeks' use of your Sight Restorer I dispensed with glasses, which I wore for three years. I spent a lot of money with an oculist, who failed to benefit me. Your treatment is a very valuable invention."

Mr. W. Simpson, of 33, Dyehouse Fold, Apperley Bridge, Bradford, October 18th, 1912:

"I feel it my duty to tell you of the great benefit I received from your Sight Restorer. It is a month ago I began using it for weak sight, and now the defect has left me altogether."

Miss Nellie Cookson, 71, Ruskin Place, Frickeleton, near Kirkham, writes November 18th, 1912:

"After using your Sight Restorer I have given up wearing glasses. I have used it for two months and have been without my glasses a month to-day."

Miss May Gilson, 18, Broad Street, East Road, Cambridge, June 16th, 1912:

"I am very pleased with the Sight Restorer. It is surprising the good it has done. I began to use it on May 3rd, and am very glad to say I have not had glasses on for five weeks. I can see to write, needlework, and everything. I have derived very great benefit."

I want this public announcement to spread the glad news that there is help for those threatened with even Cataract, Glaucoma and Blindness, as well as the lesser eye defects. Pause and write to me before you take to spectacles for curing (?) Astigmatism, Squint, Shortsight, Farsight, Oldsight, and simple Eyestrain. Glasses can never cure these defects of vision. If you wear spectacles I can restore you to perfect sight. You can dispense with these eye-crutches altogether.

My world-famous book, "Weak Sight and its Cure" (published at 1s.), will be sent free to all who write to me. In it I explain fully my simple and inexpensive home treatment. If you suffer from weak sight in any way, do not hesitate a moment. Simply fill in the Coupon, cut it out, and post it to me with 2d. (abroad 4 foreign) stamps for postage. Write your name and address plainly, so that there is no danger of the book going astray, as I want them to reach only those who are in need of it.

I have only a limited Edition—get it without delay. I impose no obligation. I simply want sufferers to learn how they can cure their weak sight. Write at once.

CUT OUT AND POST TO-DAY.

COUPON.

Dr. E. M. PERCIVAL, Neu Vita Health Association,
95-106, Exchange Buildings, Southwark, LONDON.

Please send me your book on "Weak Sight and its Cure," for which I enclose 2d. (abroad 4 foreign) stamps for postage.

NAME

ADDRESS

NO MORE TIME TO PONDER

—go to your Stationer or Jeweller and choose a "Swan" Fountpen which pleases your fancy—never mind about the point, your friend may change it for one that "just fits" afterwards—but mind and get the "Swan," which is all that a pen and gift should be!

DAINTY,
USEFUL, LASTING.

SENSIBLE, HELPFUL,
PLEASING.

THE SWAN

Standard Pattern
from 10/6

Safety Pattern
from 12/6

SOLD BY ALL STATIONERS AND JEWELLERS.

May we send our complete illustrated Xmas list?

MABIE TODD & CO.,
79 & 80, High Holborn, LONDON, W.C.

55, Cheapside, E.C., 95a, Regent Street, London, W.; 5, Exchange Street, Manchester; 37, Ave. de l'Opera, Paris; 8 & 10, Rue Neuve, Brussels; and at New York, Chicago, and Toronto.

a "swan" for everyone this Xmas!

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 11. Vol. 1.

[REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1912.

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 325
The Centenary of Peace with America— By Hector Macpherson	326
The Conquest of the South Pole— By W. Forbes Gray	327
An Eton Education—Part I.— By Mgr. R. H. Benson	328
War Against Poverty— A Rejoinder by Mrs. Sidney Webb	329
Swedenborg; The Savant and the Seer— By J. Howard Spalding	330
Portrait of Swedenborg The Twentieth Century—A Reply— By A. S. Neill	331
Silhouettes	332
Henry Maye's Hyndman. By C. C.	333
Literary Notes	334
Leonard Merrick— By M. Hamilton	335
Jupiter Carlyle— By Norman Maclean	336

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

MGR. BENSON

NORMAN MACLEAN

MRS. SIDNEY WEBB

CANON BARRY

The Tyranny of the Novel— By Canon Barry	PAGE 337
The Goldfinches of Galilee— Short Story—By René Bazin	339
Hyde Park—The People's Forum Correspondence	340 341
Reviews—
An Arthurian Romance	344
Valserine	344
Bee, the Princess of the Dwarfs	344
Plays by Sudermann	344
Tweedledum and Tweedledee	346
Benjamin Waugh	347
Victor Hugo	347
A History of the British Nation	348
Sweethearts at Home	348
Stories and Pictures of Japan	350
The Inferno	351
Books of the Week	352
List of Books Received	354

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OWING to the attitude of the Turkish delegates towards the Greek representatives at the Conference, the proceedings have been delayed. In diplomatic circles a feeling of hopefulness prevails. Good results are anticipated from the meetings of the Ambassadors. Everything, however, depends on the speedy and successful ending of the Conference between Turkey and the Allies, and that again depends on the question of Adrianople. That is admittedly a hard nut to crack.

The close of the year finds the Unionist party in a state of distraction over Tariff Reform. The trouble began when Lord Lansdowne, in a recent speech, cancelled Mr. Balfour's pledge with regard to a Referendum. Mr. Law, in his speech at Ashton-under-Lyne, brought the crisis to a head. A Referendum was impracticable, he said, because the question of food taxes in this country would be left for decision to the Oversea Dominions. The result is the splitting of the party into three sections—those who dislike the food taxes and prefer the Referendum, those in favour of the food taxes, and those who object to them being referred to the Colonies. The Colonies themselves are not enamoured of the proposal. In Canada, Conservatives as well as Liberals declare that the British taxpayers alone must decide whether their food is to be taxed or not.

In the House of Commons the Prime Minister outlined the Government programme after the Christmas holidays. They mean to dispose of Home Rule, Welsh Disestablishment, and the Franchise Bill. They also hope to deal with the Osborne Bill, the Railways Bill, and the Lords' amendments to the Scottish Temperance Bill, which has been suspended in the Upper House till the middle of January. Mr. Asquith hopes to see the programme finished by the middle of February, but he could give no pledge.

The result of the voting on the Insurance Act at the divisional meetings of the British Medical Association shows that against service were 11,309, and in favour 2,422. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has caused it to be known that the Government will protect against boycott or intimidation those doctors who agree to offer themselves for service.

Lord Rosebery's public references to the party system prepare us for the views which he has just expressed in an article which he contributes to the Review of Reviews. The party system, he thinks, is an evil—perhaps, even probably, a necessary evil, but still an evil. Its operation blights efficiency, which implies the rule of the fittest, whereas the present system puts in power, not the fittest, but the most eligible from the party point of view—that is, very often the very worst. Lord Rosebery offers no substitute. After all, he says, if you get rid of party in one shape, it will turn up again in another. "Party is as ineradicable as our climate: it is, indeed, part of our moral climate."

In an address to the Glasgow International Polity Club, Mr. Norman Angell said, in regard to war, they could not separate the economic from the moral problem. In the last analysis the two were bound together. The Balkans War, he remarked, was one of the best examples they could have in support of their thesis, for Turkey had always maintained that the only road to prosperity was by wielding the sword and conquering the neighbourhood. The war demonstrated that even after four or five hundred years' employment of physical force in conquest was a failure.

The declaration of Mr. John Dillon that, under Home Rule, the whole educational system of Ireland would be recast has greatly alarmed Roman Catholic dignitaries. Dr. O'Dwyer, Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, said they looked to Home Rule to bring Irishmen together; but Mr. Dillon had given them warning that the first work of the Irish Parliament would be to raise an issue letting loose the angriest political and religious passions. The Nationalist intimation, he said, was no less alarming for Protestants than for Catholics.

Since the publication of Darwin's epoch-making works, scientific controversy has hotly raged round the question of man's origin and antiquity. Special attention has been given to the discovery of primitive human remains. At a meeting of the Geological Society in London a palæolithic skull and mandible recently found in Essex were exhibited. The opinion was expressed that the skull provided the first discovered evidence of the primitive source whence man arose. The caveman, it is thought, was a degenerate offshoot of early man, and probably became extinct.

The controversy over the Territorial Force shows no sign of abatement. Speaking on the subject, Earl Percy said that the Force had failed to become the basis of a nation in arms. The voluntary system, he declared, had broken down, and in that case the time had come to resort to national service. Invasion was not the only danger. Germany would seize the first opportunity to disturb the European equilibrium and drive a wedge into the Triple Entente. Our fate would be decided on the Continent, and we must have an army on the Continental model. Addressing a meeting of employers, Lord Beauchamp said the Government were determined not to adopt compulsion, but would take the necessary steps to further the organisation of the Territorial Army.

With regard to the Cabinet crisis in South Africa, the public are getting a glimpse behind the scenes. General Botha's resignation arose from a speech in which General Hertzog was understood to say that he wished to suck the Empire till it was finished, and then throw it aside. This construction of his speech he repudiates. His meaning was that the interests of South Africa came first, and that when they conflicted with the interests of the Empire he would vote for South Africa. General Botha suggested that General Hertzog should give an undertaking that without consulting him he should agree not to speak on matters calculated to create unpleasantness. This General Hertzog refused to do, whereupon General Botha resigned.

In the Italian Chamber the Marquis di San Giuliano made special reference to the Triple Alliance, which he said was one of the great causes of economic progress. In regard to the Albanian problem, Austria and Italy agreed on the fundamental lines of solution, on the principles of nationality, the country to be neutralised under the guarantee of the Great Powers.

In the Canadian House of Commons, Mr. Forster, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, said it must not be supposed that the Admiralty memorandum, strong as it was, contained the most important part of the information that had been received. If the present measure was blocked, it meant a delay of two years at least, and meanwhile the fate of the Empire might be decided.

THE CENTENARY OF PEACE WITH AMERICA

FROM the earliest days poets and prophets have looked forward to a time when nations would hang the trumpet in the hall, and study war no more. The millennial ideal is far from being realised. The "warless world" of which Tennyson sang is not yet within sight. From the dawn of history—except for a brief space under Rome—the world has not experienced universal peace. With the era of Industrialism, the modern world was expected to leave behind the barbarities of the battlefield, and to find salvation in cultivating the arts of peace. At the time of the Great Exhibition optimism was the dominant note. Writers like Buckle, in prophetic vision, saw the rise of a new day, when the nations, by the magic wand of commerce, would be transformed into universal brotherhood. Cobden, it will be remembered, viewed Free Trade as a potent instrument for developing a pacific civilisation.

One hundred years ago Britain stood in inglorious isolation. She had lost her great American colony; her sun seemed to have set. Her defeat contained the germs of future greatness. She learned the futility and folly of despotism, and the experience so gained stood her in good stead in dealing with her Australian colonies. To the wisdom of her colonial policy this country to-day owes her position as the leading world Power. In that lurks another danger arising out of the rivalries and jealousies of other Powers, whose colonial aspirations are beset with insuperable difficulties. In this connection it should be noted that the loyalty of the colonies and the unity, of race, religion, and national sentiment between this country and America are likely in the near future to give a new meaning to the balance of power, which up till now has had purely a European significance. In his day Canning called in the New World to redress the balance of the Old. Britain has called in America and the colonies to redress the balance of power on the side of a pacific and progressive civilisation. Too long have the military nations of the Continent assumed the dictatorship of civilisation, and in Napoleonic fashion been engaged cutting and carving the map of Europe to suit their purely selfish designs. For this state of things Great Britain is not without her share of blame. For purely selfish reasons we have propped up among alien peoples a hideous government, whose history is written in letters of blood—a government alien in race, religion, and political traditions. In the name of the Balance of Power we have helped to arrest the civilisation of the Near East. With the fall of Turkey that melancholy chapter of British diplomacy is closed, let us hope for ever. The seeds of nationality and liberty, which in America and the Colonies have produced such excellent fruit, only need opportunity in the Balkans to produce like results. One hundred years' experience have proved the value, the enduring worth, the undying vitality of the great elements of liberty and peace. Civilisation in the Balkans will make rapid progress only when it develops on Anglo-Saxon lines, and refuses to be dictated to by a despotism which, under the sanctimonious name of Divine right, seeks, not national liberty for others, but self-aggrandisement for itself. We do well to celebrate the centenary of peace with our kin beyond the sea. The American, like the French, Revolution takes its place in history as one great turning-point in civilisation.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE CONQUEST OF THE SOUTH POLE*

WHATEVER may be thought of Captain Amundsen's sudden transference of his affections from the North to the South Pole when Captain Scott announced his intention of going to the Antarctic to continue and complete the work of Sir Ernest Shackleton, it is impossible to read these entrancing volumes without being deeply impressed by the marvellous rapidity and ease with which the hardy Norseman reached the goal of his endeavours. All things considered, it is no disparagement of Captain Peary to say that Captain Amundsen's performance is the most brilliant in the now fairly extensive annals of Polar exploration.

I.

We do not propose to recount the story of Captain Amundsen's triumphal progress (for it was nothing less) to the South Pole. That has already been done so often that no good purpose would be served in going over the ground again. Our intention is rather to try to bring into prominence the factors upon which the success of his achievement was essentially based.

But, first of all, a word or two about the book. Handsomely produced, it is an excellent piece of descriptive journalism, but it lacks the literary finish of the Antarctic volumes of Sir Ernest Shackleton and Captain Scott. Though the work extends to nearly 900 pages, only the first four chapters of Vol. II., covering 175 pages, deal with the actual journey to and from the South Pole. The first volume contains a somewhat fulsome introduction by Dr. Nansen, which, by the way, does scant justice to British explorers in the Antarctic. The remainder is taken up with a history of the South Pole, the detailing of preparations, and a thoroughly readable narrative of the journey to the South, and of life at Framheim, the winter headquarters on the edge of the Great Ice Barrier.

In Vol. II., in addition to the description of the journey to the Pole, there is an interesting chapter by Lieutenant Prestrud on his eastern sledge journey to King Edward VII. Land. This expedition not only confirmed Captain Scott's discovery, but resulted in a careful examination of the Bay of Whales and the Ice Barrier, and the collection of a number of valuable geological specimens. In another chapter Lieutenant Nilsen describes the voyages of the Fram to and from the base in the Bay of Whales.

II.

The tale unfolded in these volumes affords convincing proof that Norse valour and daring have lost none of their ancient glory. There is here revealed the old spirit of adventure, and with it foresight, skill, determination, dauntless courage, and quiet, cheerful endurance. But, as has already been pointed out, what impresses most of all is the alacrity with which the Norsemen scored their triumph. Indeed, the swiftness, comparative ease, and high spirits with which the whole enterprise was carried out is suggestive rather of a holiday party out for a ramble than of a small group of men battling with stupendous forces and facing death in an undiscovered land. From Framheim to the South Pole and back is a distance of about 1,860 miles, and it was covered in 99 days. On the outgoing journey the average rate of progress was 15½ miles per day, but on the homeward journey the speed was actually increased to 22½ miles per day. Obstacles seem to have been surmounted with

* "The South Pole." By Roald Amundsen. Translated by A. G. Chater. Two vols. £2 2s. net. (Murray.)

the minimum of trouble. It is really amazing to learn that, on the first day of the ascent to the high plateau, the distance covered by men, dogs, and heavily laden sledges was 11½ miles, "with a rise of 2,000 feet." Two "fairly steep slopes" were negotiated at "a jog trot."

III.

Unquestionably, Captain Amundsen had extraordinary good fortune. To begin with, the weather was remarkably fine. True, the party experienced a blizzard or two, an occasional gale, and some fogs while working their way through the mountains and during the march across the plateau, but these never seriously interfered with their progress. Delays there were, but they were, as a rule, of short duration. On the other hand, there are numerous references to the exemplary behaviour of the weather, and in one place Captain Amundsen alludes to the dogs lying "snoring in the heat of the sun."

But perhaps the most important factor of all was the wonderful performance of the dogs. Captain Amundsen has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that, if properly fed and cared for, these animals are a far more valuable asset to a Polar exploration party than ponies. Of the fifty-two dogs with which he started from Framheim, he managed to take forty-two on to the plateau, and no fewer than eighteen to the Pole, while twelve actually completed the double journey. Here is how the dogs (and their drivers) did their work immediately before reaching the great plateau:—

"For this last pull up I must give the highest praise both to the dogs and their drivers; it was a brilliant performance on both sides. I can still see the situation clearly before me. The dogs seemed positively to understand that this was the last big effort that was asked of them; they lay flat down and hauled, dug their claws in and dragged themselves forward. . . . How they toiled, men and beasts, up that slope! But they got on, inch by inch, until the steepest part was behind them."

IV.

But if Fortune smiled on Captain Amundsen and his comrades, it were foolish to ignore the fact that the success of the expedition was due in no small measure to his own experience, judgment, and organising ability. Again and again we are shown how carefully every part of the undertaking, to the minutest detail, had been thought out. The expedition, from start to finish, was admirably managed. Take, for example, the provisioning. On the homeward journey a depôt was missed, but the misfortune did not disturb the equanimity of the party in the slightest, for they "had food enough." At a later stage, when the depôt in 85° S. was reached, the dogs "had double pemmican rations, besides as many oatmeal biscuits as they would eat. We had such masses of biscuits now that we could positively throw them about." Clearly, ample provision had been made for man and for beast.

Nor must we forget to place to Captain Amundsen's credit that he journeyed to the South Pole and back without loss of human life; indeed, without serious mishap of any kind. Considering the innumerable chasms and hummocks encountered by the way, likewise the dangerous condition of the glaciers, it says much for the skill and vigilance of the party that they suffered comparatively little. Some discomfort, caused by shortness of breath while on the high plateau, and frost-bitten faces, seem to have been the only ailments:

W. FORBES GRAY.

AN ETON EDUCATION

MGR. R. H. BENSON

BY

PART I.

I.

To Etonians, at any rate, Eton is the Queen of Schools. She has nursed them for years with an exquisite grace that is all her own; she has led them up from wide-eyed childhood to the august splendours of the Sixth Form or the Eleven or the Eight, or, at the very least, to the secure and detached dignity of one who can "fag," and walk arm-in-arm up High Street with a friend; one who talks with masters of the affairs of the house, and presents his tutor—as one man to another—when he leaves, with a piece of engraved plate. She has, that is to say, introduced them to the world that lies outside the walls of home, and taught them an Art of Life—an Art which her very enemies and critics acknowledge as supreme. She has sent them into the world of men with a stamp upon them, that no other dares imitate, and of which they themselves are never ashamed: they leave unbuttoned always the lowest button of their waistcoat, and count themselves cadets, at least, of the noblest House in the world. But the education she gives them is simply deplorable.

I was fortunate enough to win a scholarship at Eton, owing to the admirable teaching I received, ad hoc, at my private school: that is to say, out of a large and highly specialised class of boys from all over the country, I was selected, for my knowledge of classics, my skill in Latin versifying, and my adequateness in mathematics, with eleven or twelve others, to represent what is, I suppose, the most coveted schoolboy educational team of the year. Such, at any rate, is an Eton scholarship deemed to be by professional educationists. And I left Eton four years later, a disappointment to everyone, including myself: I had learned so to hate the classics that I have never, willingly, read a Greek play since; I fumbled, the other day only, over a sum in simple division, and it has never even entered my head to try to win a Latin verse prize in the Westminster Gazette. Yet I am not wholly without intelligence, neither was I altogether so at Eton: I managed, for example, to win the English Verse prize, without advice or help from anyone, in the half in which I left. There are to-day, I suppose, still left two subjects which I can study without repugnance—history and English; since in neither of these two branches of knowledge can I remember a single lesson ever being given to me while I was at school.

II.

Now what is wrong with Eton education (and, for the matter of that, with all the general education at all the greater public schools)? Why is it that boy after boy leaves such schools immeasurably the intellectual inferior not only of all his rivals in the Continental schools, but the inferior also of the English grammar-school boy, and, of course, of the "crammer's pup." After I had left Eton I went, for a year, to Messrs. Wren and Gurney; and I say without hesitation that I learned there, in that one year, not just a few examination tips, a few brilliant and telling tricks, but more of the solid principles of mathematics, more of the general outlines of history in its broad and really important aspect, more of the real glories of the classics, more accuracy, more appreciativeness, in a word, a more sound knowledge of the things that are thought to make an educated man, than in all my four years at Eton—incalculably more. In six weeks, too, in Brittany, I began not only to perceive that French was actually a language in which real ideas could be conveyed, but even to learn how to begin to convey them. And I had "learned" French for four years, previously, at Eton.

First, I would say that at Eton no real attention whatever is paid to the idiosyncrasies of the individual boy. Roughly speaking, it may be said that there are four kinds of boys—classical, mathematical, literary, and scientific (or mechanical). Under the first class I would comprise those of whom classical scholars are made—boys to whom the deliberate analysis of language and its laws comes very nearly naturally; men who take an actual delight in Greek poetry, and can distinguish, inevitably, the respective force, let us say, of an aorist and a perfect. The second class represents those who take to pure abstract thought in itself, apart, originally, from its effects in the world of matter; the third class are those to whom humanity is interesting; the fourth, those to whom material objects and their inter-relations are the one solid realm of fact. Now these classes of minds are almost as diverse as if they were separate creations. Yet at Eton, in the main, they are all treated exactly alike. "Specialisation" is considered the supreme danger, except in the case of the "Army class," for which a grudging exception is made. The whole lot practically go through the mill together; the boy whose fingers are itching for cogs and wheels, or the scalpel; the boy who really wants to know what politics are all about, and why France has a Republic and Russia an autocracy; the boy who shamefacedly makes poetry in a pocket-book under the elms of the playing-fields; the boy who longs not to have the moon, but to weigh it like other people, and to whom the potentialities of the number nine are as beautiful as the opening of a flower—all these minds and temperaments pass alike under the car not even of the classical scholar, but of the heaviest grammarian.

III.

For Eton herself, in spite of her protests, is an almost insane specialist. She talks of "a broad and liberal education," and provides instead one of the narrowest type. When she is pressed as to why a training in the smallest niceties of Ciceronian Latin, and in the exact force of Greek particles at a certain period—(for it is not even Greek and Latin in general that she teaches)—is "liberal," she answers incoherently that the study of these details, and these only, give a peculiarly magical tone to the minds that submit to them, partly because they are so exceedingly repulsive to a majority of students. If she really taught Latin and Greek, it would not be quite so bad; if she rendered her average child capable of seeing the point of any of Plautus' jokes, or of understanding that Horace really wrote poetry, and did not, instead, sit down and "make up" lines which fulfilled some arbitrary conditions of metre; if her children understood that Homer was as really excited about his wars and adventures as Mr. Rudyard Kipling—if they learnt, that is to say, Latin and Greek, I suppose it might just be arguable that these things formed quite as good, and nearly as useful, a training for the mind as Shakespeare or the elements of chemistry. But it is not so. Her boys are trained instead in the elements that least mattered, in phases of languages that have long ago passed away, to give place to new and vital demands. They are taught, drearily and ineffectively, to handle a few of the tools of a class that is, perhaps, the narrowest-minded in the world, and the most complacent—the classical grammarian.

IV.

'Another point is the extreme dreariness—(what Eton masters would call the "discipline")—with which subjects are usually taught. Now everyone would acknowledge—(except, I suppose, the modern Kindergarten school)—that there must be real effort in the process of learning. Boys, like the rest of us, have a strong element of sloth in their nature. But the efforts ought not to depress, but to stimulate. The chemically minded boy will work very hard indeed at what is called "stinks"; he will certainly learn the discipline of labour, and profit by it too, since he soon perceives that results cannot be obtained without it. But what is there peculiarly helpful or broadening in being forced to make efforts in a cause which neither then nor afterwards appears to him to justify the labour? Allow that the Eton theory is sound, even, and that no man can be called truly educated who has not thoroughly mastered the forces of the Optative and "done" Horace's Odes, with notes, yet, even so, why should the appalling labours of the Lexicon be laid upon him? Why are "cribs" considered immoral? With the use of "cribs," under supervision, he will learn far more quickly and joyously; he will remember what he learns, at least with equal ease; and it is even conceivable that he may some day catch a glimpse of the truth that Horace's Odes are a part of literature. I remember still with horror and resentment the hours I spent over grammars and dictionaries, and yet, classically speaking, I am an exceedingly poor scholar. I remember with even deeper resentment my excursions into trigonometry, my feeble, dreary hours under a German master; and yet I cannot bless myself in German now, nor do a simple sum in practice. In French I learned—(and many hundreds of Etonians will corroborate me in my memory)—that "Esprit does not mean Spirit." But I do not know what it does mean. If these subjects are worth learning, why are they not taught—really taught—at Eton? Why are the memories of the tasks among the most dismal remembrances of our lives? Is it, perhaps, that I myself was idle and uninterested? Certainly it was so. But whose business was it to interest me, if not my masters'?

V.

So far, then, I should sum up as follows:—

(1) An Eton education is not, fundamentally, in the least "liberal" or "broad." It is intensely narrow. The backbone of an Eton education is the "Classics"; by which is meant a minute study of certain minute details of grammarians' analyses of the Latin and Greek languages at certain limited periods of their development. The poetry and literature of classical writers are never even viewed afar off except by exceptional boys.

(2) No allowance is made for individual temperaments. Specialisation in history, modern languages, science, mechanics, is rigidly excluded—and even in mathematics, too, to some extent.

(3) What is taught is taught drearily. Of course there are, again, exceptional boys who will understand and take advantage of the real learning of their teachers, and will arrive at proficiency in spite of the heart-breaking obstacles of their methods. But the average Eton boy leaves Eton entirely uneducated, and with a profound and lasting taste for even those branches of knowledge which he might have acquired.

(To be continued.)

WAR AGAINST POVERTY

A REJOINDER BY MRS. SIDNEY WEBB

I AM interested in Mr. Munroe's extraordinary suggestion, in the letter which he contributes to EVERYMAN of December 13th, that I am proposing the creation of five separate authorities "to visit the same family." My proposal is the exact reverse of the creation of new authorities: I wish to diminish those that already exist, by one. At the present time there are six separate authorities giving treatment or relief out of public funds to working-class families—the Public Health authority, the Public Education authority, the Public Lunacy authority, the Old Age Pension authority, the Unemployment authority, and the Poor Law authority. The Poor Law Commission discovered that, in some cases, three or four of these authorities were actually maintaining or treating members of the same family, without any knowledge on the part of any one of them that the others were doing it. It is this system of overlapping and disorder that we are proposing to put an end to. We propose that all sick people shall be treated by the Public Health authority, all children by the Public Education authority, all mentally defective and lunatic people by the Lunacy authority, all aged people by the Old Age Pension authority, and all unemployed persons by the authority which deals with unemployment; and that there shall be a definite system of co-ordinating the work of these existing authorities so as to prevent overlapping and confusion. Does Mr. Munroe desire to abolish the Public Health authority, the Public Education authority, the Lunacy authority, the Old Age Pension authority, the Unemployment authority, or any of these? Does he wish to throw back all the persons who are being educated, treated, or otherwise helped by these authorities into the Poor Law, with its stigma of pauperism? Any of your readers who wish for more detailed information about this policy of Prevention, and who desire to be convinced as to the extravagance and confusion of our present methods, had better read our little book on the "Prevention of Destitution," of which, apparently, Mr. Munroe knows the title but does not know the contents.

Those of your readers who are definitely Conservative in politics will find practically the same scheme of Reform proposed in the excellent little booklet on "Poor Law Reform. A Practical Programme: The scheme of the Unionist Social Reform Committee, explained by Mr. John W. Hills, M.P., and Maurice Woods, with an introduction by the Right Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P." (West Strand Publishing Company, 1s. net). To quote from the general account of this scheme, we find that the Unionist Social Reform Committee "studied the conditions which they found existing at the moment, and tried to disentangle those features which were essential and permanent from those which were subsidiary and accidental; and, having done so, to re-examine, in the light of the experience thus gained, the conflicting theories of the different schools. When this was done they found that the points of agreement were far greater than the points of difference, and it appeared possible to find a solution acceptable to a wide body of moderate opinion." As a result of this impartial investigation, the Unionist Social Reform Committee proposes to abolish the Poor Law authority and to distribute the whole of its work amongst those public authorities that are already engaged in the work of Prevention.

SWEDENBORG: THE SAVANT AND THE SEER

* * *

BY J. HOWARD SPALDING

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG was born in Stockholm in the year 1688, and died in London in 1772. He was the second son of Jesper Swedberg, Bishop of Skara. The surname was changed to Swedenborg when the family was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora in 1719. He was a man of boundless industry, and distinguished himself in many departments of knowledge and practical work—as a mathematician, engineer, and metallurgist—besides traversing the whole range of the science known to his time, and that, not as a mere student, but as a bold explorer, whose constant aim it was to penetrate the most hidden secrets of nature. In some of his speculations he passed out of the ken of his contemporaries; and many MSS. of his scientific and philosophical papers have lain hidden in the library of the Swedish Royal Academy of Sciences till the present day, when they are being unearthed and published under the supervision of a committee composed of some of the most eminent men of science in Sweden. When he had reached his fifty-sixth year, he abandoned a career in which he had attained honour in his own country, and a European reputation, relinquished all prospects of worldly distinction, and devoted himself with the same indefatigable industry which he had displayed in all his former pursuits to an investigation of the nature and laws of the spiritual world, and their bearing on the life and destiny of man. The break between his earlier and later aims was not so sudden as this statement may seem to imply, but it was complete. For a year or two he continued to discharge his professional duties as Assessor of the Swedish Board of Mines. Then he resigned his office, that he might devote himself entirely to a life of unrecognised, unremitting, and almost solitary toil in the new vocation to which he believed he had been called.

This change was brought about by an event which he described as the "opening of his spiritual senses," that is, by his being introduced into conscious, sensible intercourse with the spiritual world and its inhabitants. The nature of this intromission can only be understood by means of the facts disclosed to Swedenborg by the experience itself. If those facts are admitted, the process becomes comprehensible, and even simple. Man, Swedenborg says, is, even during his life on earth, a denizen of two worlds. By means of his physical body he inhabits the natural world, and is subject to its laws; and by means of his mind, which is itself a spiritual body in perfect human form, and the cause from which the physical body derives its form, he inhabits the spiritual world and is subject to its laws. When a man undergoes the change which we call death, he merely lays aside the physical body which had served for his use in the natural world, of which it was a part, and then finds himself just as much a man in every organ and faculty, in a word, just as much himself in every essential respect as he was before. The only difference is that the natural world and all that it contains have completely vanished from his purview, and that he finds himself existing in a spiritual body, cognate with the spiritual environment in which he is thenceforward to live. He possesses every sense which he possessed before, only of a more exquisite quality, but his senses now take cognisance of spiritual and not of natural things, although, to the mere sense, the objects, animate and inanimate, by which he finds himself surrounded, so exactly resemble those with which he was familiar during his life on earth, that, unless he reflects on the subject, he perceives no difference whatever. He develops no new faculty; he simply begins to exercise consciously faculties which were latent in him before. Every man, therefore, according to Swedenborg's testimony, possesses, during his life on earth, faculties capable of bringing him into conscious intercourse with spiritual beings and the world in which they live; and there have been innumerable instances in history of temporary and partial intromissions into that world, in states of trance and sometimes in states of wakefulness. The Bible, for instance, is full of them. The difference in Swedenborg's case was that, for the last twenty-eight years of his life, his spiritual senses were aroused to full and continuous activity, while he was awake and in the enjoyment of his natural powers of observation and reason. Now, according to his report, although objects in the spiritual world appear to exist in space, and the changes they undergo to occur in time, just as they do in this world, yet space and time, as we know them, that is, as fixed and measurable quantities, do not exist there. All the apparent changes of place which take place there are really changes in the spiritual state of the person who experiences them, by which he is brought into *rappor*t with the spiritual states of other denizens of the spiritual world, of which he was previously but remotely, or not at all, aware. "These appearances," Swedenborg says, "are so real that a spirit [one who has but lately arrived from the natural world] is entirely ignorant that they originate in this way. The angels [those who have passed into heaven] know, but do not think about it." This being the nature of spiritual motion, Swedenborg, after his spiritual senses were brought into full activity, was able to traverse the whole spiritual world, or, in other words, to become sensibly acquainted with the infinitely varied spiritual states in which men exist there, without being in the least impeded by his earthly body, which had no relation whatever to these mental journeys.

Swedenborg was from his youth a sincerely, though unobtrusively, religious man; but although, no doubt, he had his own thoughts about the theology taught in his day, he seems, until this crisis in his life arrived, to have accepted in the main the doctrinal teaching of the Lutheran Church in Sweden, of which his father had been a dignitary. At all events, up to this time he had given no special study to theology. The crisis occurred in the year 1744. He immediately began to learn Hebrew, so that he might be able to read the Old Testament in the original language, and commenced a minute and reiterated study of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, in the course of which he prepared for his own use several large volumes of indexes and notes which, considering the space of time in which they were compiled, are monuments of industry. In 1747 he began to write his great expository work, the "Arcana Coelestia," the first volume of which he published in 1749. In this brief space of time he reached those convictions about God, Creation, and Man from which he never afterwards swerved; for there is nothing essential in his subsequent teaching which is not contained in the "Arcana." A brief account of the new outlook on the whole field of human life which Swedenborg thus attained will be given in the next number of EVERYMAN.

Em. Swedenborg:

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG, NATUS 1688, OBIIT 1772

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

A REPLY

MY DEAR PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY,—As one of her sons, I take it upon myself to answer the epistle you wrote to my mother, the Twentieth Century. I believe some of her sons may resent your good-humoured banter of the lady; but as I was your pupil for three years and learned to love your dear, kind ways, I couldn't resent your remarks, try as I might. As your pupil, I bowed to your knowledge of Shakespeare and Milton, but when you leave your recognised province and dilate upon the waywardness of the young century, I confess that my head refuses to incline forwards even an inch. You say many things that are true, but you show a complete lack of sympathy. For example, you deplore the fact that we have lost our manners, and you do not realise that the loss of them is good for us. The main characteristic of modernism is its contempt for the little things of life. There are many very little things—Good Manners, Tariff Reform, the Insurance Bill, the White Slave Traffic, Puritanism: in short, most things that figure in daily newspapers. The young century objects to a meticulous regard for, say, manners when there are huge problems to face. When a man is thinking about a plan for abolishing the idle rich and raising the down-trodden labourer he is apt to forget mere politeness. The young century refuses to take seriously the ranting of righteous M.P.s and bishops about white slaves, because it knows the root of the evil is that some men, e.g., M.P.s and bishops, have too much money while others have too little. Again, the century considers the Insurance Bill an insult. The Bill says to the worker, "Poor chap! we know you can't make a decent enough wage to live or to die comfortably; we'll give you a sort of pension."

You lament the death of charity; we lament the sad fact that charity is not dead. Charity lives because some people have more money than they ought to have; it is a bye-product of capitalism. Now I know you will smile and say to yourself, "I've heard all this before: it is merely Socialism." You might even call it cant, whatever cant may mean; but you should know that we young 'uns are in deadly earnest. You, professor, are a much cleverer man than, say, a successful brewer; but the brewer makes more money: he may become a lord, he may even become a Cabinet Minister. For, as you know, cleverness isn't essential for party politics. We want to stop this race for wealth; we object to any man buying his wife a diamond necklace so long as labourers are rising at 5 a.m. and working till 6 p.m. I am afraid you find the world so pleasant with all its books that you forget about the people who rise at 5 a.m. The moderns are disinterested; every good Socialist is an altruist.

I have been writing of the "modern" people of the century. Dear me! the folks who revel in picture shows and party politics are mid-Victorian, or at least mid-Victorian with a difference. I admit that the taste of the people is poor; cheap musical comedies, mawkish melodrama, vulgar farce attract crowds, while Ibsen, Shaw—yea, Shakespeare also, fill the front row of the pit. Are we any worse than previous ages? I don't think so; and I say boldly that altruism in its best form is more universal now than it has been for generations. Judge the century by its silliness if you will, but do think kindly of the men and women who honestly strive after, if not a new Heaven, at least a new Earth.—Your admiring, yea, loving pupil,

A. S. NEILL.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

THE crowd, good-humoured and expectant, was waiting for the gallery doors to open for a popular musical comedy. It was Saturday evening, and City offices and West End shops had let loose their staffs. Pretty typists, smart milliners, the ubiquitous flapper, a number of gallery "boys" eager to see their stage favourites, and the usual nondescripts that fringe all London crowds—men and women shabby of aspect, uncertain as to age.

A sharp-faced woman with a feather in her hat, holding a small child by the hand, grumbled that the doors were not yet open, and feared it was going to rain. The child whimpered a little, and was promptly cuffed, whereat a kindly matron sucking an orange just behind declared it was a shame!

"Shame yourself," retorted the lady of the feather. "I can't abide to see a little 'un hit," said the good creature, and extracted a pear-drop from a pocket hidden in a remote portion of her garments. The small child took the sweet, and we relapsed into silence, broken shortly by the arrival of an itinerant musician. His face was black, and he twanged a banjo hopelessly out of tune as accompaniment to a weary voice. No one applauded; the stout matron shook her head, the lady of the feather sniffed contempt.

The musician took his failure with philosophy and sheered off to another pitch. The rain by this time had commenced to fall, and even the flappers grew dispirited. We huddled together closer, and ached for the opening of the doors.

And then, just as our patience was exhausted, an old man in an Inverness coat and slouch hat strode into the empty space before us. Something there was in his carriage, his face and figure, that arrested the attention. His clothes were threadbare and tattered indescribably, but he folded his rags about him with an air of defiance that yet lacked bravado. He took off his hat and announced that he would give impersonations of great men. It was an old turn—we had seen it, every one of us, at the music-halls—the man with the hat twisted into a variety of forms, with features to match. He went right through the gamut, and was Napoleon crossing the Alps and a Pierrot upon the sands within two minutes. The man was an actor—more, he was an artist. His poverty, his rags, concealed, but could not kill his genius.

The show finished, he handed round his hat with an air of princely condescension that impressed us. We gave him our pennies cheerfully, and the stout lady wished him luck. I noticed his boots were broken, but the brave old mouth did not quiver, nor did his eyes flinch. He stood before us indifferent to our offerings, and, the doors opening at the moment, moved aside to let us pass. The light flashed full in his face, and in the moment that his eyes met mine I recognised him. He had been a famous actor once, and had played in the very theatre at whose threshold he now postured for our pence. He read the knowledge in my face—a swift pang rent his fortitude; for a moment he waited, the next he gathered his rags about him and passed into the shadows of the Strand.

"Lor!" said the lady of the feather, "he ain't wot you might call grateful-like, is he?"

"I think the man was hungry," said the friendly matron, and she gave a little sigh.

HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN

THE new volume of Mr. Hyndman's reminiscences is quite as fascinating as his last, though in the nature of things the canvas is somewhat smaller. The previous volume told us of Mr. Hyndman's wanderings in search, among other things, of a political creed, and brought us in contact with Garibaldians, Irish Fenians, and Land Leaguers, old Chartist and Republicans, to say nothing of politicians like Disraeli and astute onlookers of the governing class like Lady Dorothy Nevill. But from the moment that Marx converted him to collectivism, Mr. Hyndman, in the intellectual sense at least, ceased to wander. With an intensity of conviction and a self-sacrificing enthusiasm as rare as they are admirable, he threw all his energies into the Socialist movement. The present volume is practically a record of his relations with that movement since the eighties. And very entertaining as well as instructive reading it makes.

I.

The apparent paradox of Mr. Hyndman's character, which lends peculiar interest to his book, is that he contrives to be a strict and, as many people would say, a fanatical believer in a fixed creed and panacea, without ever for a moment allowing this to interfere with the ease and humanity of the rest of his nature. He is a Marxian of the Marxians—"at the feet of Gamaliel himself." Yet there is nothing about him, except his convictions, that suggests the popular image of the "Socialist"—an image which, though it has nothing whatever to do with Socialism, has undoubtedly its counterpart in real life among the devotees of that doctrine. Take away Mr. Hyndman's Marxianism—you would find it no easy job, by the way—and you have a very genial, highly cultured and travelled old English gentleman, with all the traditions that go with that type, with its courtesy, with its generous love of the good things of life, and with, as far as externals go, not a little of its conservatism. He retains also to a great extent those strong, though more or less subconscious, articles of political faith which that type inherited, but which among Socialists too often tend to get rubbed out, notably an intense love of personal liberty, a belief in the sanctity of nationality, and a strong sense that, whatever pacifists may say, there is nothing in the world so splendid as armed fighting in a just cause.

II.

That impression, the impression of the author's personality, is the final and most significant thing that strikes one as one lays down Mr. Hyndman's book. But, in the course of reading it, one comes upon plenty of good stories well told, and plenty of shrewd criticisms of men and things.

Most readers will probably turn with peculiar interest to what the writer has to say of his principal contemporaries in the Socialist movement, and especially of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Of Mr. Shaw he writes very cleverly, though perhaps one may be tempted to think that neither of these very able and very honest men is quite capable of understanding, and therefore of doing justice to, the other. Between them there is a gulf fixed—a gulf, I think, less of conviction than of temperament and habit of mind. One of the most amusing passages in the book is that in which he describes his dinner with Shaw after the latter had spoken for him at Burnley. "It commenced," says Mr. Hyndman, "by my watching him with concealed and silent horror supply his waste of tissue by eating only the white of fried eggs. Since a well-known cricketer excused himself to me years before for having dropped an easy catch on the ground that he supped on oysters and hot port wine and water the previous evening, I do not think my natural sense of the fitting and the congruous in matters gastronomic had received such a shock." They proceeded to discuss Shakespeare, for whom Mr. Hyndman—here again the contrast is characteristic—has a full-blooded admiration, while finding Ibsen simply boring.

III.

It will be seen that Mr. Hyndman has no more sympathy with Mr. Shaw's fancies in the matter of food and drink than with his belief in the "New Drama." In a very ingenious passage, he attributes all Shaw's defects as a playwright to these peculiarities. "Take Shaw now and feed him up for a season on fine flesh dishes artfully combined and carefully cooked, turn a highly skilled French chef on to him in every department of his glorious art, prescribe for him stout, black jack, or, better still, the highest class of Burgundy of the Romanée Conti variety, born in a good year, and Shaw would be raised forthwith to the nth power of intellectual attainment. His strong human sympathies, no longer half-soured by albuminous indigestion, would bring the tears to our eyes, and tend them gently as they course down our cheeks. Lyrics of exquisite form and infinite fancy would literally ripple out of him, while his blank verse and his rhymed couplets would be the joy of all mankind. As to his humour, Mercutio, whom Shakespeare killed, as he himself confessed, in order to prevent Mercutio from killing him, would be a mere lay figure by the side of the irrepressible funsters Shaw should furnish for us." Mr. Hyndman does not add that under such treatment G. B. S. would inevitably accept Marx's Theory of Value; but one feels that he thinks so.

IV.

Of the other figures that stand out prominently in the history of the Socialist movement in England, Mr. Hyndman has much that is interesting to say. A powerful, if a very tragic, interest attaches to his narrative of the tragedy of Marx's daughter, Eleanor. Mr. Hyndman tells the tale simply and strongly, and with all the instinctive though restrained loathing which a decent man feels for a cur of the type of Aveling. He attempts to draw no moral; and perhaps to such a story there is no moral save the old reflection that Satan is 'the Prince of this World. Nevertheless, considered as a commentary on "advanced ethics," there is perhaps this to be said: that no girl, fresh from a convent school, and easily capable of being exhibited to the world as an example of defenceless innocence, ever placed herself so utterly at the mercy of an inconceivably worthless man in consequence of her ignorance as did Eleanor Marx, as the direct result of the inheritance of the most advanced revolutionary culture of the age. It is the one solid thing to be said against the anarchic morals that were preached so easily in the early Socialist movement that they meant one thing to the slightly inhuman idealists who invented them and quite another thing to the devils who occasionally took advantage of them. It is one thing to have Free Love preached with perfectly sincere conviction and with almost too austere purity of motive by Bernard Shaw. It is quite another thing to see its consequences deduced and practised with diabolic logic by Edward Aveling.

There is little more that needs adding, except that whatever may happen ultimately to the cause of Socialism, these two volumes of Mr. Hyndman's will always stand out as monuments not only of historical interest, but of personal nobility.

C. C.

LITERARY NOTES

THE lamented death of Mr. Whitelaw Reid reminds me of a rather curious fact, namely, that the United States have produced quite a small army of literary ambassadors and consuls. And in saying this, I am thinking not of second-rate men, but of some of the greatest names in American literature. Mr. Whitelaw Reid's predecessors include Motley and Lowell, the foremost historian and the finest literary critic of the New World. Nathaniel Hawthorne and Bret Harte both served as consuls in this country, the former in Liverpool and the latter in Glasgow. Washington Irving, on the other hand, was for a short time secretary to the United States Legation in London.

* * * * *

And if we go further afield, we are confronted with the equally notable names of Fenimore Cooper and Bayard Taylor. Cooper was U.S. consul at Lyons for three years, and Taylor was ambassador at Berlin, a post for which he was eminently fitted in more ways than one. He had a profound knowledge of German literature, one of the fruits of which was his classic translation of Goethe's "Faust." I ought also to mention his brilliant lectures, entitled "Studies in German Literature," which are still recommended to English students as a thoroughly competent survey of the leading characteristics of the subject.

* * * * *

Mr. Whitelaw Reid maintained the literary tradition, though with less brilliancy than his predecessors. The fact is he was not so much a man of letters as an able journalist and publicist. He made no mark in the realm of pure literature, though some critics have been writing as if he did. Most of his books deal with political subjects, and are of ephemeral interest. Occasionally, however, he gave lectures and addresses which clearly showed that the literary talent was not dormant. As an after-dinner speaker, I should not place him alongside of his immediate predecessor, Mr. Choate, who not only proved himself a man of marvellous versatility, but spoke with a grace, fluency, and humour which were quite irresistible. Nevertheless, Mr. Whitelaw Reid wrote books, and may therefore be acclaimed a literary ambassador.

* * * * *

Lady Sybil Grant, who was the principal guest at the annual ladies' dinner of the Authors' Club, is the elder daughter of Lord Rosebery. Many well-known authors and lady writers were present to welcome this recent recruit to the ranks of literature. Flattering things were said of Lady Grant's literary attainments, and while some of these were deserved, one must not forget that for the present she is basking in the sunshine of her distinguished father's reputation. I observed that in announcing her recent book, her publishers were careful to add that she was the daughter of Lord Rosebery. But the critics generally are agreed that Lady Sybil gives promise of outliving the necessity for adventitious support of this kind.

* * * * *

The approaching centenary of Wagner's birth is likely to bring us one or two fresh books about the composer. Messrs. Bell already announce a biography from the pen of Mr. John Runciman. The literature regarding Wagner and his music-dramas is now so extensive that I am surprised any publisher finds it worth his while to add to its volume. This remark applies specially to biography. There is the elaborate autobiography in two bulky volumes which Messrs. Constable published about a year ago. Then there is Mr. W. J. Henderson's admirable monograph, which not only tells Wagner's life-story, but explains his artistic aims, and details the history and meaning of each of his great works. We have also Mr. Lidgley's shorter biography in the Master Musicians series. But Mr. Runciman is a musical critic, with a point of view of his own, and no doubt he will have something fresh and arresting to say in his forthcoming book.

* * * * *

Financially, the past record of the shilling monthly magazine has not been of the brightest. I shall therefore watch with interest the progress of the British Review, a new magazine which Messrs. Williams and Norgate are starting in January. This firm has already achieved a brilliant success with its half-crown quarterly, the Hibbert Journal, and I do not despair of their making the new venture pay its way, though I hardly think any substantial profit need be looked for. The British Review, which will incorporate the Oxford and Cambridge Review, will be Imperialist, but an effort will be made to allow all sides an impartial hearing. Good space is to be given to literature, and first-class writers only will contribute to the pages of the magazine. I have seen the contents-page of the first number. The topics are varied and timely, and the writers include Sir A. T. Quiller-Couch, Mr. Cecil Chesterton, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Mr. Philip Gibbs, and Mr. F. E. Smith, M.P.

* * * * *

Next March celebrations are to be held on a national scale in connection with the centenary of the birth of David Livingstone, the famous African missionary and explorer. The publishers are not unmindful of the fact, and one or two fresh books about Livingstone are already on sale, as well as new editions of old ones. Mr. Murray holds the copyright of Livingstone's "Second Expedition to Africa, 1858-64," and his "Last Journals." If I am not mistaken, a cheap edition of the latter work was published a few months ago. Mr. Murray also publishes a half-crown edition of the best personal Life of Livingstone—that by W. G. Blaikie. It requires, however, to be supplemented by Sir Harry H. Johnston's monograph, which deals specially with Livingstone's exploration work. A shilling edition of this book has just been published by Messrs. Philip.

* * * * *

I hear that two of the best selling books this Christmas season are Captain Amundsen's "The South Pole" and "The Girlhood of Queen Victoria," both published by Mr. Murray. These works are expensive, but there seems to be a public for them. Captain Amundsen's book is already in its second edition, and there is every prospect of "The Girlhood of Queen Victoria" being similarly honoured shortly. This, indeed, is not to be wondered at, for, as the Times' reviewer remarked, it is "one of the most engaging, and to all Britons most engrossing, revelations of Royal life that have ever been published."

* * * * *

It is gratifying to learn, on the high authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the British Museum expenditure on foreign books greatly exceeds that of any other library in Europe. This is as it should be, for, of recent years, the increase of scientific books of high value published on the Continent, particularly in France, Germany, and Italy, has been very appreciable. Mr. Lloyd George was asked in the House of Commons the other day if he would provide in the next estimates for an additional £10,000, so as to enable the British Museum to retain its position as one of the greatest libraries in the world. The Chancellor's reply was of a reassuring nature. X. Y. Z.

LEONARD MERRICK * * * BY M. HAMILTON

THE novel of psychology, the dissection of motive, the narrow presentment of a single phase of character too often crowds out Romance and obliterates humour. And without humour and the flutter of the skirts of chance, adventure, the soul and spirit of Romance cannot live. Life, as the novelist sees it to-day, is, for the most part, fragmentary. We are treated to pages of the burden of Brixton, the morals of Mayfair, the dull and ordered routine of suburban or society life. If the author once in a while kicks over the traces and makes a dash into the land of adventure—the land of swift laughter, quick tears, and valiant comradeship—he takes but a furtive peep, and, unable to breathe the atmosphere, comes back, eager to resume the dissection of a dreary soul.

Across the waste of wordy volumes comes the flash of Leonard Merrick's art, the gleam of a lantern, the echo of a laugh—Romance and the quest of the open road, the road that passes through Bohemia.

